It is a notorious fact that ninety-nine out of a hundred of all the original stories written for the movies are artistically upon the level of the cheapest magazine fiction and that an equal proportion of those based upon other works are reduced to the same level in the course of the process of adaptation. The mechanical perfection of the cinema already furnishes the most violent contrast to its artistic immaturity and the makers of the photo-play can already say more completely than they ought to be able that they know nothing which is worth the saying. The last ten or fifteen years has shown so little improvement in any important direction that there is no good reason for hoping that any such improvement would ever take place, but at least it may reasonably be maintained that under the circumstances every limitation was an advantage and that to accord them a new means of expression before they had begun to make any good use of those which they had is to curse them with a new curse.

Each new mechanical contrivance is greeted in the newspapers by some editorial writer who recalls the first message sent across telegraphic wires: "What hath God Wrought?" Each time it is used the question seems less and less a rhetorical one.

Business Superstitions

AN American business man will tell you that he is individualistic, hard-headed, unemotional, and a worshiper of facts and figures. There are certain signs, however, in Presidential years that show that he may be highly sensitive, not to say superstitious. In each of the twelve election years since 1880, for example, the curve of general business activity has dipped sharply during the spring and summer months. This occurred regardless of the prevailing business conditions in those years. And since the dip was more pronounced than the normal slackening up of business in the summers of other years, it reveals a hesitant and apprehensive attitude on the part of industrial leaders during campaign years.

It has been the pet doctrine of both Republican and Democratic partisans that business men are nervous because they fear a change of political parties in the White House. The ease and effectiveness with which this argument can be used by the Republicans in office—and similarly by the Democrats—makes it popular with both parties. A survey of business conditions made by Editorial Research Reports since 1880 reveals that the various cycles ran their courses without much regard to the changes of administration or legislative control in Washington. From 1880 to 1896 wholesale commodity prices declined almost steadily, while wages rose slowly and steadily throughout the whole period—with a slight setback in 1894 and 1895. Again from 1915 to 1927 practically all the general indexes of prosperity showed a vertical rise with a sudden drop in 1921. Obviously, these changes were not due to any legislation enacted by Congress or to policies pursued by a Democratic or a Republican President. In this connection it is also interesting to note that there were business depressions in the United States during the campaign years 1884, 1900, 1908, 1920, with closely corresponding conditions at the same times in England, France, and Germany. To assume that the Presidential election caused the recession in these years in the United States would be to assume that the election influenced business in the other nations as well.

In a few specific elections, it is true, the economic issues at stake may have caused a temporary tension in the business world. The bitter attack of Cleveland on the protective tariff in the campaign of 1888 undoubtedly scared the vested interests and influenced considerably the business decline. And again the "sound-money" issue between Bryan and McKinley in 1896 caused a great strain in the money market. But violent fights on tariff or money are out of style today, and no similar economic issues have taken their place. Such changes as either party might make in the tariff, while frequently having an important bearing on individual industries, are greatly overestimated as factors in national prosperity. In the opinion of Charles O. Hardy, one of the few authorities who even mention the influence of politics in connection with business cycles: "The popular view enormously exaggerates the business significance of national elections. Except when the question of peace or war arises, comparatively few businesses are greatly affected by such changes of national policy as follow the success of one or the other of the leading parties." It is time for the business man to quiet his nerves and forget his superstitions about Presidential elections.

It Seems to Heywood Broun

Poor unfortunate Bobby Jones! The tragic situation of this young man should rouse the pity of all golfers. Unfortunately nothing more tangible than pity, or some kindred emotion, is within our power. In the words of the ballad: "We can't give you anything but love, Bobby." Last week he stood lonely as any Alexander upon the twenty-seventh green and the match had already ended. Jones has become so good that his opponents no longer carry him far enough to constitute a brisk walk. In coming to the final round Bobby beat Beck 14 up and 13 to play. And Finlay fell at 13 and 12. In other words Bobby Jones had a margin of thirty-seven holes in his last three matches for the championship. It was his fourth amateur title within five years.

It seems to me entirely reasonable to maintain that the young man from Georgia is not to be envied. All the golfing commentators inform us that he is a sportsman of the highest type. As such he can hardly enjoy the fact that his victories come so easily and by so wide a margin. Such triumphs can hardly be more thrilling than shooting chickens in a hen-coop. The stirring excitement of a close encounter is practically unknown to Jones. Only in little eighteen-hole jaunts is his supremacy ever threatened.

In the beginning it must have been that Bobby loved the game of golf. He began to play while still a youngster and he was good enough for tournaments while yet in short trousers. But those were the days before the blight of constant victory had fixed its icy grip about him. Upon some small foundation the legend grew that Jones was a lad much given to tantrums. History records that once or twice he said things and there is also a rumor that when sorely tried he might hurl his clubs about in anger. At least there is no doubt that in the days of his youth Bobby played golf with passion.

And no game is worth while unless it can enlist some fragment of that spirit. It is well enough to work and fight and love with a certain detachment, but in play a man must give his heart as well as back and shoulders. After the downfall of Napoleon some ex-Etonian cricketer might well have mourned because he could no longer perform in the game with all his old-time skill and fire. And he might well have remarked to some group of fellows also grown slack and seedy: "We lost that match upon the battlefield of Waterloo."

In fact many morals may be drawn from the sad predicament of Bobby Jones. He has succeeded in reducing to an absurdity the American passion for efficiency. In all the magazines and newspapers advertisements scream at us and urge improvement. We are asked in forceful language to become masters of public oratory, of French, and banjo playing. But what shall it profit a man if he becomes so good that he can no longer enjoy contacts with the average folk who fill the land and are not to be in any way avoided? As a child my parents and mentors tried to keep me away from the highly interesting stories written by Horatio Alger, Jr. These books, they said, were trash and would spoil my taste for good literature. Although a dutiful child, I did not obey this particular injunction wholly. My intuition in the matter was more wise than the parental theory.

If I were one tuned only to receive the words of the great in poetry and fiction, most evenings with books would be a little dreary. Not once in ten years, or maybe twenty, would a new novel appear to which I could commit my attention and enthusiasm. As it is I suffer trash quite gladly and, like any statesman or captain of industry, I can sit down and while the nights away with a good detective story.

One of the triumphs achieved by Bobby Jones seems to me to increase sterility of spirit. All sporting writers go in quite a bit for morals, and they have pointed out that not only has the young golfer conquered every competitor but he has also won complete mastery over himself. No longer do the clubs or cuss words fly, no matter where a shot may land him. Which means that Jones has become a machine completely. Both his drives and his emotions go always in a straight line. At twenty-four the man is a myth, a superman, a legend. He is one of the gods and should always play with that other Olympian, Par, the son of Colonel Bogey. But even in that there is not much fun for Bobby because he can beat Par almost as readily as flesh and blood opponents.

Golf, of course, means far more to me than it does to Jones. When I stand upon the first tee and nervously waggle a wooden club, a world of potentialities lies before me. A slice is possible or a hook. The chances of topping the ball are excellent. At times I hit behind it. It is not wholly unknown to swing and miss entirely. The entire course is my oyster. By no means am I restricted to the middle of the fairway assigned to the first hole. There is always the possibility that the shot may go off sharply at a tangent and land in the lake which guards the eighteenth green.

Very possibly I suffer more during any given round than would an expert. But there is no pleasure without pain. A straight drive of one hundred and eighty yards, a mashie pitch for Bobby, is enough to make the entire afternoon a day of joy as far as I'm concerned. No single shot can do as much for Jones. He knows almost precisely where the ball will go when he steps up to hit it. Of course there is upon occasion some slight deviation from the plan, but generally it is not enough to notice. Golf in the case of Jones takes on a deadly monotony. He whales the ball a mile and then he takes an iron and pops it up to the green close to the cup. The only issue is whether or not he can hole the putt. And so it seems hardly worth his while to tramp over hills and down the valleys. He might as well linger on the clubhouse lawn and amble round the clock course.

Jones will never know, as I do, how beautiful are the wild flowers which grow deep in the rough. He has not seen closely the glory of autumn foliage in expeditions into the primeval forest in the search for slices. And I have gone down into gullies and lakes and even through the window of a quaint New England dwelling. If some magician could give me entire the game of golf as played by Bobby Jones I would not take it. Still maybe I could be persuaded to accept his driving and his iron play. And perhaps I would take over his putting, too, but only every other week-end.

HEYWOOD BROWN

Curtis's Oily Hands

By FREDERIC BABCOCK

SENATOR CHARLES CURTIS'S son is an attorney for Harry F. Sinclair. He got the job, through his father's influence, about the time Teapot Dome began erupting, the job consisting of making a saving to the Sinclair company in its income taxes. While drawing a salary from Sinclair, young Curtis took an active part in getting the Republican Vice-Presidential nomination for his father at the Kansas City convention.

The Senator himself either is or has been, by virtue of his holdings in Sinclair stock, a partner in Sinclair's business dealings, honorable and otherwise. Curtis is a long-time close personal and political friend of Sinclair, and for many years has ridden into office on money furnished by the oil owner. He thus stands heavily indebted to Sinclair (provided he has not, by his official acts in Washington, already paid off the debt).

Why Sinclair has gone out of his way to befriend the Senator, what payment he has exacted in return, and how the Senator, though singed in the Teapot Dome investigation, escaped the holocaust, is left to the imagination. A vivid imagination is not needed.

Sinclair (some of you may recall) several years ago corrupted a sizable portion of a federal administration in order that he might rob the nation of its oil reserves, and later wiped out the Republican Party's deficit with a part of his profits in that deal. Knowing that some evil-minded persons might misconstrue Harry's generous motives in employing the son of the Senate floor-leader and Vice-Presidential candidate, I thought the only fair thing to do was to go to this son and find out the truth.

I wrote the city editor of Arthur Capper's paper in Topeka and asked for the son's address. No response. It appeared that the young man was somewhere in Chicago. I searched for the name Harry K. Curtis in the Chicago Bar Association directory and in the Chicago telephone directory. No results. The only Harry K. Curtis listed in the city directory was denominated a painter at 2347 North Clark Street, and I felt that he wouldn't quite fill the bill. I appealed to the Sinclair offices, and learned that Mr. Curtis was on the pay roll there, but repeated telephone calls brought the information that he was "not in." Finally I located him in the expensive Lincoln Park West apartment hotel, and made arrangements to meet him.

At the executive offices of the Sinclair Refining Company, McCormick Building, 332 South Michigan Avenue, Chicago, Mr. Curtis greeted me with cordiality even if without manifest enthusiasm. I found him to be a rather large man in his middle or late thirties—a ruddy-faced, hearty man, with unmistakable evidences of his Indian ancestry.

Yes, he said, he was Senator Curtis's son and he was connected with the Sinclair interests. But this connection dated back to 1909, when, as a youth just out of high school, he left his home in Topeka and went to Independence, Kansas, there to work for the Sinclair boys, Harry and Earl, in the First National Bank. His father and Harry were old friends, and Sinclair always had taken a personal interest in the boy. The elder Curtis was serving his first term in the Senate at the time.

From Independence young Curtis went to the University of Michigan, and from there, after he had been graduated from the College of Law, he went to Detroit, where he opened a general practice in 1914. Three years later, following the passage of the income-tax law, he began to specialize in taxation matters, and in 1921 entered the service of the government as a tax expert in charge of the St. Louis office. At that time Sinclair had nobody handling the legal end of the work of preparing his tax returns.

In July, 1923, young Curtis received a wire offering him a position supervising the making of these returns for the Sinclair company. He accepted. His job then became a matter of checking up on the legal aspects of virtually all of the company's taxation.

"Was the wire from Mr. Sinclair himself?" I asked.

"It seems to me it was—either from him or from Mr. Stanford, general counsel," he replied.

"Well, then, was the initiative taken by your father, or by Mr. Sinclair, in getting you a job with the Sinclair people?" was my next question.

"Mostly by Mr. Sinclair," he answered. "I don't think father had a whole lot to do with it."

I let that "whole lot to do with it" pass, and asked another question.

"That was about the time the Teapot Dome case was starting, wasn't it?"

"The lease had been signed in April of that year," he answered. "The investigation hadn't yet started, but"—he added naively—"we saw it coming."

I let that pass also.

After La Follette, Walsh, Norris, and other Senatorial "busybodies" had started prying into the leasing of the Wyoming naval reserve, which thereupon was to take its niche in the Hall of Fame, the young man conferred with his father on the advisability of keeping his job. He asked the Senator if the latter wished him to sever his connection with Sinclair. The Senator made no such request, but advised that, since he (the Senator) was in politics, it would be better if the son had no dealings with the government on behalf of his employer. So the son moved to Chicago and became one of Sinclair's district attorneys.

"My work here consists of drawing leases, answering questions in case of dispute with customers, going over contracts, and engaging in general corporation practice," he told me. "The country is divided into several districts, and there are one or more such attorneys for each. There are four of us in Chicago. My salary is the same as that of each of the others. I have nothing to do with the government. I try to stay away from it; in fact, I do stay away."

I had been told that Mr. Curtis's duties were only nominal; that he was drawing a large salary for doing virtually nothing, that he appeared in court almost never, was not known to others of his profession in my home city, and that the real reason for his employment by Sinclair was all too obvious. But he was so earnest and so able in his presentation of the case in behalf of the worthiness of his job, that I did not bring up unpleasant topics. I adopted another tack.

"Is it true that your father has grown wealthy through his dealings in oil?" I asked.

"I never heard that he was wealthy," he replied.

Balked at that opening, I resorted to desperate means. I threw out a wild query—and it went home. I had no inkling that Senator Curtis had so much as a single share of Sinclair stock. But it would do no harm to ask.

"Is it true that your father is a large stockholder in Sinclair Oil?"

"No," he said, and hesitated. Then he added: "He has had Sinclair stock, but—I think—he has sold it all."

That frank admission was all I could ask for along that line, and so I again changed the subject.

"Did you have any hand in your father's nomination for Vice-President?"

"I was on duty at his headquarters," he answered, with a show of justifiable pride. "I've been around quite a bit, and know lots of people, and I steered them around where it would do the most good."

"Mr. Sinclair has always supported your father?"

"Oh, yes, he always contributed to father's campaigns out in Kansas."

"And you have no compunction about keeping this job?"

"Why should I?" he retorted. "At least I have definite work to do. It's not like Archie Roosevelt, who capitalized his father's name to get a job with Sinclair and then had to be shoved around, from department to department, because they couldn't find any work he could do."

"Supposing the opposition to your father exposes your connection with Sinclair. Then what?"

"Let 'em come. We're ready for 'em. We'll come right back at 'em and spring something on the Democrats, and it'll be a lot worse."

A lot worse than what? I hadn't the heart to ask him. Once more, I let it pass.

An open letter to Senator Curtis:

As the clans were gathering at Kansas City you proclaimed that any ticket headed by Hoover would at once be placed on the defensive. You must have known whereof you spoke! In March, 1924, it was brought out by the Teapot Dome investigators that Ira E. Bennett, editor of Edward B. McLean's Washington Post, had sent this telegram to his chief:

Saw Principal. Delivered message. He says greatly appreciates and sends regards to you and Mrs. McLean. There will be no rocking of the boat and no resignations. He expects reaction from unwarranted political attacks.

The "Principal," it was made known, was yourself. The charge was not denied. You have never satisfactorily explained it to this day. At that time you were the Republican whip of the Senate, and already scheming to succeed Henry Cabot Lodge as majority leader. No doubt even then you had your eye on the Presidency.

In the light of what we now know about you and your affiliations, and—our full cognizance of how you tried to stifle the investigation that would involve both you and your oily benefactor, perhaps it will be best for all concerned if you will at this time retire from the ticket and from political life as gracefully as you can.

Socrates Sits Upon the Log

By LELAND HAMILTON JENKS

IF there is hope for an intellectual renaissance in the United States, one of its most promising signs is the zeal with which the college world is engaged in self-criticism. It is a poor college that is not trying, if very feebly, to follow some such trail as those blazed by Wilson at Princeton, Meiklejohn at Amherst and Wisconsin, Aydelotte at Swarthmore, Morgan at Antioch, and Hamilton at Robert Brookings. The more venturesome of the many experimenters are not only hoping to reorganize the curriculum but are also seeking to break through the routine of the time-honored lecture-and-quiz methods of instruction. None perhaps has broken so completely with classroom tradition in this respect as has Rollins College at Winter Park, Florida, under the leadership of Hamilton Holt.

It is nothing new for Rollins to be a pioneer. When the college was founded in 1885 under the auspices of a group of Congregationalists from New England, it was the only institution of higher learning in Florida. It was the first liberal college in the Far South. From the first it was devoted to the old Amherst idea of being a Christian college which imposed no religious test upon either faculty or students. Through many difficulties the college was kept true to this generous faith. And last year it had an opportunity to renew publicly its convictions when it was the only college in Florida to oppose the threatened anti-evolution bill. The clear-cut, reasonable statement of the views of the Rollins faculty produced a marked effect upon the legislature. Rollins is living proof that a liberal college can exist and grow in the most fundamentalist part of the South.

Three years ago the college undertook a further mission. Dr. Holt, former editor of the Independent, co-founder of the League to Enforce Peace, and leader in numerous enterprises for international cooperation, was offered the Rollins presidency. Although his career had thus far been that of a publicist, President Holt had some well-defined ideas about education. And his freshness to the academic world emboldened him to launch an attempt at Rollins to get back to first principles in the relations of teachers and students.

Briefly, Dr. Holt proposed to banish the lecture and recitation wholly from the campus, as the normal methods of instruction. He proposed to provide each department and instructor with a laboratory or workshop, equipped with the tools, books, and conveniences for study. Here it was hoped that students and teachers would work together, the former learning especially from the contagion of common intellectual undertakings. It was a thoroughgoing application to the college field of what is frequently called the "project-method" in discussions of secondary education.

"We would have continuous and intimate association of professors and students in the working period of the day," declared President Holt. "Every student should spend the entire morning in intellectual work, two hours of the afternoon in field work, and perhaps an hour or an hour and a half in the evening in receptive work and play."

In working out Dr. Holt's ideals, several modifications were made at Rollins. The financial condition of the college made it impossible to put the plant in ideal shape for the effective working of the plan in all its aspects. Instructors of national prestige entered their rooms at the inauguration of the experiment two years ago to find some of them without a scrap of furniture. The floor and window-ledges were for a few weeks a very real equivalent of Mark Hopkins's hypothetical log. Yet this very lack of standardized equipment has helped to destroy the obstacles to natural, human contacts between students and instructors. And instruction has come at Rollins to be a matter of conference, suggestion, and guidance, with the student placed increasingly upon his own initiative and held responsible for results.

Thus the student enrolling in chemistry may be handed a text and a book of exercises. "Here is your year's work; go to it," says the professor in effect. "When you strike a snag, come into the office for a talk. When you are ready for a quiz, it will be ready for you." In a literature course, discussion by the Socratic method is the principal feature of the class period. One professor delivers a brief lecture embodying original material at each meeting of the class, and devotes the remainder of the period to individual conferences. Another divides his class into sections for the purpose of making group reports to the class as a whole upon principal topics of discussion. In one history class recently the instructor devoted a portion of the period to individual conferences upon essays previously written, while the bulk of the class engaged in the preparation of another set of papers, with the aid of the departmental library. Presently half a dozen students were discovered on the veranda, heatedly arguing the reasons for the fall of Rome. The instructor joined the group, and ultimately the discussion attracted the attention of the entire class. In another course the instructor lectures informally when the students decide that they need encouragement or enlightenment with respect to a complicated situation. In the education department, customarily the stronghold of aridity and insipidity, the instructor has been approaching problems of educational psychology by way of Plato and Dante's "Inferno."

Whatever Dr. Holt has started at Rollins, it is not a cut-and-dried system. He has given able instructors who were dissatisfied with older methods an opportunity to experiment with more direct means of promoting the intellectual and aesthetic development of their students. And the admitted results have encouraged the indefinite continuance of the experiment.

"What do you do when your class meets?" I have been asked by anxious colleagues at other institutions. This is the precise difference between Rollins and the average college. The class does not meet as such. Individuals come to the department room for reading and research, to make written or oral report, for conference with the instructor, to attend an announced discussion or lecture. If they do not come they must be accounted for. But they are self-starters. The students decide for themselves how they will spend their time, unless they are deficient. When at rare intervals the instructor assumes the role of taskmaster, the event is impressive for its novelty. It is not the duty of students to run if the instructor does not put in an appearance within ten minutes of the beginning of the period.

They have their work cut out for them; and it is their loss if they do not do it when it can be best performed.

It was not easy at the outset to bring students and teachers to realize the full implications of this sweeping break with time-honored college teaching methods. To assist the conference idea in making its way upon the campus, a departure was instituted in the length of class periods. Instead of meeting for three one-hour periods a week, classes were scheduled for the same number of periods, two hours in length, for the same credit. It was assumed that college students, who are generally supposed to study two hours in preparation for every hour spent in class, actually spend only one hour or less in preparation. Hence it was proposed that students should perform all of their required activities in connection with any course during the two hours scheduled for contact with their instructors in the classroom. If they wished to excel, or to master their courses more rapidly than their fellows, they might do so after school hours, in their rooms or elsewhere. The college day, however, was divided into three such conference periods, which, together with a period for athletics in the afternoon, were expected to place the required activities of the school upon an "eight-hour business day."

It must be said that this attempted analogy between college education and the New York business office has not been free from difficulties. Experienced educators have viewed it at all times with distrust, as based upon erroneous premises. The problems of attention involved have been solved at times at the expense of content in the courses. The organization of college work about the average performance of the average student as a standard is out of line with contemporary trends in progressive education. Moreover, the element of supervised study seemingly involved in the eight-hour day principle is at war with the conference ideal itself. And as the college attracts to it, as it is doing, the type of student best able to become master of his own education, this particular mechanism is certain to undergo considerable modification. It has already been abandoned in advanced courses, which are being run along seminar or autonomous lines. And in practice it is safe to say that there is not a student on the campus who actually performs all of his required college work, not to say all that he is moved to do, within the strict and exclusive limits of the office-workers' day. The conference idea will triumph over the time-clock as well as over the lock-step.

It is particularly with reference to the curriculum, however, that the limited number of periods provided in the schedule has proved embarrassing. Because of it the college has thus far done little toward wrestling with the great problem of what to teach, which Dr. Meiklejohn has so adventurously undertaken at Wisconsin. In this respect, as in many others, Rollins stands so far in the same shoes as dozens of her compeers. The college has its unsolved questions of admission, of discipline, of student activities, of fraternities, of academic tenure, of collegiate self-government. Many of these questions are now being studied at the initiative of a group of the faculty of the college. Rollins boasts for president a man who, while campaigning for endowment, indorses the doctrine of evolution in Florida and public ownership in New York City. What college has better right to be proud of its liberalism? Who can doubt that it will be the questing spirit of Socrates rather than the dogmatism of Mark Hopkins which will sit at the end of the Rollins log?

What Happened in Maine

By PERCIVAL MUSGRAVE

Augusta, Maine, September 14

ONE Maine newspaper had the effrontery to declare the week before the State election that "As Maine Goes" was a myth, and to cite the two Cleveland and the second Wilson elections in substantiation of the discrepancy between State and national verdicts in Presidential years. But apparently this was a still small voice. The ballyhoo to indorse Republican prosperity, to rebuke the attempt to re-enthronize King Alcohol (whose first dethronement by Maine is the State spell-binders' pride), to repel the attempt of foreign and Tammanyized New York to lay its tiger claws on the nation—and, above all, the whispered campaign against the menace of a "foreign potentate"—drowned out all other considerations. "Rum, Romanism, and Rebellion" (the rebellion of those who would upset our perfect order) proved—this time in reverse—as potent as against that famous native son, Blaine of Maine.

Regularity and conservatism triumphed. The sentiment that in the same week in neighboring New Hampshire nominated the gubernatorial candidate, Charles W. Tobey, of the progressive wing of Republicanism against the standpat Ora Brown, supported by Senators Moses and Keyes; that in far-away Washington rejected Poindexter, the renegade progressive—all this was totally lacking in the State whose motto is "I direct." Senator Frederick Hale, whose slogan is service, who in Washington attends the minutest wants of his constituents with Sears-Roebuck diligence, emerged unscathed from his opponents' attacks. Both in the primary and the campaign proper his votes in favor of Newberry, the Fall oil policy, and Vare and Smith—particularly the last—his reactionary labor record, his votes against the utilities investigation and government retention of Muscle Shoals, but in favor of turning over the bankrupt Cape Cod Canal to the government, were brought into the open. He thereupon received the largest majority ever accorded a United States Senator in Maine. Colonel William Tudor Gardiner, of Gardiner—a country squire, with Harvard polish and democratic manners—who avoided discussing any issues but let it be known that he favored export of hydro-electric power, which the power companies want, was likewise elected by the largest majority ever given a governor in Maine.

By the election Maine is apparently headed for the category of one-party States, like those of the Solid South, and without the saving grace of a vigorous insurgency which prevails in the nominally Republican States of the Northwest. The Democrats lost not only every one of the sixteen counties, but every county officer save one, lost their lone seat in the State Senate, and in the House dwindled from twenty-two to sixteen out of a total membership of 151.

The power issue, though taken up both in the Republican primaries and in the campaign itself by the losing candidates, made no appreciable impression on the voters. The issue which was variously termed "Insullism" or export versus retention of hydro-electric power, had its origin a score of years ago when Governor Bert M. Fernald brought about the enactment of a law forbidding the export by corporations of Maine's hydro-electric power without special permit. For twenty years the power interests have assaulted the law, first with little effect, but since the entry of the Insull interests into Maine with apparently increasing success. Since 1909 every governor has opposed "export." In 1922 Governor Percival P. Baxter, who succeeded to the governorship by the death of Frederick H. Parkhurst, campaigned for reelection successfully on that issue. Against a rising pressure Governor Ralph O. Brewster vetoed the Smith-Wyman export bill, frankly sponsored by the power companies, and threatened to take the matter to the people on a referendum if the measure were repassed over his veto. Sufficient votes to repass were lacking. But Governor Brewster had earned the enmity of the power interests and the Republican machine, which are closely identified, and in the Senatorial primary was defeated by a somewhat less than two-to-one majority. A feature of the campaign was the complete about-face of former Governor Baxter, who, long hated by the machine for his avowed position as "the people's defender," swallowed all his previous utterances and clambered on the standpat band-wagon. His political ambitions within the State were ended in a special election for the Senatorship in 1926 by a crushing defeat at the hands of Arthur R. Gould, who was as liberal in his campaign expenditures as Mr. Baxter was not. It is no secret that Mr. Baxter is now an active aspirant for a diplomatic post. He needs the State party organization's support to get it.

In the Republican gubernatorial primary, two out of four candidates made retention of Maine's hydro-electric power their issue. One of them weakened before the end of the campaign, but a third, who had long indorsed the power companies' views, switched to the other position in mid-campaign on the ground that he had discovered the Insulls were not to be trusted. Faith in that candidate's sudden conversion did not appear to be widespread. Colonel Gardiner, who, beyond an original declaration in favor of exporting "surplus" power, had conducted a campaign of handshaking, received half again as many votes as his three opponents combined. A broken arm might have cramped his style, but none of his opponents thought of that. His political dryness and his record of personal wetness were also used quietly where each would be most effective.

A rift in the local Democratic Party was apparent at its State convention. The pledging of the delegation to Smith alienated the Drys and others—not so dry—whom the prohibition issue served as a cloak for their religious prejudices. The party platform, in a plank written by a power attorney and former party leader, denounced the power issue as "demagogic" and declared for the export of power. The convention nominated a little-known youngster from Rockland, Edward Carl Moran, Jr., a few years ago a famous Bowdoin debater, who had distinguished himself at the convention by a stirring address in favor of pledging the delegation for Smith. Shortly afterward he repudiated the State party's power plank and declared for the retention of Maine's power and an investigation of the rates which the power companies were charging. He campaigned eloquently but vainly on that issue.

The Democratic National Committee evidently considered Maine hopeless. Previous experience likewise, it appears, had taught it that funds sent to Maine for campaign purposes had often not been disbursed by the recipient politicians. The committee sent but $5,000 to Maine—not even cigar money—specifically directing that it be used for registration of voters only. Elections in Maine as elsewhere are won on money. Moreover, Moran labored under the handicap of his name, which the Protestant voters in large numbers deemed to be “Irish Catholic.” He is a Protestant, while his running mate for the Senatorship, Herbert E. Holmes, is a Catholic. Each won and lost votes through mistaken conceptions of his faith on the part of the voters. The falling off in the Democratic vote, while the Republican was almost the same as in 1924, indicates that the striking results on September 10 were due to the non-voting of Democrats rather than to the swing to Republicanism. The Portland Press-Herald offers evidence that the abstention was wholly among the women.

Although the winners declared that national issues alone were involved and that the local power issue was not an issue at all, the power interests had it all their own way. It is on the cards that a power-export bill will again pass the Legislature, and will not be vetoed by Governor Gardiner. The result on a referendum, which is bound to follow (for it can be compelled by 10,000 signatories), is not easy to forecast. Only one daily in Maine, a newcomer less than a year old, the Portland Evening News, appears to have had the temerity to challenge the power interests. The power-trust organs—whose owners are a past Republican National Committeeman and his wife, the present Republican National Committeewoman—promise reduced taxes to Maine through the additional revenue to the State from the great profits which will accrue to the power companies when these are permitted to sell their surplus and as yet undeveloped power in Massachusetts. The Portland Evening News vigorously combats these claims, denies there would be any surplus to export if rates were equitable, points to the discrepancy between the prices of power to Maine consumers and that promised to Massachusetts potential purchasers, charges that the purpose of export is to remove Maine's power from State to federal control, and attacks the financial structure of the Insull corporations. It recently revealed that the Maine Insull companies—which have absorbed every important producer of hydro-electricity in the State but one—are controlled by the New England Public Service Company, which in turn is controlled by the National Electric Power Company, which in turn is controlled by the Middle West Utilities Company. Samuel Insull is the directing genius of all these interlocking and overlapping groups. The Portland Evening News charges that this too-heavy super-structure rests on the shoulders of the Maine consumer. If that be the case, one might judge that the Maine citizens are, paraphrasing slightly the phrase coined by Lincoln Steffens about Philadelphia years ago, “exploited and contented.”

Hoover sentiment is predominant in Maine. His personal popularity among the rank and file is unmistakable. Before his nomination the more conservative organs of Republican opinion were only lukewarm in his favor. The Portland Evening News, which came out early and vigorously for his nomination, sought vainly to secure a Maine

Republican delegation pledged to him. Now the press of the State has become unanimous for him. No Democratic dailies survive. There have been none since the days of the Portland Argus, when in the fine flush of power in the wake of Bull-Moosery, Democratic newspapers existed also in Waterville, Lewiston, and Bangor. They extolled the virtues of the party of Jefferson and Jackson, while two Democratic Governors, first Plaisted and then Curtis, ruled at Augusta and Obadiah Gardner and Charles F. Johnson were in the United States Senate. The dwindling of Maine's Democracy coincides with the vanishing of its newspapers. Therein lies the truest approach to a parallelism between Maine and the nation.

The Way of Boston

By GARDNER JACKSON

CERTAIN individuals, struck by the significance of the case of Sacco and Vanzetti, thought it important to have a memorial meeting on the anniversary of the execution, August 23. They gave their names to the enterprise—such people as Samuel Eliot Morison, the historian of Harvard, Dr. Alice Hamilton of the Harvard Medical School, Mrs. Gertrude L. Winslow, and others. They said: “We will hold the meeting in the Old South Meeting House. That place has historic associations exactly suited to the purpose and is in the hands of liberals.”

Speakers were secured, Dr. Alexander Meiklejohn and others. Scant thought was given to the possibility of a refusal by the Old South board of managers. Application was made in person by Miss Catharine Huntington and myself to Richard W. Hale, who is treasurer of the Old South organization and the man to whom one applies for a permit to use the Meeting House.

The discussion was long. Mr. Hale suggested that free speech required that both sides of a controversial issue be represented. We urged Mr. Hale to invite Governor Fuller, President Lowell, and any others of that side to speak at the memorial meeting. Nothing would satisfy us more than to have them, we said. Mr. Hale agreed, in effect, that he was rhetorical in making the suggestion. “We know,” he said, “that they want to forget it.”

Confessing his sympathy with our undertaking, Mr. Hale said that it was futile to call for a vote of the board of managers. He offered a check for $25 to rent a vacant lot on which to hold the meeting. He said we could never get a hall. If the vacant lot meeting was interrupted by the authorities, he would urge the board of managers to give the Old South Meeting House to us for a meeting to protest such interference.

He pointed out that such a meeting as we wished would be classed as controversial, and that if the Old South was used for it the managers of the Old South would be regarded by the public as taking our side. “It's illogical but it's so,” he admitted. He called Courtney Crocker, another of the managers, on the telephone. He told him what he had told us and asked Mr. Crocker if he did not agree. He hung up the receiver and told us that Mr. Crocker agreed.

He turned to Miss Huntington with a hypothetical case. Supposing, he said, the Old South was controlled by the Quakers and some group outside were considering the question of whether women should be allowed to dance naked on Boston Common. Did Miss Huntington think the Old South should be thrown open by the Quakers to such a discussion?

Professor Morison went to Mr. Hale and Mr. Hale reconsidered. He sent out by mail to the board of managers a voting blank on the proposition of giving the hall to the Sacco-Vanzetti group for the meeting providing they could secure no other place in Boston. The hall, which is dedicated to the purpose, among others, of memorial meetings and is considered the final stamping ground of liberalism in Boston, includes the Mayor of Boston, the Governor, and others among its board of managers, ex officio. With the voting blank Mr. Hale, the sympathizer with the Sacco-Vanzetti meeting, sent a letter saying he and Mr. Crocker disapproved of allowing the use of the hall for the meeting. Announcement of the vote has not been made.

We set about seeking other halls. John P. Englert, Superintendent of Public Buildings for the City of Boston, told Miss Huntington he would see the Mayor about Faneuil Hall. He seemed agitated. He said he was intimidated after the refusal of Faneuil Hall for a meeting last summer at the time of the execution. He said two men jumped out at him when he was putting his car in his garage at his home in Hyde Park. In spite of this he would see what he could do. He did not want to refuse, he told Miss Huntington.

It seems to me [he wrote some days later] that this whole affair was very regrettable and that it would be inadvisable to start any agitation either of sympathy or defense, and, furthermore, Faneuil Hall belongs to the people as a whole. There are undoubtedly many more taxpayers of the city against the reopening of this case than there are sympathizers, and their wishes must be considered in the premises.

Considering the foregoing I regret that I cannot allow you the use of the hall on that date for this purpose.

William E. Blodgett, chairman of the trustees of Ford Memorial (Ford Hall), wrote: "We do not believe any good purpose will be served by holding such a meeting, and we decline to rent the hall for it." The superintendent of Tremont Temple, F. F. Plimpton, wrote: "In our opinion a meeting of the kind you propose will be construed as a further criticism of our courts; therefore we cannot permit the use of Tremont Temple for the proposed meeting."

So it went all along the line, including the churches. Temple Israel was refused because the trustees open their halls to nothing but religious or Jewish meetings. Theaters were refused because of repairs and cleaning in process. Once Miss Huntington listed the speakers, including Edna St. Vincent Millay, without stating immediately the purpose of the meeting. The manager of the theater assured her she could, of course, have his theater. Then Miss Huntington mentioned Sacco and Vanzetti. The manager said he would have to make his final answer by telephone. It turned out to be that the repairs would take longer than he thought. The manager of Steinert Hall consented, and after we had sent out letters withdrew his consent. Under questioning he said it was either the Mayor's office or the State police that had made him withdraw his consent. City Censor Casey at the Mayor's office denied influencing him. So did the office of General Foote of the State police. Discrepancies. Whose? The Symphony Hall management would state no reasons for refusing.

Finally, M. Furash of the Scenic Auditorium in the South End agreed to let us use his hall if we could assure him the police would not penalize him. John S. Codman of the American Civil Liberties Union got such an assurance from Michael H. Crowley, Superintendent of Police. So it was arranged with Mr. Furash and his son—Mr. Furash, a Jewish immigrant, the only hall-owner in Boston willing to rent his premises for a Sacco-Vanzetti meeting.

In the Driftway

THE picturesque country roads are going. And there are many persons, chiefly summer visitors to the country, who bitterly bemoan the fact. What a pity, they say, to chop down the trees, to widen the banks, to dig up the leaning ferns, to cut the clinging locust and alder branches, to straighten out the curves and flatten out the humps. Of course there may be a little mud in the spring, maybe, but what is a little mud to the beauty of the old, narrow, winding road? The farmer, of course, has a different answer to make. To him the mud makes a lot of difference, as do frozen ruts in the fall and snow-piled banks in winter. And on the whole, although he is as alive as anyone to the importance of preserving the country from "modern civilization," the Drifter is inclined to agree with him.

* * * * *

NOR is the new, paved road without beauty. It is glistening black asphalt or smooth white concrete; its curves are wide and open, its hills sweep nobly up and down. A road looked at from above has a flashing beauty, a beauty that belongs exclusively to a new age. Lately the Drifter has been on the spot while a new road was in the making. He has only admiration for the process, even though parts of it may be painful to the man who is forced to drive his car over ruts and around trucks. First come the wood-choppers, widening out the shoulders, cutting down fine trees, it may be, but letting the sun in nevertheless. After them the steam shovel marches steadily, biting great holes in the banks, tearing out roots and rocks, moving earth at a pace that twenty men could not equal. With the shovel goes the blasting. The hills rock and resound; the stones fly; trees are split in two, as if from a bombardment with heavy artillery. But the road goes on relentlessly. The rock-crusher and the pick are busy; the shovel wielded by hand makes a smooth bank or digs out a bed for a recalcitrant brook. At last the paving-stone is thrown out with a fine, swinging stroke of the shovel, the same stroke, by the way, that used to broadcast grain. And at last, like a king over the magic carpet that has been spread for him, majestically, slowly, inevitably comes the roller, mashing it all down flat under his great feet.

* * * * *

IF the roller is like a king, the trucks that carry sand and gravel are his herd of elephants. The Drifter has always suspected that a truck-driver was permanently attached to the monster he guides; that indeed he does not guide it, but merely moves as it is pleased to move, and stops when in its wisdom it sees fit to stop. But if the truck-drivers are less—or perhaps in a machine age more—than men, the gangs that follow them with a shovel are men indeed. Ajax the Drifter sees every day, bossing his gang with a sweep of the arm; Ichabod in the flesh drives the caterpillar tractor. He saw the Walrus—without the Carpenter—walking to work this morning, and the shaved, crimson head of a prisoner from Devil's Island burns under the noonday sun. A road is an adventure; even if it were not successful it would be worth watching. But it is successful. Motors that travel on it fairly sing their satisfaction. Even the Drifter, who has expressed from time to time an acute dislike of automobiles, cannot but rejoice when he glides smoothly and swiftly over the new road.

The Issue Is Tolerance

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Ardent admirer of Norman Thomas, supporter of Debs in 1920 and of La Follette in 1924, disillusioned Wilsonian, scion of a Republican and Protestant family, believer in the real need of a third party in American politics, I am nevertheless going to cast my vote in the coming election for Al Smith.

Mr. Thomas is by all odds the best candidate the Socialist Party in the United States has ever nominated for the office of President. It would be a pleasure to contribute to a large vote of confidence and tribute to him personally, but such a vote at this particular time is a gesture of futility. Even more, it is a vote to send to the White House a Quaker who believes in a huge navy (as Dr. Butler has put it, in the policy of "swagger"), who five years ago waged a fantastic and futile "rubber war" against Great Britain, who has played a conspicuous role in the vicious policy of government control of foreign loans, and who has presided over an aggressive Department of Commerce maintaining abroad an elaborate system of commercial espionage in the interest of American business. It is no exaggeration to say that, with the exception of Belgium, there is no country in Europe in which Mr. Hoover's name recalls pleasant memories. As to the backward areas of the world, Mr. Hoover has personally acted for the greater part of his life as one of the advance agents of that economic imperialism which is one of the principal causes of the war system. How much sympathy can the Chinese, for example, expect from this man? Is there any hope that Mr. Hoover's policy on Russia will be other than obscurantist? Al Smith will have a great deal to learn about foreign relations, but he will have nothing to unlearn. He will appoint, it may safely be assumed, a capable Secretary of State, whereas Mr. Hoover will probably be his own Secretary of State and in the long run will be dominated by the efficient bureaucracy in the Department of State.

Al Smith's Tammany affiliations are admittedly unfortunate. But Tammany Hall has not dominated the government of the State of New York during his four terms as governor. It has not prevented Al Smith from giving the State the most satisfactory code of welfare legislation in the Union. And if Al Smith has Tammany, Mr. Hoover has Thompson and Vare and Bascom Slemp, who are not so far removed from Sinclair, Doheny, Fall, and Hays in their practical influence on politics; Mr. Hoover accepts support from the former group and does not specifically repudiate the latter.

The real issue in this campaign, however, is tolerance. This may not be altogether obvious to the resident of New York City. But to a New Yorker transplanted perforce into an up-State community it becomes of prime significance. I am not speaking alone of religious toleration—although Protestant pulpits are booming with denunciations of a candidate who happens to be a Catholic, whereas Catholic priests are silent lest their words be taken as orders direct from the Pope! I am speaking of a kind of tolerance which is free from snobbery—which is not afraid of brown derbies, a nasal twang, or an unobtrusive wife. There has suddenly sprung up a new qualification for office in the United States—that the President must be a college graduate! As a professor in a great American university, this strikes me as the choicest sort of nonsense—Al Smith's education in dealing with men and women is much more to be valued than the sort of book-knowledge (or lack of it) which one acquires in our best country-club colleges with their ranking football teams and high social prestige.

Under existing conditions a vote for Hoover is a vote for the Straton, the Hefins, the W. C. T. U., the Anti-Saloon League, the embattled Methodist bishops, the anti-evolutionists, the America First League, the big-navy men, and every other force of intolerance in the United States. If Smith is submerged in a wave of bigotry and snobbery, none can foresee the consequences to freedom of thought and habit in America.

We need, to be sure, a third party which in future will make unnecessary a Hobson's choice between the Republican and Democratic candidates. But the way to build such a third party is not by protest votes for the Presidency. It is by control of the smaller units of government through contesting in each district for the offices of alderman and representative in Congress. On a Statewide basis contests should be made, particularly for seats in the United States Senate. Until a respectable showing can be made by a third-party movement in municipal and State government and in the Congress of the United States it is no longer practical politics to vote for a forlorn hope for the Presidency.

His Faith Is Slipping

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I have voted for Governor Smith every time he has been a candidate. But, like many other Progressives, my faith is slipping.

The Public Service Commission, consisting of five members, three of whom are Governor Smith's appointees, has proved more than once that it is very much on the side of the utility corporations. This is especially true of George R. Van Namee, the Governor's pre-convention campaign manager this year, his former secretary, and an intimate political adviser. When the Public Committee on Power, representing the consumers, asked for a hearing on the merger of the Consolidated Gas Company and the Brooklyn Edison Company, the commission declined to hear it. After much publicity had been given to the request of the consumers' committee Governor Smith, rather feebly as I think, asked that the case be reopened. Then followed a gesture often adopted by politicians to deceive the people. One of the five commissioners, Brewster, was known to be ill at Syracuse. The remaining four, Prendergast, Pooley, Van Namee, and Lunn, divided two to two and the motion was lost. Is the Governor really entitled to the credit for supporting State development of water power and for preventing mergers without a pledge on the part of the merged corporation to reduce rates for electrical service? The merger was authorized by unanimous vote of the four commissioners, including George Van Namee.

During his eight years as Governor, Smith has gone all the way from State development and distribution of power to a plan for public ownership and private distribution. He appears to know nothing of the wonderful Ontario system, nor of the hundreds of excellent examples of municipal ownership.

Throughout this campaign we have heard a great deal about William F. Kenny, a boyhood friend of the Governor, multi-millionaire and large contributor to the Democratic fund. He owns a special railroad car in which Governor Smith, his family, and friends have been traveling. But I hear that Kenny made much of his fortune on cost-plus contracts for Nicholas

F. Brady, president of the New York Edison Company, and large holder in numerous power generating and distributing systems outside of the greater city, including the recently merged plants at Albany, Amsterdam, Utica, and Syracuse.

Is it reasonable to suppose that gentlemen like Owen D. Young, Pierre Du Pont, E. S. Harkness, and John J. Raskob would continue to support Governor Smith if they believed he was committed to State development of water power? Some say that the real water-power battle is between interests allied with Owen D. Young and the Mellon interests.

Blame

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In the article, Insull-ating the Coolidge Cabinet, in The Nation for September 12, the question is asked: Mr. Common Citizen, what do you purpose to do about it?

If the answer is nothing, a good share of the blame should be placed directly on Upton Sinclair, Norman Thomas, and their followers. This group, knowing well it is impossible to carry through its program in one grand sweep, nevertheless stands aloof. Through the candidacy of Governor Smith—the assertion is based on The Nation's own words—there is opportunity at last to try with some hope of success to turn the social trend in the direction at least of some of the reforms Socialists proclaim. Socialist leaders might win confidence in their practical judgment and add to their influence later by coming down from the heights for the present and lending a hand to the realists. They seem to prefer bombast to a little genuine accomplishment. That is their privilege, but they cannot escape responsibility.

The New Liberia

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The trip from Berlin to Paris threatened boredom pretty complete and discomfort. Being nearly broke we had foregone sleepers and were sitting up very much crowded and uncomfortable in a second-class compartment, surrounded and inundated by foreign speech, French, German, Spanish. As dawn was breaking and we seemed to be entering the outskirts of Cologne, the rich molasses of South Carolina dialect trickled into our homesick ears. Peering through the dim light we perceived two colored people, a man of middle age and a woman somewhat younger. Naturally, my first impulse was to ask what part of the South they hailed from. Imagine my surprise when I learned that they had never been in the U. S. A., but were Liberians, attached to the Liberian mission (consulate or legation, I forget which) in Berlin. Their ancestors, it appeared, were among the original settlers in Liberia; they had inherited white American civilization from their grandfathers and kept that torch burning in the African wilds for several generations. American civilization, however, only fringed the coast, had never been able to penetrate the interior. Mr. J. A. said:

We never were able to subdue the wild native tribes, because we didn't have any money or weapons. Also the French and English were always making trouble on our frontiers and stealing our territory. But now that has all changed, with the granting of the Firestone concession. You see we have been careful to give Mr. Firestone his concessions along the frontiers so that now when the British or French want to encroach on us they will have to face the United States Government. Oh, yes, we have a financial adviser, approved by the State Department at Washington, and whatever he says goes. I guess we all are fixed all right now. And then, you know, with the money Mr. Firestone loaned us, we have for the first time in our history been able to subdue them native tribes. They are all pacified now, and working like everything collecting rubber for export. I tell you, Mister, Liberia hasn't ever been so prosperous as it is now, no, not since the settlement of the country by the American colonists.

This is not a document, but it is gospel true, and probably sheds a more revealing light on the actual arrangements in Liberia than days of argument at Williamstown.

Dwight Morrow's Achievement

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I have just returned from a trip to El Paso, where I had an opportunity to talk with an American doing business in Mexico, who has been in that country for nearly thirty years. You will be interested in having his testimony as to the very great effect which Mr. Morrow's diplomacy has had throughout, at least northern Mexico. Mr. Morrow has converted the suspicion and dislike of Americans, which was noticeable throughout the whole country among high and low, into friendliness. The whole atmosphere as between Americans and Mexicans in their business relations, my informant tells me, has changed. In place of suspicion of this country there is confidence in its friendship, and instead of fear that an individual American business man is trying to overreach the Government and individual Mexicans, there is a growing sense of cooperation and a willingness to recognize Americans as not merely rapacious concession grabbers.

This evidence of the result of treating Mexicans as people and their government as a real government is worth pondering. Evidently the Spanish Americans are not much interested in oratorical declarations of friendship and respect for the independence of national governments, but they are impressed by having the government treated like an independent government and their people shown consideration.

What's the Ukraine?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I pick up The Nation and my eye rests upon an ad, in heavy black letters: "All-Russia Tour, including the Ukraine." In 1914 I graduated from one of the high schools of Chicago. To me was allotted the task of speaking at the exercises. And what to speak of? The Ukraine, of course. Had I not been taught from the days of lisping that I was an "Oukrainka"?! Was I not brought up on Ukrainian history, literature, traditions, songs, folk-lore? And to help me in the delivery of the "oration" a teacher of French was chosen—Miss M. Timidly and reverently I brought her the "speech" "to have it looked over." It began: "There are forty million Ukrainians in the world. . . ."

Miss M. frowned. There was a wrinkle between her eyebrows. She was gentle and she spoke softly:

"Mary—there must be a mistake, dear. You better ask your father. Surely you do not mean forty millions! Perhaps it is 400,000, but I'm sure it's not forty million. I would have heard about them!"

The budding orator wept bitter tears that night. Forty million! And the teacher knew nothing about them.

Fourteen years have passed; today even teachers of French are expected to know a little more about the Ukraine and her people than just: "Oh, its something like Russia, or is it Poland?" Today The Nation carries an ad. And there will be many who will go to see the Ukraine—her steppes and her poppy-sprinkled fields, to hear her nightingales and listen to the roaring of the Dnieper River!

The Old Executioner

By McALISTER COLEMAN

Time is a headsman
In a mask of black and white
Standing at corners
Peering at people with glittering eyes.
Sooner or later Time will get them all
And thinking of this
Time ticks contentedly,
Grimly waiting the inevitable hour.

Eucharist

By ANNE SINGLETON

Light the more given is the more denied.
Though you go seeking by the naked seas,
Each cliff etched visible, and all the waves
Pluming themselves with sunlight, of this pride
Light makes her sophistries.

You are not like to find her, being fed Always with that she shines on. Only those Storm driven down the dark, see light arise,
Her body broken for their rainbow bread,
At late and shipwrecked close.

Versailles vs. Civilization

The Mirage of Versailles. By Hermann Stegemann. Alfred A. Knopf. $5.

Locarno: A Dispassionate View. By Alfred Fabre-Luce. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

HERE are two notable books by distinguished European publicists, one a Swiss and the other a Frenchman, defending the same thesis; namely, that civilization cannot continue without a cessation of international wars on a large scale and that world peace cannot be expected as long as the atrocious Treaty of Versailles and its allied pacts of St. Germain and the Trianon remain the foundation of the European system.

Dr. Stegemann, already well-known for his monumental work on "The Struggle for the Rhine," in which he treated this question in detail as the key to Western European politics from Caesar to Poincaré, surveys the leading problems in the national development and international relations of Europe and the United States. It is not an aimless or superficial encyclopedic summary, but a searching historical analysis, which is organized about the traditional problems, ambitions, and "missions" of the chief European Powers. Especially important are the chapters on the French military hegemony in Europe, the Anglo-American primacy in world relations, and the savagery of the post-war treaties which threaten the future of world peace and European civilization. While in no sense an apologist for Germany and her history, Dr. Stegemann contends that there can be no real prospect of good-will and international cooperation in Europe as long as Germany is morally condemned and severely punished for alleged sole guilt in precipitating the World War. The Treaty of Versailles created a situation which, though designed merely to ruin Germany, bids fair to ruin all Europe. European peace can be assured only in proportion as Versailles is undermined and destroyed. Even the more hopeful developments, extending from Versailles to Locarno, are practically nullified because of the fact that Germany is denied participation in the new system on anything like terms of physical or moral equality with her associates in the family of nations.

Dr. Stegemann's book may be recommended to American readers as the most useful and cogent historical introduction to contemporary international issues in Europe which has been written in any language, and the most important book on post-war Europe since Alcide Ebray's masterpiece, "A Frenchman Looks at Peace."

Much the same line of argument is advanced by M. Fabre-Luce in a book of quite different scope. Dr. Stegemann's work is historical in character and brings pre-war history to bear upon post-war problems; M. Fabre-Luce's brilliant discussion is confined to an analysis of the post-war situation. Fabre-Luce is already well-known as the author of "The Crisis of the Alliances" and "The Limitations of Victory," having thus established himself as one of the ablest realistic French writers on the causes and consequences of the World War. A member of one of the richest families in France and brother-in-law of M. Margerie, the French Ambassador to Berlin, M. Fabre-Luce cannot be dismissed by M. Poincaré as a radical, a malcontent, or a renegade.

Fabre-Luce begins his book by a brief and lucid summary of the changes in European attitudes, problems, and methods since 1914, especially those transformations related to the conception of the place of war in civilization and the responsibility for the World War. These changes, M. Fabre-Luce contends, require new methods and instruments in dealing with international relations. Toward the League of Nations the author reveals a sensible attitude—"this great institution may become a blessing or a curse." He favors the principle which it represents and answers many of the specious conventional objections to the League. Yet he maintains that the League can have no far-reaching influence for good as long as the present Franco-German impasse continues. In a fine chapter he attacks both the Utopians, whose ideals are above criticism but who fail to grapple with the practical realities and the diplomatic limitations imposed thereby upon immediate constructive action, and the Nationalists, who deplore the fact that the post-war treaties were not more severe and that the destruction of the Central Powers was not complete. Like the League, Locarno was splendid in conception, but is as yet nullified in practice because its architects did not recognize and provide the indispensable prerequisites of European peace and good-will. Both the Leaguers and the devotees of the Locarno cult have failed to remember that "the instruments must be tuned before the concert is given." As obstacles to the realization of the goal of Locarno Fabre-Luce cites the absurd Entente doctrine of the unique responsibility of the Central Powers for the World War, the coexistence of the impossible Polish-German boundary with the Franco-Polish military alliance, the Entente opposition to the Anschluss between Germany and Austria, the insistence of the Entente upon German disarmament without any appreciable willingness to reduce their own military and naval forces, and the complete deprivation of Germany with regard to colonial possessions. The position taken by Fabre-Luce in regard to war debts and cancellation is sound and conciliatory. He would assure France and Belgium payment for the reconstruction of devastated areas and then provide for general cancelation of debts and reparations.

Like Stegemann, Fabre-Luce agrees that the future peace of the world cannot be harmonized with the continuance of the humiliation and prostration of Germany, and he holds that the development of a real and extensive Franco-German rapprochement is the true key to European peace and disarmament. Even in France there are many who realize the truth of this assertion, but they find it difficult to take practical steps to realize this indispensable objective, for it involves by implication at least a repudiation of the whole war-time mythology regarding Germany and the Germans. Patriotic lying, then, which was the chief cause of the war fury and excesses, still remains to plague its authors and to obstruct all realistic plans for peace. He concludes by offering a grave warning and a constructive challenge to Frenchmen sincerely interested in peace:

The policy we have outlined is the one from which France can derive the most honor and advantage, but it is also the one which will call for the greatest effort to cultivate a new spirit. In recommending it, we are taking an optimistic view of the vigor and youth of the country. It is a risk, but it is also the means of winning the stake. . . . Perhaps we shall live to see another carnage. Perhaps those who had dreamed of better things for their country may confess themselves defeated in the end. Perhaps, but they will first try their luck. . . . We shall either be devoured by the Sphinx or we shall guess her riddles. Learn or perish. That is the chance given to modern intelligence, and its tragic value.

The Eccentric Century

The Stammering Century: Eccentricity and Fanaticism in the United States, 1800-1900. By Gilbert Seldes. The John Day Company. $5.

HENRY L. MENCKEN has long contended that America is populated largely by a boob class ready to swallow and to sacrifice itself to any silly notion, however lacking in common sense or reasonableness it may be. Not a few persons have been struck by the thought that members of the "intellectual aristocracy" (for the cultivation of which Mr. Mencken has sown so many dragons' teeth) are often equally gullible. Indeed, many a newspaper paragraph has been given to the thought, and there once existed and perhaps still exists a magazine devoted to its propagation. When the idea reached Mr. Seldes, however, he decided that a book was necessary for its proper documentation. Then, some time before he reached page 411 in the writing of the book, Mr. Seldes decided that he wanted to prove nothing after all. He has his wish in abundance.

"The Stammering Century" is concerned with "the minor movements, with the cults and manias . . . fanatics, and radicals, and mountebanks" of the nineteenth century. Mr. Seldes does not believe that "these cults and crazes were isolated phenomena of a specially stupid class" or "aberrations, separated from the facts of common life . . ." He regards them rather as "more or less natural phenomena, as abnormalities closely connected with normal life, as part of the continuous existence of the nation. . . ." With the latter statement not even Mr. Mencken would disagree. With the former he might. He might say, for example, that if Henry Ward Beecher, Julia Ward Howe, and General Custer took phrenology seriously (page 315—an apparent hangover of the desire to prove something) they, too, were boobs. Against such an argument Mr. Seldes apparently is not prepared to contend.

Mr. Seldes devotes chapters to the revivalists, Rappites, Owenites, Oneidans, transcendentalists, abolitionists, prohibitionists, suffragists, phrenologists, mesmerists, Christian Scientists, et al. That on Jonathan Edwards is little more than a watered-down repetition of some of the interesting things Vernon Louis Parrington said in his "Main Currents of American Thought." Those on J. Humphrey Noyes and Bronson Alcott are pleasant enough reading; the material is almost author-proof. Yet there is nothing in either of them which was not perfectly well-known before Mr. Seldes honored the subjects with his attention. The chapter on William Lloyd Garrison is disconcertingly sparse. That on Christian Science, in view of the fact that Janet wrote his "Psychological Healing" fully twenty years ago, is amazingly simple-minded. It is hardly a contribution, at this date, to tell us that Christian Science arose as an escape from American materialism. One is amazed to discover in this book no mention whatsoever of John Most, Sixteen-to-One, or Populism. Surely they were "abnormalities closely connected with daily life." It is not clear why Mr. Seldes ignores the political salvationists. Of course, their stories are much less interesting than those of Matthias who committed murder, or of the Oneida Community where one man's bride was every man's bride.

The upshot of Mr. Seldes's study is the following set of amazing insights into the nature of radicalism: 1. "The underlying motive of the radical cults was salvation." 2. The radical cults were generally touched by a greater or lesser degree of madness which most Americans escaped. 3. The radical cults had at least this merit, that they did not submit to commonly accepted evils in American life. 4. The cultists were suffering from an inferiority complex, an Oedipus complex or (vide their land-hunger) a mother-fixation. 5. They were related to the romantic movement. 6. "The balanced man is rare." 7. To avoid cultism it is suggested that man make a good adjustment, be normal; but would this not mean a great loss since the neurotics have given us so many great gifts of genius?

To reach these remarkable conclusions Mr. Seldes goes through a great many complicated motions. His opening chapter is beplastered with platitudinous and pretentious history, sociology, and psychology. His final chapter is touched by the fine philosophic exaltation of a school principal giving an assembly talk on Arbor Day. The thinking is inconsequential, the writing is generally dull, and the puns are simply horrendous. If Mr. Mencken lets this book get by him it will be because Mr. Seldes—despite an apparently sincere desire to win a commission in the rising army of revolt against Menckanism—is dealing here with typical Mercury material—the idiocies of American life. Considered in this light, "The Stammering Century" is less titillating than the books of Messrs. Werner, Asbury, and Merz.

Mexico's Xenophon

Bernal Díaz Del Castillo: The Discovery and Conquest of Mexico, 1517-1521. Edited from the only exact copy of the original manuscript (and published in Mexico) by Genaro García. Translated by A. P. Maudslay. Harper and Brothers. $5.

THE Conquistadores were unusually fortunate in their chroniclers. The written records of four participants in Hernan Cortés's anabasis to Tenochtitlan have come down to us, to say nothing of a score of accounts compiled in closely succeeding years based on the testimony of eyewitnesses whose minds were still filled with the great adventure of the Conquest. Of the four first-hand chronicles none matches in completeness and interest the account of Captain Bernal Díaz del Castillo, written in his old age sixty years after the first successful invasion of the mainland. He wrote in Guatemala, where he lived the rest of his life. Age had not withered the vividness of his recollections; if anything time had freed him from bias, had given him leisure for reflection, permitted the rounding out of an adventure story which is among the few great epics of the human race. It has become almost axiomatic among historians to discount the recollections years afterward of participants in stirring combat. The truth is said to have become blurred with much retelling and respinning. In the case of Bernal Díaz there is ample material for checking the sturdy old soldier's reminiscences. Unquestionably he is the Xenophon of the New World.

The story of his manuscript rivals in interest his own tale. The original has remained to this day in Guatemala, where it was for some generations preserved by his descendants until it became one of the nation's treasures. But a copy was made in the reign of Philip II of Spain—which covered virtually the second half of the sixteenth century—and sent to the mother country, where it was consulted by the royal chroniclers. It was first published in Spain in 1632 by Friar Alonzo Remón of the order of La Merced. Other editions followed rapidly, and translations were made into many tongues—not less than two into English, French, and German, and some of these translations went into more than one edition.

Now the Spanish text and the translations—all of which were based thereon—were something of a hoax because of Father Remón's extensive perversion of the original. Just what motives operated in causing him not merely to suppress entire pages, to delete numerous passages, to alter others, to substitute one name for another, but even to add extensively from his own pen, is not fully known. Doubtless rivalries among the descendants of the various Conquistadores were still keen a century and a decade after the events chronicled, powerful family jealousies at court may have been involved, for the strife over overseas grants still continued—wrangles based in large measure upon the supposed contribution of each warrior to the enlargement of the King's domain in the New World. Be that as it may, the authentic story of Captain Díaz remained unknown to the world until that great Mexican scholar and bibliophile, Genaro García, secured permission to copy the original text and publish it. The first translation into English was made by A. P. Maudslay and published in 1908 by the Hakluyt Society in five volumes. The work was virtually unavailable for popular consumption. The present edition is a reprint in one volume omitting unnecessary passages and ending with the fall of Mexico City, whereas Díaz's narration continues with the march southward into Central America and the conquest of what is now Guatemala and Honduras.

Few indeed are the books that at one and the same time are historical source material and a thrilling yarn. As juvenile literature it is unexcelled. It is meaty for boys from twelve to eighty-four—that being the author's age at the time he wrote how he, in company of some six hundred men, had conquered Montezuma's empire and its millions of inhabitants. It is an authentic account of the greatest adventure of an epoch of epics.

Southwestern Poetry

The Turquoise Trail: An Anthology of New Mexico Poetry.
Compiled by Alice Corbin Henderson. Houghton Mifflin Company. $2.25.

EVEN an anthology is after all a book, and a book must have some principle of unity. Most anthologies of poetry, however, are little more than who's who's of the poets. They have no more internal unity, and only slightly more interest, than the city directory. Mrs. Henderson's collection goes a step farther—it has at least the unity of place. It tells one not merely who the poets are but where they are. At one time or another many of them have fled from the perpetual childish present tense of our great cities to the lunar buttes and mesas, the time-filled solitudes of New Mexico; to that marvelous region which is at once the wildest, the most serene, and the most anciently civilized province of America.

Obviously Mrs. Henderson's intention has been to cause New Mexico to emerge as a physical and cultural entity, through the responses of the poets who have lived there, however briefly. She has measurably succeeded; the book is more than the sum of its poems, and many of the poems are strikingly good. They were bound to be. In that taut desert equilibrium of brazen sky and thirsting sage-brush man's gestures are few and simple.

Genuine artists can scarcely respond trivially or sentimentally to such a landscape; often the response is clear and profound.

"The Turquoise Trail" contains much distinguished work both by well-known poets and by others less known. John Galsworthy, Carl Sandburg, Vachel Lindsay, Alfred Kreymborg, Willa Cather, Edgar Lee Masters, John Gould Fletcher, and D. H. Lawrence are all represented. The strength and substance of the volume are chiefly supplied, however, by the more permanent Santa Fe and Taos residents, such as Mary Austin, Yvor Winters, Haniel Long, Maurice Leseman, Witter Bynner, Arthur Davison Ficke, and Mrs. Henderson herself. It can scarcely be said that even they have possessed this soil, in the sense that the Indian aborigines and the Mexican villagers possess it. But what portion of America have we really possessed? Until America wearies of its mechanical toys, its sterile conquests, and turns inward for power, our artists will be cheated of maturity. Wistfully they sing the corn dances and the rain dances of older peoples who live in a more secure communion with older and truer gods; wistfully, and not very well.

In this sense, of course, the cult of the Indian is dangerous and disturbing. What is really disturbing, however, is the evidence of spiritual exile and homelessness within the hollow shell of our white civilization, and that, surely, is not the Indian's fault. New Mexico is at least a place where one can possess oneself, slough off the gratuitous social impediments of our obsessed extensiveness and acquisitiveness, and prosecute an independent search for permanent values. I do not think it does much harm to invoke the aid of the Indian gods; not much harm and not much good. Ultimately, when we have discovered our own images, we shall have to make our own gods—out of something better than spare radio parts: out of our own desperate and tragic need.

Two general comments suggest themselves: First that the alphabetic arrangement of contributors seems a mistake, resulting as it does in accidental sequences not always fortunate; second, that the idea of regional anthologies is a good one. Plato to the contrary, poets don't lie and vulgarize with as much facility, as, say, realtors or popular fiction writers. Given a chance, they will discover America to herself as fast as any body; part by part and ultimately the whole.

Books in Brief

Beauty and the Beast. By Joseph Gordon Macleod. The Viking Press. $2.50.

A puzzling and occasionally brilliant piece of literary aesthetic by a young English critic. Much mumbo-jumbo about "Singular Form," "the Anthropomorph," and two strange abstractions known as "Beauty" and "the Beast" is compensated for by a number of illuminating analyses of individual books, such as "Bleak House," "Wuthering Heights," and "The Brothers Karamazov." The courageous reader who is willing to wrestle with Mr. Macleod's preposterous neo-Carlylean style will encounter a hundred interesting pronouncements on the formal technique of the novel and the drama.

Destinations: A Canvass of American Literature Since 1900.

By Gorham B. Munson. J. H. Sears and Company. $2.

Mr. Munson's subtitle is inexcusable. Only with great difficulty and artifice has he succeeded in endowing with superficial unity a collection of disparate literary essays. His book is valuable for its point of view rather than for the validity of its judgments. The conclusion that the dominant generation of American writers has signally failed and the suggestive and sympathetic appreciation of Irving Babbitt and Paul Elmer More will interest the contemporary anti-romantics. They may, however, be alienated by Mr. Munson's pedantic concern with Marianne Moore and Wallace Stevens and by his lyric laudation of figures whom one cannot yet appraise, such as Jean Toomer and Kenneth Burke. Their impatience will perhaps come to a head upon encountering Mr. Munson's nebulous mysticism, absorbed from A. R. Orage and Gurdjieff. The author's tentative conclusion that the way out for young American writers lies through an intent perusal of the "Mahabharata" adds a touch of unconscious humor to a rather consciously serious book.

The Voyage of the Norman D., as told by the Cabin Boy. By Barbara Newhall Follett. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

This latest book by Barbara Newhall Follett seriously indicates the ever growing tendency to exploit the publicity value of children's writing. Such a book has nothing of intrinsic beauty to captivate other children. Barbara is precocious, clever, facile, and at fourteen apparently far more interested in being a writer than in writing. Her sea trip is convincing as an effort at securing copy, not as the momentous personal experience it pretends to be. The book as a whole is self-conscious, insincere, studied in its effects, and this is chiefly because the author is not equipped for adventure; she has merely a sense of excitement.

The Tale of Genji. Part Four: Blue Trousers. By the Lady Murasaki. Translated by Arthur Waley. Houghton Mifflin Company. $3.50.

This instalment of a Japanese masterpiece in fiction brings the life of Prince Genji to its close. The book has kept up, and Mr. Waley as translator has kept up, amazingly well; readers of the three preceding volumes will want to have this one too, wherein strength and delicacy combine as before to make a rich, wise, and amusing tale.

History of American Foreign Relations. By Louis M. Sears. Thomas Y. Crowell Company. $3.50.

Professor Sears has equipped his book with some of the apparatus of a textbook, and the teacher who uses it in the classroom will not need to add much to it in the way of lectures, but the book is quite as useful and interesting for other readers as it is for students, partly because it is well written, and partly because it offers a successful union of comprehensiveness and detail. It begins with the colonial period, when foreign relations, such as they were, were British rather than American, and comes down to the beginning of the Coolidge regime. Naturally, it does not contain anything really new, for the main subject-matter of American diplomacy, comparatively simple and direct, is pretty well known and has been worked over a good many times, but Professor Sears, who feels that the foreign relations of a country "constitute the highest challenge to the intelligence and good sense of the voter," and who would like to see Americans as much interested in the subject as enlightened Europeans commonly are, has performed very well the necessary task of selection and arrangement. What he has to say about American diplomatic relations since the Roosevelt period is judicious, and the connection between foreign policy and domestic politics is more or less systematically noted throughout.

Niccolo Machiavelli, the Florentine. By Giuseppe Prezzolini. Translated from the Italian by Ralph Roeder. Brentano's. $3.50.

Prezzolini is an ebullient biographer. Although Machiavelli's life is an enigmatical, almost silent episode, the author rounds out a meager history with his own sympathetic imagination. Machiavelli emerges from the background of a Renaissance Italy of gifted, impious cutthroats. He is "born with his eyes open," has a laugh which is a chuckle; spends equally enjoyable evenings reading from heavy tomes or disporting himself with pot-wallopers and lovely though lively ladies. The humble Secretary to the Committee of Ten divorces public virtue from morals and always faces his world dispassionately and squarely. He closes his life poor and defeated by the very forces he so skilfully analyzed—an unmachiavellic figure. The style is startling. It is impressionistic, impertinent, cynical, and graphic. If belches and navels spell Rabelais, it is Rabelaisian enough. It should prove pleasant reading for those interested in a subjective study, who believe with Prezzolini that "even in scratching his itches a great man shows something peculiar and inimitable."

Strenuous Italy. Solving a Perilous Problem. By H. Nelson Gay. Houghton Mifflin and Company. $3.

Here is the Italian story with exactitude and with the earnestness of a ripe and interested mind, for Mr. Gay of Boston has lived long in the Palazzo Orisini in Rome. Mr. Gay dwells on Italy's past—showing that movements which culminated in Mussolini were not originated by him—and also on her future. He deprecates the tendency toward imperialism and the enlargement of the national property at the expense of other peoples, but he demands for his country of adoption the right to colonial expansion in Africa for the use of Italy's overflowing population. He charges that the unfairness of the Treaty of Versailles left Italy without her share of colonial mandates, though he does not dwell on the enlargement of her frontiers in the Adriatic. We are given the clearest theory of the rise of Fascism, its causes and its benefits, which we have yet seen. What is going to happen between the Church and the Fascisti is not within the range of Mr. Gay's conjectures, though to us who have in mind the latent power of the Hierarchy in Italy, and its growing influence here, this question would be of much interest. If Mr. Gay publishes a new edition it would much enlighten us to have his gloss on this question.

The Indecisiveness of Modern War and other Essays. By J. Holland Rose. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $3.25.

In these essays Professor J. Holland Rose justifies his new position as Harmsworth Professor of Naval History at Cambridge. His thesis is that modern inventions have brought naval warfare almost to a deadlock. It is more and more difficult to surprise the enemy fleet, owing to recent developments in scouting all air-craft, wireless, and submarine. In other words, science has reduced war to a dull and inconclusive occupation. An interesting chapter studies Admiral Duckworth's exposition to Constantinople in 1807. If the British war-dogs had known their history, they might have saved England from the disastrous venture of 1915.

Great Britain and the Dominions. The Harris Foundation Lectures. University of Chicago Press. $3.

Another volume of the Harris Foundation lectures, devoted to the British Empire. Of the seven lecturers, four are government officials and hence the point of view is usually innocuous. Sir Cecil Hurst has interesting articles on the British Empire as a political union, in which he successfully evades discussion of the real dilemma with which the British Empire is faced—namely, of choosing between unanimity, in which one Dominion having a population of a million may block any action of the Empire as a whole, and a policy of Dominion independence,

Drama

Behaviorism and Drama

IN ten brief, often nerve-racking, scenes Sophie Treadwell's "Machinal" (Plymouth Theater) tells the story of a woman who killed her husband with a bottle and went to the electric chair for the deed. Preliminary rumors had it that the play was based upon the Snyder case, and though the events which it recounts resemble those of that particular newspaper sensation no more than they resemble various others the story does seem, nevertheless, to come straight from the tabloids. It is told, not in the semi-realistic fashion of various recent high-speed melodramas like "Crime," but by means of the blinding flashes for which expressionism tries and, thanks to the laconic vividness of the method, it has that same air of being at once true and unbelievable which marks all accounts of the more extraordinary contemporary crimes; so that one leaves the theater exactly as one often puts down a newspaper—knowing that certain events have taken place and yet not believing that such things can be. One reads, for instance, that some quite ordinary people, exasperated by quite ordinary little irritations or inspired by quite ordinary little lusts, suddenly commit the most incredible deeds, but no patient unraveling of the whole story can discover any compulsions which seem adequate to account for them. One does not doubt, but neither does one understand. Facts are facts, but one does not know what to do with them or how they may be accepted. Whether they be told baldly as the police reporter tells them or artfully as Miss Treadwell sets them forth they remain essentially indigestible, not to be made a part of that rational world in which we seem to live. They shock and they bewilder but they remain, like a nightmare, haunting and yet unreal.

Most literature has been based upon the assumption that human actions are, in some measure, to be rationally accounted for; that great crimes are committed by great criminals under the influence of great passions, and that motive and deed are somehow commensurate. Thanks no doubt to literary influence we have come to accept this assumption, and because of it we believe that a great woman like Lady Macbeth could kill King Duncan for the sake of his crown much more deeply and really than we believe that vulgar little Ruth Snyder killed her husband for the love of a corset salesman, or that (to take the case of the present play) an ex-typist could kill her husband for reasons no deeper than those which are given—that he was a maddeningly commonplace man and that she had found a lover in a speak-easy. Yet the evidence of the tabloids is not to be denied. People do daily the things which "people don't do," and it is inevitable that this age, which may or may not produce great artists but which certainly has its crimes set down for it with a detailed accuracy never known before, should endeavor to utilize the facts in its possession, seeking by dramatic or fictional representation some means by which their meaning may be fathomed. It is this which Miss Treadwell attempts, and if she does not succeed she comes at least as near doing so as anyone else ever has.

Certainly the method which she adopts is the most suitable one yet devised. Most of the murderers whom the police courts know do not think or feel or act after the patterns which literature has created, and they are not understandable by the principles it recognizes. The most ruthless and rapid of new-style melodramas accepts too much of the literary convention to escape from the need to rationalize events which cannot be rationalized and to furnish adequate motive for deeds which in life are not adequately motivated. Any straight dramatization of the news falls back inevitably upon palpably unreal and purely conventional motives in its effort to fill in the background. Only the brief bare episodes which expressionism utilized can relieve the dramatist from the necessity of furnishing the rational explanation which it is impossible to furnish and allow him to give facts too immediate to demand explanation in their place. We know no more of Miss Treadwell's dramatis personae than we know of those individuals who are lifted suddenly from nowhere into the headlines. They have no definite past, no philosophy of life, no complex personalities. And instead of explanation we are given a series of scenes which offer no interpretation except that which is implicit in the fact that they are represented in a slightly distorted form which suggests that they are seen through the eyes of someone whose nerves are tense to the point of breaking. Our typist works in an office a little more maddeningly mechanical than most offices really are, her successful husband repeats his copybook maxims a little oftener than most successful husbands do, but that is about all. The thing simply happens—undeniably and yet incredibly.

The method of expressionism implies a behavioristic psychology. Instead of attempting to explain the conduct of its characters by exposing the rational processes of their minds it treats them as automata responding jerkily to the stimuli which impinge upon them, and if the results which it achieves are often extraordinarily vivid without ever being entirely satisfactory the fact may be an inevitable result of the method. Even behaviorism admits that to ourselves we seem to control our acts by conscious and reasoned process. Even if this be mere illusion it may still be that art cannot perform its functions without accepting the illusion as a reality, and certainly Miss Treadwell's play (which is at once impressive and unsatisfying) would seem to indicate as much.

Incidentally it should be remarked that the production which Arthur Hopkins has given it is an extraordinarily accomplished one. The gradual emergence of a blood-red glow out of the darkness in which the play ends serves almost magically to give a concluding touch which the dialogue lacks and is one of the most unobtrusively effective bit of stage technique seen here in a long time.

"Trapped" (National Theater) is a conventional melodrama strongly reminiscent of the ten-twenty-thirty. "The Great Power" (Ritz Theater) is a highly moral drama very earnestly produced by its author. The hero, a ruthless financier, has a dream in which he is summoned before God's tribunal and shown the error of his ways by means of a moving picture film. He wakes a better man.

"Ringside" (Broadhurst Theater) is a stirring prize-fight play apparently adapted from the movies, with a dull-witted boxer, a siren, and a sharper, and a sweet home girl. The best scene is that in which, with the curtain down and the theater dark, a loudspeaker blares forth a radio report of the fight.

"White Lilacs," a German operetta built about the loves of George Sand and Chopin, is a strange melange of over-stuffed romanticism and lean cynicism. Odette Myrtil creates a George who, while a novelty to historians, is an ardent and convincing female.

A Nation on Trial

THE following article on Poland's attempt to suppress the efforts of her White Russian residents to obtain autonomy was contributed by William Zukerman to the August issue of Foreign Affairs of London:

A trial has just ended in Europe, which for vastness, for the number of the accused, for the spectacularity of its staging, and for political significance surpasses anything that has ever been seen in a court of law in any country since the war. It was a trial not of an individual, not even of a group, but of a nation. Literally the entire intelligentsia of a people was in the dock. The nation on trial was the White Russian, and the country where this unique legal battle occurred was Poland; the specific place—a small courtroom in the city of Vilna. The defendants were fifty-six White Russian teachers, members of Parliament, editors, writers, and social workers. The trial lasted three months, although the court often sat until midnight. Four hundred witnesses were heard for the accusation and 600 for the defense, and the result was a total sentence of 161 years of imprisonment for thirty-nine of the accused. All this, however, was but one small instalment of the vast legal battle which is still going on. About a thousand more White Russians are now in Polish jails awaiting similar trials. The above-mentioned fifty-six were only the vanguard of a vastly bigger army which is still awaiting its fate.

The facts of this remarkable case are as follows:

By the Treaty of Riga Poland has received vast stretches of White Russian territory, extending from Brest-Litovsk to Baranovichi, with a total population of about three million White Russians. These people, Slav by race, are neither Russians nor Poles, but a distinct nationality, with a language, culture, and national aspirations of their own, which are very similar to those of the Poles themselves before the war. Their ultimate aim is the establishment of an autonomous White Russian state, embracing the territories which are now under Poland and Soviet Russia. At the present moment they strive only to the attainment of full national minority rights, which are their due, according to the national-minority clause of the Treaty of Versailles. This guarantees national schools in their own language, full unhampered representation in Parliament, and freedom from national discrimination. Unfortunately, this much-abused clause of the Versailles Treaty, as applied to the White Russians in Poland, is nothing more than another "scrap of paper." The White Russians are denied schools in their own language; they have no autonomous local government of their own, even in places where they are in a preponderant majority; the Polish language and culture are forced upon them; and, what is worse, a system of economic discrimination has been established, which cannot but lead to very dangerous complications.

This system is a kind of "plantation" of Poles in White Russian territory which can only be compared to the Cromwellian plantation in Ireland. Big tracts of White Russian soil are systematically given away to Polish ex-service men and officers, who are brought over from Poland for the special purpose of forming Polish islands in the White Russian sea, and thus eventually Polonizing the country. The evil of this system is a double one. It deprives the White Russian peasants of the land which they need badly, and by its system of Polonization it adds national danger and fear to the grave economic injury; together these form the background of the events which culminated in the remarkable scenes in the little courtroom of Vilna.

For a still better understanding of the situation, it is necessary to mention that that part of White Russia which is under the rule of Soviet Russia enjoys in full all the national and economic privileges which the same people are denied just across the frontier of Poland. Whether as a part of their political maneuvers, or of their philosophy, the Russian Soviet Government has granted the White Russians, Ukrainians, and, in fact, all minority nationalities within its borders a greater amount of national autonomy, both cultural and political, than any country in the world. It is a great pity that the bigger controversies over the Soviet economic policies have obscured this smaller issue to the world, for it is a fact that the grievous problem of national minorities is practically solved in Russia, and many a non-Communist state in Europe could greatly benefit from the Russian experience. White Russia, as well as Ukraine under the Soviets, is now culturally and politically to all intents and purposes as autonomous as Ireland and Canada are within the British Empire.

This contrast served but to accentuate the growing dissatisfaction of the White Russians in Poland, and, following a few futile attempts of obtaining relief by Parliamentary action, Polish White Russia became the scene of a primitive and dangerous peasant insurrectionary movement, which took the ancient form of burning big estates and of armed bandit raids upon rich landowners.

For a time it looked as if this dangerous conflagration would spread, and both White Russia and Poland would be involved in a bloody civil war. But this was avoided by the timely action of the White Russian intelligentsia, who, in July, 1926, formed the now famous White Russian Workers' and Peasant Hromada, which in White Russian means the crowd, the people, or the ancient peasant community. The new organization, it must be admitted, was extremely revolutionary in character and in its demands. It proclaimed (1) that the land must be given to the poor, landless White Russian peasants; (2) that the schools, courts, and local government in White Russia must be conducted in the White Russian language; (3) that the two parts of torn White Russia, under Poland and under Soviet Russia, must be united into one independent White Russian republic; (4) that all this must be accomplished by constitutional means.

In spite of these revolutionary demands, however, the Hromada was essentially a means of saving the people from bloody revolution and anarchy, rather than prompting them to it. At that time the Pilsudsky regime had just come into power (it was only two months after the Pilsudsky revolution), and the new Government, strengthened by the victory of the more Liberal forces in Polish society, did not object to the new movement, and even gave it the legal status of a political party.

The success that followed was phenomenal. Within a period of six months the Hromada had two thousand branches in Polish White Russia, with a membership of over a hundred thousand. Within a year the Hromada became the National Party of the White Russian people in Poland. It stopped the estate fires and the bandit raids, but it fired the imagination and the heart of the entire White Russian youth instead. But this phenomenal success has frightened the big Polish landowners in White Russia, and under their influence the Pilsudsky Government revoked the legal status of the Hromada. The dissolution of the Hromada was followed, in the small hours of January 15, by the arrest of four White Russian deputies in the Polish Sejm, together with most of the other leaders of the Hromada. Proclamations were spread throughout the country, declaring the party as illegal and adherence to it as treason to the state. Alongside with this declaration mass arrests of all the more active members of the Hromada began throughout White Russia. Over a thousand men, mostly teachers, professional men, and social workers, comprising practically the entire intellectual class of the White Russians, were arrested and incar-

Interpreting AL SMITH

INTERPRETING Al Smith is a job cut out for The New Republic. Except in New York, progressives are but dimly aware of the promise of his growing personality. They have felt a freshening in the stale atmosphere of party politics, but they have not as yet had time to reflect upon the full meaning of his national leadership.

Less than two short months remain—crowded months. Issues long hidden under thick coats of prosperity paint begin to show between the cracks. Values about which progressives care are being restored to their rightful place. Political intelligence, courage and sincerity are in the ring once more.

Until November The New Republic will actively devote itself to interpreting the many-sided dynamic Al Smith in relation to the living social issues which he has endowed with political reality.

cerated in various jails in Poland, where they are still awaiting trial. The present trial in Vilna, which has just been concluded, was the case of the first group of these people; the others are to follow.

The official accusation by the Government was that the Hromada under the guise of legal constitutional activity had conducted a revolutionary propaganda, with a view to seceding White Russia from Poland by force of arms, and uniting it with Soviet Russia. For this purpose, it was said, the party had received from Soviet Russia the sum of $15,000.

The defense denied all and every accusation of working in the interest of Soviet Russia. The accusation of having received the sum of $15,000 for fomenting a revolution in a vast country like that of White Russia, they declared, was in itself the best proof against the allegations. The defendants did not deny that they had striven and are still striving toward the establishment of an independent White Russian Republic, but such activity, they claimed, was neither morally nor legally wrong, as the Poles themselves were engaged in exactly the same activities a little over a decade ago.

The strongest point of the defense, however, was that even if their activity is illegal now, it became so only after the proclamation of the Polish Government on January 15. Prior to that the Hromada enjoyed the status of a legal organization, and the Government could not try them now for acts which were recognized as legal by itself. But the Vilna court overruled this strong point of the defense, and acted very harshly toward the accused. The four deputies were sentenced to twelve years' imprisonment each. The other thirty-five defendants were sentenced to smaller terms aggregating in all 161 years. When the sentence was declared, the accused all broke out singing the White Russian national hymn "Ot Wjekoff my spali" (For centuries we have slept), which created a weird and powerful impression. The situation was so strongly reminiscent of Czarism that it could not but embarrass every intelligent, thinking Pole in the audience.

It must be said, however, to the honor of the Polish public opinion, that it has remained highly displeased with the sentence. The chief defender of the White Russians, the well-known Polish Sejm deputy, Shmianowsky, who is an influential member of the Government Party, resigned from his party immediately after the pronouncement of the sentence. Similar protests are heard in all Liberal quarters, and strong influence is being exercised to get the Government to revise the sentence or to pardon the prisoners altogether. The accused have now appealed to a higher court in Warsaw, and it is the prevalent opinion, or at least the hope, of all friends of peace that Warsaw will reverse the sentence of Vilna, and that a policy which can lead only to civil war will be avoided.

AL SMITH HAS TAKEN THE OFFENSIVE, and it will be strange if Mr. Hoover does not find himself forced to reply. At Denver and at Helena the New Yorker used Herbert Hoover's own words as text and preached his typical sermons from them. At Denver he demanded to know where the silent candidate stands on water power. His own definition brought commendation even from Senator Norris of Nebraska. He showed the close links between the Coolidge Administration, and even Mr. Hoover's own department, and the public-utilities propaganda which has sought to rob the people of their water-power heritage. At Helena he retold the old, but still pertinent story of Republican corruption. He recited the shameful story of Secretary Fall and Teapot Dome, of Hoover's own letter indorsing Mr. Fall, and asked dramatically:

Is the record, the real record of the last seven and a half years, known to the Republican candidate for President of the United States? . . . He sat in the Cabinet of the President while all this was going on, and you can search the record from one end to the other, you can dive into it in its minutest details, and you will fail to find a single word of condemnation. On the contrary, in his speech of acceptance, let us see what he said about the last seven and a half years:

"The record of these seven and a half years constitutes a period of rare courage in leadership and constructive action." . . . Does Mr. Hoover want the people of the United States to believe that he looks over that record with satisfaction?

THE SORRIEST FIGURE IN THIS CAMPAIGN is not Heflin or Straton, but William E. Borah. It was bad enough for a man of his ideals and standards to sink to nominating Charles Curtis at the Kansas City Convention, but for him to go about the country proclaiming Hoover as a "miracle-man" and generally exalting him to the skies is decidedly too thick. Every newspaperman in Washington knows that there has been no severer critic of Mr. Hoover than Senator Borah. The Senator has just refused to explain why he said in 1918 that Hoover was unworthy of being trusted with $100,000,000 and now praises him without stint. He sought to explain his charge of January 18, 1919, that "vast monopolies directed and controlled the Food Administration. Hoover permitted them to fix their own prices" by saying that "Mr. Hoover contended he was doing the best possible under the circumstances. I contended to the contrary, but I never questioned his honesty or patriotism." What stuff! A man who permitted vast monopolies to direct and control the food prices the American people had to pay must have been a knave and a traitor. You cannot let food barons rob the American people and still be honest and patriotic. That is a mere juggling with words. To be trusted and be believed now, Mr. Borah must withdraw and apologize for those words of his that fill so much space in the Congressional Record. The plain fact seems to be that Mr. Borah is out to be "good" and a "regular." He can no longer be carried on the roster of independents and Progressives. Doubtless we shall hear in a year or so of a boom for him for a regular nomination for the Presidency.

THERE IS NO MEASURE on our statute books today that represents a more fundamental, sound, and important step in true progress than does this new charter of American Labor." Thus Herbert Hoover in his speech at Newark defended one of the most selfish and reactionary bits of legislation ever enacted in the United States—the closing of our doors to aspiring immigrants, the ending of a glorious chapter in enlightened humanitarianism, the yielding of the politicians to a demand of union labor which is on a par with its former efforts to limit the number of apprentices and to oppose the use of machinery. Quite rightly Mr. Hoover links this "new charter" with the protective system. He wants not only to exclude all foreign goods but all foreigners. For the farmers he holds out the hope of excluding foreign foodstuffs. Indeed, he assails the Democrats because they want, he says, to "let in a flood of foreign goods, destroy employment, and lower wages." Thus he outdoes Joe Cannon and Mark Hanna and William McKinley. Their fetish was at first to protect infant American industries and then only industries whose goods could be undersold. It never occurred to them to tax foreign foodstuffs or to protect the American workingman by abandoning the historic American ideal that this country should be an asylum for the oppressed and the ambitious from abroad. Mr. Hoover is for a country surrounded by a Chinese wall. There is only one further step he could take—non-intercourse, the stopping of the arrival of all ships from the rest of the world.

NOW, THE DISHONESTY OF ALL THIS lies in the fact that Herbert Hoover knows that this policy not only hits directly at our foreign trade, and invites foreign reprisals and international bitterness, but also makes impossible the payment of the vast sums owed us by the foreign governments we assisted during the war. He knows that every one of our large industries produces more than it can sell at home and that they cannot sell abroad without being paid, not in cash but in goods. William McKinley, theretofore the highest priest of protection, declared, just before his assassination, "If we will not buy, we cannot sell." Even he felt that brakes must be applied to the protective juggernaut. Mr. Hoover wants none. Yet he is supposedly the great internationalist, the one man who really understands foreign affairs, who knows how to deal with foreign problems, and is always actuated by humanitarianism. Governor Smith properly countered Mr. Hoover's economic nonsense when he declared in reply that the tariff is not the solution of the farmer's troubles. Obviously not. If the tariff were raised so high that not a pound of anything eatable could cross our frontiers it would in no wise settle the question of our food surplus. Governor Smith also made most effective use of a bit of sententious buncombe uttered by Mr. Hoover in 1925 that "the fundamental need is a balancing of agricultural production to our home demand." What Hoover meant then apparently was that the farmers must be so controlled by the government that they would not raise one pound more of anything than the country could consume!

THE DISCLOSURE IN THE HEARST PRESS—and this time the Hearst document turns out to be genuine—of the essential terms of the Franco-British naval understanding makes it clear that the naval officers of the two countries were in fact seeking to outmaneuver the United States. In return for French support of the British claim for an unlimited number of small cruisers—the claim which wrecked the Geneva "disarmament" conference—Britain accepts the French claim for an unlimited number of small submarines. Doubtless the British have as sound a right to urge their position as the American admirals to demand that Congress authorize a billion-dollar naval program (incidentally, there is not the slightest doubt that their claim will lead to a new big-navy howl in this country), but the secrecy with which the negotiations were surrounded can hardly be much more pleasing to the British public than to the American. At first, there was denial of the existence of the pact; then, when the rumors bloated it into a new Dual Alliance, it was asserted that it referred merely to technical details; then came an announcement that it was so harmless that it would be published; then it was kept secret until a Hearst correspondent persuaded some French diplomat to show him a copy of an official memorandum describing it. This was, indeed, a flagrant example of the evil of secret diplomacy. The French and British positions were well known prior to the agreement, but the British Foreign Office, by attempting secretly, in advance of a general international conference, to pledge the French to support their position against the American, has poisoned the international atmosphere.

WE NEED A DWIGHT MORROW FOR COLOMBIA, and probably we shall need one in Venezuela too. Venezuela, in the last three years, has jumped from the bottom of the list of the world's oil-producing countries to a position where she vies with Russia for second place and is shipping more oil than Mexico. Colombia, which in 1924 exported 447,744 barrels of petroleum, sent out 15,760,797 barrels in 1927, and if she had more pipelines to the sea she would pump more oil through them. Of course, the oil companies and concessionaires are becoming involved in disputes with the Colombian Government, and, of course, the American concessionaires are dragging the State Department into their disputes. Ludwell Denny told a part of the history of the Barco Concession, about which the latest dispute centers, in The Nation for July 11, last. The Colombian Government has since issued a second decree upholding the cancelation of the 5,000,000-acre concession, in which the Mellon family, through the Gulf Oil Company, is heavily interested; the concessionaire, through the Ameri-man Minister at Bogota, has asked to file a further memorial in behalf of its title; the Colombian Government has replied, sharply warning the United States to keep out of Colombia's domestic affairs; and the State Department has retorted, vigorously affirming its right to intervene in behalf of property interests. The net result is more anti-Yankee sentiment in Latin America and the beginning of another prolonged diplomatic dispute. Ambassador Morrow seems to have found it possible to persuade the Mexicans that even a Yankee diplomat can be a gentleman; why not put someone of his character in charge in Washington?

THE APPARENTLY UNANIMOUS STAND of the Mexican Congress for Emilio Portes Gil, newly appointed Secretary of State, as the next president of Mexico, has an obvious logic behind it. Shortly after the murder of Obregon, Portes Gil, former governor of Tamaulipas and a well-known lawyer, was given the cabinet position which according to the Mexican constitution ranks after the presidency. Almost simultaneously Dr. Puig Caussaranc, the new Minister of Industry, speaking for Calles, declared that "the law shall be the next president"; Calles himself corroborated this in his presidential message, reaffirming his stand against reelection and stating that "the time for military chieftainship is past." The former Obregonista bloc in the Chamber of Deputies split up; the factions which had been supporting various generals for the presidency dissolved; and the generals themselves, together with most of the lesser military chieftains, declared themselves definitely "with and behind the president" and for a civilian. Portes Gil, almost a dark horse, became the only possible candidate. He has a solid record of agrarian reform in the northern part of Mexico behind him. On loans of the National Agrarian Bank agricultural communities were organized, machinery was bought, and agricultural experts were detailed to give intense assistance to the small farmers. Portes Gil is somewhat of the Calles stamp.

Everyone of you has seen policemen inflict corporal punishment on prisoners. Everyone has seen brother officers intoxicated and has not reported it.

THIS IS NOT A POLICE CONFESSION extorted by some belligerent district attorney uncovering police corruption in Philadelphia or Chicago or elsewhere. It is the calm and deliberate statement of Patrolman R. J. Allen of the Third Precinct in the city of Washington, D. C., at a mass meeting of policemen held in an attempt by the men themselves to discover what is wrong with the department, and how the wrongs are to be remedied. It is not surprising that the Washington Herald declares that most of his comrades who heard him considered that he was "too painfully frank." Naturally, for he convicted them to their faces of constantly committing crimes. Patrolman Allen went on to say that having been present on one occasion at the infliction of corporal punishment on prisoners he attempted to interfere and was reported to his superiors for his trouble. The lieutenant on duty told him to mind his own business. It is time that somebody in Washington acted, for recent figures show that more than one-third of the police of the nation's capital have been brought up before a higher authority on one or more charges within the last three years. Several men are up for trial now on charges of drunkenness, reckless driving, the uncalled-for shooting of a colored man, etc. Yet this story is one than can be told about almost every police force in this country. No wonder there is crime in America.

CALIFORNIA'S BRIGHT PROSPERITY is dimmed a trifle by data recently come to light. In Los Angeles (which is planning to have a population of some several millions of people by 1950 or thereabouts) 31,000 citizens are registered with the Emergency Employment Bureau whose advisory committee is headed by Mayor George E. Cryer. According to a letter recently sent out by the bureau some of these are in "destitute circumstances" while others, home-owners, are in danger of losing their homes through lack of employment. The bureau appeals for aid, emphasizing the fact that the citizens of Los Angeles, by helping the 31,000 out of work to secure employment, will really be helping themselves "by making possible the elimination of soup kitchens, (with all the attendant detrimental publicity in the Eastern papers)." From the grape-growers of California comes another note of distress. Since prohibition they have increased their total yearly production somewhat more than 200 per cent; since 1920 the annual carload shipments out of California have more than trebled. This year the "juice," or wine, variety will come close to the unprecedented figure of 500,000 tons. But this is more than can be profitably sold and distributed, and the California Vineyardists Association has been organized with the aid and support of such big-business leaders as Henry M. Robinson, Paul Shoup, and Herbert Fleishhacker. Of course, this has nothing to do with the prohibition issue in the election. Californians will vote Dry with Hoover and refuse to admit that the grapes will be used for anything but grape jelly.

ON THE COAST of old Santo Domingo where Christopher Columbus and his sailors landed in their first exploration of the West Indies all the nations of the Americas are uniting to build a Columbus Memorial Lighthouse. The project, which is sponsored by the Pan-American Union, has been planned with imagination and a genuine regard for artistic values. No political committee will handle the designing of the memorial but the choice will be left to architects from every nation of the world who care to compete for the grand prize offered for the best design. The international jury of architects, chosen by the competitors themselves, will award prizes of $2,000 each for the best ten designs submitted in a preliminary competition, and then will set the ten winners competing against one another to perfect the final design. The ultimate winner will receive at least $10,000, and his earnings may run to several hundred thousand. Towering perhaps six hundred feet over a memorial park of 2,500 acres, the great lighthouse of sea and air will overlook the island which Christopher Columbus loved more than any other place in the world. It will be more than a monument to Columbus. It will be a symbol of the potential friendship of all American peoples and a reminder that beauty is a more worthy goal of international competition than the range of elevated guns.

A NEW NAPOLEON OF THE PRESS announced himself to the world the other day in full-page advertisements in New York newspapers. The advertisements, bearing the cryptic title "Down the Pilot's Ladder," expounded the career and ambitions of Mr. Albert J. Kobler, lately the guiding genius of the American Weekly, the Sunday magazine of Mr. Hearst's many newspapers. Mr. Kobler, who admits he made the American Weekly what it is today—"with 25,000,000 readers and advertising $16,000 per page, it has smashed every circulation and rate record"—has a soul that clamors for greater conquests. He says so himself:

But neither my temperament nor career can be satisfied with a situation that hereafter demands so little personal action. My energies and imagination must have fuller play.

And Mr. Hearst has been so lavish, so generous and appreciative, that my ambition can at last afford to execute a project cherished and deferred for twenty-five years.

And so I have tendered my resignation, turned the ship back to its captain. With this statement I climb down the pilot's ladder to an argosy of dreams.

I am now the proprietor of a New York Daily. . . .

I only bespeak the patience of friends and public for time to "Build my Rome."

Within a few days I will formally announce where I have hung my hat and flung my flag.

The argosy of dreams on which Mr. Kobler has hung his hat and from which he has flung his flag and on which he will build his Rome is none other than the New York Daily Mirror, least successful of the city's three tabloid dailies.

IT IS WITH KEEN REGRET that The Nation announces the retirement from its active editorial staff, with this issue, of Lewis S. Gannett and Mark Van Doren. For nine years Mr. Gannett has served this weekly with a devotion and ability that make the loss of his gifted and charming pen a serious one, especially in the field of foreign happenings and politics. Of this his articles on the new China, contributed from that country in 1926, afford only one, if a striking, illustration. Mark Van Doren's work as literary editor has spoken for itself. The third of his family to hold this position, Mr. Van Doren leaves to devote himself to other activities in which lie his chief interests, notably the field of poetry. It will, we hope, always be a function of The Nation, as long as it exists, to serve as a training school for liberal writers and editors to prepare them for leadership in other fields. It cannot, however, be expected to feel else than a pang of sorrow when it must lose such collaborators as Messrs. Gannett and Van Doren. Fortunately for our readers, their transfer to the board of contributing editors assures The Nation of at least occasional contributions from them. As a result of these changes Freda Kirchwey becomes literary editor and Paul Blanshard, of the League for Industrial Democracy, becomes an associate editor.

Mr. Hoover's Misstatements

IN his Newark speech on labor and prosperity Herbert Hoover played the role of a political magician, showing his audience the empty Democratic hat of 1921, and then pulling out the rabbit of Republican prosperity. Unfortunately his statistical springs were not well oiled, and the false bottom of the hat was plainly evident. How clumsy Mr. Hoover was in his legerdemain may be seen by placing in one column some of his important claims and in another column certain contradictory facts.

WHAT HOOVER SAID:

An accurate survey of the Department of Labor showed that even including the usual winter seasonal unemployment, about 1,800,000 employees were out of work as contrasted with five to six million in 1921.

THE FACTS:

Ethelbert Stewart, Commissioner of Labor Statistics, reported on March 24, 1928 (see Monthly Labor Review of the Department of Labor for April, 1928, page 26), an estimate of the shrinkage in the number of employed workers between 1925 and 1928 as 1,800,000. The figure was not an estimate of unemployment; no account was taken of the number of unemployed in 1925. The Labor Bureau, Inc., estimates the unemployment this year at about 4,000,000.

The foreword to the report of the President's Conference on Unemployment, signed by Herbert Hoover, refers to "four to five million unemployed as a result of the business depression of that year." This conference met in September, 1921. It appointed a subcommittee of experts to report on the number of unemployed. Their estimate, as contained in the official record, says: "It is highly improbable, taking all occupations into account, that more than 3,500,000 persons now remain unemployed in the sense that they desire and are unable to find work suited to their capacities."

When we assumed direction of the government in 1921 there were five to six million unemployed upon our streets. . . . The Republican Administration at once undertook to find relief to this situation. At once a nation-wide employment conference was called. It was made up of representatives of both employers and employees. I had the honor to be chairman of that conference. . . . Within a year we restored these five million workers to employment.

The Republicans assumed office in March, 1921, but President Harding did not call an unemployment conference until six months later, September, 1921. As to Mr. Hoover's claim that they had restored five million workers to employment within a year, compare the employment figures of the Bureau of Labor Statistics for the year after the President's Conference with the estimates of unemployment made in the official report of that conference. The Monthly Labor Re- view for December, 1922, gives the estimated growth in employment from October, 1921, to October, 1922; this comparison shows that 1,500,000 would be a generous estimate of the number restored to employment during that year.

Despite the great after-war slump they [real wages] have risen until today they are over 50 per cent greater than before the war.

The best figures which we have concerning variations in real wages are those of Paul Douglas of the University of Chicago, published in the American Economic Review for March, 1926. Mr. Douglas estimates that there was an increase in real annual earnings from 1913 to 1924 of about 15 per cent. Since 1924 real earnings have increased very little.

Jurgen Kuczynski and Marguerite Steinfeld, in Research Series, No. 6, of the American Federation of Labor, after an exhaustive analysis based on government figures, estimate the increase in real wages of manufacturing workers from 1924 to 1927 at less than 1 per cent, from 1914 to 1927 at 35 per cent.

Some of the slips Mr. Hoover made are unimportant blunders of detail which any busy man might make, but taken as a whole they reveal how Hoover the Republican is corrupting Hoover the engineer. His least excusable error, the underestimate of our unemployment, was borrowed from another Cabinet member, James J. Davis, who used his position as Secretary of Labor last Spring to distort the report of his own Commissioner of Labor Statistics and to send out a false statement concerning the volume of unemployment. The Davis falsehood was immediately revealed in the press and widely commented upon, so Mr. Hoover can scarcely avoid responsibility for repeating it at this time.

When he talks about efficiency Mr. Hoover is on familiar ground. He wades into his subject with a zest and a command of detail that are most refreshing after the limp platitudes of Mr. Coolidge. Between the lines can be read his philosophy of economic life. He is not disturbed by the inequalities in the distribution of wealth in the United States, the greatest inequalities in the history of the world. The Department of Commerce under Herbert Hoover's guidance has cooperated with manufacturing industries to reduce internal inefficiencies whenever the owners desired such cooperation, but when public interest has clashed with the interests of the owners Mr. Hoover has avoided the challenge. Notably in coal and electric power, where a comprehensive program of public ownership and coordination is required to protect the consumer, Mr. Hoover chose to run away from his opportunity because the owners preferred the old way.

The Protestant Menace

“THERE are two thousand pastors here. You have in your churches more than 600,000 members of the Methodist church in Ohio alone. That is enough to swing the election. The 600,000 have friends in other States. Write to them.” Those were Mabel Walker Willebrandt’s words to the Ohio conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and after her address the conference voted, unanimously, to support Herbert Hoover for President.

“There can be no question as to the plain duty of all Presbyterian church members,” Rev. Dr. Hugh K. Walker, moderator of the General Assembly of that church, writes in its official organ. “The plain duty of every churchman is to work and pray and vote for the election of Herbert Hoover.”

Al Smith was right in what he said at Oklahoma City. It would hardly be possible to persuade any body of Roman Catholics in this country to adopt, by a vote even approaching unanimity, a resolution supporting any candidate for public office. For one thing, they would be afraid to do so. They would be too well aware that such action would expose them to the charge that the church was in politics, that the Catholics were attempting to control the state. And they would be right in so fearing. Any such action by a body of Roman Catholics would bring out a flood of anti-Catholic feeling which would overwhelmingly defeat the candidate indorsed.

But the Methodists indorse Hoover with impunity, and the Presbyterian leader asks his fellow churchmen to vote en bloc. Protestants seek to throw the Protestant vote to Hoover, and have no fear that they will be accused of destroying the balance of church and state. We have become accustomed to the Protestant church in politics; it is so familiar that we have ceased to fear it. Yet the simple fact, due to no special virtue in either of the historic religious groups, is that if there is a church menace in this country it is a Protestant rather than a Catholic menace, simply because the tradition of this country is Protestant and the bulk of its population is Protestant. The danger of religious oppression always comes from the majority church. Catholics, despite a very different attitude in countries predominantly Catholic, have in this country loyally supported the Constitutional principle of separation of church and state, well knowing that the unofficial state church of this country was Protestant. On the other hand, in Arkansas Protestant Fundamentalists, balked in their effort to force an anti-evolution law through the Legislature, have put the question before the voters in the form of a State referendum. What happened in Tennessee is still a familiar and painful story, and for Tennessee’s monkey law and the Dayton trial organized forces of the Protestant church are directly responsible.

We are not of those who would have the churches draw a sharp line between politics and religion. The man who takes his religion seriously inevitably finds it affecting the issues of his daily life and his code of public conduct. If religion and peace are identified in his mind, a minister must indeed voice his Christian protest against war. Prohibition is quite properly claimed as an achievement of Protestant church effort, and we are not among those who feel that churchmen should have left the issue alone. But when the churches as such attempt to put sectarian legislation upon the statute-books, as in Arkansas, or when they attempt to bar members of rival creeds from public office, they go too far, and a real church menace appears upon the horizon. We do not want sectarian blocs in America.

Mrs. Willebrandt, the skilled politician who was Harry Daugherty’s right hand, knew only too well the depth of the prejudice to which she could appeal. She knew, as every politician knows, the bitterness of the klannish spirit so deep-rooted in many evangelical church groups. Even The Nation’s mail reflects the backwash of its appeal. “The progress and advancement of the world depends upon Protestant Christianity,” writes a Louisiana reader. From Kansas City comes a passionate appeal to get our “Protestant [twice underscored] friends and relatives to vote,” and the threat that if “Protestants do not wake up and do their duty by a united vote, we are going to have a Roman Catholic for President.” From Idaho comes an hysterical accusation (no sillier than hundreds of others) that Rome inspired the recent race riots for reasons which the anonymous writer does not make entirely clear. A Jewish Republican in Canada writes that her vacation conversations with anti-Catholic Southerners have convinced her that Jews should vote for Al Smith in self-protection against the menace of religious hate.

Anti-Catholicism has thus made religion an issue in American politics. We recognize the right of individuals to believe that the Catholic church threatens American institutions, and to argue the question, as Mr. Marshall and Governor Smith argued it a year ago. But it seems to us beyond argument that Mrs. Willebrandt and the Stratons and Heflins are attempting to make the Protestant churches dominant forces in American politics. This transcends the issue of prohibition. No political issue should be set beyond argument, crystallized as a part of the dogma of a church. When a minority sect sets up binding doctrines, and bids its members vote accordingly, it may be negligible; but when the dominant church group of the nation does that, the historic separation between church and state has ceased to function.

No, we are not alarmed by the Catholic peril in the United States. If his Catholicism has influenced Al Smith in office at all, it has made him rather specially careful to select non-Catholics for appointment. But if the Protestant bigots continue their dire work there will be in this country a real Protestant peril. If they continue they will make decent people hope, as an object-lesson, for the election of a Catholic President in 1928, a Jew in 1932, and an atheist in 1936.

An American Resume

“AMERICANISM” got back to an older meaning when the International Congress of Americanists met under Franz Boas’s presidency in New York City, September 17 to 22. These Americanists were anthropologists from some twenty-five countries, and men with names like Bogoras, Hrdlicka, and Tello were among those who contributed most to an understanding of the remote American past. Anthropology has broadened in recent years. It is no longer a branch of biology; it is pre-history, and includes phases of psychology and sociology. And in the last decade we have learned more about American pre-history than in a dozen earlier decades. It is not yet possible to make precise statements regarding the antiquity and origin of the American civilizations, but the papers read at this conference gave a new, vivid picture of pre-Columbian culture.

It seems agreed that man inhabited this continent at least a few thousand years before the Christian era, having come from Asia by way of Behring Straits, and the remarkable civilizations of pre-white America may be explained as native growths. But there agreement ends. In America a beginning of culture has as yet been fully traced only in the Southwest of the United States. The great civilizations to the South seem to have sprung up mysteriously full-born, already inter-related across great spaces, yet not demonstrably indebted to any special spot or impulse except as the development of agriculture contributed to a sedentary national life and a powerful religious tradition.

An impressive vision of the age and power behind these civilizations was afforded at the conference by the results of the Carnegie Institute expeditions, dramatically presented in the discoveries and reconstructions at Chichen-Itzá, under Dr. G. S. Morley, and the newly uncovered most ancient site of Huaxactun, dated before the Christian era, excavated by Dr. O. G. Ricketson; a concept of their scope across space was given in the results of the explorations of the Tulane University Expedition, under Dr. Franz Blom, which traversed on mule-back the whole of the Maya area, through the jungles from Central America to Yucatan; a further demonstration of high development at an early date was given in the newly reconstructed pyramid of Tenayuca in the Valley of Mexico, work undertaken by the Mexican Government under Dr. Jose Reygadas Vertiz, and in the study of pre-Aztec and pre-Toltec potteries of the Valley of Mexico, presented by Dr. G. C. Vaillant of the American Museum of Natural History.

Such civilizations as America produced do not die easily, despite the onward sweep of European culture. How elements of them survive, how they assimilate new factors and reshape themselves to new conditions, was suggested by Dr. S. K. Lothrop's discovery of a modern Maya calendar, directly fitting into the old, used today in Guatemala; by the Maya ceremonies and customs investigated by Oliver La Farge; by the evidence of fertility cults surviving in Guatemala, investigated by Dr. Franz Termer; by the primitive cults and "picture-writing" discovered by Dr. Erland Nordenskiöld in South America; by the Bush Negro culture in Dutch Guiana, built up by runaway slaves out of African, European, and native American elements, investigated by Dr. J. M. Herskovits; by Dr. Barbeau's studies of the assimilation of art motifs by North American Indians, and Dr. Benedict's analysis of the psychological basis of the preservation of local traditions.

Apart from the scientific value of these investigations, they suggest experimental applications of anthropology, such as that initiated in Mexico by Dr. Manuel Gamio, and more recently among the primitive peoples of Russia by Dr. Waldemar Bogoras, both on a similar principle of education on the basis of old customs and beliefs. To most of us today pre-Columbian America is more remote than pre-Christian Europe. These Americanists are opening the way for a coming American generation which will feel closer to its own continent.

The Woman's Party and Mr. Hoover

THE uncompromising National Woman's Party has compromised. After having declared repeatedly in its official organ, Equal Rights, as well as in statements by its leaders, that it could not give its organized support to any candidate for President who did not forthrightly, specifically, and unequivocally declare himself in favor of equal rights between men and women, a conference of its national and State officers and founders and life members has adopted a resolution "to support the Republican candidates for President and Vice-President for the reason that of all the candidates before the country, these are the only ones whose election offers any hope to the movement for equal rights between men and women."

What hope did Herbert Hoover and Charles Curtis offer to the movement for equal rights? The Republican platform "accepted" a non-existent equality between men and women, boasted of its appointment of women to government positions, and urged women to "participate even more generally than now in party management and activity." Later, however, the Republicans segregated women from the Eastern party conference into a little conference of ladies only.

In his speech of acceptance, Mr. Hoover said:

Conservative, progressive, and liberal thought and action have their only real test in whether they contribute to equal opportunity, whether they hold open the door of opportunity. If they do not, they are false, no matter what their name may be.

When a deputation from the Woman's Party went to Mr. Hoover on September 12 and asked him, on the basis of this statement, to support the Equal Rights Amendment, his only suggestion was that he might have some of his friends make an investigation. In his reply to the Women's Party delegation, he said, according to the stenographic report later approved by him:

There is on the statute-books of all States much legislation designed primarily for the benefit of women and children. I hesitate to say without a thorough and exhaustive study that all of these statutes should be brushed aside with one sweep of the hand.

"Women and children!" It was this sub-title in the Democratic platform which roused the Woman's Party to scorn and derision. It is a classification which they have been fighting ever since there was an organized demand for the rights of adult women. Yet only a few hours after Mr. Hoover used the hated phrase, the Woman's Party adopted a resolution to back him. Its indorsement of Mr. Curtis is, of course, logical since the Senate leader has consistently supported the Woman's Party and its program.

We have no quarrel with Mr. Hoover for his hesitation to support an amendment which would wipe out all protective industrial legislation. It is an attitude which he shares with the candidates of the Democratic and Socialist parties and with which we ourselves have sympathy. We quarrel only with the National Woman's Party, which in coming out for Mr. Hoover is abandoning an historic and successful policy of political strategy. But perhaps the days of militancy are over.

It Seems to Heywood Broun

HERBERT CLARK HOOVER has performed the extraordinary feat of managing to make dignity almost as offensive as billingsgate. Last week he declared that his campaign for the Presidency was based upon "the issues and conditions in the Republican Party" and that it was "not a campaign of opposition." In other words, so great is the exclusiveness of Mr. Hoover that he likes to pretend that there is no other candidate. The great humanitarian is quite above the tiresome necessity of answering any questions propounded by a man named Al. The famous engineer resents the fact that he should be called upon to explain to the voters his plans and purposes. With all an expert's contempt for commonalty, it suffices him to talk vaguely of prosperity and acres of diamonds and let the rest go hang. The textile workers starve, and if they clamor loud enough perhaps Herbert Hoover may hear and toss out a handful of statistics. The trouble with the farmers is that there are too many of them. Are coal miners hungry? Let them drop their picks, leave their children, and seek other jobs in busier regions. White is white and a straight line is the shortest distance between two points. Mr. Hoover in his own person has said a harsh word against no man and he has been bold enough to declare that he believes in righteousness, honesty, and tolerance. It is a rocking-chair campaign and the Republican nominee has not once come out from behind the sheltering potted palms.

As a matter of fact, Herbert Clark Hoover is not running for anything. He's being run. The holier-than-thou attitude of the man would be annoying enough in itself, but when this attitude serves merely as a false front to conceal the dirtiest political fight waged in this country in fifty years the composite picture becomes obscene. Public life knows no greater hypocrite than Mr. Hoover. He is deserving of the scorn of decent men.

After Governor Smith's speech in Oklahoma the Republican campaign managers had the audacity to reply that after all their man had already come out for tolerance and long before Al Smith. But Hoover's references to the subject were the veriest generalities. Not one word has he uttered to offend the Klan and all its kleagles. They may not be his men but he is theirs. Fanatics, trimmers, rascals have joined the train of Herbert Hoover and nothing has come from the great humanitarian to discourage such support.

Indeed the pretense has been set up that Mr. Hoover knows nothing about it. The voters are asked to believe that he is too aloof from petty politics to notice such things. Accepting such statements at face value, one would have to mark the man down as a magnificent recluse or someone not quite bright. But there is no reason why we should accept disclaimers from Work or Moses. The lies which they give out while their chief preens himself in silence are just a shade too gross. The religious issue, so they say, was dragged into the campaign by a desperate, undeserving Democrat.

Mabel Walker Willebrandt had already addressed a conference of Methodist pastors before Smith defied the Klan and all its allies. And then to emphasize Republican mendacity Mrs. Willebrandt did it once again. To be sure the lady said that she was not seeking to stir up religious prejudice. She merely invited all Methodist preachers to stand up in their pulpits and work for Mr. Hoover. Prohibition, according to her definition, is not a matter of politics at all but a moral issue. Seemingly she is willing to let the Protestant churches decide certain vital public questions in the light of their own dogma and bar all outsiders from having any voice in the matter whatsoever. But if prohibition is a moral issue and belongs beyond the range of politics, then so do divorce, birth control, and Sabbath observance. Is America calmly to turn all such questions over to the churchgoing members of the evangelical Protestant sects and refrain from making any decision through the weight of numbers?

Mrs. Mabel Walker Willebrandt is no outsider exempt from party discipline. It seems to me an evil thing that a representative of the Department of Justice should mingle so vociferously in any campaign and still more when she lights the torch of denominational prejudice. But aside from being close to the Attorney General in the cabinet which Hoover has just quitted Mrs. Willebrandt is closely linked to the candidate in other ways. She was his right hand at Kansas City and served upon the Credentials Committee where she did yeoman service for the great humanitarian. Even though it disturbs the dignity of Mr. Hoover, somebody should take his statistics away from him and wake him with a resounding slap between the shoulders. And let this messenger from the outside world of hurly-burly shout loudly in his ear: "Herbert, I wish to call your attention to Mabel."

Immediately after the conventions there was comment by many newspapers tending to express the belief that both parties had put their best foot forward and that the country would be well served no matter who won the election. In a small way this commentator contributed to that fallacious reasoning. By now I wish that it had been Curtis or any one of the Old Guard stalwarts. No standpatter could possibly have succeeded in so debauching national politics by smearing them over with hypocrisy. Of course Herbert Hoover is not the first stuffed shirt set up as a breastwork for rogues and regulars. The pity of it lies in the fact that his camouflage has been successful with so many. All the aerated blood of Borah is on the hands of Herbert Hoover. If Curtis had only received the nomination we should have been spared the pitiful spectacle of seeing the Senator from Idaho whooping around the country with the tricks and postures of an old-line machine politician. Borah is dead. The cross which marks the spot should rest upon the abdomen of Herbert Hoover, for he has devoured a good man and swallowed him.

Naturally Mr. Hoover has been obliged to dispose of his own soul as well during the exigencies of the campaign, and in this respect he has proved himself a superb business man. According to tradition the deal can be made just once. Mr. Hoover has bettered the technique of Faust. His soul, and not a very big one either, has been bartered off a score of times. In fact, whenever he saw a group of voters.

HEYWOOD BROWN

Will Rogers, the Bunkless Candidate

By DOROTHY VAN DOREN

"WHATEVER the other fellow don't do, we will." Thus refreshingly Will Rogers, the bunkless candidate for President, begins his campaign. It is, of course, a dangerous doctrine, but Mr. Rogers does not mean it that way. In announcing himself as the candidate of the Anti-Bunk Party, he says: "Our support will have to come from those who want nothing and have the assurance of getting it." Within these limits, therefore, he—and the country—is perfectly safe. He can say what he likes, he can thumb his nose at politics, he can make saucy faces at government. There is not the slightest chance of his being elected, and the American people, which is said to be noted for its sense of humor, is willing to let such a man have his little joke and to laugh heartily at it.

The idea of running Will Rogers for President was conceived by Life, the humorous weekly, and in its columns he duly sets forth his views on politics and the other candidates. There are campaign buttons with Rogers's picture, burlesque political rallies are broadcasted over the radio, and Life is besieged by a large number of persons desirous of voting for Rogers and anxious to find out how to do it. A national committee of fifteen prominent citizens has solemnly agreed to indorse his candidacy. Henry Ford, Harold Lloyd, Nicholas Murray Butler, Roy Howard, Glenn H. Curtis, Judge Ben B. Lindsey, Babe Ruth, William Allen White, Clare Briggs, Grantland Rice, General William Mitchell, Ring Lardner, the Rev. Francis P. Duffy, Charles Dana Gibson, and Tex Rickard make up the committee. Thus it appears that Candidate Rogers has the support of Industry, Sport, Art, Journalism, the Army, the University, the Church, and the Bench. What more could a candidate ask? Radical and conservative, rich and—comparatively—poor, swell and proletarian, man of letters and ignorant financier, all these are not only among his anonymous supporters but his publicly announced committee. The Press and the People, the Catholic Church, the New York 400—surely no candidate was ever championed with such glorious variety from one end of the social scale to the other. And Will Rogers holds their support, he says, by eschewing bunk. "We are going to try and eliminate slogans. Slogans have been more harmful to the country than Boll-Weevil, Luncheon Clubs, Sand Fleas, Detours Conventions, and Golf Pants." Thus the candidate of the Anti-Bunk Party. "No matter what's on our platform now," he says, "on November 6 we will have a bonfire and burn the platform." However, a few of the planks in the Anti-Bunk platform are as follows:

Whatever Hoover or Smith promises you, we'll raise 'em at least 20 per cent. (And I can come just as near keeping my promise as they can.)

We absolutely promise to make no effort to get votes by sex appeal. (We are glad to have so much support from the ladies, but if it turns out that it is only sex appeal, then they'll have to stop printing my picture in the paper.)

Our plank on the liquor question is: "Wine for the rich, beer for the poor, and moonshine for the dregs."

We will not only give the farmer relief, we will cure him of being a farmer.

I also pledge myself that, if elected, I will not have any Official Spokesman.

The last plank ought to be good for a million extra votes anyway. But more encouraging even than his attitude on the Official Spokesman is Mr. Rogers's animadversions on the farmer. "I am the only candidate," he declares, that is running on either side that has ever looked a Mule in the face (or otherwise) down a corn row. I know what the farmer needs, but I can't give it to him. But I am going to tell him before election that I can't give it to him—and not afterwards.

I can tell you in a few words what the farmer needs. He needs a punch in the jaw if he believes that either of the parties cares a dam about him after election!

That's all the farmer needs, and that's all he'll get.

Mr. Rogers has nothing personally against his rivals. "They are both able, fine men," he says, "but they wasn't chosen on that account." They were chosen because they were vote-getters, he goes on, and Wet and Dry will forget their principles in the final crisis and stick by the party of their grandfathers. "All you hear now is the Politicians of both partys hollering about what great Candidates they have. Al Smith is really Thomas Jefferson disguised in a brown derby and Hoover is Abraham Lincoln with a college education." Thus the Anti-Bunk Party tells the truth about the opposing leaders. The politicians are running them because each looks like a good bet. Party leaders want to win. Mr. Rogers says he will eliminate party leaders; "no party can be as bad as its leaders," he adds. And the party leaders, having picked their candidates to win, now pretend that they "carry on the glorious traditions of our party" because—according to the relentless anti-bunker—"they're in favor of Motherhood, Virtue, the Constitution, and anything else that seems to call for a word of praise, including the Farmer."

All this is as invigorating as a bright fall day. In place of the stale windiness of political promises, we have wind, it is true, but wind of a refreshing sort. The Rogers wind blows cobwebs away, cobwebs that both the major parties have been guilty of weaving. A good deal of this amiable truth-telling, of course, is due to the fact that Candidate Rogers doesn't expect, or even hope, to win.

Not even in his funniest dreams, I imagine, can he see himself in the White House as its rightful tenant. So he can afford to tell at least part of the truth, and it is evident that he derives considerable enjoyment from the telling. He knows, as every intelligent man knows, that politics is no longer the recreation of gentlemen or, save at least rarely, the profession chosen by aspiring men who love and want to serve their country. It is a business, like any other business. You spend money to get in; if you don't spend enough money, you get out. "It's fine of these other candidates to want to run a campaign on a High Plane," says this Bad Boy of Politics, but it would be just like me wanting to conduct my campaign on a strictly grammatical basis. I would like to but I just ain't equipped for it, and that's the way they are. With politicians as the tools you just ain't equipped to conduct anything on a high plane. The whole election won't be a month old till everybody in it will revert right back to type. So this will give you a sort of rough idea of how low it will get by fall.

So there's where the Anti-Bunk Party is lying low, just to grab up the fellows that can see these other two boys are nice kids, but they are just running for the job.

They got their minds set on the tail end of Pennsylvania Avenue, and they will promise anything short of perpetual motion to have Senators eat breakfast with 'em.

This, says Mr. Rogers, is the truth about politics. And it is not necessary to set oneself up as a professional cynic in order to agree with him. This is the Age of Bunk. We eat it with our cereal at breakfast, we ride to work with it posted before our eyes, we see it in the movies at night, we hear it over the radio. Bunk is the American staple of existence. In love, in war, in work, in play it is busy making things seem what they almost certainly are not. Bunk greases the wheels of industry; bunk furnishes the home. Mr. Rogers, of course, did not originate this idea. Nor is he the first man to see that bunk colors politics as well as everything else in American life. The truth of the matter is that the American people like bunk, they choose it deliberately, it is the breath of life to them.

Doubtless Mr. Rogers is perfectly aware of this. At any rate, it is part of the joy that he gets out of life to be the debunker of persons, safe or otherwise. His quips in print or on the stage and lecture platforms long before he was nominated for the Presidency have spared nobody—that is one reason why he is such a popular candidate. Not even the holy Calvin Coolidge has been safe from him. Indeed, the longer the President has remained in office the sharper the humorous barbs, and the greater the reported coolness between them. In June last he wrote:

I see by this morning's papers that Mr. Coolidge is sending somebody to Kansas City to protect his interest. If I had an interest to be protected at a political convention, I believe I would send the marines. It would be a good joke on the Republicans, if they went and nominated somebody else, if Coolidge would veto the nomination. He is liable to do it just through force of habit.

It is not his fault that the bunkless candidate has not appeared more largely on the political stage, for he challenged both Al Smith and Herbert Hoover. His challenge to Al is so characteristic that it deserves its place in this record:

Dear Friend Al:

Now this is the open season for debates, and I believe you and I could put on about as good a one as one of these others. So I hereby challenge you the way I challenged the other fellow last week.

Now the trouble with most debates, they are confined to a subject. Now we won't let that worry us, we'll just rent Madison Square Garden. All we do is sell tickets, and let the money go to poor Democratic widows who have given their husband's lives to trying to get elected to some office in the Democratic Party. Those are the most deserving women I know of.

And there's farm relief. You know how a farmer votes. When he gets to the polls he reaches in his pocket and sees how much he's got. If it's only a few cents, why, he says, "Throw the rascals out," and he votes Democratic. But if he's got as much as a dollar he guesses that the rascals is on his side after all, so maybe he'd better leave 'em in.

I wrote Hoover and challenged him, but he wanted to make it over the radio. Hoover wants to get on the radio where they can't see him, but with you it's different. You want the gang to see you. You want to make your appeal to the common people. Well, you can't make any commoner appeal than I can.

So come on, be a good fellow, Al, and name the time, place, and subject (if any). You and I can pack 'em in.

So long, Al, and good luck to you till we meet in debate.

Yours,

WILL,

Candidate of the Anti-Bunk Party, without campaign buttons or cigars.

The pity of it is "Will's" candidacy has not received even wider attention. However, thousands of Americans are giving thanks to Mr. Rogers for providing the one cheerful note in an otherwise trying political campaign.

Electric Rates Need Readjustment

By EDGAR J. KATES

FOR a number of years the electric light and power companies have been "regulated" by the several States; that is, before they could issue new stocks and bonds or change their rate schedules the companies were obliged to obtain the approval of State public-service commissions. It was recognized that it would be wasteful to have more than one electric company serve a single locality, but on the other hand, the privilege of exclusive service could not be safely granted unless there was some control in the public interest. And so laws have been enacted by most of the States, giving the electric companies the valuable privileges of exclusive territories and the rights of eminent domain, but imposing upon them supervision by State commissions.

Because the free conduct of their business would be hampered, the electric companies at first looked with disfavor upon State control, and many attempts were made to prevent the functioning of the public-service commissions. In the last few years, however, the attitude of the power companies toward the commissions has been completely reversed, and the companies are now staunch supporters of the principle of State regulation despite occasional controversies on specific details.

Why this change of mind? Can it be because the power companies have found State regulation profitable beyond their fondest hopes? Instead of unrestricted competition they now have monopolies—regulated monopolies, to be sure, but regulated in a manner highly advantageous to them.

In effect the public utilities are operating on a "cost plus" basis, and this bears great resemblance to a business man's idea of paradise. According to the regulative laws of most of the States, it is the duty of the public-service commission to limit the income of each power company to an amount not exceeding a "fair return" (usually put at 8 per cent) on the "rate base" or value of the property. While the stated purpose of the law is to prevent the return exceeding this limit, the nature of the business is such that few companies earn appreciably less than the maximum allowed. Two-thirds of the utility income being derived from current sold for lighting, which is almost entirely non-competitive, the income necessary to pay an 8 per cent return is easily assured by a sufficiently high-rate schedule for lighting service.

This "fair return" upon the value of the property used by the electric power company is the foundation upon which has been reared the type of financial pyramid so clearly brought to light by last year's report of the Federal Trade Commission's investigations. The 8 per cent earnings upon the total investment of the operating company not only suffice to pay the holders of the bonds and preferred stock their 5 to 7 per cent, but the remaining earnings yield 12 to 15 per cent to the holders of the common stock equities in these operating companies. Furthermore, by means of holding-company ownership of these common stock equities, the multiplication process is repeated, whereby the promoters who own the common stock of the holding companies receive, according to the official report, earnings ranging from 16.50 per cent to as high as 55.22 per cent! The ordinary investor who supplies most of the money in the business is excluded from these huge profits and receives merely 5 to 7 per cent on his holdings of bonds or preferred stock.

The profit in the pyramiding process results from the fact that the public-service commissions allow a return of 8 per cent on the total investment while the promoters pay the public an average of less than 6 per cent for the capital it supplies. The arithmetic is simple. Take the case of an electric generating system costing $100,000,000 and having the following typical capital structure:

5% bonds, held by public.....	$60,000,000
7% preferred stock, held by public.....	20,000,000
Common stock, held by promoters.....	20,000,000
Total investment .....	$100,000,000

The public-service commission allows a return of 8 per cent on the investment, or $8,000,000. This income is distributed as follows:

To bonds, held by public.....	$3,000,000
To preferred stock, held by public.....	1,400,000
To common stock, held by promoters.....	3,600,000
Total distribution .....	$8,000,000

Thus the promoters, with an investment of $20,000,000, receive an annual income of $3,600,000, or 18 per cent!

By forming a holding company, the promoters can greatly increase their dividend rate beyond this already substantial figure. Instead of keeping the $20,000,000 common stock of the generating system, they transfer it to a holding company which is capitalized at the same amount. The holding company thereupon distributes its own securities in the following way:

5% bonds of holding company, held by public.	$10,000,000
7% preferred stock of holding company, held by public .....	5,000,000
Common stock of holding company, held by promoters .....	5,000,000
Total capitalization of holding company..	$20,000,000

Through its ownership of the entire common stock of the generating system the treasury of the holding company receives the $3,600,000 earnings thereon. This income is then distributed as follows:

To bonds, held by public.....	$500,000
To preferred stock, held by public.....	350,000
To common stock, held by promoters.....	2,750,000
Total distribution .....	$3,600,000

In this way, the promoters, with an investment of $5,000,000, not only exercise complete control over property worth $100,000,000 but also receive annual returns of $2,750,000, or 55 per cent!

There is probably nothing illegal about this sort of pyramiding and it could be, and is, applied to other classes of business beside that of producing electric energy. In fact, its name conveys a wrong impression of its stability unless the pyramid be pictured as standing upon its apex. The inflated profits accruing to the small managing group are completely dependent upon the maintenance of the 8 per cent return. Let this fall off and the promoters' profits decline swiftly. This is the deterrent in pyramiding propositions in most lines of business. But the difference between the electric-power industry and the others is that it is a monopoly under State protection, and its earnings, though not guaranteed by the State, are assured by our present system of regulation. Assure the 8 per cent return on the operating companies' property and you render certain these handsome earnings of 16 to 55 per cent to the controlling financiers.

In view of this delightful situation is it surprising that the financiers are eager to increase the investment in the electric power industry? The bigger they can build the business, the bigger will be their own returns. Since the earnings are proportional to the value of the property, technically called the "rate base," there is a strong incentive for promoters to increase their profits by enlarging the rate base.

Now the rate base cannot legally be increased through indiscriminate additions to the property in the form of unnecessary electric-generating equipment or transmission lines. The law requires that all additions be approved by the public-service commission, and the commission is charged with the duty of disallowing any addition which it finds to be unnecessary. So the promoters' aim is to show cause for plant enlargement and thus obtain the public-service commissions' authorization. Obviously the simplest reason for plant enlargement is an increased demand for electricity.

For the purpose of establishing this increased demand the industrial power user is an ideal prospect. Manufacturing establishments consume large amounts of electric power which can be supplied either by the manufacturer's own plant or by the public utility company. To obtain this load for its own lines, the central station need only quote a price low enough to cause the manufacturer to give up his own power plant. Of course the more efficient the private plant is, the lower price will the central station have to quote in order to make its own proposition attractive.

In many cases where industrialists can generate their own power quite cheaply, the central station must quote an exceedingly low price, one that means little or no profit. Though in an ordinary business such a procedure would not be regularly practised, because it would not pay, there is no such deterrent in the case of the public utilities under the present form of regulation. On the contrary, there is every temptation for them to quote as low a price as is necessary to get the business, practically irrespective of cost, since they will be allowed an 8 per cent return on the enlarged rate base. The inadequate profit on the power load can easily be compensated for by charging sufficiently high prices to certain other classes of consumers, particularly lighting customers, who use but little current and must pay whatever rates are charged.

The records show that the electric companies have not resisted this temptation to favor the industrial power user as against the lighting customer. From 1922 to 1926 the amount of electric energy sold in the United States increased 20,308,000 kilowatt-hours, or 58 per cent. Of this increase 14,087,000 kilowatt-hours, or 69 per cent was the result of enlarging the power load, while only 5,264,000 kilowatt-hours, or 26 per cent, was due to increased residential usage. (The small remainder applies to electric railways.) Nevertheless, the lighting customers contributed $414,800,000, or 74 per cent, to the increase in gross revenue, while the power consumers, who were mainly responsible for the plant enlargement, paid only 25 per cent toward it. The accompanying changes in rates are interesting. The average lighting kilowatt-hour which sold for 7.07 cents in 1922 had advanced to 7.36 cents in 1926, while on the other hand the average kilowatt-hour for power use actually dropped from 1.50 cents to 1.29 cents in the same period. It was only through such rate reductions that the existing power business could be held and the enormous additional load obtained.

This discrimination is obviously against public policy. By means of excessively low rates charged to industrial users of power, the central stations have added an enormous amount of load to their lines. The public-service commissions have duly authorized the corresponding plant enlargements, with the accompanying increase in rate base. In 1926 no less than $900,000,000 was invested in such enlargements in the United States.

What is the result? The central stations are permitted to earn a fair return on this increment to the rate base. Roughly this amounts to 8 per cent annually on $900,000,000, or $72,000,000, which is what the public will pay every year thereafter as the return on the utility enlargements during 1926. No criticism could be made if a fair share of this huge sum were derived from earnings on the industrial power load that was responsible for the plant enlargement. But that is not the case; the industrial power load has been acquired at low rates, in many cases so low that there is no profit whatever in it. No, the increased earnings cannot be obtained from that source, but they are derived from the far more tractable class of residential consumers. They are the ones who, by paying excessive electric rates, produce the 8 per cent earnings on the additional plant investment, which in turn becomes a profit of 16 to 55 per cent on the money that the financiers themselves have put into the business.

The mere exposition of the facts exposes the faulty principle in our system of utility regulation and indicates the remedy. Regulation at present is ineffective because it is founded on the principle that the sale of electric current is altogether a monopolistic business, that all classes of customers need to be equally protected, and that this can be accomplished in a simple manner by limiting the total earnings. The fact is that only a small part of the electricity is sold monopolistically, while the majority of the current is disposed of under highly competitive conditions. Limiting the total return does not at all prevent one class being exploited in order that the total return may be made the full legal maximum on an economically unsound enlargement of the business.

We need legal cognizance of the fact that part of the consumers can produce their electric power requirements at a competitive price while others cannot. The central station's customers should be divided into classes, and the return on each class should be limited. Such a limitation of the return on the investment utilized in serving the residential consumers will at once stop the mulcting of that class. The companies will be ordered to reduce their rates to the home, and then something will take place that is common enough in other industries but which most central-station men have not visualized. When prices are reduced, the falling off of income will be but temporary, inasmuch as the lower prices will induce a larger usage. This has always happened with commodities of the convenience or luxury type, where the saturation point is practically non-existent, and indeed has actually occurred in the few cases where it has been tried in the sale of domestic electricity. Lower rates have not only induced the householders to use more current to obtain better lighting, but also to make greater use of such electrical conveniences as flat-irons, vacuum-cleaners, dish-washers, washing-machines, and mechanical refrigerators. Electric cooking, with its amazing ease of control and its freedom from waste heat, is an unsurpassed improvement in the kitchen, and if rates were lowered, the only fault of the electric stove—costly operation—would be eliminated.

Engineering studies have shown that if electric rate schedules were lowered sufficiently to induce such greater use of electric appliances in the home, the volume of business would be increased so greatly that the net profits to the central stations would far exceed those under the present restricted usage.

Thus the electric companies would not lose by an enforced reduction of rates to the home, and the community would greatly benefit by the full enjoyment of those unique services that only electricity can supply.

Bombing London

By LEE SIMONSON

Nayland, Suffolk, August 23

EVERYONE, as the evening express for Suffolk and points east pulled out of Liverpool Street station, leaned out to see a great V of airplanes overhead with others looping above and swooping below them. It was the second day of the raids realistically staged by the Air Ministry. "How we bombed London," read the headlines in the evening paper in my lap. After supper we watched the last defenders, a triangle of three pinpricks of light over our garden, returning to their base. "Pretty, isn't it?" said the cook. As she made the fire in the drawing room she recalled how her home town, Sudbury, nine miles west, had been hit by a passing Zeppelin in 1916, and the brains and livers of various farmers blown out of them as they slept. Sudbury is a market town. There hadn't been an encampment, a war factory, or a depot within miles. "Funny, wasn't it?" said our cook.

It is funny. But it is still funnier to speculate as to what has happened to the well-known sense of humor of the average taxpayer. The Observer admits that according to the official umpires "200 tons of bombs could have been dropped on London. Moreover, any hit within the target is a bull's eye. The target in this case is Greater London with its 10,000,000 inhabitants." The Student of War in the Times concedes even more: "No local defenses can possibly prevent an air raid over London, and the same is true of every large town in the country. The real defense against air raids is our power to do worse to the enemy's capital before he can do it to ours."

Thus, if the precise military objective isn't hit—an arsenal or an aerodrome—something will be in any case, mothers, children, curates, seamstresses, cooks, hairdressers, cabmen, green-grocers, and such. Of course, not all of them will be blown to bits in their beds or at their supper tables. The lingering fate of the rest was sketched by the whiff of phosgene gas that got loose in Hamburg recently and sent its fumes far enough to strangle a few suburban cows. But the survivors will, at any rate, have the immense satisfaction of reading the very next day how many more mères et enfants, abbés, midinettes, cuisinières, coiffeurs, and marchands des comestibles have been efficiently pulverized. Even if 10,000,000 gas masks aren't on tap when the next war is declared, the moral is obvious and the Times trumpets it: "Every man, woman, and child must exhibit the qualities of a disciplined soldier under fire."

This is, of course, a romantic prospect for non-combatant stay-at-homes who haven't read or who will have forgotten what the emotions of combatants in the last war were really like. But the emotions of civilians of former wars will be experienced by all the slackers at the front in tin helmets, snuggling in dugouts, gloating over their comparative safety, fortified by the occasional relaxation of aiming a gun or taking a bayonet jab at a visible opponent. The only strain will be the news of the home casualties as they reach the front each evening, and the anxiety as to whose family has been wiped out. A wife's earring forwarded; unfortunately nothing else could be recovered from the debris of Brompton Road. Ten-year-old Lilian's last words as she choked to death in the gas hospital: "Tell father I helped to defend London." Johnny, aged twelve, had said only the night before: "I'm helping fight this war. I don't care if I am only a target." Unfortunately, no souvenir of Johnny could be found.

The gold-star fathers! Poets in profusion will be needed to portray their emotions. How much more they will have to revenge! And how much better they will fight, urged never to forget by the bishops and editors who have not yet been air-raided.

There will at least be no question of the morale of the fighting troops under such circumstances. And thereby the high commands will be relieved of one great problem and the press spared for the more important work of sustaining the morale of the home army of women and children. For, as the Times points out also, raids will be undertaken for the purpose alone of shattering civilian morale regardless of factories and ammunition dumps, presumably to the farthest counties. Morale, so difficult to aim at in the trenches, is so easily hit from the air. The population must stand firm. With the pertinacity of the human animal they doubtless will, and mop up each other's viscera in the cause of civilization.

The next war will naturally be as brief as the last one was expected to be. The obvious tactics will, of course, be to raid the enemy's capital first and not be too messy about missing arsenals and army headquarters at the first blow. Under the circumstances it seems surprising that no Ministry of Defense has calculated just how much of the home town's population could be temporarily housed in the subways, a gas mask hung from every strap, if all the cars were stood end to end.

It's too bad we can't have a sample war just to be certain of what it would be like instead of having to rely on umpires as to how many tons of bombs were dropped and precisely what they hit. But we have had sample wars in Nicaragua and elsewhere, and taught women and children the penalty of having husbands and fathers who held the wrong opinions. That doesn't seem to help much. Reviving our imaginations is probably too vague a project after all. It is much more practical to wait for the next war and put the subways into a state of preparedness.

In the Driftway

AT a London exhibition of engineering models just opened the prize exhibit was Eric the Robot, the steel man with electric bulbs for eyes, which—who—stood up, bowed, delivered a speech in a dreadful, hollow voice, and sat down. This reminds the Drifter that as soon as he can take the time he means to make a list of things which may be profitably performed by the mechanical men now being constructed by the General Electric Company. At present these creatures are being used to shout a warning when the Washington water supply reaches a dangerous level. Probably they have other functions as uninteresting; they can turn electric current on and off, they can operate electrical machinery. But, in the Drifter's opinion, it would be far better to have tasks like these performed by men of flesh and blood, and train the mechanical man to do something really worth while.

* * * * *

TAKE, for example, the business of social functions. How simple it would be and how agreeable, when asked to a tea or reception, to send one's mechanical man instead. It—or he—could ring the door bell, give his hat to the butler, mount the stairs, shake hands with the hostess, and engage her daughter in conversation. A few well-chosen remarks might be talked into him, as in a phonograph, before the occasion; they would certainly suffice for tea conversation, provided there were as many as ten or a dozen of them. At a dinner party the mechanical man could eat the chicken without indigestion, at White House breakfasts he could safely stow away the sausages and griddle cakes. He could go to the movies without being bored, he could sit by the hour—or stand, for all the Drifter cares—and listen to the radio, turning it off when it tired even him. Each professional man could have his personal Mechano, which would stand at his elbow during most of the day. When a lady came up to him and said brightly: "Oh, Professor X., I am so delighted to meet you! I hear you are a philosopher, and I do so love to talk about philosophy ever since that course I took last winter," the professor could smile kindly—surely that takes no effort, but perhaps the mechanical man could even learn to smile—and urge forward his steel companion, who, in a voice full of all the proper respect, could satisfy the lady.

* * * * *

BUT, after all, this is mere child's play compared to what mechanical creatures could do if they tried. So far the Drifter has merely, in his imagination, saved himself from being bored. How much pleasanter it would be to save himself from being tired! It requires only another step to fancy Mechano taught to do work of any kind. Thus one could sit home of a morning and dawdle over breakfast, secure in the knowledge that one's occupation down town was being conducted with acumen and dispatch—or at least enough acumen and dispatch to meet all requirements. Thus the subways would be filled with creatures protected by armor plate from the crowds, thus business would boom without the necessity of considering the troublesome human equation. Even the Drifter, who has been accused of never doing anything useful, could let the Robot perform his drifting for him. Which is probably the only thing that would stop him from being

Houston's Shame

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Did you note this dispatch?

Houston, Texas, Sept. 13. (A.P.)—Finis was officially written here today in the murder case against Robert Powell, Negro, who was lynched on the morning of June 20. Powell was in a hospital with a bullet wound in his stomach and charged with the slaying of City Detective A. W. Davis when a group of men entered the hospital, took the Negro from his bed, and lynched him from a bridge over a shallow ditch (just before the Houston Democratic convention opened).

The grand jury today wrote on the docket against Powell's name: "Defendant dead—no action taken."

It looks as though the prosecution were a mere sop thrown to the Northern people visiting the Convention.

Tight Walkers?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Shakespeare says that consistency is a jewel, but this evidently does not apply to the domain of politics. The millions of Dry Democrats who are going to vote for Smith and the like number of Wet Republicans who will cast their ballot for Hoover are agilely carrying a pail of water on one shoulder and a keg of beer on the other.

Do It Now!

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I have read Professor Earle's letter in The Nation of September 26. When will the liberals and progressives stop saying, "just this time" or "on this occasion"? Every year when a "red herring" is thrown across the path of progress as bait for the Liberal and Progressive votes a large number of liberal and progressive voters are so glued down by their old traditions that rather than really break away from the two old parties they try to look up excuses why they should support one or the other of the old party candidates. They admit that the two old parties are rotten, yet they choose between the lesser of the two evils.

Governor Smith has not Tammanyfied the State government, not because he did not want to do so but because he could not do so. The Republicans are all-powerful up-State and Governor Smith was being reelected because of the sufferance of many Republicans up-State. But does the professor not forget the connection of Governor Smith with the Sulzer case? As the Speaker of the Assembly, he was Boss Murphy's main mover in impeaching a man for alleged crimes committed before he became Governor. This was done presumably because Boss Murphy could not dictate the actions of a governor who wanted to go straight and become independent after receiving the suffrage of the people.

Governor Smith has no more chance of being elected than Norman Thomas. Hoover will win. If a vote is to be "thrown away," a progressive and a liberal should throw it away for a party and candidate that is working for the common good. Both Mr. Earle and The Nation express a hope for a third party in the future. Why keep on putting it off? Why not have all the forces of progress unite this year as never before and roll up a tremendous vote for Norman Thomas and James H. Maurer, the Socialist candidates, thereby giving hope and courage to the forces of enlightenment that have kept the flag of "peace, freedom, and plenty" flying for these many years? Do it now!

The One Issue

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In this campaign, the Catholic focuses the fight for religious liberty and all those who abhor bigotry, in any of its forms or manifestations, should rally round Al Smith.

Through bitter experience, we Jews know only too well the negative value of religious discrimination. We paid the bloody price of it in the dark Russia of yesterday, and are still paying it now in some so-called civilized countries of Europe. And so we are going to fight, to the last ditch, any attempt of that devastating monster permanently to intrench himself in our new home. That, I maintain, is the all-important issue of the day. All the rest is bunk. Prohibition, farm relief, foreign relations—all great problems, I agree. But neither of the candidates of the two major parties has, so far, offered a definite solution, probably for fear of incurring the ire of the powers-that-be.

All that is rotten in America today—that despicable bunch of cheap notoriety seekers, demagogues, and religious fanatics—are all aligned against Smith. This in the year 1928. Are we reverting to the dark ages? Let the true lovers of America, of which the Jew has always been one, storm that Chinese wall of intolerance and bigotry!

Anonymous, of Course

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I once thought you were getting your eyes open to Truth, but alas, you snore now in your sleep. The greatest fakir of all generations has you in his coils. Holy Writ says: "Who can bring a clean thing out of an unclean?" Why always "Governor" Smith and "Mr." Hoover? Who hobnobs with the kings of earth more than Rome? Your days of usefulness are numbered. Already Rome has vomited enough stuff to nauseate any decent man. You have the "dizzyotis."

EX-JOURNALIST

Religion and Liquor

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Won't you please tell us why a man cannot object to a candidate for public office on the ground of his church affiliation, and still not be a "bigot"? Do you think that any man in the Presidency who is under the influence of any strong church or other organization can fill the job as fairly as a man without such connections? Without whispering or apologizing I maintain that Governor Smith can legitimately be opposed because he is a Catholic. I would not want a Catholic's tutored views on divorce, birth control, the rights of women, public education, etc., to be overshadowing the administration of our national government. I cannot see why The Nation would want it. No more would I like to see militant Methodist supervision of morals, which, however, does not bother me much, since I consume only about a quart of good wine a year and have no trouble finding where to get it.

Non-Catholic Smith supporters think that he would not be swayed by his church and they point to his governorship as an example. What question important enough to gain public notice in which the Catholic church was interested ever came up before Smith as Governor? Also, hasn't it been a tradition in New York that if a man could get to be Governor of this State he could follow in the shoes of Cleveland or Roosevelt, providing he were on his good behavior? I do not doubt that Tammany realized this as well as the young Theodore Roosevelt.

I was in the Middle West this summer and spent a month in Methodist localities which were dripping wet. We must not consider the Prohibition issue a whisper—it is a smoke screen. Almost everyone in the Middle West seems to be making his own wine and home brew, and after seven or eight years of practice he has it down pat. They are all proud of their accomplishments, too, and ask you if you ever bought anything as good as that in the old saloon days. And they are all for Prohibition. It has done away with the saloon and keeps the city feller on the job.

The Frontier of Decency

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Mr. Heywood Broun affirms in The Nation for September 19 that "it is silly to bring any sort of criminal indictment against vowels and consonants"; therefore indecency is all right. Admirable. But why pause? Why not overturn two or three other superstitions with this nimble magic? The name a man forges on a check is made up of vowels and consonants. Vowels and consonants make up the words by which a man lyingly swears away his neighbor's life in the courtroom. It is silly to indict vowels and consonants. Therefore forgery, perjury, and legal murder are right. Mr. Broun cannot be the dupe of the fallacy that the innocence of the tool vindicates the purposes of the user.

"There is no such thing as a bad word," says Mr. Broun. "Language was created by man and in (is?) his own language." Language reflects man. If, then, weak men utter weak words, silly men silly words, proud men proud words, and great men great words, why not bad men bad words? Mr. Broun probably values the difference between his mother's English and that of a barmaid. Society also values that difference, and, to insure its maintenance, sets up, wisely or unwisely, a usage called decency. Why does Mr. Broun quarrel with society for agreeing with him?

Our critic would approve a world in which everybody would say everything; that is "Utopia." But why does he enjoy "The Front Page"? Plainly, because somebody in "The Front Page" says something that somebody else doesn't. His everybody in abolishing his somebody else would abolish his somebody. Mr. Broun owes to decency his chuckle at indecency; it is a pity that he does not thank his benefactor.

Man rejoices in sex and is worried by it; his manners and his speech will reflect both those feelings. That is why the line of decency, where these two feelings meet, though shifting, is ineffaceable.

Justice to Judge Murray

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I think your article Blasphemy a la Mode, with which in the main I heartily agree, is unfair to my friend Judge M. J. Murray of Boston, who dismissed the charge against Dr. Kallen. I have known Judge Murray for more than thirty years and in my judgment no fairer or more sympathetic judge toward all mankind is on the bench anywhere. It does not seem to me that your interpretation of his words is necessarily the only one and, in any case, I know that the article misrepresents the man.

Two Poems

By S. BERT COOKSLEY

Late Reaping

Always the fear was there, always there walked Into the day a shadow of the night.
And my lips cooled, my lips would be lines chalked
Thickly on a mask of fright.

I thought: One day I shall be running where
The thin road ends, running there and holding
My heart against the green sky—standing there
Watching the moon unfolding

Along the field and the stars clinging fast.
Running there quickly, needing love at last!

Beggar's Sonnet

Better be blind than see what beggars see
In their brown sacks when the day is over,
And the wind in his rags walks down the lea
And the spent lark pushes into clover.

Better be mute than speak what beggars speak
Round their green fires when the moon is coming,
And the gaunt lizard paddles to the creek
And the brittle locust begins drumming.

Better be deaf than hear what beggars hear
In the pitch night when they draw their covers,
And the star-crazy wood rats blunder near
And the blank owls become noisy lovers.

Rather than dream their dreams till day returns,
Better stretch dead across the loco ferns.

Jesus for the Rationalist

The Son of Man: The Story of Jesus. By Emil Ludwig. Translated from the German by Eden and Cedar Paul. Boni and Liveright. $3.

THE many lives of Jesus fall in the main into one of two categories depending on whether the founder of Christianity is regarded as a natural or a supernatural character. While each type of life has its own problems, both have been affected by the progress of rationalism. Indeed, one of the chief extrinsic interests of every biography of Christ is its character either as a positive or as a negative reflex of the rationalist spirit. From the time when the very notion of a life of Jesus was blasphemy, rationalism has made the conception of Jesus as the Son of Man less and less revolutionary. The great problem of the first studies was to explain away the miracles. Then came a more skeptical period which subjected the gospel narratives to a more fundamental and searching historical criticism to establish their relative value as documents. Upon this followed attempts to reconstruct the life of Jesus psychologically in accordance with human probability. Indeed, most "lives" of Jesus have been less lives than studies of the sources for a life of Jesus, in other words, biblical criticism.

The very title of the present work shows that it is intended for the rationalistically minded modern who experiences religious emotion vaguely but is nevertheless interested in the character of Jesus. In the preface Herr Ludwig makes much of the originality of his conception of Jesus as the son of man, but it will hardly come as a revelation at this date to educated men. The life now offered to us is rather labored than inspired. While Ludwig has perhaps realized its problems critically he has been unable to solve them creatively. To write a life of Jesus the prime requirement is a bold imagination, and he has been too timid to do more than build very tenuous bridges across various episodes of the gospels. It is true that he has motivated various individual incidents with a great deal of plausibility, not to say ingenuity, but he has failed to connect the great gaps in our knowledge of the life of Jesus. The motivation of his personality as a whole remains unaccomplished. Ludwig is primarily the documentary historian who is quite helpless without a profusion of documents, but in the life of Jesus the authentic documents are so few that his very historicity has been doubted. Indeed, Ludwig naively apologizes that his book is so short! The caution he exhibits moreover is so great that many whole chapters are little more than summaries of the gospel teachings. Besides, although advanced theologians have long ceased to place much importance upon the naturalistic explanation of the miracles, Ludwig is still greatly preoccupied with this trifling. This is a fault to which German theologians have always been especially prone since the days of Paulus and Schleiermacher, and so it is less strange that Ludwig has gone astray.

His life of Jesus belongs rather to the increasing biographical studies of these days than to devotional literature. One imagines him resolving to "do" a life of Jesus, who with Napoleon and Bismarck has been one of the great men of the earth. As it appears consciously to have been written to be "popular" among a growing class of at least superficially educated readers, it is particularly interesting as a rationalistic reflex. Essentially Ludwig has undertaken to rewrite Renan, who appealed to much the same class of readers without, however, much concern for anything but his own tastes, and Ludwig frequently betrays his indebtedness to his model. Although Renan's purpose was as much aesthetic as religious, he was too much of a scholar to do away entirely with the controversial footnotes on the sources; but the conventions of the new biography are evident in the bold omission of all such concessions. The weakening of the religious spirit since 1865 is manifest in the considerable toning down of the excessive religious emotionalism which at that time made for the success of Renan's work. The diffusion of the rationalist spirit also has worked to make Ludwig take a more charitable view than Renan of the part played by the Jews in the life of Jesus. He has adhered so strictly to the dictates of reason that he failed to capture the fire of religious poetry and truth which is in the gospels and, in lesser measure, in Renan.

Ludwig has apparently attempted to write a shrewd life of Jesus. The insincerity of such an object is less flattering to the author than he has aimed to be toward his public. Even an honest rationalist must regard a life of Jesus so conceived as "blasphemy." It has been said that the first and only Christian died upon the cross. It is perhaps no less true that the first and only life of Jesus is in the gospels. The life of Jesus, the Son of God, will never be better written than in them. A life of Jesus, the Son of Man, must sacrifice too much of their essential truth and beauty. Biblical criticism, of course, is another matter. Thus rationalism, which first made any other versions of the life of Jesus possible, has put almost insuperable obstacles in its way.

England's Holy War

England's Holy War. By Irene Cooper Willis. Alfred A. Knopf. $4.

IN the years before 1914 the Liberal Party in England, apart from one or two Cabinet Ministers consciously or unconsciously working for war, was so pacifically inclined that it could not believe danger of war existed. Most of its members were absorbed in domestic problems and had little understanding of the ominous way international events were shaping. Even when the crisis broke in the closing days of July they failed to realize what was happening. The Liberal press, taking Asquith's and Grey's pledges at their face value, protested that Britain was not bound to France and should remain neutral.

Nevertheless on August 4 Britain took the plunge: the diplomatists and soldiers had made sure of that. The Tory press, firmly convinced that the war was one of vital national interest, continued happily to beat the Jingo drums. But the Liberal press was acutely unhappy. It had been pacifist; now it felt a conflict between its patriotism and its principles. The quandary gave it a violent attack of brain fever. At its bedside Miss Willis sat through four long years, feeling its pulse and noting its ravings. Her diagnosis of the painful case and her report on its strange symptoms are to be found in "England's Holy War," which originally appeared in London in three small volumes, "How We Went into the War," "How We Got on with the War," and "How We Came Out of the War."

The Daily News, the chief London Liberal organ, declared on August 5 "that it would have been just and prudent and statesmanlike for England to have remained neutral," but, it concluded, "being in we must win." The Liberal editors were rational and idealistic men and a position as negative as this was impossible for them. Rapidly they began to idealize the conflict, to see it as a struggle between the powers of light and the powers of darkness. They took it upon themselves to supply, not only for Britain but for the Allies at large, war aims of a highly moral nature. They invented the slogan "The War to End War." They worked strenuously to square their consciences with eloquent rationalizations. It was a pitiful effort, "the offspring of an enforced union between abhorrence of, and submission to, the war."

As, with Miss Willis's aid, we follow the course of the Liberal press from day to day during the early months of the war, we feel sick and sorrowful. The men who sought in its columns to whiten the face of Mars with an emotional lather were those whom we have many reasons to respect: Gardiner of the Daily News; Massingham of the Nation; H. G. Wells; and, alas, even the editors of the Manchester Guardian.

At first they maintained a fairly high level of argument. Kaiserism, not the German people, was denounced as the offender. The Allies, determined to overthrow the former, were, it was argued, plainly furthering the interests of the latter. But, after all, Kaiserism was a charge equally applicable to Britain's noble ally, the Czar of all the Russias, who, not so long before, had been anathema to every good Liberal. The atrocity stories, which soon put in an appearance, were useful in settling this difficulty. Miss Willis writes:

The Daily News searched even more assiduously than the Daily Mail for traces of German moral defects because these discoveries helped it to overcome its twinges of conscience about fighting as the ally of Czardom. It struggled throughout August and September, 1914, with that twinge, but, by the end of September, what with Louvain, Malines, Rheims, and the atrocity reports it was almost quite happy about the Russian alliance. It wallowed in German's immorality.

Liberal belief in the holy war continued almost unabated for more than four years. It was shaken somewhat by the publication of the Secret Treaties, but President Wilson and the Russian Revolution helped to restore the faith. Only when the peace treaty and its aftermath blew up the whole Utopia which had been so elaborately and painfully concocted did the Liberal idealists perceive that the powers of darkness had been hovering impartially over both camps.

Miss Willis has told the story of this unparalleled campaign of self-deception mainly by quotations from the daily press during those years, linked by a running commentary. The coolness of her own thinking and the acid quality of her style can be indicated by brief quotations from her conclusions:

The war, from the intellectual point of view, was a flow of unbridled impulse; the thought that ran alongside the engines of destruction was of a rotten quality. The world's moral currency has been debased by the extraordinary issues of beliefs, with less and less substantial backing in fact.

What is wanted to avoid such catastrophes as this which has almost ruined us is not so much a creed as a skepticism.

It is not for nothing that Miss Willis has been a distinguished student of Montaigne.

Journalism from Russia

The New Russia. By Dorothy Thompson. Henry Holt and Company. $3.

TO call this book excellent journalism is to challenge two possible opposed conceptions of the term. Miss Thompson is no provider of hot copy for a hectic press, and neither is she a George Bernard Shaw. But when Shaw claims the title of journalist on the ground that "what the journalist writes about is what everyone is thinking about (or ought to be thinking about)," he admits Miss Thompson to his company, if not his class. To her Russia is hot copy, because its rulers are attempting to overthrow the accepted economic order and ideology, a far more stupendous revolution than either physically effected in the spring and fall of 1917. Miss Thompson's sense of human news values is, then, unassailable. Her failure adequately to cover her assignment, noticeable only in two main instances, is due to no deficiency of judgment. In one case it may be attributed to lack of self-confidence. In the other she has bitten off not more than she can chew but certainly more than she had completely digested before she sat down to assemble the material for her book.

Miss Thompson is revolted, and, in a way rightly, by the

If the world's greatest thinkers are too "deep" for you, would you pay fifty cents for a clear understanding of their ideas?

EVERYWHERE you go these days, you hear people talking about the Darwinian theory. You know that the revolutionary, breath-taking ideas with which Charles Darwin startled the world are contained in his book, THE DESCENT OF MAN. Sometimes you have thought it would be a fine thing to read that book, and get Darwin's ideas direct. But it was a big book, filled with obscure language, and you gave it up. Here, then, is a godsend for you. NEWELL R. TRIPP has gone through THE DESCENT OF MAN and has summarized it for you. In simple, plain language he repeats all of Darwin's ideas, just as Darwin wrote them; but in a way which makes you understand them. And you can buy this book now for fifty cents!

Ever since ERNST HAECKEL issued his THE RIDDLE OF THE UNIVERSE, his name and his book have been a subject of conversation wherever educated and intelligent people get together. But what a big book is THE RIDDLE OF THE UNIVERSE! How hard to read, how difficult and scientific its language! Now VANCE RANDOLPH writes a complete summary. Just as they were written, he presents all of HAECKEL's ideas; but he gives them to you plainly, simply, clearly, so that you can understand them quickly. And now you can buy this book for fifty cents!

In this series of GREAT BOOKS MADE EASY there are others equally important for your self-education. THE HISTORY OF THE CONFLICT BETWEEN RELIGION AND SCIENCE, that great provocative book by JOHN WILLIAM DRAPER, which no intelligent man can afford to ignore, is summarized in clear and simple language by CHARLES T. SPRADING. That enormously important book, A HISTORY OF CIVILIZATION IN ENGLAND, which HENRY THOMAS BUCKLE wrote, is made easy for you by CLEMENT WOOD. And MR. WOOD also offers you a clear and comprehensive summary of one of the finest "deep" books ever put in print, LECKY'S HISTORY OF EUROPEAN MORALS.

EACH of these books costs only fifty cents! They are printed from new type, on good paper and bound in a fine quality cloth! More titles are coming. But you can get each one for only fifty cents, or all five for only $2.50! Send in your order now!

And, at the same time, ask yourself this question: How much do you know about Art, about Astronomy, about Biology, and Psychology, and History, and Physics? Will you pay fifty cents for a fine book which tells you, simply and clearly and comprehensively, all that you need to know about each of these subjects? Here is a series of outlines, written by experts, giving you a grasp upon each. Check over the list. Order the ones you are interested in now!

discrepancy between the everyday life of Russians and the dreams of Russia's self-assigned rulers. But when it comes to depicting this life for the information of American readers, she shirks her job and substitutes for her own perception that of one Michael Sostchenko who describes his work as "a carnival of grotesque masks, written by one who sees life as a stupid joke." Sostchenko's vignettes may be true to life, but they are drawn to a different scale from the rest of Miss Thompson's narrative, and by their very intensity are, therefore, untrue.

Misleading for a different reason is her italicized statement that the "peasants . . . are brutally discriminated against in the composition of Soviet congresses." Their representation is, as she says, roughly one-fifth that of the town population, but they are 83 per cent of the total population. If they lack organized influence, it is because they lack organized interest in the life of the country. Their organization is effective enough when it comes to guarding their individual interests, as the government has cause to know. Again to say that the "peasant is materially worse off now than before" is not true. Any man sure of his roof, his job, and his food is not badly off in Russia today—or yesterday. Not only has the peasant got his land, as Miss Thompson admits, but he cannot lose it. He is, again according to her admission, eating more and better food. It is true he suffers temporarily under a system that refuses him an adequate return in manufactured goods for his agricultural products. But an explanation of the Gosplan, which Miss Thompson mentions only once in parenthesis, would have shown the reason for this. It is not due to any deliberate discrimination against the peasant. Miss Thompson should remember that before the war, according to a rough estimate, the amount of cotton available in Russia was not sufficient to give each peasant one handkerchief. The peasant, however, did not need a handkerchief until the Soviet began to educate him—much less a cream separator, which would have struck him as magic in the "good old days."

Where Miss Thompson makes her special contribution to the discussion of the Russian situation is in her analysis of Communist doctrine and its application to the everyday life not only of its devotees but of all Russians. Russian communism, as she sees it, is a new religion unapplied and even opposed to a knowledge of any god—unless, indeed, that god is Lenin.

"All," she declares, "which in communist Russia is vital and realistic, as opposed to what is arid and intellectual, arises from the Lenin faith."

In deifying Lenin, his followers have ascribed to him precisely those virtues which Christians consider the peculiar attributes of Christ, the man. A vow of poverty, obedience, self-sacrifice, and humility is exacted from those admitted to the Communist Party. Miss Thompson draws an analogy between its composition and that of a Catholic religious order. Miss Thompson is the daughter of an American Methodist minister, and I was educated by Catholic Irish nuns. Yet, on my return from Russia, I wrote in 1924 in the Irish Statesman that I believed there were more practical Communists in proportion to the population in Ireland than in Russia, because proportionately I think there are more men and women in monasteries and convents. Miss Thompson, while paying high tribute to the incorruptibility and devotion of Communist Party members, complains that they are the slaves of a "collective ubiquitous, inhuman system." The weakness of the new religion lies, indeed, in its lack of spiritual comfort for those with a special "vocation" and its lack of emotional appeal for those unaffected by the present revolutionary passion in Russia. Man does not live by intellectual bread alone, however excellent the bread may be, for he is an emotional before he is a rational being. To supply the lacking spiritual content of their doctrine for the masses, the Communists have resorted to a sort of apotheosis of Lenin. His picture supplants the icon in the honored corner of Communist household and meeting-hall. He will be ousted from his implied godship, his disciples declare, when his doctrine has been accepted on the earth. A strange reason for reduction to the ranks! Why he should be chosen for deification instead of Karl Marx Miss Thompson explains as follows: "Marxism is the conclusion of a brilliant, synthetic mind, drawing its knowledge of life and sweaty workmen from the British Museum. Leninism is the working faith of a primitive people."

And the founder of this faith, the new defender of the poor, is usually presented to his people as a workman, dressed in "baggy trousers and a cap, a quizzical expression in his eyes, an attitude keen and yet casual—hands carelessly thrust into pockets, but eyes concentrated, body at attention." This is the new "little father" of the Russian people, and under his aegis they are moving forward.

Books in Brief

The Peacemakers of 1864. By Edward C. Kirkland. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

This book is a study of the attempts that were made in 1864, chiefly on the Union side, to arrange a peace between the North and the South. The Presidential campaign of that year was a good deal influenced, especially in the nomination of candidates, by the existence of a strong peace sentiment among the Democrats, but actual negotiation was mainly the work of Republicans. Horace Greeley and John Hay appear as accredited representatives of Lincoln in abortive interviews with some bogus Confederate spokesmen in Canada, and two other Northern emissaries sought out Jefferson Davis. What was left of this midsummer dream was apparently dissipated by the November election, but the Blair family, past masters of the politician's art, lent their weight to a revival of the peace project until the Hampton Roads conference wrote failure across the final chapter. There was never any sound reason for hoping that the peace efforts might succeed, but there was undoubtedly an increased desire for peace on both sides as the war went on, the difficulties of reconstruction and Negro status were beginning to be perceived, and political turmoil gave the politicians their opportunity. Mr. Kirkland brings a wealth of research to the unraveling of this interesting story of mystery and intrigue, and has made a book which is a real contribution to the history of the Civil War.

Travels in Tartary, Thibet, and China, 1844-1846. By Régis-Evariste Huc and Joseph Gabet. Translated by William Hezlett. With an Introduction by Paul Pelliot. Harper and Brothers. Two volumes. $5.

Here at last is the full text of the Abbé Huc's story of his two-year journey across Mongolia to the Forbidden City of Shessa and back to Canton. The old woodcuts which brightened the edition published by Alfred Knopf last year are missing, but both volumes are here and there are no omissions, and Pelliot's introduction gives hints as to when to believe the Abbé and when not. His would be a remarkable journey today; it was still more remarkable eighty years ago, and the Abbé had eyes to see and a pen to picture what he saw. It is one of the great adventure-stories of Oriental travel.

The Paradoxes of Legal Science. By Benjamin N. Cardozo. Columbia University Press. $2.50.

Judge Cardozo sighs for logarithms which would give his juristic reasoning the certainty which the applied sciences claim with such iterated emphasis. He is too humble by half. Bridges and aqueducts built with five place logarithms have crumbled upon the heads of their builders and perfect equations on white paper or blue have not always meant complete certainty in concrete applications. But the most striking paradox of legal science is if the certainty he desires were attainable law would probably cease to exist. Law is a prediction of the result of specific processes. If the prediction could not be falsified by the event, there would be no need of making it. We should be living under the detestable sovereignty of Tropisms. Judge Cardozo views the One and the Many, Rest and Motion, Liberty and Rule, with a certain melancholy doubt whether these ancient antinomies can really be reconciled by the judicial processes he administers with such eminent distinction and ability, but he leaves us in no doubt that in his mind legal science is primarily concerned with this reconciliation. And he makes it further clear that as between the opposing claims of ensconced power and crying need the reconciliation is to be sought, not in a mathematical mean between two extremes but in a path deflected, however unscientifically, by the force of non-calculable human interests.

Hanging Johnny. By Myrtle Johnson. D. Appleton and Company. $2.

A naive and wise girl has written a tale of a whimsical, superstitious, and charming character whose occupation is that of hangman in Dublin. This is indeed a charming novel of Irish life with the lilt of Irish humor and laughter, mingled with the dour superstition and despair of poverty. Hanging Johnny hanged his best friend and was plagued by remorse and conscience into marriage with a stalwart lass of practical nature who could not understand his poetry of soul nor his remorse.

The Wars of the Godly. By Reuben Maury. Robert M. McBride and Company. $3.50.

In this book, which is another one of those obviously inspired by the politics of this Presidential year of grace, is related part of the story of religious intolerance in America from Colonial times to the rise of the Klan. The myth of complete American religious liberty since the patristic period is one which is widely believed. The present work will illumine somewhat the prevailing ignorance, but as the first general work upon the subject it leaves a very great deal to be desired. It is confessedly partial in its scope, and anecdotal in its method, and confined practically to attacks upon Irish Catholics. The other Christian sects and the Jews particularly are hardly mentioned, although anti-Semitism has existed in this country in the past. A few Catholic church histories have been the author's main sources. A book such as this would have profited greatly by a more systematic exposition especially of the constitutional theory of religious freedom. The apparent haste in which the book has been compiled, however, prevented this. In other words, its faults are typical of the occasional volume. Its worst one, however, is peculiarly this author's own. He has seen fit to write this history of religious intolerance in a breezy and snickering manner which is all but intolerable. He reveals his mental immaturity by mistaking boorishness and vulgarity for wit and humor. He confesses in the introduction that he was at one time a member of the Klan.

How We Got Our Liberties. By Lucius B. Swift. Bobbs-Merrill and Company. $2.50.

The author of this book, an Indianapolis lawyer, has set out to relate those events in Anglo-American history which are supposed to have given us our present political and religious liberty. We hear again the stirring stories of Magna Charta, the Petition of Right, the Declaration of Independence, in a manner which is refreshing. The author has no skepticism and takes superficial political events at their full value, eschewing entirely the heresies of economic and social determinism. His account of the American constitutional convention is motivated entirely by a lofty altruism, and he quotes several times Gladstone's dictum to the effect that the American Constitution is the greatest instrument ever struck off by the brain and purpose of man. Here, in short, is one of those naive and almost mythological Americans who still believe that the Bill of Rights and the Constitution are respected. He deserves to be encouraged, and his book, which is apparently one of the "story" books intended for the general public, may

Saint Louis. Par Georges Goyau, de l'Académie Française. Paris: Librairie Plon.

There have been many lives of Louis IX, but this is one of the best. Readable, judicious, authoritative, the only serious criticism which could be brought against it might emanate from the liberal who objected to its extreme orthodox, ultra-montane animus. Georges Goyau sees clearly, and he makes his readers see clearly, that Louis was not only a good man but a great one, with certain definite contributions to civilization to his credit, namely, a keen consciousness of the rights of the lower orders, the discovery that peaceful persuasion may accomplish something with non-Christian nations (here was the beginning of modern Christian missions), and the conviction that nations cannot get on except by mutual concessions, from the strong to the weak as well as conversely.

Contemporary Economic Thought. By Paul T. Homan. Harper and Brothers. $2.50.

This is an informing and illuminating book which endeavors to present contemporary economic theory by means of a detailed analysis of the doctrines of certain representative writers instead of through an encyclopedic bibliographical summary of all leading present-day contributors to the field. Professor Homan selects for his purpose John Bates Clark, Thorstein Veblen, Alfred Marshall, John Atkinson Hobson, and Wesley Clair Mitchell. John Bates Clark is presented as the foremost American exponent of the view of economics as an exercise in precise dialectic. Alfred Marshall is expounded as the greatest of the Neo-classicists, attempting to adapt the older Ricardian analysis to the changing facts of the economic environment and the chastening influence of the quantitative method. Veblen is set out as the great critic of economics as pecuniary logic, and as the founder in America of institutional economics, based upon evolutionary and pragmatic philosophy. Hobson is the great English critic of respectable classicism and Neo-classicism, and the leader of what may be called “welfare economics.” Mitchell is held to be representative of the contemporary trend in America toward institutionalism, synthesis, and the ever greater use of the quantitative method. The chief impression gained from a perusal of the book is that of the triumph of institutionalism and the quantitative method over arid and unreal dialectic, and the substitution of a realistic psychology for the hedonistic metaphysics of Jeremy Bentham's felicific calculus. The book is clearly and interestingly written and is free from dogmatism and partisanship. It is not only a valuable contribution to economic theory in particular, but is equally significant as an addition to the current discussion of the social sciences and their interrelation in general. As a contribution to the history of economic theory it is as novel and commendable as the writings of Veblen and Hobson in the field of economic theory.

Art and Germany. North German Lloyd Steamship Company.

A collection of brief essays by various authors intended as a guide to travelers in their adventures among the art treasures of Germany. Though it is in no sense a Baedeker with exact address and hours of admission, the book is full of useful and suggestive information authoritatively presented. The essays treat of art in its widest ramifications: primitive, peasant, and academic art, interior decoration, architecture, and city planning—in brief, every phase of art old and new, pure and applied, comprising even art education and a cinema experiment on the manual workmanship among artists. Making due allowance for a certain excess of superlatives and a metaphysical generalization on the special nature of the German spirit, the book may be recommended as answering fully the purpose intended.

The Mexican Side of the Texan Revolution. By the Chief Mexican Participants (General Antonio Lopez de Santa Anna, D. Ramon Martinez Caro, General Vincente Filisola, General Jose Urrea, General Jose Maria Tornel). Translated with Notes by Carlos E. Castaneda. P. L. Turner Company. $5.

A book of general interest chiefly because of the light its documents throw on our whole past and present relations with Mexico. It contains not only Santa Anna's defense of his ill-fated Texas campaign, together with counter-charges by his secretary and leading generals and an endless attempt to shift the responsibility for the massacre of Fannin and his men at Goliad; it offers also a vigorous and rather prophetic analysis of the part which the United States Government played in the Texan Revolution. This is the work of General Tornel, written at the time he was Secretary of War, and showing with unmistakable clearness the feeling which the patriots of Mexico and Latin America had toward our policy of expansion as early as 1830. It suffices that the general's prophecies turned out to a letter. The book should make a nice text for schools and colleges in the Lone Star State and a splendid antidote for George Creel's biography of Sam Houston. It is well supplied with index and maps.

The Constitutional Jurisprudence of the German Republic. By Johannes Mattern. Johns Hopkins Press. $5.

An explanation of a system based upon the juristic conception of the state, likely to become standard in its field. It deals with general principles rather than with fundamentals, and is supplemented by an impressive bibliography.

Drama Murder With Music

PHILLIP DUNNING'S "Night Hostess" (Martin Beck Theater) follows the formula of the same author's "Broadway" as closely as decency permits and seems to have been written on the doubtless quite justified assumption that what "knocked 'em cold" the first time is pretty sure to awaken a profitable (even if less tumultuous) enthusiasm the second. On this occasion the author has moved his scene from the back room of a night club to the reception hall of a similar institution, but the ingenuity required to conceive that variation seems to have pretty well exhausted his imagination and the rest of his play is made up of the same melodramatic incidents recounted in the same jazz rhythm which in the former piece, delighted all the childish hearts of two continents and helped convince the European producers that though we may be a little silly on the subject of Eugene O'Neill America is, nevertheless, the real hope of the modern drama.

The new comedy has no bit of bravura quite equal to those recurrent scenes in "Broadway" where members of the chorus, mechanically detaching themselves from the excited group in the green room, danced out the door to the waiting audience, but every effort is made to obtain the same effect. While the stage is given over to various sinister intrigues, the doors leading into the bar and the gambling room are thrown open at appropriate moments so that the raucous gaiety of the customers may throw the desperate deeds of the chief characters into violent relief and the main requirements of Mr. Dunning's formula—murder with music—may be fulfilled. In "Broadway" the not-too-good girl shot the villain while the last strains of the jazz were still echoing in the ears of the audience; in "Night Hostess" the villain dispatches the not-too-good girl with a napkin on the very spot which the revellers have recently quitted, and you may make your Hobson's choice between the two with full con-

PHILOSOPHY FOR THE LAYMAN Series

An Important Book for Everybody

The NEW MORALITY

By Durant Drake

THE old morality, founded on tradition and respect for authority, is being reformed in the social crucible by a scientific, experimental attitude toward morals. Where is the jazz age going? How may those entrusted with the guidance of youth help to contrive a new morality, new codes of conduct which are consonant with the spirit of a world moving rapidly from old standards? Durant Drake discusses, in a detached and enlightened manner, the many problems of personal and group conduct that are now perplexing thoughtful men and women. This first volume in the new Philosophy for the Layman Series is a very human and readable survey for all those who are working toward a new moral thoughtfulness and a better technique for securing the common good.

fidence that you will get your money's worth in either. The inexhaustible fascination of Sin in Evening Dress was first thoroughly exploited by the movies, but the stage still knows how to turn a trick now and then and no one before Mr. Dunning ever succeeded so completely in showing how the background afforded by a Gilded Palace of Sin could be combined with the ageless thrills of the ten-twenty-thirty to form what innocent Broadwayites call a real novelty.

The villain and the not-too-good girl (sound at heart though unfortunately strayed) are permitted by the defects of their character a sufficient latitude of conduct to furnish the thrills, but there must also be an ingenue to introduce the note of simple sentiment and in this play the author allows her to be loved by a nice boy who happens to be a vaudeville pianist instead, as in the former one, an ambitious "hoofer." Now these sweet heroines are, it seems, the real chef d'oeuvres of this kind of drama, and they most certainly bear witness to the fact that the populace has not lost faith in human nature, for they are characterized not only by a virginal purity but by an innocence of the world which would be remarkable in anybody, let alone in one following the profession of what is euphemistically called a "hostess" in a night club.

In the older literature, disillusioned men used to go to the country in search of uncorrupted girls; a character in Wycherly's "Country Wife" betook himself to Wales and was disastrously unsuccessful even there; but one would judge from the present and similar plays that the New Yorker need go no further than the nearest speakeasy on any evening after twelve o'clock. Apparently the question so often asked by critics of our society—"Whither has Innocence flown?"—is answered at last. In this age of flaming youth and dancing mothers our daughters grow disconcertingly knowing even in the most sheltered drawing room of the selectest boarding school, but guilelessness, modesty, and that old fashioned self-respect which refused to cheapen itself by permitting unlicensed familiarities has found refuge in the night club.

Doubtless stranger things have happened. We have it on good Latin authority that not even the wolves will touch the man who is armored with virtue, and perhaps that will hold for women too. And yet, much as one dislikes to confront the optimism of the playwright with a cynical skepticism, one wonders just how a girl may nightly entice suckers to a gambling hell without losing a little of the delicate bloom of innocence. Just how, one asks, does she get her victims and just how does she hold them? Nor is the question impertinent since night clubs, like other business institutions, exist through the sufferance of satisfied customers. Is it possible that the ingenues whom they employ charm their patrons because they remind an old roue of his sister or do they, perhaps, like the professional corespondent in one of Maughan's comedies, know a lot of delightful card tricks by the aid of which a night may be pleasantly whiled away? "This," says one of the characters of the present day in the penultimate line of the piece, "is a hell of a town." It is indeed.

Frederic Lonsdale's "The High Road" (Fulton Theater) shows signs of becoming a success. The form is smart English comedy rather plentifully larded with good old-fashioned hokum of the American sort. There is a charming young actress who teaches an aristocratic family (into which she is about to marry) that social distinctions do not count where love is concerned, and much is made of a scene in which a pompous old nobleman is convinced of the virtue in American cocktails. This latter seemed to please the audience greatly but to me it was strongly reminiscent of the stock scene in which Aunt Mary, come disapprovingly to the city, takes one drink and decides to bob her hair. Two musical comedies—"Luckee Girl" at the Casino and "Cross My Heart" at the Knickerbocker—follow closely the models of their kind. The former has a new team of precision dancers who are well trained and a fat comedian named Billy House who is sometimes amusing.

Hindu Farmers at Bay

By N. B. PARULEKAR

EIGHTY thousand farmers in Bardoli—men, women, and children—are facing unarmed the machine-guns, tanks, and airplane bombers of the British Government.

What is happening in Bardoli, and what is repeating itself in other parts of India, is this: A military-ridden government (60 per cent of India's income goes to feed the army directly or indirectly) is trying to increase its revenue to meet growing expenditure. India, being poor, the Government cannot expect to raise this revenue from a general rise in the income tax nor from a tariff increase, as it would hinder the flow of the British-made goods into India. Besides, to encourage industrial development of the country is to invite the same danger by another door. Farmers are the only class of the population that are subjected to heavy taxation. And they have borne the burden meekly so far. The Indian farmer represents 80 per cent of the population, lives in far-off villages where Government agents penetrate twice a year to collect land revenue, withdrawing themselves for the rest of the year to enrich the few cities they live in and use as centers of export and import. The farmer gets little benefit from a Government of which he has become willingly or unwillingly the principal feeder.

From an intended increase of 30 per cent land revenue in Bardoli, the officers of the state came down to 29 per cent and finally made up their mind to collect a 20 per cent increase at the point of the bayonet if necessary. The farmers protested, sent deputations, and urged upon the Government to submit the whole assessment to the judgment of an impartial committee. The Government, of course, is not prepared to surrender the divine right to tax the farmer according to official discretion. In India land-revenue settlement is kept out of ordinary legislation as a matter for purely executive will. The Bardoli farmers refused to pay without arbitration, and the war of peace started against the war of force.

Confiscation of lands and attachment of movable property followed. There are 130 villages in Bardoli with 126,000 acres of arable land. Forty Pathans—an alien element known for its underworld activity in Bombay—were imported by the Government to frighten the people and harass them into submission. Bullocks and buffaloes were attached, beaten, and tortured to incite the peasant, to whom agricultural animals are part of his family. The farmers remained unmoved. Furniture and grain bags were appropriated only to be left where they were, because no porter would lift his finger to remove them to the government storehouse. Carts were attached either to be abandoned or to be driven by the officials themselves. No driver could be had to do it.

The "japti" officers, i.e., the government men intrusted with the task of confiscating property, have to walk miles before they can get a shave. Their automobiles would remain buried in bad roads but for the generosity of Vallabhbhai Patel, the leader of the Satyagrha (passive resistance) movement. The Collector of the District, the highest and all-powerful official, cannot get even a conveyance from the station except by permission of Mr. Patel.

The Government is doing its level best to break the backbone of the farmer. It is blowing away the farmer's property as so much sawdust. A buffalo worth 150 rupees and a young buffalo calf worth 60 rupees are sold by the Government for four and a half rupees. For a total assessment of about 700 rupees one man has had lands of the value of between 30,000 to 40,000 rupees forfeited. Another lot of 33 acres worth more than 15,000 rupees was sold for 161 rupees. As if this was not enough, the man's cooking utensils were attached, his pair of horses was sold for a nominal sum, and his nephew is being criminally prosecuted for an alleged false declaration. Cotton worth 250 rupees was sold for 21 rupees. For failure to pay 300 rupees Dorabji, the Parsi saloonkeeper, had liquor worth 2,000 rupees attached and his saloon closed, and yet a balance was shown, for which his lands worth 30,000 rupees are forfeited.

The Government has dispatched armed police, regular army divisions—tanks, airplane bombers, and other engines of war—to occupy every inch of this territory so that the farmers may not be able to till the soil nor sow the crops and the confiscated lands shall remain under the possession of the Government in reality and not merely in name. On the other hand, the farmers have decided to keep working on their lands as if there was no Government, and 80,000 men, women, and children are waiting for as many officers of law to arrest them and lead them into jails. The Government is faced with the dilemma either to shoot these agriculturists as outlaws or prosecute them in the courts of law with all severity, in which case instead of collecting the revenue it will have to spend large sums to feed these people in jail! And all this for a paltry sum of 100,000 rupees, which is but a straw to the Government, though to the farmers it is the straw that breaks their back.

At the head of this movement are men recognized to be among the best and the noblest in India. There is, of course, Mahatma Gandhi, whose spirit is pervading the whole affair, though he himself is living in his hermitage on the banks of Sabarmati. The next man and the man on the spot is Vallabhbhai Patel, the former mayor of Bombay and Ahmedbad, whose services were not long ago praised so highly by the Government in organizing relief work during the recent floods in Gujraht. The farmers have faith in him as one who has shared their sufferings in their worst days. His brother, Vithalbhai Patel, is the president of the Legislative Assembly at Delhi. He sends 1,000 rupees a month from his salary to the cause—an example of how government money is used to fight the Government itself.

Last but not least are those young college men, "Gandhiwallas," or the workers of Gandhi, as they are known among the farmers. They are volunteers. Two hundred and fifty of them are scattered in different camps throughout the affected area supplying the farmers with the necessary means of organization. They run a publicity department which puts out 13,000 leaflets a day and distribute them free. They manage "thanas," or offices to parallel government offices, serve as watchers to match the official detectives, run errands, serve the sick and the old, and so on. These youngsters under the guidance of their leaders have organized themselves into as many parallel departments as the Government generally has, except of course the police, which the peasants do not require. There has not been one single case of crime reported during the last four months of agitation. Thus there is coming into existence a government of the people, by the people, and for the people, beside which the old Government looks like an impostor, helpless with all its military power.

The amount of moral energy brought forth during this movement is stupendous. For over four months the farmers have been marooned in their houses, their cattle gone, their lands laid waste. They refuse to resort to violence, or to succumb to any temptation of promotion or fear of complete ruin. They have declined so far to receive any pecuniary help from other parts of India, the only money collected being used for the purpose of organization and education. The young volunteers are subjected to mock trials, and sentenced to hard labor of six months or more. They decline to pay fines and cheerfully accept imprisonment. They are "framed up" for "rioting and obstruction." The watchers are prosecuted as "ruffians and suspects loitering near public places to cause mischief and worse." Many of them are led "handcuffed and roped in pairs." Yet no violence, no abuse, not even a sigh of sorrow either from them or from their relatives.

Students in schools deny themselves butter and milk for days, go out to do manual work, and send in money thus saved and earned in the sweat of their labor. When over 100,000 textile workers in Bombay are on strike and need every succor, their comrades from Ahmedabad are sending money to the farmers' cause out of their meager wages. The majority of the revenue collectors, village headmen, and other village officers have resigned, leaving in some cases twenty years' service behind rather than aid the Government in its attempts of coercion.

Bardoli is not the first of its kind. India has been resorting to this method for the last fourteen years in attempts at redressing wrongs in political, social, and other departments of human intercourse. Mahatma Gandhi insists that all such experiments point to the one conclusion, that civil power is greater than military and that cooperation is the only element on which any organization, even the most autocratic, can stand. You deny this cooperation and the whole social fabric lays itself open for a new adjustment. This is nothing short of a revolution, except that the process is rendered harmless by keeping it strictly within the bounds of non-violence. The opponents may take to force, but they are bound to find it futile.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: NATION, New York. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising, Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 34, Clifton Gardens, W. 9, London, England.

THE NATION is on file in most public and college libraries and is indexed in the Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature.

HOW WILL AMERICAN LIBERALS VOTE in the election next November? The extraordinary confusion of issues in this campaign has induced us to take a post-card poll of our subscribers in the United States. Our mail does not give us the usual index, for it indicates the same perplexities and the same differences of opinion that have made it impossible for the editors of The Nation to agree upon one candidate. Whereas this journal is entirely opposed to Herbert Hoover, our correspondence indicates that a certain number of Progressives who voted for La Follette in 1924 are going to vote for Hoover, not because they like him, or like his party, but simply and solely in order, as they think, to save prohibition. In view of the shortness of the time remaining we earnestly request our readers to return their ballot with the least possible delay in order that there may be presented an adequate cross-section of liberal opinion which cannot, of course, be represented in any of the polls taken by daily newspapers.

IF HERBERT HOOVER is making headway it is not due to anything that he has said or done, or to the work of the Republican National Committee. The management of Hoover's campaign is ridiculous, it is so inept and so futile. The other day one of the prominent men in the party visited headquarters. He received hardly any attention and, although the announcement that he was there to offer his services to Herbert Hoover would have been first-page copy in the newspapers, nobody told the press that he was there. When asked subsequently why this happened, a responsible person in the headquarters said sarcastically: "We are too busy knifing each other here to think of giving out a big story like that." In characteristic manner Mr. Hoover now tries to duck responsibility by letting it be known that he has nothing to do with the campaign, although it was announced in all the newspapers when he returned from California that he had come to supersede Dr. Work and would thenceforth direct his own fight. Without question Dr. Work is so poor a national chairman that the shades of Quay and Hanna and many others must be wringing their spectral hands. Mr. Hoover himself is producing next to no newspaper publicity; Mr. Smith gets the first-page stories every day. None the less, Republican confidence grows. The allies who fight for them are bigotry, intolerance, prejudice, snobishness, and the reluctance of those who have special privileges to yield them. But in the unusual confusion of issues, and the bitterness of prejudice, the real progressive issues are lost to sight. Only Mr. Thomas speaks for them.

SWINGING AROUND THE CIRCUIT from New York to California and making part of his trip by airplane, Norman Thomas, Socialist candidate for President, made sixty speeches in seventeen States in the month of September. Since he cannot pay $16,000 an hour for a sixty-station radio hook-up, and since there is only one Socialist daily paper in English in the United States, Mr. Thomas's chief reliance must be upon mass meetings. The West has given him a good response, recognizing in him a gallant fighter for an intelligent program. He has sought to stem the liberal drift toward Smith by emphasizing the inadequacy of the Democratic power program.

The public development of water power sites [he declared] and the regulation by contract and commission are good as far as development is concerned, but they are a million miles from what we need. They will never curb the Power Trust or substantially reduce rates to consumers. All the water sites still in public possession are capable of producing only a small part of the total electric power which America needs. The heart of the problem is transmission, and Governor Smith does not conceal his program of turning over the distribution of power generated by the government to private companies.

Such candid criticism may not win many votes from an electorate which is absorbed in the exciting personal fight between Smith and Hoover, but it needs to be said.

ALFRED E. SMITH has beyond question furthered his candidacy by his Western speaking tour. The most detached observers are sure of this and believe that he has captured at least two States and moved several into the doubtful column. If his managers are wise they will keep him on the stump continually; therein lies his only hope. He wins his audiences invariably. People like the warm human qualities of the man, his humor, his naturalness, so rare in politicians, and his obvious honesty. At Milwaukee he again showed his courage by coming straight out on the liquor issue and declaring that he wished to be the leader of a national movement to bring about the alteration of the Volstead Law. That is forcing the fighting; that is being honest and above board; but it will also arouse to a still higher pitch those who are for prohibition with all its faults. With them the campaign now becomes a holy war. Gradually, we regret to say, the flames of intolerance and bigotry rise higher. Tammany, being a Wet and a Catholic—these are crushing burdens that Al Smith carries. If he can bear them and still reach his goal it will be an extraordinary personal achievement.

ONE POLITICAL EVENT gives us the greatest satisfaction—the nomination by the Republican Party of Alanson B. Houghton, now Ambassador to Great Britain, for the position of Senator from New York. We are unqualifiedly for his election. Mr. Houghton has for the last six years rendered in Berlin and in London services of the greatest moment not only to his own country but to Europe. We are inclined to think that, when the history of post-war Germany is written, much credit will be given to the American and English ambassadors who were in Berlin during the most trying years of the Republic, 1922-1925, and gave to it a warm and hearty support and a friendly interest which were of incalculable aid. In London Mr. Houghton ranks high, not as a talking but as a working Ambassador. It is a commonplace in London that he has been the ablest American Ambassador in decades. But even if Mr. Houghton had been less successful abroad, we should still be for him if only because of his devotion to the cause of peace and his demand that the war-making power be taken away from governments and placed in the hands of the people. As for his opponent, Dr. Copeland, he has made no such record at Washington as to obligate the State to return him to the Senate. He is an excellent doctor and a popular medical writer for the daily press, but no statesman. Mr. Houghton would again make the position of Senator from New York a powerful one. We are gratified, too, by the nomination by the Democrats of Franklin D. Roosevelt for Governor of New York.

THE PUBLIC UTILITIES INVESTIGATION has received considerable publicity since it was resumed recently in Washington by the Federal Trade Commission—much more, in fact, than during the earlier session several months ago. Indeed, some of the men implicated have protested against what they term unfair publicity. Possibly in a few cases they are justified. There was, for example, nothing wrong in William Allen White's acceptance of $500 for an address before the National Electric Light Association in 1926. His son commented that the only wrong that he could see in the transaction was the smallness of the sum paid. For the honeyed words of "Bill" White, heralding the men of the public-utilities industry as "priests of a new era," it probably was. On the other hand, a great deal of material has been revealed that cannot be passed over so lightly. There is the case of Professor James S. Thomas receiving $666 per month from power interests while engaged in "research" and extension work of the University of Alabama. When he was asked at the investigation if it was known that, while he was teaching his regular classes in sociology and economics and making speeches on utilities before various State meetings, he was also in the employ of the power company, he replied: "I don't suppose was." There is similar evidence of other propaganda work in the schools of New Jersey and at the Iowa State Agricultural College—with the "power trust" supplying thousands of dollars but staying quietly in the background.

THERE IS STILL DISCUSSION as to which team won first honors in the Olympic Games of 1928. In our issue of August 22, taking our data from an Associate Press dispatch of August 12, we stated "according to the final score the German team led with a total of 45½ points, the United States was second with 39, and Holland third with 34½." Two weeks later Major General Douglas MacArthur, president of the American Olympic Committee, issued a tabulation of results which placed the United States first, Finland second, and Germany third. Several Nation readers have asked an explanation. There is no official method of awarding points in the Olympic; each nation—or individual—can choose the method which shows its team to best advantage. This is intended to help promote good-will among the athletes. The tabulation which we quoted in our earlier paragraph awarded points according to team achievements in each sport and team standing separately, on the basis of ten points for first place, five for second, four for third, three for fourth, two for fifth, and one for sixth. This method of scoring weighs more heavily the consistent performance of an entire team in a sport, and less heavily individual records. General MacArthur's tabulation, on the other hand, is based on individual achievements, awarding three points for each first place, two for second, and one for third.

ACHMED ZOGU IS KING OF ALBANIA, but Wilhelm of Wied is still Mpret. Perhaps the Albanians have forgotten Wilhelm, but he has not forgotten his six hectic months of mpretship, and evidently he hopes his son will have as lively times, for he salutes Achmed's coronation with the solemn announcement that he "retains all his claims upon the Albanian throne intact, for himself and his descendants." He adds that the Albanian people "is still true to its prince." That, as the Berlin Tagebuch points out, is a craven gesture of democracy; why should a king or a mpret bother about the will of the people? Conrad von Hötzendorff's memoirs recall a different consideration for the will of the people evinced by the mpret upon his arrival in Albania in March, 1924. Wilhelm wanted to live on a good, safe battleship in the harbor of Scutari, but when his sponsor, Count Berchtold, remarked on this to the chief of the Austrian general staff, Hötendorff answered that the mpret must make a "pompous" entry into Scutari, and accordingly it was arranged for him. "But what shall we do if the prince is assassinated?" asked the Austrian Foreign Minister. "Find another candidate," replied the military king-maker. Twenty-five days after his arrival the poor mpret was faced with an insurrection. Only the arrival of a foreign fleet kept his capital safe for him; and when the outbreak of the European War called the cruisers to other service the mpret, on September 2, sneaked off to the safety of Venice. "A few spirits misled by passion have not understood the value of the reforms," he said, "and do not trust the new government. . . . I must go to the West for a time." He is still there; and the Albanians, apparently, do not yet trust any government, for already there is an uprising against Zogu.

WHAT'S THIS? Here is Eugene Lyons, United Press correspondent in Moscow, declaring that the Russians are "the world's worst propagandists." We have it on the word of some of our foremost Daughters of the American Revolution and members of highly patriotic societies that they are the most dangerous propagandists on earth, so skilfully propagandizing the United States that our beloved republic is actually rocking on its foundations. Mr. Lyons, to be sure, does not refer to the direct dissemination of Communistic propaganda. He is outraged because the Bolsheviki failed utterly "to make adequate use of the truly heroic behavior of Chukhnovsky, Babushkin, and the others," aviators and members of the crew of the icebreaker Krassin, who were responsible for the recent brilliant and dramatic series of rescues in the Arctic. It was an unprecedented opportunity for the Bolsheviki to blow their own horn. "One need only think what America or Italy or Germany would have done with a similar opportunity," says Mr. Lyons. Instead, the Russians not only did not encourage the foreign correspondents in Moscow to exploit the story but actually hampered them in obtaining information. He continues:

The correspondents, in short, had to fight for every bit of news, and, having wrested it by the sweat of their brows, they then spent more time searching for the censors. If the Soviet officials had the faintest right to their reputation as propagandists, they would have lifted the censorship on this one story.

No wonder that the Bolsheviki appear so wicked to foreign journalists! The idea that any people may accept the heroic deeds of their fellow-citizens as something to be taken for granted and expected, as not calling for personal exploitation and national aggrandizement, is certainly something to make the journalistic gods weep.

WHEN LINDBERGH LANDED in Paris many young gentlemen in the streets of Mexico fell enthusiastically into each other's arms, and many young ladies wept—partly because it was Lindbergh, but chiefly because it was flight. Ever since, Mexico has been so devoted to airplaning that not even the tragic end of the beloved Emilio Carranza had any effect on the characteristically sudden and exuberant growth of a popular idea. Now an official government postal line has been established from the capital to Laredo, a private mail-and-passenger line is operating from Progreso to Vera Cruz, and a semi-official similar line is shortly to be initiated from Mazatlan, on the west coast, to the capital, while still another is planned from Tamaulipas to Mazatlan. The government has declared itself ready to cooperate with such private enterprises, and an aviation club has been organized in the metropolis for their development. Enrolment in the National School of Aviation has jumped, and now includes several girls, among them the young daughter of the President, Señorita Alicia Calles, whom her schoolmates have chosen, in good Atlantic City style, Queen of the Air. Apparently, it takes more than death by flight to discourage a people for centuries familiar with death and for millenniums the worshipers of flying gods.

A Lusty Literature?

WE are familiar with the theory that contemporary American literature is in a great state of health. We hear of renaissances, resurgences, and re-awakenings; and in the past two years we have been asked by numerous book clubs and guilds to consider the additional advantage of a large new public created almost overnight to enjoy this large new literature. Nor do we wish to deny that American letters flourish. There are simply a few contradictions to be noted.

Here is "The Second American Caravan"* for instance, a volume of 864 pages purporting to offer a cross-section of our best literature and announcing on its jacket that "it does not conform to any preconceived pattern, stand for any particular group or clique, represent any particular part of the country; nor does it seek to please a standardized body of readers." All it does is give us the best there is. And the editors—Alfred Kreymborg, Lewis Mumford, Paul Rosenfeld—believe that best to be symptomatic of "a growing American literature," believe it to be "essentially a response to the developing and growing forms of American life," claim that it "furthers the expression of a 'large, lusty, loving' America."

The figures, borrowed from biology, are a little deceptive. In what direction, judging purely by the contents of the "Caravan," is our lusty infant growing? And is it lusty? The answer would seem to be that the infant is no infant at all, but an ancient weary creature groping through thick twilight to the grave. Open almost any page of the prose and you will find a paragraph like this:

The hired man was sitting in the hammock in the dark. She threw the mail in his lap and lay down on the grass beside him. She was hot and tired. She tried to think about what had happened, but her head ached. The tears were all gone, but her head ached and ached. She cuddled up alone on the grass near the man, and went to sleep.

Or this:

And all the time he knew that he was waiting upon the coming of death. His business about the house, his watering the garden, his turning up the earth with a feeble willingness, his weeding—all acts and motions that stirred and carried about his meager body were blended in a long ritual before the inevitable god.

Always this monotone, always these short, gray sentences uttered out of mouths too tired to express anything but death, dirt, and despair, or too skeptical to explore anything but the recesses of minds across which half-thoughts mope as these sentences mope across the page. Lusty? If so, we do not know the meaning of the word; or perhaps we do not appreciate the use to which it has been put.

The excellence of most of the work in the "Caravan" is undeniable. Jonathan Leonard, Evelyn Scott, Margery Latimer, Philip Edward Stevenson, Francis Gregg, "H. D.," Gertrude Diamant, Josephine Herbst, and Nathan Asch have contributed stories which do indeed represent the best that is being done in America today, and in general the book is brilliant. The question comes down, then, to the larger question as to what we mean when we say that our literature is growing, or that it is vigorous.

* The Macaulay Company. $5.

The answer has been made that we are growing as adolescents grow, with necessary pains. It has been pointed out that although our outstanding authors—Dreiser, Anderson, Lewis, Cabell, O'Neill, Robinson—deal always with frustration and end almost always in mockery or contempt or despair, they are nevertheless clearing the ground for honest days to come when there shall be brightness without fatuity, hope without ignorance, and strength without brutality. In other words, we could not have a healthy literature until our life and our morals had been overhauled.

It is getting a little harder all the time to accept that answer—partly because it has been given so often and partly because its rational grounds are none too clear. For one thing, as the "Caravan" shows, the discipline we have been undergoing seems to have resulted in a sophistication far too fine for a national literature ever to be founded upon it. America cannot read this book either with ease or with excitement. It, along with the literature it represents, is the product of an intellectual class, and unless we are mistaken a lusty national literature never came from such a source. And, for another thing, we do not understand the biology of any art—if there is such a thing—well enough to be sure just what follows what in literary time. So we prefer to wait quietly for the things that chance and change will bring. And meanwhile we shall expect for a long generation to enjoy as best we may the beautiful, sad burden of the "Caravan" and its companions.

College Morality

Why wait till marriage? If this is a normal impulse, if marriage is unavoidably postponed, if knowledge of contraception makes sex relationships physically safe, if the world in general is reconstructing its moral codes and its standards with respect to monogamy, why should postponement be necessary?

SO run the rebellious questionings of certain American college students according to a new study, "Undergraduates," made for the Institute of Social and Religious Research by R. H. Edwards, J. M. Artman, and Galen Fisher. The study is based upon 1,100 interviews with undergraduates and officers of American colleges. Altogether the revelations of college life are not startling. Considering the insistence of rebellious questions about sexual life among the younger generation, and the long delay after sexual maturity before marriage, there seem to be surprisingly few undergraduates who defy the conventional moral code. In Russian universities men and women live together freely; in American universities, in spite of occasional headlines about student excesses, the undergraduates do not seem to be any more revolutionary in moral habits than the people of their own age outside of the colleges. "Petting," says one undergraduate, "has always existed but just suddenly has been given a name and is done in public. That is all the difference from yesterday." Probably there are other differences from yesterday—more candor, more love-making, perhaps more actual sex relationship—but these changes can surely be explained as part of a new American attitude toward sexual life.

The tension due to sex attraction and repression is evident in any college—or for that matter in any prison, convent, or monastery where men and women who have attained maturity have no sexual life. The problem of control is made doubly difficult for the modern dean because the colleges include physical children and physical adults, weaklings who cannot use freedom wisely and responsible men of the world. Because the newspapers and the public judge the "morality" of a college in terms of its conspicuous weaklings, the dean is in a dilemma. If he tempers the winds of temptation to the black lamb, he must treat the rest of the students like children. Also he must stand as the guardian of chastity in a world where chastity is on the defensive. Against him are arrayed the automobile, the sexual instinct, and the women who want husbands.

"There are many sorority girls who are well dressed, well painted, and whose real object for being at ——— is to secure a man," says one girl student in reporting her opinions to the authors of "Undergraduates." "Parties," complains one professor, "have official chaperones who sit laboriously all evening, then go home, while couples get into the automobiles and go on necking parties." If these quotations seem to reflect upon the morals of our coeducational schools, let a lonely girl from a woman's college report: "The problem here is the lack of men. Very few girls 'date,' and those who do would not be seen at home with the type of man they find here."

But the sex problem is by no means the most serious problem in our college life; the outstanding sin is the undergraduates' absorption in triviality. Practically every college in America has its undergraduates overorganized in a hundred varieties of "student activity" which assume a higher place in the estimation of the students than class-room distinction. In most colleges thought outside the class room is positively unpopular. Only the "radicals" and a few isolated, brilliant students enjoy the give and take of fundamental conversation. "You might as well be at a summer resort," said one student in describing his college.

Student activity undermines the intellectual morale of the college by creating an alternative set of values in contrast with academic values. At the time of graduation it is true that the college senior begins to realize the sham and insignificance of the "pep" meeting, the club membership campaign, the fraternity presidency, and even the varsity letter. But then it is too late. In the last half of his senior year he will vote for Phi Beta Kappa as the one genuine distinction at college, but for his first three and a half years he would sell a thousand scholarship keys for one fullback's sweater.

It would be sheer quackery to say that any one remedy or any set of remedies will cure the ills of American undergraduate life. The creation of junior colleges and upper-class universities, the abolition of fraternities, the limiting of athletics to intramural competitions, the tutorial method of instruction—all of these reforms are being advocated and tried in various American schools. They will doubtless improve the undergraduate life but they can scarcely destroy the predominant triviality of that life so long as the college is chiefly a passage-way to the upper economic classes.

Fighting Against Disarmament

DISARMAMENT is still a rosy mist on the far horizon. The peoples may demand action, but the governments tread warily at the mere mention of the dangerous word. Neither Washington nor London nor Paris has the slightest desire for any radical step toward disarmament, and the hullabaloo about the Franco-British agreement is, in fact, a series of maneuvers designed to throw the burden of the failure upon the other fellow. Each government wants to build more ships of certain kinds, and resents efforts to limit such action; and all the governments are willing to welcome open-armed any step toward reducing other navies if only it will not disturb their own.

Yet it seems to us that the American Department of State has a special right to protest against the secret Franco-British understanding. There is no reason to mince words; it was a secret agreement designed to checkmate American plans at the next international conference to limit armaments. The French have consistently refused to limit submarines or to compare their conscript army with the small volunteer armies of the Anglo-Saxon countries; the British have refused to accept limitation of small cruisers carrying six-inch guns and had refused to accept the French position on submarines and on land forces. The two Powers met (secretly) and agreed (secretly) to support each other's positions and to accept limitation only of the large cruisers so dear to Washington's heart. They say that this was intended to facilitate the cause of disarmament, but they can hardly expect to be believed. While the British press has in general accepted the government thesis that a vast armada is necessary to protect Britain's trade routes, not a single British newspaper, so far as we are aware, has defended this compromise with France, or the manner of its negotiation.

The American reply was sharp. The Franco-British "proposal," it should be recalled, had not been communicated to the United States until after a storm of protest in the press on both sides of the Atlantic had produced a counter-storm of contradictory explanations in the British and French parliaments and semi-official press. Washington rejected the proposal outright. It called it "even more unacceptable than the proposals put forward by the British delegation at the [Geneva] conference, not only because it puts the United States at a decided disadvantage but also because it discards altogether the principle of limitation as applied to important combatant types of vessels."

The United States, the note said in a passage which deserves emphasis, would be glad to agree to abolish submarines altogether; but it would not except from limitation small craft carrying as destructive torpedoes as the large craft which would be necessary for defense of our long coast-line. The Franco-British proposal, it said, "would actually tend to defeat the primary objective of any disarmament conference for the reduction or the limitation of armament in that it would not eliminate competition in naval armament and would not effect economy. . . . [It] would inevitably lead to a recrudescence of naval competition disastrous to national economy."

That is a vigorous tone for a peaceful diplomatic communication. It was, we believe, justified by the circumstances. And it would be supremely justified if it should lead to some new step toward a Franco-British-American agreement intended, not as was this discredited proposal, to block disarmament, but to check naval competition and to limit the growing rivalry in various classes of fighting ships. The Washington note reverted to a suggestion made by M. Paul-Boncour of France at the first session of the preparatory conference on disarmament held under the auspices of the League of Nations; possibly steps can be taken along that line.

The most disquieting aspect of this whole series of negotiations is its revelation of the complete absence of any really impulsive drive for peace. The foreign offices, having signed the carefully guarded Kellogg pact and advertised it as a far greater step toward peace than it was, are continuing to plan for war. The Paris correspondent of the New York Times cables that "It seems months and, indeed, years since August 27, when the Kellogg pact outlawing war was signed at the Quai d'Orsay. For since then no one has ever heard of the pact except to hear it sneered at. . . . It certainly seems as dead as the dodo."

We now know that while France and England were arranging with the United States the details of the historic scene in the Salle d'Horloge, when all the nations met to outlaw war, they were secretly scheming to outmaneuver Washington and prevent effective limitation of land or sea forces. (Washington's note replied only to the Franco-British naval agreement; but it is now admitted that France and Britain also reached certain conclusions hostile to any attempt to abolish conscription or reduce land forces!) Britain was simultaneously organizing a mock air raid on London to advertise to the Londoners the need of spending more money on military airplanes. France was preparing to refuse to evacuate the Rhineland unless Germany should agree to accept a system of refined blackmail by which she would pay extra for fulfilment of her treaty rights.

It is not a pretty picture. And, despite the sun that shines alike upon the golden beeches of Europe and the flaming maples of America, this is not, in any political sense, a pretty world. The discouraging nationalisms of pre-war days persist, and, while the names of the foreign secretaries sometimes change, the old crew of officials schooled in pre-war and war diplomacy still rule the chancelleries. A genuine spirit of peace is not in them. And the will for peace of the masses will have to become more articulate and intelligently directed before it can be finally effective. If Germany is disarmed, and Russia ready for disarmament, France still adores Poincaré; England thinks that peace means a world wherein Britannia rules the lands as well as the seas; and here in America we seem to be about to elect as President a man who talks in terms of prestige-diplomacy and thinks that a nation must be feared to be respected.

Fiasco as it is, this latest revelation of the shallowness of British-American friendship, of the weakness of the drive for disarmament, is not a backward step. Progress cannot be based upon illusion. The extravagant hopes that clustered about the Kellogg pact have been shattered. Very good. We know better where we are. We understand better the magnitude of the task that still lies before us.

It Seems to Heywood Broun

IT is quite possible that New York's favorite son will not reach Washington, but our city may still find its place in the sun by winning the World's Series. In baseball, public sentiment plays a smaller part than in elections and yet it is well not to overlook the fact that all the nation is rooting against our representatives on the diamond. In part this disaffection rises from the circumstance that New York has had very many championships and pennants. But back of that there lies the animus of the hinterlanders against all things metropolitan. As William Allen White has so well illustrated, Puritan America does not like the culture which flourishes on Manhattan Island. Even a winning baseball team is somehow interpreted as a sign of metropolitan decadence and an effete civilization.

So bitter is this feeling in the remoter hamlets that fans have been known to hiss even Babe Ruth as he advanced up to the plate three bats in hand. And if, by any chance, a pitcher fools him and he swings in vain all the Philistines set up a caterwauling in their ecstasy.

Now that the issue is joined between New York and St. Louis our Yankees need expect no sympathy in any quarter save the home land. Not even there can they count upon 100 per cent loyalty. Traitors are freely admitted to Colonel Ruppert's gigantic stadium. It is no uncommon thing to hear some person in the grand stand remark quite audibly, "I hope the New York Club will take a licking." Once I heard a faithful soul rebuke just such a fellow roundly. Turning to the viper a superb old gentleman remarked, "If you don't like it here why don't you go back where you came from?"

Unfortunately not all the folks in New York who cheer the visiting team are aliens. Some are citizens from our own sidewalks who have become tainted by a certain international point of view. It is their contention that a good play should be applauded whether made by friend or foe. This type of mind does not belong in New York. Baseball thrives on limiting the scope of patriotic feeling. If St. Louis wins it is my intention to go and live four years in France as a protest against a rank injustice. I trust, however, that I shall not be forced to extreme measures.

It has been said that it is silly to work up any feeling over the fate of the home team since many of the athletes are not truly residents of the city which they represent. This seems to me a quibble. As soon as a ball player puts on a shirt emblazoned with the words New York he becomes a symbol of the city and its fame and honor. Of course I see by the papers that Earl Combs is a Kentucky school teacher and that Lazzeri lives in San Francisco. For all emotional purposes these men are as truly native as Al Smith and must serve the uniform they wear till death or victory. Of course, in the meantime they may be sold or traded to some other city; whereupon they become instantly rogues and rascals.

Babe Ruth himself was not always with us. Born in Baltimore he played his first big league engagement with the Boston Red Sox. But Ruth has been a Yankee long enough to become naturalized in soul as well as body. One does not have to read the letters on his shirt to recognize him as a true New Yorker. Though born and reared in Mencken's town Ruth is in no real sense a product of the American Mercury philosophy. There is nothing cynical about the Babe. He does things with a largeness of spirit which is characteristic of Manhattan men. "Shoot it all" is Babe's motto. As is the custom of the town he's always ready for a feast or famine. Naturally he prefers the feast. But when Ruth puts all his energy in some mighty swing he is content to risk everything upon the possibility of some gigantic drive. It is better to miss than to dawdle along with puny bunts and singles.

There used to be a man over in Brooklyn who led a school of thought which has since been demolished by Ruthian prowess. Willie Keeler explained his batting theory with the injunction "Hit 'em where they aint." Accordingly, he would niddle along with little taps just beyond the reach of the opposing players. All this looked well enough in the batting averages but it was a Coolidgean kind of practice. There was a miserly economy of effort and a stinginess of display.

Ruth would never hold himself within the cramped confines of any such school of conduct. His motto is more brave and glorious, for he seems to say: "Hit them where no one has been or will ever get to." It is not his desire to tantalize third basemen with dragging bunts or pop up Texas Leaguers just beyond the reach of the short stop's outstretched fingers. Instead he aims only for the most distant fences. The cities of the American League are strewn with glass shattered out of residential windows by the mighty wallops of the Big Bam.

At the moment of going to press the great man is a little ailing. One leg is not so good and the other is also bruised and painful. And something is the matter with one shoulder. But there is no reason for us to despair nor for St. Louisians to rejoice in these misfortunes. The Babe is too flaming a spirit to be hampered much by mere physical disabilities. "Ruth crushed to earth will rise again. The Ruth is mighty and shall prevail." I quote from an eminent authority on Ruthiana.

Still in all sober consideration one cannot quite forget that New York comes to the vital test sadly crippled. Herbert Pennock, known for short as the Silver Fox Farmer of Kennett Square, is not likely to appear in the series, since his good left arm has been knotted by neuritis. At last reports the throwing hand of Combs was broken. Wilcy Moore has been retired for the season on account of some ligamentary disturbance.

The Cardinals, on the other hand, are in the very pink of condition. Grover Cleveland Alexander has never known better health in all his forty-five-odd years of service. Frankie Frisch has a normal pulse and blood pressure. Wee Willie Sherdel was seldom better fitted to pursue his nefarious calling of making gallant Yankee players bite at slow balls and bad ones.

Somehow the children of darkness always seem to have better health than the children of light. But no matter. The handicaps being what they are, triumph should be all the sweeter when it comes. And so may the best team win just so long as it is not St. Louis.

HEYWOOD BROUN

As the Farmers Go, So Goes the Election

By W. G. CLUGSTON

Topeka, Kansas, September 21

NEVER before, perhaps, have the farmers—especially the Middle Western farmers—carried the balloting responsibilities which will be theirs when they go into the election booths on November 6. Surveys of the national campaign, as the home stretch nears, make it appear that half a dozen agricultural States, where the farm vote will be the deciding factor, may—probably will—determine who will be the next President.

It is generally conceded that Governor Smith will get something more than a hundred electoral votes in the South, and, to have any chance at all, he must get approximately a hundred from the Eastern sector. In the Middle Western agricultural area there are eight States with a total Electoral College vote of 106 where the farmers, although predominantly Republican in the past, are pretty generally on the "war path" this year, and are openly threatening to throw aside party ties in an effort to improve their economic conditions. These States, set down in the order of their likelihood of going Democratic, are Missouri, Wisconsin, Nebraska, South Dakota, Minnesota, Illinois, North Dakota, and Iowa. In every one of these States, with the possible exception of Missouri, the outcome depends upon the way the farmers vote. If a majority of them go Democratic, and Smith attains his expectations in the East, he can give the Republicans Kansas and Oklahoma and need not worry much about what the so-called border States may do. Wisconsin to Smith would exactly offset Kentucky's going to Hoover; Nebraska would offset Oklahoma, and Illinois would make up for several losses.

There is no question that the farmers throughout the more progressive sections of the Middle West are in revolt against the economic conditions which have made it impossible for them to get what they consider their rightful share of the blessings of the much-heralded era of Republican prosperity. Since the big agricultural deflation which followed the end of the war, the grain-growing farmers have been disgruntled, and have, through their organizations, demanded that the national government give them something equivalent to the protective-tariff benefits provided for other industries. The refusal of President Coolidge's administration to do so, together with the general belief that Herbert Hoover approved the Coolidge attitude and helped the President maintain it, made the grain-growing States very decidedly anti-Hoover—and very doubtful about the boasted Republican corner on the supply of prosperity formulas. On top of this, wheat prices during the past summer went generally below 85 cents a bushel on the farm; corn also has gone down so much the farmers can hope to make the profits they had expected only by buying cattle and hogs and feeding them—a precarious plan at present livestock prices; and the potato market has been so badly demoralized that many potato growers have left their crops to rot in the ground.

These conditions put the farmers of the Middle West in a receptive frame of mind when Governor Smith made his invasion of the section. And there is no one who has watched developments during the last few weeks who will dispute that Smith made good use of the opportunities opened to him by that trip. The result has been that thousands upon thousands of farmers are aroused to the point where they are asking themselves if their responsibilities as voting citizens do not transcend party ties. In every State I have mentioned the rural voters are honestly seeking to determine the vital issues and to vote upon them in an intelligent way. In many instances there are farmers of the Republican faith who have been driven to the verge of revolt because they believe security in the ownership of their homesteads—and from peasantry-threatening tenantry—will depend upon the action taken by the next administration in the matter of farm-relief legislation.

There are, however, so many cross-currents in this campaign—so many phantom issues—that the untrained mind is often confused, and it is not easy to concentrate on the real issues with clear-thinking, prejudice-shorn courage. Smoke-screen artists have been abroad in every township; almost every cross-roads telephone pole has been made into a whispering post. Religious prejudices have been played for all they were worth, and, beyond question, many Republican voters have been held in line by the circulation of stories to the effect that Smith is merely a puppet of the Pope—and that the public-school system will be wrecked if he wins. Methodist conferences generally have gone on record as against Smith and for Hoover, and this has brought many of the more liberal-minded to an honest belief that religious intolerance, more vicious than when Thomas Jefferson gave his best energies in fighting it, will, if Smith is defeated, destroy freedom of conscience and equal opportunities. There has been much mouthing of malicious slanders similar to those for which poor "Bill" White was made to stand sponsor. To injure Smith there have been criticisms of his "Bowery talk"—and belittling whispers about Mrs. Smith's cultural qualifications to preside over the White House; but also many "Sir 'Erbert 'Oover" fabrications have been told for no higher purpose than to arouse prejudices against him. There has been much talk of the past corruptions of Tammany by many newspapers and men of such eminence as Senator Arthur Capper, with no memory, apparently, for the more recent conspiracies of Fall, Doheny, Denby, Doherty, and others.

The prohibition question also is playing a prominent part in every one of the farming States. Under the charge that Smith is a "Wet," many are masking the real cause of their opposition to him—their prejudices against his religion. A great many of the church organizations are using his stand for a modification of prohibition enactments as an excuse for their actions in converting structures erected for the worship of God into political pursuits. But in the States I have enumerated above sentiment for prohibition as a phobia is not nearly as strong as in many other Western and Southern States; in fact, in most of them there is a pronounced public sentiment in favor of a change in the method of handling the "great experiment." Two years ago the people of Montana, one of the early bone-dry commonwealths, wiped the State enforcement act from the statute books. Last June North Dakota, another dry State, came within a few thousand votes of doing likewise. Wisconsin voted wet on a referendum two years ago, and there is a strong sentiment against the political Drys in Minnesota. Prohibition is hardly the stuffed club with which the Republicans can keep the farmers in line in the States where the farmer votes may decide the election. But it is playing its part along with pumpkin seeds and poison ivy and preachers full of prejudices.

Perhaps the most pronounced farmer-revolt against the Republican attitude toward agriculture, as it is believed to be exemplified by Mr. Hoover, centers in Iowa. From that State came the most emphatic demands for enactment of the McNary-Haugen bill. But Iowa presents the spectacle of such leaders as Senator Smith W. Brookhart, Representative J. L. Dickinson, and Governor John Hammill—political leaders who have been placed in power as a result of their activities in championing the demands of the dissatisfied farmers—now trying to persuade their constituents to forget their dissatisfactions, along with their depleted resources, and vote for that faction of the Republican Party which at the Kansas City convention defied them to bolt. It remains to be seen whether these men, and other leaders like them in several of the other States mentioned, have merely become Lenroots or whether they have the power to make the farmers follow them.

Possibly the farmers of no State hold the future of the nation in their hands so nearly as those of Illinois. This State, undoubtedly, will swing the way the farmer vote goes. The Illinois farmers are largely Republican. They can easily overcome the Smith lead in Chicago if they stand behind Hoover; but with such outstanding leaders as George N. Peek refusing to swallow Hoover—and refusing to forget the Lowden drubbing at Kansas City—enough Illinois farmers may step into the breach to close the lines for Smith if Brookhart and his associates break up the revolt in Iowa.

In Nebraska the revolt sentiment comes largely from the grassroots, as it does in most of the States, but the Democrats have got much encouragement from the fact that Republican leaders such as Senator Norris and Governor McMullen have not only said nothing commendable of the Republican platform or candidate, but have declared that the Democratic campaign platform, and Governor Smith's declarations, are more satisfactory to those who are striving to aid agriculture. In Wisconsin it is conceded that much of the La Follette vote will go to the Democrats. Former Senator Magnus Johnson of Minnesota has joined former Senator Hansbrough in declaring for Smith; in North Dakota the Non-Partisan League refused to act with the Republican State committee in indorsing Hoover; in Missouri the most effective of the farm leaders are for Smith, making the State more promising to him than it would be if he had to rely mostly on the majorities he will get in St. Louis and Kansas City. South Dakota has a strong Democratic Governor, an early-day farmer, who has a good chance of being reelected, and he, with all the machinery of his administration, is supporting the Democratic national ticket.

To expect a bloc of such traditionally Republican States as most of those I have mentioned to swing into the Democratic column seems like folly—especially in face of all the handicaps the Democratic candidate is carrying, his Tammany connections, his religion, his enmity to Volsteadism; and all the preacher-prejudices that are in action against him. If such a thing can happen, then there is an agrarian uprising in the Middle West of greater proportions than the country in general has imagined. A conservative prophet would probably advise a prized customer to put his money on a majority of these States remaining Republican. I wouldn't. The handicaps which Hoover carries are more real to many farmers than those which have been hung on Smith. Whether it be deserved or not, there is a widespread belief throughout the agricultural sections that Hoover dealt unfairly with the farmers when he fixed food prices during the war—that "Hoover kept down the price of wheat and hogs and kept up the price of sugar." There also is a general belief that he was one of President Coolidge's chief supporters in the Administration's successful efforts to prevent the farmers getting the relief legislation they demanded. Besides, the farmers throughout the entire bread-basket belt are agreed that the Democratic platform meets their demands more completely than the Republican platform—and there is no comparison in the aroused farmers' minds between the appeals of the candidates personally. Mr. Hoover in his home-visiting speech at West Branch, Iowa, did not satisfy them nearly so well as Governor Smith did when he accepted the principle of the McNary-Haugen bill in his Omaha address—and few revolting farmers have been won back by the prosperity recitals of the last eight years of Republican rule. They have not been won back because they feel that they have been denied their share in whatever prosperity there has been.

Senator Curtis, the Republican Vice-Presidential candidate, has probably made some headway with the tariff talks he has made in his swings across the corn and wheat belts and his pledge that Hoover, if elected, will take steps to relieve the distressed and disgruntled agriculturist. But to many observers it seems that much more must be done in the hectic last-day drives if the Republican managers are to have pleasant dreams on the night after the election. As it now appears, they have more to worry them in most of the States I have mentioned than the Democratic managers will have in all their weak spots in the Southland.

Just as the above lines were finished a report came from Des Moines that the Iowa Farmers' Union State convention had adopted resolutions calling for the defeat of Herbert Hoover, despite the fact that Senator Brookhart made an impassioned plea before the convention for an indorsement for the Republican nominee. The resolution adopted calls for the defeat of Hoover as a "protest of the American farmer at the insulting and high-handed manner in which the Republican national convention turned a deaf ear to the plea for justice for agriculture." This, of course, is only a straw indicating the direction the wind is blowing. But there are many similar straws. The Corn Belt Committee, meeting only a short time previously, adopted resolutions of a similar trend as expressing the sentiments of the farm leaders of ten States; one of the largest farm organizations in Missouri has openly thrown its influence behind the Democratic cause; the North Dakota Nonpartisan Leaguers, as previously stated, refused to indorse Hoover. In Nebraska the Federation of German-American Societies, at a meeting as late as the middle of September, passed resolutions vigorously condemning the religious whispering tactics, declaring: "We therefore vigorously resist any attempt to require a religious qualification for public office, even though it be the Presidency of the United States."

Also, there are straw-vote polls of threshing crews and farmer picnic gatherings which are startlingly off-color to Republican eyes.

By the sixth of November all such signs may have been blown away by the hot winds and cyclones of political oratory which will sweep over the land for the next few weeks. The newspapers, it must be remembered, are largely Republican, and are pounding away for Hoover with insidious cunning while pretending to be fair; the political machinery from the township trustee boards to the top floors of the State capitol buildings are Republican, and ready to use any ruse necessary to keep the voters "regular"; the Catholic-hating parsons have quit sleeping nights in order to keep abreast of the Ku Klux processions; the ardent prohibitionists are exerting themselves to the utmost. All these forces were aroused to more frantic efforts by Smith's invasion of the West, and the dashing, daring bravery with which he attempted to drag into the open—and across "the great open spaces"—the big issues of the campaign. I have seen the most promising of bumper corn crops curl up in a day under the blasts of a hot August wind, and I have seen wheat fields, haled out until they were considered total losses, revive and produce near-normal yields at harvest time. I have seen political structures crumble in a fortnight, and I have seen popular idols put into power in spite of every agency that could be employed by the opposition. So I shall continue to be an optimist regardless of the outcome.

California Is for Hoover

By GEORGE P. WEST

Sausalito, September 17

IT is scarcely news that Herbert Hoover will carry California by a large majority. In normal years the State is overwhelmingly Republican. The Hiram Johnson progressives, whose snubbing by Hughes and subsequent defection threw the State to Wilson in 1916, are this time working in harmony with the party's right wing. So are the independents, who, caught by Wilsonian "idealism" and then antagonized by the frank and almost illiterate toryism of Harding and Coolidge, now recognize in Hoover their own genteel and orthodox brand of righteousness and are further attracted by the fact that he has ridden on many steamships, acquired many respectable dollars, won worldwide fame, and read quite a number of books. His being an engineer appeals to a vast number who refuse to realize that the Presidency is politics and that politics is itself a highly skilled trade, if not a profession. It is a campaign slogan that we need the expert in government. By a curious confusion of ideas, Hoover the engineer is an expert, Smith the masterly politician is not.

Hoover's dulness in the field of general ideas, his complaisance as a Cabinet officer during shameful years, his final speaking out only to recite the Coolidge-Harding ritual and bid for the continued support of their crowd, his ineptitude in the selection of men (at least in the political sphere, vide Dr. Work and Curtis D. Wilbur, whom he urged on Coolidge for the Navy Department)—not any or all of these are permitted to count against him in the appraisal of Californians. From admiring Hoover it seems but a step to idolatry, and in typical California groups to criticize him even moderately is to arouse resentment. There is something about this silent, bashful man who has successfully managed engineering works in many quarters of the globe and who won, in 1914, the admiration of the world by his direction of Belgian relief that either bores and irritates or makes of his cause a cult. Perhaps it is that his dulness caters to the dull man's distrust of cleverness, and in Hoover's case dulness is combined with really distinguished achievement. For it is the dulness of the "practical" man, a dulness which he shares with nine successful business men out of ten, and therefore the orthodox American brand which is not dulness at all in the eyes of those who regard the Coolidge era as a golden age. It is, that is to say, the dulness of the extrovert who is an immensely able executive in accomplishing any purpose (Mississippi relief, feeding the starving, making a mine pay), on the goodness of which all men are agreed, but who becomes confused and irritated and ineffectual when his purpose is challenged by the raising of those philosophical and sociological questions that are the stuff of politics.

Also it is very important in its bearing on the California result that Hoover, now a Californian, was born on an Iowa farm and that his people were hard-working, pious Protestants. To be born in the Middle West and then to come and live in California is, for hundreds of thousands of Californians, the perfect way of life, and reason enough to vote for the only candidate who has achieved it.

Hiram Johnson's support of Hoover is in compliance with an agreement by which he received the Republican nomination for United States Senator without opposition. Johnson gained nothing except a summer free from the strain of a campaign, for his renomination was already assured. And he gave very little, for he would probably have had to support Hoover in any case. Mercifully freed of his own Presidential ambition, he is today a happier man and a more engaging figure than in many years past, but with his mellowing has come a philosophical acceptance of things that can't be helped. Johnson's personal meeting with Hoover at Palo Alto was formal and probably a little strained. He did not hesitate, a week or two later, to "jam" Hoover by declaring in a speech in southern California that no man was too big to be required to tell where he stood on Boulder Dam, and Hoover's slightly ambiguous declaration at Los Angeles a few days later in favor of the project (he carefully refrained from indorsing the Swing-Johnson bill by name) was accepted as the carrying out of a bargain. But whatever Johnson's personal and private estimate of the Republican nominee may be, there is no question that his organization, and Governor Young in particular, is wholeheartedly for Hoover. Johnson personally has kept whatever remains anywhere of the fervor and conviction of the California progressive movement of 1910-1916. While he has usually worked and fought with the left wing of his party in Washington, his crowd in California have grown fat with years and success until no issue and no difference in temperament or philosophy separate them from old-guard Republicans.

San Francisco is the Smith stronghold and will probably give him a fair-sized majority. It would be a huge majority if the gang were not held in the Republican Party by that party's control of State and federal jobs. Dripping wet Irish Catholics—graduates of saloon and trades-union politics who belong by every test in the Smith camp—are unhappily serving on Hoover committees because they must keep control of the local Republican organization if they wish jobs for themselves and their friends.

All the newspapers in San Francisco and Los Angeles are for Hoover, the two in each city that circulate among Smith followers being owned one by Hearst and the other by Scripps-Howard, and hence getting their national policies, as they get their comic strips, by mail. Hearst's personal indorsement of Hoover probably carries no weight, but his cartoons and news columns do, for Californians are ignorant of the sound thrashing with which Smith closed Hearst's grotesque political career. Indeed outside of the villages Smith has only the three newspapers owned by C. K. McClatchy and his son Carlos—the Sacramento Bee, the Fresno Bee, and a paper at Modesto recently purchased. McClatchy is the choleric old-time owner-editor who demanded lamp-post justice for the I. W. W., imprisonment for Anita Whitney, and the election of La Follette in 1924. He is an admirable, cantankerous, unpredictable old hater, sadistically Puritan in lusting for the punishment of moral male-factors, violently opposed to prohibition, as angry about Hoover as he was about the Wobblies. I have not seen his newspapers, but Chester Rowell, a Hoover enthusiast, writes in his syndicated column that their intemperate abuse is helping the Republican candidate. In any case, they circulate only in the Sacramento and San Joaquin valleys, whereas the State's voting strength is concentrated around Los Angeles and San Francisco Bay.

Governor Smith's campaign is just beginning as this article is written. A Smith supporter who assigns any reason except the prohibition issue for his preference faces surprised challenge on every side and realizes that Al Smith has not "got over" at all at this distance from Albany. The Hearst-Republican effort to classify him as the usual cynical Tammany politician succeeds because that classification is confirmed by the bare facts of his career leading up to the governorship. What California does not comprehend is the simple old-fashioned "goodness" of the man and the humane intelligence that has won him the good-will of the most critical public-spirited groups in New York.

A foot-note should be added to chronicle the prevalence in California of a phenomenon that must be general in this campaign—the snobbishness encountered everywhere that chooses Hoover on two odious counts: one, that his wife would better grace the White House, and the other that Hoover's incumbency would add to the prestige of Americans traveling abroad. It is reason enough to vote for Smith.

Asquith Reveals War Secrets*

By WILLIAM MACDONALD

COMMENTING in his recently published "Memories and Reflections" upon the "debatable problem in the minor ethics of literature" of "the relations between what is called the professional or political diarist and the world of his actual or potential readers," the late Earl of Oxford and Asquith remarks, apropos of the "Greville Memoirs," that there seems to him to be "no occasion why, after a decent interval, such a journal should not, with all possible verification of details, be published with the same freedom and fullness as the correspondence of the dead." Asquith himself, save for a brief period, did not keep a diary, but he made extensive memoranda from day to day, and a good deal of what he recorded, all of it informing and some of it sarcastic or entertaining, may now be read.

At the moment when the war clouds of 1914 began to gather, the Irish question was absorbing the attention of the Asquith Government, and it continued to be a disturbing issue for some months after hostilities were well under way. On July 24, however, Sir Edward Grey laid before the Cabinet a statement which, according to Asquith, showed a European situation "about as bad as it possibly can be." With Austria, Serbia, Russia, Germany, and France actually or potentially involved, "we are within measurable distance of a real Armageddon." "The curious thing," he wrote two days later, "is that on many, if not most, of the points Austria has a good and Servia a very bad case, but the Austrians are quite the stupidest people in Europe. There is a brutality about their mode of procedure which will make most people think that this is a case of a big Power bullying a little one."

The main question, of course, was what to do about it. "It is one of the ironies of the case," he notes on July 29, "that we, being the only Power who has made so much as a constructive suggestion in the direction of peace, are blamed by both Russia and Germany for causing the outbreak of war." "The City, which is in a terrible state of depression and paralysis, is for the time being [July 30] all against English intervention." There was Belgian neutrality to consider, however, and "France, through Cambon, is pressing strongly for a reassuring declaration [July 31]." On August 1, when the news of the Russian order for mobilization arrived, Asquith called a taxi and drove to Buckingham Palace. "The King was hauled out of his bed, and one of my strangest experiences was sitting with him, clad in a dressing gown, while I read the message and the proposed answer."

The same August 1 saw the beginning of the Cabinet divergence which thereafter, with only short periods of harmony, ran its vexatious course. "Lloyd George, all for peace, is more sensible and statesmanlike for keeping the position still open. Grey declares that if an out-and-out and uncompromising policy of non-intervention at all costs is adopted he will go. Winston Churchill very bellicose and demanding immediate mobilization." The next day John Burns resigned, followed by John Morley and Sir John Simon, after Grey, in a speech in the House of Commons, had committed the Government to the war which had then begun.

* This article sets forth the political aspects of Asquith's "Memories and Reflections." The book is reviewed in this week's book supplement—EDITOR THE NATION.

On August 5 Asquith decided to give up the War Office portfolio and install Kitchener, who proved a tower of strength to his chief but a source of extreme annoyance to Sir John French, who fares rather badly in Asquith's memoranda, and to the bellicose Churchill. "It will be amusing," Asquith wrote, to see how Kitchener, who was not a politician, "gets on in the Cabinet." The dispatch of the Expeditionary Force, begun in profound secrecy, was ordered, but a discussion of plans for attacking Germany in Africa and China moved Asquith to remark to his colleagues that "we looked more like a gang of Elizabethan buccaneers than a meek collection of black-coated Liberal Ministers." By August 21 the center of interest had shifted to Turkey, and again Asquith found the varying views of his Cabinet amusing: "Winston violently anti-Turk; Kitchener strong that Rumania is the real pivot of the situation; Masterman eagerly pro-Bulgarian, but very much against any aggressive action vis-à-vis Turkey which would excite our Musselmans in India and Egypt; Lloyd George keen for Balkan confederation; Grey judicious and critical all round; Haldane instructive, and the 'Beagles' and 'Bob-tails' silent and bewildered."

The Continent, what with the Belgians and the French, jealousies and recriminations over questions of command and cooperation, and the speedy emergence of a demand that Italy and the Balkan States should be brought in on the Allied side, was as troublesome as Turkey. On October 3, with the Belgians reported as on the eve of abandoning Antwerp, "the intrepid Winston set off at midnight" to see what he could do. "I do not know," wrote Asquith while awaiting the result, "how fluent he is in French, but if he was able to do himself justice in a foreign tongue, the Belges will have listened to a discourse the like of which they have never heard before." The mission had some success, but an unexpected consequence was Churchill's plea to be allowed to command the Seventh Division which had been sent to the Belgians' aid. "Winston," Asquith notes, "is an ex-lieutenant of Hussars and would, if his proposal had been accepted, have been in command of two distinguished major-generals, not to mention brigadiers, colonels, etc., while the Navy were only contributing their little brigade." Kitchener, meantime, was fearful of a German invasion, and Lloyd George and Kitchener waged a "royal row" over recruiting in Wales.

The year's close found Asquith gloomy and perplexed. Sir Maurice Hankey wanted to "clear the Turk out of Europe," Churchill wanted to close the Baltic so that Russia might "land her troops within 90 miles of Berlin," and Delcassé was "extremely anxious to bring the Japanese into the European theatre." To this latter plan Japan was averse, and Asquith, who was "not very much enamoured of the idea," could not see "what inducement in the way of material gain could be offered them, except the certainty of retaining Kiauchau"; but Churchill "derides any scruples as born of perverted sentiment, and remarks with truth: 'The great thing is to win the war.'" On January 5 Lord Fisher, who proposed to shoot all the German prisoners in England by way of reprisal for the Zeppelin raids, abruptly resigned when Churchill "refused to embrace this statesmanlike suggestion." The one bright spot was a cable from Sir Cecil Spring Rice, British Ambassador at Washington, who reported on Christmas Day his conviction that "both the German and Austrian Ambassadors there are working for peace."

Asquith appears to have surrendered early to the idea of bringing in other Powers. Referring on January 7, 1915, to the question of a choice of theaters and objectives, he notes that "one must always keep in view the chances of bringing in Italy, Rumania, and such minor but not negligible quantities as Greece and Bulgaria." Two weeks later he wrote: "I have urged Grey to put the strongest possible pressure upon Rumania and Greece to come in without delay, and to promise that if they will form a real Balkan bloc we will send some of our troops to join them and save the situation." If Lloyd George could have had his way, he would have set out at the end of February for Russia and the Balkans "as a kind of extra ambassador and emissary," but Grey was "dead opposed." By March 6 Asquith thought the situation acute. Russia, apparently with the approval of France, had refused absolutely to allow the Greeks any share in "the Dardanelles business," while the Greeks, on their side, "wish to avoid committing themselves to fighting against anybody but the Turks and possibly the Bulgarians," will not "raise a finger" for Serbia, "and even want all the time to keep on not unfriendly terms with Germany and Austria." "Two most infernal problems" had arisen. Italy was probably "coming in," although Russia "strongly objects," and Russia also intended to take over Constantinople and the Straits.

A memorandum entry on March 25 shows Asquith opposed to Churchill's land-grabbing program. He had been discussing "the whole international situation" with Grey, and notes that "Winston is very anxious that if, when the war ends, Russia has got Constantinople, and Italy Dalmatia, and France Syria, we should be able to appropriate some equivalent share of the spoils—Mesopotamia with or without Alexandretta, a sphere in Persia, and some German colonies, etc. I believe that at the moment Grey and I are the only two men who doubt and distrust any such settlement. We both think that in the real interests of our own future the best thing would be if at the end of the war we could say that we had taken and gained nothing"—a statement somewhat suggestive of Wilson's "peace without victory." The reason, Asquith hastens to explain, is not merely moral or sentimental, but practical, as evidenced by the difficulties that would be met with in administering Mesopotamia. "The great thing for the moment," he goes on at once to set down, "is to bring in Italy." On March 29 Grey tells him that the Italians "are slightly contracting the orifice of their gullet and would now be content to neutralize the Dalmatian Coast from Spalato southwards, provided they can keep and fortify the outlying islands." On April 5 the Italians were "still holding out for their one and a half pounds of flesh, but I do not mean to give them up." The secret treaty of London, it will be recalled, was signed by Great Britain, France, Italy, and Russia on April 26, but there is no mention of the fact in Asquith's memoranda.

As far as his notes show, Asquith appears to have learned only on March 25 of Churchill's intrigue to turn Grey out of the Foreign Office and put in Balfour. Massingham brought the "horrible tale." Lloyd George, who had dropped in for "his favorite morning indulgence, ten minutes' discursive discussion on things in general," thought the story "substantially true" and expressed the opinion that Churchill "has, for the time being at any rate, allowed himself to be swallowed whole by A. J. B." "It is a pity," Asquith observes, "that Winston has not a better sense of proportion. I am really fond of him, but I regard his future with many misgivings. I do not think he will ever get to the top in English politics with all his wonderful gifts." On the other hand Lloyd George, whatever he may have thought of the intrigue, was "red-hot with a plan, or rather an idea, for nationalizing the drink trade. He has had a lot of brewers with him at and after breakfast and has already made an appointment with two skilled accountants to go into figures this afternoon." Asquith warned him that a state monopoly in drink would be "a most dangerous thing politically," but Lloyd George clung tenaciously to the idea, and it was not until past the middle of April that Asquith was able to record that "the Great Purchase Folly is as dead as Queen Anne," and that "we also cleared out of the way total prohibition."

On May 17, 1915, Asquith asked for the resignations of his Cabinet, and a Coalition Ministry was presently formed which continued until December, 1916, when it was broken up and Asquith himself retired. It cost him some pangs, in remaking his Cabinet, to drop Lord Haldane, who had been bitterly assailed by the press for his alleged German sympathies and whom Bonar Law and his associates insisted should be displaced as Lord Chancellor, and to transfer Churchill to a minor post and put Balfour in the Admiralty. The change, which Asquith declares "was to the knowledge of all concerned a hazardous experiment," worked better than was to be expected, although nothing short of the exigencies of war could preserve the semblance of harmony in such an ill-assorted political aggregation.

Asquith's contacts with the French evoke, in his memoranda and familiar correspondence, repeated sarcasm and depreciation, mixed with comment upon the manhandling of the French language by some of his colleagues. "I have never heard so much bad French spoken in my life," he wrote from Calais, on July 6, 1915, where he had conferred with Joffre, Millerand, Delcassé, Viviani, and others. "Not one of the French could speak a word of English. . . . Viviani is the cleverest, though he looks sleepy and rather commonplace." Later, in December, again at Calais, where Balfour spoke "in moderate but intelligible French," he succeeded, with Kitcheners's help, in persuading the French to agree to the abandonment of Salonika, although the next day they were "once more in full cry for its retention." The return passage across the Channel "on one of the foulest nights I have ever seen" wrecked Balfour's stomach. "I said to him when at last we reached Dover: 'Well, at any rate, we have not been mined or torpedoed.' To which he replied: 'I wish to God we had.'"

So went the holy cause behind the scenes. Asquith hated war and was deeply moved by its horrors. His criticism of military or naval plans and operations was often sound. Once the war was fully under way, however, he fell in with the procession, deplored the early apathy in England, and did his best to drag in as many of the Powers as possible on the Allied side. His first Cabinet was a bear-garden, and while he exerted himself with success to curb the wild schemes of Churchill and the fantastic ambitions of Lloyd George, he lacked the rude strength needed to knock heads together and compel order from discord. It would be idle to suggest that any one else might have done better, for the times themselves were out of joint, and the unbridled performances of politicians jarred harshly upon the temper of an old-school gentleman such as Asquith was, but one puts down the "Memories and Reflections" with a feeling that British statesmanship, as Asquith pictures it during the war period and as he himself illustrates it in the months of his greatest test, is not a thing to be remembered with regard.

In the Driftway

AT least once a day a man or even a woman in these degenerate days comes moaning to the Drifter. "The same old routine," they say, "every morning and every night. The same old desk, the same faces opposite, the same boss." If not of the monotony, they complain that they are slaves of a tyrant. "I can't ever do the sort of work I want. The boss wants only to make money. I'm an artist and I have to work for a man who thinks art is indecent." Thus they cry and wring their hands. And at the end of their plaint they point to the Drifter. "You're the lucky one," they say. "Nothing to do all day but poke around in odd corners for something a little out of the ordinary; and not so much out of the ordinary at that. I've even known you to write about the weather. If I could make my living that way, how happy I should be!"

* * * * *

THE Drifter does not reply when thus addressed. He refuses to tell whether he likes his job or not. But he sometimes thinks that if he does, he is unique in the world. He has wondered if a general reassortment of workers would bring happier results. Thus he hears of a certain publisher that he is a poet and a dreamer, that he "knows nothing about business." What if all the young, aspiring poets and dreamers could be his clerks and salesmen? Would they be a happy family, understanding each other's weakness and strength? Would they despise each other for the same futile ambitions? Cynics would say that the business would not be solvent long enough for either of these eventualities to happen. Yet poets have moved empires and built machines to advance the centuries. If all the hard-headed business men worked only for hard-headed bosses, what a dull world this would be!

* * * * *

THIS brings us to the highly moral if scarcely comforting doctrine that the world thrives on discontent. Long ago, when the Drifter was so young as to be a student in college, one of his more ambitious pieces of literary creation was looked on with disfavor because, in the words of its critic, "it lacked struggle." The Drifter thought this very humorous when it happened. But now that gray hairs are descending upon him he acknowledges that it is not without truth. Paradoxically enough, the wheels of the world turn because of the sand that is in them. If everybody loved his job and could find nothing to criticize in his superiors, half the joy would be taken out of life during office hours and considerably less work, the Drifter feels sure, would get done. Not a few tasks are completed to "show that old curmudgeon I'm not as big a fool as he thinks I am." And one way of escaping the deadly monotony of a pursuit is to invent new ways of doing it.

* * * * *

LIKE all rules, this one has its exception. The Drifter knows one person who actually loves his job, who begins early and quits late, not because he must but because he will. Nor does he put his daily work aside when the day is finished; he takes it home with him in the evening, it accompanies him while he dines, while he makes merry, and doubtless while he sleeps. It would be agreeable, for the sake of the Drifter's theory, to add that this contented one is on the point of being ignominiously dismissed. Exactly the contrary is the case! What the moral is the Drifter does not know. Being merely a Drifter, he does not have to find out.

Correspondence

Mr. Tilson Denies All

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: After waiting two weeks for a response to my request for the name of the anonymous writer who, in your issue of September 19, charged me with taking part in an alleged "whispering campaign," it seems that I am to be allowed the poor privilege of denying through your publication in some later issue something which everyone who knows me knew at the outset was false.

I still think that you should have furnished me with the name of the anonymous writer because any newspaper correspondent who will deliberately manufacture statements and charge them to another, as your correspondent did in this instance, is unworthy of the confidence of the public or of public men, and should be singled out so as to be shunned thereafter.

Likewise, your failure to have your correspondent indicate the source of the alleged information leaves a cloud upon the reputation of a score of the best newspaper men in the country, who are covertly charged by your anonymous correspondent with furnishing the foundation for his groundless accusation. If it should develop that even one of the twenty newspaper men who accompanied Mr. Hoover on his western trip was willing to stoop to falsehood in order to give point to an otherwise pointless article, his identity should be made known. I am sorry that the policy of your publication is such that you do not find it advisable to reveal the name or names of those who are ready to attack only in the dark.

At any rate, I thank you for the opportunity to say through the same medium carrying the original accusation that any charge to the effect that on the Hoover western trip, or at any other time or place, I sought to inject into the campaign a religious issue, or that I ever referred in any manner other than reverently to any church or to anyone's religious affiliations, is either maliciously or ignorantly false, for it is surely without the slightest foundation in fact.

New York, September 28

JOHN Q. TILSON

[We are very glad to have Mr. Tilson's assurance in the above letter. We must, however, point out that:

1. The delay in printing his letter has been due to unavoidable difficulty in communicating with our own and other correspondents who were on the train with Mr. Tilson and are still traveling in the West;

2. The anonymity of our correspondent must be upheld because our agreement with him compels it; the custom of anonymous writing from Washington is directly due to the fact that otherwise correspondents who have other newspaper affiliations are subject to pressure and attacks from those whom they criticize, even to the extent of having their positions jeopardized;

3. Our correspondent, in whose integrity we have fullest confidence, still believes that he heard Mr. Tilson make the remarks attributed to him. In view of Mr. Tilson's emphatic denial we can only attribute the incident to a misunderstanding of words in a crowd. Neither our correspondent nor The Nation has the slightest desire to do else than justice to Mr. Tilson.—

Catholic Bigotry Too

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Perhaps you do not make enough allowance for anti-Catholic bigotry. Is it not in many cases more or less of a reaction to Catholic bigotry? Are we Catholics not largely to blame ourselves?

You will guess that I have something on my mind . . . some grievance . . . and I have. Three years ago I left the Jesuit order, but not the Church. Last year I published a book, "The Jesuit Enigma," which criticized the Jesuits severely but was in no sense an attack upon my Church. But for publishing that book I have been vetoed as a lecturer on psychology by the New York Board of Education, although I had previously been acceptable. In effect this means that W. J. O'Shea and J. M. Sheahan, both of course Catholics, exercise their control over New York City public money with an eye to the religious behavior of city employees. Is not this a case of benighted bigotry on the part of Catholic officials? I told Father F. P. Duffy about it and he described it as "medieval bigotry"! Why should not a non-Catholic expect that there would be much more of that sort of thing if Al Smith were elected?

Too Dense

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: On the first page of your current issue the statement is made that "Porto Rico's territory is more densely populated than any other portion of the Western Hemisphere."

You give the population of Porto Rico as 378 to the square mile. If this is correct, it may interest your readers to know that there are several territories in the Western Hemisphere which are much more densely populated than Porto Rico. Bermuda has over 1,400 to the square mile, Barbados about 1,000 and Carriacou more than 500.

Editor's Troubles

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: No man that can indorse a Catholic for office can edit a paper for me. I must part with The Nation.

Peach, Texas, September 5

J. N. DAVIS

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Drop my name from your list. The article about Hoover and the Whispering Campaign is enough to disgust any fair-minded person.

St. Louis, September 25

HATTIE GOODING

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Mrs. G. T. Packard's subscription will not be continued. She agreed with Mr. Villard in his article in the November 30th issue of The Nation upon the undesirability of a presidential possibility who drank too much for his own good. There is nothing left but to part company.

Philadelphia, Pa., September 16

MRS. G. T. PACKARD

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I read and re-read your editorial "Should Liberals Vote for Smith?" in The Nation for September 26, to find cogent reason for your attitude. How can a truly liberal paper fail to indorse the candidate of the Socialist Party, the only party that has for its chief aim the creation of a new economic order based on production for use instead of for profit?

The Filipino's Land

By ANDRES V. CASTILLO

THE Philippines are essentially an agricultural country and for a number of decades to come the main reliance of the people will be on the products of the soil. A program of economic exploitation must face the problems of agriculture, and with the problems of agriculture is closely intertwined the question of land ownership. Who shall own the land and who shall cultivate it? Is small-land proprietorship compatible with economic progress in the Philippines? Is large-scale farming better for the country than the present system? These are some of the questions that must be answered.

Governor General Stimson has shown solicitude to effect a rapid economic exploitation of the Philippines. Through his initiative investigations of various aspects of the economic life of the people have been undertaken. Lyman P. Hammond spent nearly three months investigating the economic conditions of the Islands. Another investigation on the financial condition of the country, with special reference to banking, is being carried on by a New York economist. The result of the Hammond investigation points to the need of large capital and a kind of cooperation known as big business. That capital, American capital, is needed to carry on a vast economic program has been conceded by Americans as well as Filipinos. The reasons why American capital has not come to the Philippines as it should have never been made clear. Various reasons have been advanced, the most important the unsettled political status of the Islands and the fact that the land and corporation laws do not permit the entry of American capital as in Hawaii, Cuba, Porto Rico, and various countries of Central and South America.

The economic program of Governor Stimson calls for a revision of these laws so as to permit the coming of capital on a large scale. It has been said that these laws are antiquated and America has long abandoned the legislation upon which the Philippine acts were patterned. In other words, American capital would come to the Islands only with big land grants—beyond what the present laws permit. Mr. Stimson says in his message that "what capital demands and what it has a right to expect is safety of investment and the certainty of fair treatment under the law of the country where the investment is made." He recommends "a wise and conservative revision of the land laws, as well as of all the laws under which capital comes in contact with government," so as to insure the capitalists that the enterprise in which they invest their money will be fairly, justly, and equitably treated by the officials.

To discover the merits of such a plan let us go back to a segment of Philippine history. During the Spanish administration the Philippines, like all the Spanish colonies in America, was divided into encomiendas under the charge of an encomendero. These large tracts of land, usually the most fertile part of the country, were the counterpart and survivals of the manorial system in England. The feudal system with all its pristine tyrannies did not spare the Philippines. The friars owned large agricultural areas with all the privileges and immunities from taxation accorded to church property. The question of the friar lands, which amounted to 400,000 acres, was one of the main causes of civil disturbances during the Spanish regime. The Americans came in 1898, and with their idealism and altruism these abuses were corrected. Mr. Taft issued the now famous dictum "The Philippines for the Filipinos." Congress embodied that pronouncement in its act of 1902. This act, among other things, provided for the transfer to the Philippine Government of all property and other rights in the Philippines acquired by the United States from the kingdom of Spain through the Treaty of Paris. Section 15 of this act authorized the granting or sale of public agricultural lands by the Philippine Government in amounts of not more than 16 hectares (40 acres) to a person or 1,024 hectares (2,530 acres) to a corporation. Sales were to be conditioned on occupancy, improvement, or cultivation of the land. The Jones Law of 1916 amended Section 15 of the act of 1902 by increasing the allotment to an individual from 16 hectares to 24 hectares (54 acres). In the case of a corporation the allotment is the same.

The present land law of the Philippines is very liberal indeed. Any citizen of lawful age of the Philippine Islands, or of the United States, and any corporation or association of which at least 61 per cent of the capital stock, or of any interest in said capital stock, belongs wholly to citizens of the Philippines or of the United States may purchase a tract of public land not to exceed 247 acres in the case of an individual and 2,530 in the case of a corporation. Public lands may also be leased, 2,530 acres in both cases. Leases last for twenty-five years and can be renewed for another twenty-five years. If improvements have been accomplished to the satisfaction of the Secretary of Agriculture and Natural Resources, another twenty-five years can be granted. The rental of leased land is 3 per cent of the appraised valuation, subject to appraisal every ten years from the date of the approval of the contract. Lands sold are appraised by the Director of Lands with the approval of the Secretary of Agriculture and Natural Resources. The appraised value is to be at least equal to the expense incurred by the government. Citizens of foreign countries may buy land not in excess of 247 acres with the express authorization of the Legislature.

It has been argued that under the present land law rubber, sugar, and other products exported to foreign countries cannot be produced at a profit because of the limited acreage allowed by the law, and there has been an agitation on the part of big business to make the Filipinos change existing legislation so as to give a chance to big corporations to come in and exploit the natural resources. In the light of the testimony of persons engaged in the rubber industry in the Philippines, such a demand is unjustified. Dr. James W. Strong, vice-president and general manager of the American Rubber Company of Mindanao, writing in the American Chamber of Commerce Journal of June, 1926, makes this interesting observation:

There is no reason why America cannot grow her own rubber in the Philippine Islands under present conditions. The present land law permits the buying of 2,500 acres and the leasing of an equal amount. This area is a good economic unit. Were it permissible to hold larger areas, they would certainly be split up into smaller sizes for advantageous management. Why not start it off in this way?

PROPHETS TRUE AND FALSE

By OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

A book of timely portraits, as daring and lively as they are pertinent to this presidential year. Hoover, the "Supersalesman," is there, and Al Smith, "Governor Extraordinary," and all the other figures of the year's political drama. Mr. Villard's book is confidently recommended to all who wish to meet some politicians without their masks. $3.50

Some Comments from the Press

Mr. Villard is one of the finest analytical writers on politics now alive.

All are like portraits drawn from the life with exact knowledge and from a personal experience of public life almost unrivalled among present-day journalists.

Manchester Guardian.

It matters not whether or no you find yourself in agreement with Mr. Villard, for he is stimulating even when most antagonistic.

Los Angeles (Cal.) Times.

Each of these sketches is concise, colorful and trenchant. From every standpoint they are models of biographical study.

Buffalo (N. Y.) Times.

. . . these portraits are singularly illuminating. They are shrewd, discerning, informed, and extremely well written. They are indeed a refreshing contrast to the mountains of twaddle usually written about the figures in American life.

New York Sun.

So thorough is his knowledge of the men and events he discusses that a reading of this volume is almost like reading a political history of the past two decades.

Norfolk (Va.) Virginia Pilot.

More than being merely one of the most brilliant journalists we have today, Oswald Garrison Villard is an unusually shrewd observer of human nature. It may be that the latter qualification is essential to the former; whatever the case may be, he possesses both, a fact to which the candidly drawn word portraits in "Prophets True and False" attest.

One comes away from "Prophets True and False" with an enhanced respect for its author and a wealth of provocative information.

New York Herald Tribune.

It is high praise to say it, but I do not see how a serious student of personalities and policies in present-day American public life can afford to neglect reading this most important and readable book.

Birmingham (Ala.) Age.

Mr. Villard is shy of rhetoric, but he knows very well how to write. He gets his effects simply, but with the quiet assurance of an old journalist. Few men of his time have known American politics and politicians better than he, and none has dealt with them in a more illuminating manner. He is not impartial, thank God!

An American sugar planter, Francis J. Cooper, writing in this same publication in February, 1928, claims that sugar cane could be grown profitably on a plantation the size of which is a little over 100 hectares (225 acres). The report of the committee authorized by Congress to investigate rubber growing in the Philippines entitled "Possibilities for Para Rubber Production in the Philippines" reads in part:

The present land laws, designed to retain a diffused land ownership, do not lend themselves to large corporations in rubber lands. Nevertheless, moderate-size plantations are possible with foreign capital and, moreover, the small native planter might become a producer of important further supplies.

The Governor General draws largely from the experiences of America for methods to attain a more rapid economic development of the Islands. He wants to introduce large-scale production controlled by big business to carry out his economic program. Economic development by way of big business, now in vogue in America, would not necessarily succeed in the Philippines or elsewhere. What is the hurry in the exploitation of the natural resources of the Islands? A sudden change in the economic life of the people not followed by a corresponding change in their habits, manners, and customs will prove disastrous.

The land laws of the Philippines today afford equal treatment to Filipinos and Americans; they give equal opportunity to all and special privileges to none. What the Governor General wants is a piece of legislation protecting big capital, which means the doom of the average and individual business man. In other words, he means to say just what the Republican Administration in the United States has said, that the government should take care of those at the top and they will take care of the rest. "Profitless prosperity," charged against the present Administration in America, as shown by the prosperity of the big corporations and the decay of the average business man, would arrive in the Philippines. The Governor General is working toward exacting the same terms as the United States got in Liberia—a monopoly of the agricultural and financial opportunities of the country. Mr. Firestone asked the Filipinos three years ago for big land grants for rubber production, but the Philippine Government refused to pass the necessary legislation.

A program of vast economic development brings with it the problem of labor. How would the Filipino laborers fare in this economic system? Philippine labor would have to face foreign competition. Right at the door are the hungry and unemployed millions of China seeking employment. The exclusion act also applies to the Philippines, but it is also a fact that the Chinese continue to come to the Philippines through Borneo and other back doors in spite of the law. The cheap labor afforded by the Chinese would prove to be a strong temptation to American capitalists whose profits would necessarily depend upon cost of production, the most important item of which is cost of labor.

The land laws of the Philippines are designed to encourage and preserve the small farmer, the ordinary people, the backbone of the nation. The spirit behind the laws is to build a nation of small landowners, which is fast being realized, and to eliminate the absentee landlord. We need not scan the pages of industrial history long to find the abuses of the plantation system. Conditions in Hawaii, Cuba, Porto Rico, and some countries of Central and South America should not be overlooked. These countries are economically exploited to the highest degree, but what is the economic, political, and social status of the native inhabitants? They simply labor for the foreigner's profit, work for another man's gain.

Supporting AL SMITH

TO realize the good that is in him, what Governor Smith needs is not warm sympathy, but immediate and effective support—in other words, lots of votes. If he is not elected, progressives, in so far as they are responsible for his failure, will have proved blind and false to the one man who at this moment is capable of putting an end to the post-war stagnation of political opinion and to issue new marching orders to American Government.”

—from a recent editorial

THE NEW REPUBLIC is singularly fitted to interpret Al Smith to the progressives. As a candidate he embodies the spirit and act of that political intelligence the magazine exists to foster. In the short time remaining the paper will attempt a full and faithful presentation of what appear to be his rightful claims to progressive allegiance.

SUSAN B. ANTHONY

By RHETA CHILDE DORR

Author of "A Woman of Fifty"

Every woman who goes to college or holds a good job, every woman lawyer, doctor, professor, scientist, every woman released from an intolerable marriage bond; every mother with power to protect her children; every woman who votes, owes it in large part to Susan B. Anthony, who at the age of 33, an obscure school teacher, swore to change the mind of the ruling class of men as to the barbarous position of woman.

From all over the city—from Sutton Place and Canarsie, from Harlem and Kips Bay—they come to our workshop, drawn by the lure of something different, something better—furniture in the modern idiom, furniture that sings of to-morrow in subtle harmonies of curve and flow, in counter-point of plane and angle—the furniture of a new day, beautiful with a new beauty—and surprisingly low in its cost.

The DEBUNKER: 1 Year for $1!

*** Look up that Page advertisement in last week's NATION which told about the special offer to NATION readers of one entire year of THE DEBUNKER (12 issues) for a dollar bill. No doubt you mean to take advantage of it. You can still enter your subscription at this bargain rate—the offer ends Nov. 10, 1928. For $1 you get 12 magazines, 128 pages each, 20-25 articles each issue.

*** As a magazine, THE DEBUNKER lives up to its name. Shafts of criticism and humor are aimed at all forms of sham, hokum, and hypocrisy. Frauds and fakes are exposed. Facts are given fearlessly, the truth is faced squarely, no matter what the subject—politics, religion, education, medicine, business, literature, amusement, society, all are treated with the same debunking impartiality. THE DEBUNKER sturdily and sincerely presents one side of every question—the side opposed to bunk!

*** Read, in the September DEBUNKER, such candid articles as "Cod, Beanpot, and Boot: A Boston Farce," "Why Do Some People Resist Disease Better Than Others?" "The Holy Ghost in Arkansas," "Monkey Gland Bunk," "The Drums of Hollywood," "Southern Hospitality," etc.—with Clarence Darrow's characteristic "Why Was God So Hard on Women and Snakes?" (128 pages; 22 articles.)

And you get 10 issues besides these for $1 until Nov. 10, 1928!

The Literary Critic as Expert<sup>1</sup>

By MORRIS L. ERNST and WILLIAM SEAGLE

WHENEVER a book believed by most sane men to be an honest work of art is suddenly suppressed as "indecent" under our obscenity laws, many men of letters can be heard to say that the fiasco might have been avoided if the determination of such matters were left to qualified literary opinion. The literary critic as expert has been urged during the Boston book massacres as he was in the days when "The 'Genius'" and "Jurgen" came under the ban. It has been observed that it is impossible to imagine the suppression of these books by men of letters. The judicial tests of obscenity may be poor, but it is asked if part of their inadequacy does not lie in the very fact that they are judicial. Judge and jury are not fit to pass upon an author's work, but critics are equipped to make delicate distinctions. Standards of literary criticism should not be intrusted to amateurs. A writer is not judged by a jury of his peers when he is judged by an ordinary petit jury. Thus the argument runs.

In so far as the appeal to the literary critic involves the alternative of censorship in advance by a Committee of Authors and Publishers (whether such a censorship is voluntary or compulsory) his exclusion under the present system, it will be agreed, is much to be preferred. But how if the critic is not to act as censor but is simply to be called as an expert witness in a subsequent criminal obscenity trial, and asked his opinion of the challenged book as a work of literature? The obscenity laws are to remain, but prosecutions under them are to be ameliorated by the presence of the literary critic to guide the judge and jury. At first glance, the critic as literary expert appears to have a great deal to recommend him. It seems absurd that a work of literary art should be judged not by literary standards but by the rules of the criminal law which for the most part exclude them. Nevertheless, the compromise presented is an impossible one. The difficulties are both practical and theoretical, leading to numerous inconsistencies of position. There are to be considered the limitations of aesthetics, the limitations of individual critics, and the limitations of the legal system.

When the critic is called to the stand and declares that a book is "obscene" or not "obscene," he must be presumed to base his conclusion upon some standards. A doctor taking the stand as an expert can be examined as to the symptoms of a disease he has diagnosed in a patient. If the critic is to act as expert, he must be prepared to make similar explanations. Naturally, he will rely upon the canons of aesthetics, and will ask: "Is the book art?" Certainly, if aesthetics were a science, it should be able to limit the boundaries of the obscene. Its definition is of such vital moment to literature that one might have expected Anglo-Saxon critics especially to have devoted themselves to formulating a solution to the problem in terms of a system of aesthetics. But it is only necessary to recall the theory of art for art's sake as the leading contribution. The trouble lies in the fact that aesthetics is only a pseudo-science. Many a critical utterance as to the nature of "art" is highly ingenious but not very illuminating. A judge may have his shortcomings, but generally speaking he is far less generous in his dispensation of words than men of letters are. Except when moral fervor has interfered, the canons of construction have usually been kept more rigorous than the canons of aesthetics. All aesthetic speculation leads into mysticism. A great deal of it is charming and upon emotional levels affords satisfactions that are doubtless indispensable. The question is simply its authority for juristic purposes.

At once the first sacrifice of consistency is perceived. Most of the criticism of the obscenity laws has come from rebellious men of letters. They are the ones who are constantly saying that the standards of the obscenity laws are "subjective." They never tire of asserting that there is no uniform sense of the "obscene" and are always asking (of course, rhetorically) if it is so easy to recognize "the moral sense." Having delivered themselves of very scathing remarks concerning the "Comstocks" and the "Sumners" at their corner speakeasies, the critics depart for their studies and begin to explain to their publics the nature of "art," the conditions of "significant form," and the way to recognize immediately "the aesthetic sense."

But it must be obvious that art, too, is highly "subjective." For any number of judges who have defined "lewd" as "lustful," there are any number of critics who have defined "art" as the possession of "the aesthetic sense." But "the aesthetic sense" is no clearer than "the moral sense," and the test of "art" is as indeterminate as a working principle as is the test of "morals." The test of art is simply a highly organized complex composed of the difficult and far from exact tests of sincerity, truth, and intention. The appeal is simply from one mystery to another. One has only to consider the well-known remark of George Meredith that if a novel "is deeply conceived, it cannot be immoral." One has only to read some modern essays on the aesthetics of the obscene to discover that the greatest variety of attitude exists among critics as well as judges. A great deal naturally will depend upon a critic's position in the different aesthetic camps. Aesthetics, it is true, once offered some semblance of finality when few dared to dispute Aristotle's doctrine of katharsis. But literary authoritarianism is past and impressionism is the prevailing mood of modern criticism.

True, at times there have not been wanting critics who could infallibly recognize the obscene. "For the moral tendency of books," once observed John Ruskin, "no such practical sagacity is needed to determine that. The sense to a healthy mind of being strengthened or enervated by reading is just as definite and unmistakable as the sense to a healthy body of being in fresh or foul air." Again, John Erskine has remarked: "Well, if it is obscenity we war against, by all means root it out, for it can be recognized at a glance." But each of these instances of critical dogmatism has its special irony. Whistler's suit for libel against Ruskin for calling one of his nocturnes "a pot of paint flung in the public face" may well stand as a general warning against debating art in the law courts. Some time after Mr. Erskine declared that obscenity could be recognized at a glance, he published "The Private Life of Helen of Troy" only to have it denounced by Rabbi Wise in a public sermon as "moral filth" and "corruption."

The history of literary criticism is full of confusion upon the subject of literary decency. Thackeray, who deplored the loss of the freedom of the days of Fielding, nevertheless excluded Elizabeth Barrett Browning's poem Lord Walter's Wife from the Cornhill Magazine. Robert Buchanan, who attacked Rossetti so savagely, was one of the warmest defenders of Walt Whitman. Swinburne, whose "Poems and Ballads" shocked England in his time, was himself shocked by Shakespeare's "Venus and Adonis," but on the other hand defended the language of Aristophanes. Emerson asked of Shakespeare: "What maiden has not found him finer than her delicacy?" But Coleridge observed: "Decency is a gift of reason and morals, as indecency is rooted in nature and passion. Shakespeare's words are too indecent to be translated."

The enthusiasm for the literary critic is predicated fundamentally upon the erroneous assumption that all critics are "good" critics. From this point of view a "good" critic presumably is one who is less sensitive to morality than to art. It is a common delusion derived from such object lessons as Marlowe, Villon, and Wilde to regard writers as a class as immoral. There is as little reason to look upon them as Olympians free from the prejudices of their times. The Victorian critics exhibited the same nausea as the middle class over what one of them called "the Ptolemaic system of sex." Charles Lamb held Fletcher's "The Faithful Shepherdess" to be "unfit for boys and virgins." Robert Hall found the moral tales of Maria Edgeworth debasing. Henry James accused Maupassant of picturing "a world where every man is a cad and every woman a harlot." Wendell Phillips remarked upon looking into "Leaves of Grass": "Here be all sorts of leaves except fig-leaves." The whole period in this country was perhaps best summed up in William Dean Howells's matter-of-fact observation: "Generally speaking, people now call a spade an agricultural implement."

If it is true that modern men of letters are on the whole freer from the preoccupations of decency, it must be remembered that members of the old guard still live to uphold Victorian standards. There is a group of writers which is almost regularly quoted in the literature of the New York Society for the Suppression of Vice and of the Clean Books League: they are such erstwhile rebels as Hamlin Garland, Irving Bacheller, and Edwin Markham. Many authors refused to sign the protest against the suppression of "The 'Genius'" even as in 1923 others refused to join in the protest against the suppression of "Jungen." Professor Linn of the University of Chicago went so far as to call Cabell "a prosperous and affected pseudo-litterateur." His self-righteousness was equaled only recently when Professor Bliss Perry, speaking at a dinner of the Watch and Ward Society, referred to George Moore as "a satyr in his seventieth year."

There still remains the intelligent and liberal critic who can perhaps be trusted. When he understands, however, the only manner in which he can function as an "expert,"

he will not be very eager for a call. The limitations of the legal system interpose. As at present constituted it is unfortunately not adapted in any way to the adjudications of problems of literary art. The bewilderment of critics at present when they are called to testify in plagiarism suits should serve as ample warning. In a criminal obscenity trial a great many more ludicrous turns may be expected when the critic presumes to take the stand as expert. A light-minded public prosecutor might make a great deal of the preliminary examination of the critic's qualification for "expertness." A doctor's, an engineer's expertness is easily established. But the state does not yet license poets, novelists, or literary critics. What will constitute an "expert" in literary criticism? Will it be inclusion in "Who's Who" as an author? Will the proffered critic have to be a member of the Authors' Club? We may yet hear a public prosecutor thunder in Part I, or VI, or XIV of the criminal courts as jurors and bailiffs listen agape:

"Do you mean to say you believe in art for art's sake?"

"What do you mean by 'art'?"

"Have you ever reviewed a book of the prisoner either favorably or unfavorably?"

As the critic will have to act as expert in the present criminal courts, he will be bound by its rules of evidence and procedure. These fairly require that if the indicted author or publisher is permitted to call literary critics to testify, the public prosecutor also be allowed the privilege. At once the literary critic as expert proves to be such a boomerang that one wonders why all the forces of morality have not hitherto united to welcome him with open arms. When the secretary of a vice society is put upon the stand, a decent-minded jury can be often made to feel that he is a literary spy and informer who is trying to make trouble for a reputable publisher. The cross-examination reveals the unpleasant tactics of vice-hunting. But with the literary critic as expert the defense would be in a much more difficult position. After it had called its radical critics, the prosecution would begin to call its conservative critics, and there might appear upon the scene Professor Bliss Perry or Professor Linn to say that the challenged book was very bad art and detrimental to morals. The effect upon the jury can well be imagined. If professors of literature in our higher institutions of learning denounced a book, it must obviously be criminally obscene. The verdict will be guilty.

Of course, the conservative critic might not necessarily think that the book should be suppressed. But again the rules of evidence would hamper him. The way the book should be treated would be a conclusion of law for the court and jury. When a psychiatrist is on the stand upon an issue of insanity in a murder trial he is allowed to say that he thinks the prisoner sane or insane, but it is beyond his province for him to add that he should or should not be hanged. Similarly the critic would not be able to state his whole position. The critic who thought a book bad art would be in a deplorable situation indeed. If he valued literature above the obligations of his oath he would simply have to lie. For instance, would Mr. Heywood Brown, who said in reviewing "Jungen" that "In the hands of Cabell the joke becomes a bar-room story refurbished for the boudoir," say the same thing upon the stand?

It is unnecessary to repeat all the general objections to trial by expert in the law courts—the modern equivalent of wager of law and wager of battle. It is significant that the testimony of literary critics is also excluded in France and Germany, which have been more tolerant. The judge as literary critic certainly leaves much to be desired. But the confusion would only be increased when men of letters trooped before the criminal bar to save one of their number from the fell clutches of the law. It is undoubtedly desirable that judges and juries should proceed in as civilized a manner as possible, but it is better that they get their aesthetic appreciations elsewhere than in court. The fundamental incompatibility of the artist's and moralist's positions makes it idle to attempt any reconciliation. The assumption of the obscenity laws is that it is morality that is endangered, and if this is true, then it is obviously no answer that the ends of art are being served. The point is not that a book be judged by this standard or that but that it be not judged at all. It is only when the need for censorship is admitted that there can be any question of the literary critic as expert. His admission may spell an enlightened Puritanism but it is Puritanism none the less. The issue must be squarely fought until the case of either the moralist or the artist is invalidated.

Remembering Vaughan in New England

By GENEVIEVE TAGGARD

I saw reality the other night
By New England moon-light.

All of my life, living had been
One, or another, kind of dream.

Now nothing festooned itself between
Me and the substance of moon-beam.

The land is honest, small, and swept Bare as a barn-yard floor

In winter. And no third thing crept
As it had, times before.

No feeling its mist to intervene;
No inner thought to warp,

I stood: And behold, the trees were lean,
And lo, the hills were sharp.

Moon's no ephemeral faint stuff,
First seen, painted upon

Windows and walls—it is yellow as dawn,
After dream, it is marvelous rough,

Coarse as hoar-frost—texture no dream
Can invent.

Cut my vague dreams away!

Moon in New England, O pure moon-beam,
Let it be day.

The Nihilism of Remy De Gourmont

By JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

IN 1921 Harcourt, Brace and Company published under the title "Decadence" one volume of selections from the work of Remy de Gourmont. About that time he was enjoying a considerable though somewhat esoteric vogue in America and his name was being invoked by the more "advanced" writers and readers in an awesome way not unlike that in which the name of Paul Valéry has been more recently cited. Since that time several of de Gourmont's books have been issued here in what appeared to be a rather random and aimless fashion, but his cult seems to have dissolved and to have illustrated by the rapidity of its dissolution the fact that the tastes of the intellectual are not always very much less changeable than those of the vulgar.

Now Richard Aldington has prepared two large volumes* which illustrate the whole range of de Gourmont's work and which afford to the reader ignorant of French his first opportunity to form anything like a just estimate of the work of one of the most distinguished critics of our time. The skill of Mr. Aldington's excellent translation is shown especially by his success in the difficult task of preserving the sharpness and the force of various detached pensées, and to gain or to renew an acquaintance with the critical and philosophical side of de Gourmont's genius through these pages is to be convinced that the indifference with which he is now generally regarded in America can hardly be due to any absolute defects in his work.

Certainly he deserves a place alongside of Anatole France in the great line of French skeptics, for if he lacked France's felicitous facility, and produced nothing so brilliantly easy as the latter's most popular tales, he had a far wider intellectual curiosity and a more strictly original genius. The two men were alike in cultivating doubt until their skepticism was Pyrrhonicly absolute and in professing the most uncompromising Epicurianism in the realm of ethics, but de Gourmont was less often content than was his more popular contemporary merely to ring stylistic changes upon the commonplaces of his sect. France, indeed, seldom wandered far from his few simple themes. He regarded with complete indifference all the fields of human knowledge which have been opened up since the Renaissance and he stated his eternal problems in terms hardly different from those which Lucian employed. De Gourmont was, on the other hand, for all his professed love of paganism, as completely modern as Anatole France was timidly pseudo-classical. Since nothing which could be made the subject of analysis was indifferent to him, he went to science in search of the new weapons which science had forged for the use of the skeptic but which France never attempted to wield, and with them he attacked the faiths of the modern world in the very terms in which those faiths were stated. His central contention that there is no Truth as distinguished from the Truths which various men have variously held was the same as that of France or of any other absolute skeptic, but the route by which he reached it was different and so also is the whole intellectual background against which his mind worked. Unlike France he made full use of the fact that Darwinism gave the satirist's trick of identifying human with animal traits an apparent cogency which it never had before, and when, for example, he dismissed the attempt to presuppose a meaning to existence by asserting that life has no purpose except its own preservation, he was drawing, not upon the speculations of an ancient philosopher, but upon the argument which Schopenhauer documented with facts drawn from the data upon which the theory of natural selection was based.

The difference in temperaments was, moreover, no less marked than the difference between the fields of study which the two men chose. For France, the exquisite voluptuary, intellectual pessimism was the key which made accessible various delicate delights for mind and body. He could cultivate pleasure as the pagans cultivated it and he could achieve something of their lightness of heart. To de Gourmont, on the other hand (as to most nineteenth-century pessimists), loss of faith in any ultimate meaning of existence brought with it a certain depression of animal spirits and made of him a recluse. It would seem, indeed, that while the a priori skepticism of ancient times was joyous, the documented doubt of naturalism is almost inevitably dreary, and de Gourmont, for all his reiterated assertion that the sense of freedom which a profession of nihilism brings is the most precious thing which man can achieve, felt to the full this dreariness of the natural world. "I think," he said, "that we should never hesitate to bring science into literature or literature into science; the age of fine ignorance is gone." And yet the result of his determination to be rational and informed about everything was to destroy the meaning of the very conceptions in which he was most interested. Plagued by the conviction that man is, even at his best, only a rather complicated animal he could, for instance, write:

Beauty is so certainly sexual that the only undisputed works of art are those which show the human body in its nudity. By its perseverance in remaining purely sexual, Greek sculpture placed itself for all eternity above dispute. It is beautiful because it is a beautiful human body, like that with which every man or every woman would wish to unite to perpetuate themselves according to their race.

And yet he got only a bitter satisfaction out of so absolute a statement, for naturalism, which begins by seeming only an invitation to eat, drink, and be merry, ends by depriving the guest of his appetite. Having committed himself to the exclusive cultivation of rationality, reason itself convinced him that the pleasure which it recognized as the only good was not to be had through the reason and thus he was brought face to face with a dilemma which he never solved: "Man is an animal who has the privilege of watching himself act; and the older he is in civilization, the more cultivated he is, the more delight he takes in watching himself." But "consciousness contaminates the will," and it is the will, not the consciousness, which leads one to do things worth the watching.

Probably no one touched nineteenth-century thought at more of its crucial points than de Gourmont did, and probably no one furnishes a better epitome of its tendency. The name—"dissociation"—which he gave to the object of his favorite intellectual process might, indeed, be used not inappropriately to describe the whole effect of scientific rationalism so far as general social, moral, and aesthetic ideas are concerned. He loved to cut through a whole complex of ethical conviction with a single stroke by remarking, for example, that the major part of the current conception of sexual morality was based upon a merely arbitrary association of the idea of "pleasure" with the idea of "procreation," or through a whole complex of social enthusiasms by pointing out that "political liberty" was generally celebrated by people who associated it quite unjustifiably with "individual freedom." And when he did so he was merely reducing to a formula the most characteristic process of nineteenth-century thought, since, to choose two simple illustrations, the whole task of Nietzsche was to dissociate the idea of "virtue" from the idea of "self-negation" and the whole task of Ibsen to dissociate the idea of "rectitude" from the idea of "respectability."

It is true that when he attempted to assert rather than to deny de Gourmont himself had to depend upon associations no less arbitrary than those which he attacked in others. Distrusting socialism he was capable, for example, of ridiculing a specific proposal of some radical platform of his day ("Suppression of bounties for capability") by assuming that it implied the untenable proposition "one man is as good as another," and he did not stop to consider that his argument was based upon a by no means inevitable association between the idea of "capacity or virtue" and the idea of "reward or recompense," which he accepted but which his opponents did not. To say this is, however, merely to say that no conviction is possible except upon the basis of some preliminary associations without which every fact and every idea is separate from every other and no thought concerning them possible. It was indeed toward such a completely fragmentary mental world in which no fact had any relation to any other fact and no conclusion could be drawn from any premise that de Gourmont was headed, and with him were going all those who had learned from him, from Nietzsche, or from others the technique by means of which all tablets may be broken.

Doubtless it is the very fact that de Gourmont so adequately represents the tendencies of his time which is responsible for the lack of interest in his work manifested by the present generation. To say that he was, for a brief period, regarded with a superstitious awe like that now accorded in some quarters to Paul Valéry is to suggest how unfashionable his particular kind of thought must have become, since the new watchword "synthesis" is the exact opposite of that "analysis" which de Gourmont sought everywhere to effect. His enthusiasm for doubt and freedom and his hatred of "standards" and absolutes no less than his contempt for "pure" metaphysics and his determination to reduce all aesthetics and all morality to psychological and physiological principles, stand at every point in opposition to the aims and principles of those contemporary intellectuals who are endeavoring to erect structures to replace those which he tore down. In truth one could hardly go much further in his direction. Even skepticism must be supplied with beliefs to dissolve and even the Nihilist must be supplied with affirmations to be denied. Nor is it likely that there will ever be a permanent lack of either. New faiths will be generated, new associations made, and new tablets written. The very fact that his weapons are capable of destroying at least many of them is good reason why no strenuous efforts will be made to keep those weapons from being forgotten.

The Future of the Movies

By ALEXANDER BAKSHY

THE movies of today are a vast industry supplying the nations of the world with a standardized, machine-made entertainment. The standards are those demanded by the world market which the industry serves. Consequently they are inevitably determined by the lowest common denominator of the movie-consuming intelligence of the moment. It is said that the American "hick" is the arbiter of taste who dictates the fashions of Hollywood, because today his appreciation of a picture spells its success or failure. The time does not seem to be far off when this proud position will be held, probably, by the humble Kaffir or Hottentot of the movie-civilized kraals of Africa, whose intellectual and moral reactions to the unhappy ending, for instance, will then be carefully studied, with the help of charts and diagrams, in the selling and producing offices of Hollywood.

On the other hand, even if the future Napoleons and Genghis-Khans of Hollywood, to spread their world dominion, do develop respect for the Hottentot ideal vamp, or perfect lover, or man-about-town, it is just as possible that their efforts will have as little influence on the production of worthwhile movies as they have today when these valiant gentlemen "realize their lifelong ambition" of putting this or that popular classic on the screen. It is one of the gratifying signs of the present situation that leadership in the art of the movies seems to be definitely passing into the hands of the smaller producers who meet with ever-growing and already ample support of cultured people all the world over, because the standards of quality, and not those demanded by the world "boobery," are the standards governing their work. In this respect it is difficult to exaggerate the importance of the so-called "little-theater movement," and particularly of the home movies, both of which promise an assured outlet for the work of the independent artist. Judging by the trend of the present development it is quite likely that the future movie will be largely an entertainment at home obtainable either through a broadcasting station or, for the more discriminating, through a film library supplying films, probably printed on paper by the colotype or photogravure process, and at prices only a little higher than those at which books are sold or hired today.

More, however, than in the question from whom and how we shall be getting our movies we are interested in the mystery of the future movie itself. What is it likely to be? Will it be all talking, or all silent, or mixed? And what will be its forms, and how will it affect the theater of the live actor?

In so far as the talking picture is concerned there can be not the slightest hesitation in saying that it is bound to oust and supplant, in the field of popular entertainment, both the silent picture and the theater of living actors. The silent picture will give up its present position of dominance simply because the talking one has a more obvious and more easily workable means of carrying dramatic appeal to the audience. And the theater of live actors will have to go into retirement because the talking movies, technically developed as they are certain to become in time under the stimulus of competition in the same field of entertainment, will outdo the theater in all those effects of representation, whether naturalistic or "artistic," which stand for so much in the eyes of the average playgoer. There is no need to shed tears over the coming substitution of a machine for the live actor. The machine does not dispense with the actor, and is entirely subservient to the will of the artist. But the danger of the machine is that it is just as subservient to the will of any boob who may have enough money to buy it. And when it comes to money it is seldom the artist who has enough of it, as one observes by the condition of things in Hollywood. The danger of the talkies, therefore, is merely the danger of the Hollywood methods submerging completely even the not particularly inspired methods of Broadway.

There is one consolation left to those genuinely concerned in the future of dramatic art whether on the stage or on the screen. The industrialization of the popular forms of drama will leave the artist free to concentrate on those qualities of his medium which contribute most to the creative potency of his work. In the theater the artist will emphasize the direct contact between the actor and the audience, and the fact that the play is actually performed on the stage in front of a number of spectators who have gathered there for that special purpose. In the talking movie, in so far as the independent artist will have the opportunity of handling it, he will develop the combination of speech and picture in which the dramatic effect will depend on the unique and complementary qualities of both. And, finally, there will be the silent movie—the movie in the strict sense of the word—in which the artist will continue to express himself through the various forms of visual movement—forms the wealth and significance of which are still but dimly realized even by the most venturesome among the artists.

How greatly underestimated the resources of the silent movies are is revealed in the present stampede of Hollywood producers for the talking movies. Through sheer technical as well as artistic incompetence, in spite of all the big talk that comes from Hollywood, the American film producers have suffered an inglorious defeat in their effort to sustain the drawing power of the silent picture. With the growing popularity of the so-called system of "presentation," the motion-picture houses have been more and more changing into regular vaudeville theaters. The talking picture has now delivered the coup de grace, and the Hollywood silent movie can be seen taking the full count, with its seconds shouting "foul" and swaggering in the usual manner about its hidden prowess. Nobody will put any trust in the ability of Hollywood to come back, though attempts, and well intentioned ones at that, will undoubtedly be made here and there. But it is Hollywood and not the silent picture that has suffered defeat. The silent picture is perfectly able to stand up for itself, provided it is allowed to use its full force and to fight in its own way.

The metaphors of the ring are more appropriate here than may seem at first glance. The photoplay, after all, is a form of drama, and dramatic effects are essentially impacts on the emotional sensibility of the spectator, with the dramatic climax playing the part of the knock-out blow which in the popular phrase "brings the house down" (nothing less than the whole house, be it observed). The cold sweat which follows this experience must be that consummation of dramatic thrill which Aristotle calls "catharsis." All this seems pretty elementary and obvious. And yet even these axioms of dramatic art are persistently ignored by the producers of movie drama.

The classic example of such blindness one finds in the case of William Randolph Hearst, the gentleman who according to his recent biographer lost $7,000,000 in furthering the art of the motion picture. Of course, anybody who can lose $7,000,000 can lose $7,000,000. But for Mr. Hearst to have done so in making screen drama seems hardly believable. We know how he made his great fortune. He did so by dramatizing information in his newspapers. He bent his every effort on one main purpose, which was to attract the reader's attention, to strike his imagination, to rouse his emotions. He knew that the appeal had to be made to the senses, and so he applied "sensationalism" in the form of lurid stories and shrieking headlines. There may be some who still believe that information should be supplied pure, or at least with not more than 1½ per cent of intoxicating dramatic content. That is, of course, a matter of personal preference. The fact remains that as a dramatizer of news Mr. Hearst was supreme. And now observe Mr. Hearst as a producer of screen drama. According to his biographer "everything had to be real with Hearst. If the script called for the ladies of the ensemble to wear Irish lace, Belfast was asked to send entire bolts of its best and most costly hand-woven product. The result often was that . . . plays that should have cost two or three hundred thousand dollars actually required two or three millions."

This was the extent of Mr. Hearst's sensationalism in the movies: real Irish lace, and, one assumes, real silks and velvets and emeralds and pearls. Was this used to attract the attention of the spectator, to hit his eye, to rouse his emotions? No, it was just "art," which in Mr. Hearst's understanding obviously did not mean drama. Ah, what an irony of fate! Here was a man, perhaps one of the greatest masters of our age in the art of playing on human emotions (whether base or noble is a separate question), a man who not only knew all the old tricks of the game but who enriched them with a thousand of his own—and this man, when he came to deal with the screen drama, forgot all about his sensational stunts, his banner headlines, his four-inch type, and the innumerable other devices with which he assailed the public. Instead he spent a goodly fortune in providing real Irish lace and real this and that, as if it mattered two pins whether they were real or not.

If ever there was a case of genius misapplied and wasted, Mr. Hearst's was one. The silent motion picture, which cannot shriek and cannot bang, must learn to shriek and to bang with silent images. It must adopt Mr. Hearst's methods of sensationalism. It must learn the uses of emphatic statement, of dramatic accent—not of those produced with the help of music and sound devices, which would be like pasting miniature rattles in the places in the newspapers where bold-faced headlines should be. But to give dramatic accent by changing the form and the position of the visual image on the screen—this would be the way of sensational makeup in the newspaper, and the way of drama on the screen.

To demand this from the movie artist is to demand an emotional or dramatic progression which is represented by a combination of all the basic movements of the medium welded into a single dynamic pattern. Some of these movements have already been pretty thoroughly explored and effectively turned to dramatic uses. The principal one is that of the independently moving objects. Human beings, animals, automobiles, trains, rivers, and waves have all movements which can be manipulated and organized to fit a certain pattern. Here one finds effects of tempo and rhythm in the actual movement of objects. In "The Big Parade" and "Potemkin" we see these effects very skilfully and forcibly exploited for dramatic purposes. Contrast in the direction of moving objects is effectively brought out in the abstract picture "Ballet Mecanique," and even more so in the German film "The Symphony of Berlin," in both cases, however, without much dramatic significance.

Another important form of movement is contributed by the combined movement of the camera and the film. It may result either in merely effective camera angles, as in "The End of St. Petersburg," or in a certain fluidity of the visual world which, as in "The Last Laugh" and especially "Sunrise," renders it more malleable to dramatic effect. The so-called close-up, which is a special type of camera angle said to have been introduced by Griffith, is extensively used in Hollywood, alas, without any reference to its dynamic or dramatic significance. There is an important problem here which will be solved only when the relationship between the scale of the object, its absolute size and the size of the picture, is thoroughly studied.

But perhaps the most revolutionary change in the form of the movie will be brought about by treating the screen itself as an arena of dramatic movement. Considered at present so devoid of merit that it is usually hidden behind a curtain, the screen in the movie theatres of the future will be the most important part of the building. It will occupy the largest area architecturally possible in the theater, and it will be used for effects of movement obtained by changing the position of the picture, by changing its size, and, finally, by employing simultaneously a number of separate subjects which are organized to form a single dramatically dynamic pattern. There are already many evidences pointing in this direction. The device called magnascope, demonstrated in "Old Ironsides" and "Chang," indicates the dramatic possibilities of mere enlargement. Abel Gance in France, in his picture "Napoleon," obtains the effect of overwhelming grandeur by using a triptich screen with a simultaneous projection of three films. King Vidor in "The Crowd" puts one picture inside the other to give a realistic representation of the thoughts passing through one's head. And, finally Murnau in "Sunrise" combines a number of different sequences within a single frame in order to convey a symbol. We are thus on the threshold of a new development. It is suggested by both practical and artistic reasons. Most narrative subjects reviewed in single file, so to speak, have to be ruthlessly pruned to conform to the requirements of time. On the other hand, there are stories which cannot be properly appreciated unless they are unfolded simultaneously along their several and interweaving channels. For such material the contrapuntal or symphonic treatment seems to suggest the only effective dramatic form.

There is yet another possible development of the motion picture drama in which the screen in its bodily form is likely to play an important part. Like the theater artist of today, the movie artist is confronted with the problem of pure cinematic entertainment. So far this problem has been attacked, with considerable though incomplete success, only in the pictures of Charlie Chaplin, where it finds its partial solution in the superb and purely conventional acting of Chaplin himself. But Chaplin is an exception. Nor are his pictures quite consistent, since his method of frank entertainment extends only to his own acting. To be completely cinematic and at the same time theatrical, the motion picture must appear as nothing but a motion picture which is exhibited on the screen to provide a dramatic entertainment before a spectator. It will be able to do so only if it treats the screen not merely as an inert canvas but as the actual bearer, in fact, as the very locale of the dramatic development portrayed in the picture.

When the motion picture reaches this stage of complete liberation from aiming at effects of illusionistic representation, and proclaims itself openly as a means of dramatic entertainment, it will stand revealed before the admiring spectator as the wonderful mechanism in which profound experiences are given almost tangible form through the magic combination of lighted objects, the camera, the film, the projector, and the screen. Such will be the final glory of the silent movie drama, unless the latter be killed in its coming fight for existence by its quickly growing and rapaciously inclined little brother—the talking picture.

Literary Bushwhackers

By CLARENCE E. CASON

I HAVE 319 books for sale. They are not much good, and I shall expect only a little money for them. They are all collections which college professors have compiled to sell to helpless members of their classes. I have paid freight on these books twice. They have occupied ninety of the 1,800 cubic feet in my study for a period of six years. Simple calculations demonstrate that the space thus occupied has cost me $144, not including the expense of dusting, which has been enormous.

The original cost of these books was practically nothing. All but seventeen of them were presented to me by hopeful authors (if one should call them authors) or by publishers desirous of adoptions within my jurisdiction. If I can get $60 for the entire outfit I shall subscribe to three magazines, buy the complete works of two legitimate authors, enjoy four trips to the theater, and dine twice at a famous restaurant I have in mind.

I have felt it incumbent upon me to compose a sort of epitaph for these literary bushwhackeries, for tomorrow the drayman comes; and I shall soon have quotations from a second-hand dealer. It is my desire to establish unity, coherence, and emphasis among my notes regarding these books. Seventeen of the freshman rhetorics are agreed that such steps should be taken. As an only token of respect to the departing members of my library, these fundamental principles (three of the rhetorics say cardinal principles, but fundamental wins by a majority of fourteen) shall be partially observed. Were it not that I have for several years been bothered by certain insurgent thoughts, I should not dare to write such an epitaph on a perfect afternoon of Indian summer.

During these last days it has irked me beyond relief to find by explicit calculations that college students in the last year have paid a little more than $3,000, and that professor-editors have cleared slightly over $450, on stories written by Edgar Allan Poe, stories for which Mr. Poe himself received about $97 in all.

Reference to the current Publishers' Trade List, and an assiduous use of pencils and paper pads, discloses the fact that there are on the market 1,453 reprints of English and American literature designed by college professors for use in their classes and those of their friends. The average length of these books is 255 pages; the average amount actually written in each book by the royalty-drawing professors is 11 pages—including introductions, prefaces, indices, explanatory notes, proofs that the book "fills a long-felt need," selling talks, and other devices supposed to make the volume singular and authentic. Average retail price is $1.90; average royalty, 15 per cent.

The contents of the books in each class—essays, stories, poems, individual authors, or what not—are as imitative as sheep. Any professor with a passable background in his field could design such a book in an afternoon, complete his selections after dinner, find copies of the material between classes the next day, assemble introductions and notes while the classes are doing written exercises, and be fresh and free for church on Sunday morning. At some convenient time later he could have a brace of young instructors read proof sheets, and so be done without a dissolving loss of time and creative energy. Say he sells 2,000 copies during the first year; with a 15 per cent royalty $570 drops from the sky. And to the mere money add the fun of having jealous colleagues forced to use the book and the exhilaration of seeing one's name stamped in gold on the back of texts being carried everywhere about the campus.

One might conclude that the process of selling the world's best literature to one's students on a 15 per cent commission might, with respect to ease of operation and unencumbered profits, be favorably compared with the sophomore's established custom of selling seats in chapel or dormitory radiators to newly arrived freshmen. Such, however, is not the case. The compilation itself is simple enough, and the matter of obtaining a publisher—after adoption—is routine. The real skill, of course, is needed in gaining adoptions for the prospective book. And the grace here demanded is no mean thing.

It has been my late pleasure to examine thirty-two collections of short stories aimed at college classes. Calculations show that they contain an average of twenty-nine stories each, that the mean length is 485 pages (of which the editor writes 31.2 pages), and that they wait upon purchasers at an average price of $1.60. These collections were used last year, circulars and personal letters inform me, in 317 colleges and a few high schools. Allowing 100 buyers for each institution, I find that the cost to students was $50,720. The editors gained approximately $7,608, or about $238 each. Four out of these twenty-one editors have written and profited from original fiction; the others find it more advantageous to be experts in the general field.

Among these 928 stories there are, if my mathematics is correct, 1,490 duplications; that is, if every book is compared with every other book, it will be found that an average of three stories are repeated in each case. Either The Fall of the House of Usher, The Mask of the Red Death, The Cask of Amontillado, or The Pit and the Pendulum is in every one of the books. The same is true of Dr. Heidegger's Experiment, The Great Stone Face, The Ambitious Guest, or Mr. Higginbotham's Catastrophe; and of The Necklace, The Piece of String, The Little Soldier, or Hap- piness. The stories of Stevenson, O. Henry, Bret Harte, Kipling, W. W. Jacobs, and Irving are repeated again and again. Reasons for these duplications are not far to seek.

Reasons for these duplications are not far to seek. In the first place, if a fair number of favorite titles is not found in any proffered collection it would be idle to try to persuade the committee that such a book really contained short stories. In the second place, copyright laws and privileges are influential: an editor does not, under any reasonable circumstances, wish to pay anything for a story. That is why so many second-rate stories of modern authors are found in the college books.

Though undoubtedly there is a considerable amount of sport for the amiable gentlemen who gather together bits of fiction over rainy week-ends, the amount of money wasted in the present methods of this pleasant business is rather serious. If the money spent in paying printers to duplicate story after story were in some way saved, there would be enough in a few years to build several quite noteworthy college halls. But who is interested in building college halls when it is possible to have one's name in gold on the back of a handsome green book?

So long as authors' agents, writers' magazines, and romantic instructors continue to persuade large proportions of all freshman classes to be story writers, we shall be blessed with comparatively few compilers of other persons' essays. Yet let no one believe that the essay field is to be despised. As a matter of fact, most college classes read more essays than stories. Out of a book of thirty stories the class might actually read about six; but out of a book of thirty essays a class might be asked to read as many as ten or eleven.

In my pile of volumes awaiting the second-hand dealer are twenty-two collections of essays. Some are labeled "English" and some "Modern"; there seems to be a struggle between the two, as to which shall get the trade (rival sales talks flourish in the introductions). All the English essays are practically the same—Spectator papers, Poor Relations, Roast Pig, Sweetness and Light, Compensation (few Americans make the grade), Aes Triplex, On Going a Journey, Of Truth, Of Studies, and in the preface the gripping account of how Michel de Montaigne in 1580 retired to his cylindrical country house and wrote the first "Essais." The modern essays contain expositions chosen mainly from the current magazines (which, incidentally, pay for them), selected by professors who doubtless compensate for their indicated enthusiasm by roundly aspersing journalism in their calmer hours.

Bushwhacking is also practiced widely in the field of individual authors. Suppose one is chairman of a freshman English course—the freshman courses not only present the largest number of prospects but also are compulsory nearly always—and wishes to have the class read "The Ordeal of Richard Feverel" or "Vanity Fair." The chairman obviously finds it desirable to procure a special edition, with perhaps an introduction by himself. In such cases it is often far more profitable to compose introductions than mere novels themselves. From my pile of books there peers a "David Copperfield," and from the back of it one would hardly get the impression that Dickens ever had anything to do with it. The name, however, of the illustrious professor, who seems to have spread his talent over the first twelve pages, is more prominently displayed than the title.

Both bushwhackers and publishers regard spring and fall as open seasons. During the summer many professors move away from their seats of power, and during the winter many reach the melancholy end of their indulgence. Circulars fly; committees ponderously weigh and select; and, prodded by innumerable bickerings, unabashed by wasteful and useless duplication, the game goes cheerfully on. One looks back to Tottel's "Miscellany" (1557) and to Percy's "Reliques" (1765) and must with charity allow that 250 years is too long for any practice to remain altogether respectable.

Orthodox

By ROBERT BOOKER HUNT

Some one, I know, is hurrying to my door
Whose feet are tipped with lightning, shod with wind, Dispatched to hush my rebel tongue before
I loose ideas that beat against my mind.
I see him in blue distance hastening on,
Striking a stride that keeps apace with time.
From never he strode forth when I was born
To stop my lips and seal my urgent rhyme.

O what escape have I, who am equipped
With bone that crumbles and with flesh that rots?
What speed might this small spirit gain, though stripped
Of comforting divinities it plots?
And who shall wonder that I hold my tongue,
Confine the blasphemies I might have sung?

Asquith on Himself

Memories and Reflections, 1852-1927. By the Earl of Oxford and Asquith. Little, Brown. 2 vols. $10.

FROM the chair of a meeting in London some six years ago, an affair at which Philip Guedalla and A. G. Gardiner were discussing biography, H. H. Asquith declared, in reply to a demand that he should record his own life, that he had no intention of writing an autobiography, adding that he left such things to other members of his family. A few years later, we are now informed, Lord Balfour expressed to Margot Asquith the opinion that her husband ought not to neglect this duty, and, the pecuniary value of autobiographies having been abundantly proved, the last of the Liberal prime ministers agreed. Asquith had already done two things in this field. He had published a brief and formal statement on the genesis of the war, and had assembled two large volumes on "Fifty Years of British Parliament." In 1926, when he set to work upon the more personal task—if "personal" is a word to use in any connection about Asquith—he was already 74. He had been defeated in his final encounter with Lloyd George; he had ceased to be titular leader of the Liberal Party; his vigor had departed, and he was looking back from an invalid's chair upon the last margin of a great epoch.

It is obvious that in such circumstances as these Asquith could not write an autobiography. No later Victorian had less of the autobiographic temperament or habit. Product of a class that carries reticence to its extreme, trained in a school that was devoted to the gentlemanly tradition, he could not talk about himself. Asquith as Prime Minister was the despair of politicians and journalists. He would not play even the most refined game of publicity.

By JOHAN BOJER

Author of The Great Hunger, etc.

This mighty novel is a sequel to The Great Hunger. It describes how Lorentz Holm, disappointed in earthly possessions, sets out to find a new God worthy men's worshiping. Beside the deeply significant story of Lorentz's quest stand the quieter and lovely stories of his sister Louise, his aged parents Peer and Merle, and the distinctive people of the Norwegian uplands. Simple, powerful, human, this is Bojer at his best. $2.50

353 FOURTH AVENUE

THE CENTURY CO.

NEW YORK, N. Y.

Nevertheless, in the end he had to give way, or at any rate he tried to. There is internal evidence in these two volumes that Asquith had not much heart in putting down his "Memories and Reflections," and the suggestion has been made by at least one well-informed reviewer that the material embodied in the later sections may not have reached publishable form at the time of the old statesman's death. The book, however, is all Asquith: there can be no mistake about that. And, while no one could call it a good book, or a record in any sense commensurate in its subject's powers, place, and name, it contains not a little interesting stuff, and, needless to say, it must take its place as a source document.

In August, 1914, Asquith occupied the crucial position of the world. He was head of the British Government at the moment when the destiny of Europe hung upon the decision that had to be made in London. The Cabinet over which he presided contained all the important Liberal statesmen of England, with the exception of James Bryce. It had been engaged for eight years in carrying through a program of social legislation which progressives in other countries looked upon as setting a new standard. Among Asquith's colleagues in the Government were a few, among whom Winston Churchill was most conspicuous, who believed in the inevitability of a European war. There were others—notably Edward Grey—who hoped war was avoidable, but knew that if it came England would be in it. Asquith agreed with Grey, though there is no evidence that he had thought much about it. When, in the moment of the supreme crisis, he wrote down what he himself would have called the main and governing issues, he was clear in mind as regards certain things, as, for instance, that the neutrality of Belgium constituted an obligation and that, as Prince Lichnowsky did his utmost to make Berlin believe, England could not afford to allow France to be reduced to the level of a second-rate or third-rate Power. But it was not until July 24, 1914, one week before the German armies began to march, that Asquith noted in his diary the signs of a European crisis; nor did he know within twenty-four hours of Grey's momentous speech whether the Cabinet would vote for war or be rent in two. Until the morning of the fateful Sunday, the day upon which Grey uttered the first definite word to France, Asquith believed that if war were actually coming the Cabinet would split.

Read these pages indeed, make your way through the first half of the second volume, and you will be astounded at the Prime Minister's coolness, his complete detachment, his apparent insensitiveness. To Asquith, it would seem, all events and all public men were of about the same interest. If anything stirred him, it was at any rate impossible for him to show it in the written word.

Of course there is a certain greatness in this and beyond all question something that was of inestimable value for England in 1914-1916. The English mind is appalled when confronted with the thought that a Churchill or a Birkenhead might conceivably have been Prime Minister in 1914. (Needless to inject that he could not: the Providence that has watched over England and the United States would not have permitted it!) Nor did Asquith make any difference as the war went on. His enemies had resolved to remove him in May, 1915; he defeated them by inviting them into the Government. It took them another eighteen months to get him out. There is remarkably little here upon the policies of the war and the purposes of the Allies. But there is at least one new document of the deepest interest—a careful memorandum laid before the Cabinet by Lord Landsdowne just before Asquith's fall. It was written ten months earlier than his celebrated letter to the press, and contained the facts that seemed to portend a peace without victory, two months before Woodrow Wilson made use of the phrase. There is, however, one admirable revelation of Asquith's clearness of sight. In 1915 he observed that Winston Churchill was anxious for British annexations. "I believe," wrote Asquith, "that Grey and I are the only men who doubt and distrust any such settlement. We both think that in the real interests of our own future the best thing would be if, at the end of the war, we could say that we had taken and gained nothing, and that not merely from a moral and sentimental point of view." The words I have italicized have led some readers of "Memories and Reflections" to utter severe or contemptuous words about the statesman who wrote them. Why in the world? Asquith was convinced that for England to take or to gain anything out of the war would be mean, unworthy, un-English, as well as unwise. That, I suggest, should please us all. S. ## Beveridge's Lincoln

Abraham Lincoln, 1809-1858. By Albert J. Beveridge. Two volumes. Houghton Mifflin Company. $12.50.

WHAT the late Senator Beveridge's final estimate of Lincoln might have been must remain, unfortunately, only a conjecture. The two volumes of biography that have now been published are only the first half of the four that he planned, and they bring the narrative down only to the close of the great debate with Douglas in the Illinois senatorial contest of 1858. Even the last chapter of the second volume was left without final revision, and a continuation of the story to the election of 1860, added to give the work an impression of completeness by leaving the narrative where Beveridge intended to leave it, is by an unnamed hand. One gathers, however, that if Beveridge had lived to finish the great task which he undertook, that, namely, of giving an "institutional interpretation of America" such as he began in his life of John Marshall, he would have succeeded in accomplishing at least two things. He would have sifted to the last straw the facts of Lincoln's life, and he would have shattered the Lincoln myth. That either of these things should need to be done more than sixty years after Lincoln's death is an illustration of the large fields that American historical scholarship has still to conquer, and a striking commentary upon the beclouding haze with which a sentimental people have been content to surround their national heroes.

From the standpoint of facts, these volumes are a monument of zeal and thoroughness. With a painstaking industry which seems never to have flagged, Beveridge has traced to its lair every name, date, incident, tradition, or assertion having anything whatever to do with Lincoln's early years, verifying, comparing, correcting, refuting, and reconstructing, massing the evidence in footnotes and setting out the results in the text, until one feels that here, at last, is the veritable truth of the matter. When, on the other hand, in the second volume, the period of the predominance of the slavery issue is reached, biography expands and becomes history, with Lincoln as only one of the figures. Fully a third of this second volume is taken up with a description of slavery as an institution and extended accounts of the compromise measures of 1850, the Dred Scott case, the Kansas-Nebraska Act, and the Kansas struggle—all, of course, true historical "background," but on a scale uniquely large.

And what of Lincoln, the Lincoln of tradition, after the work of research has been completed and the historical setting duly displayed? The story will not be altogether pleasant reading to those who have been accustomed to seat Lincoln from his youth among the gods. The myths are scattered right and left as Beveridge sweeps the field. There was no midnight reading as a boy by the fireside, and no thorough reading of anything later, notwithstanding that reading was long the great preoccupation. Lincoln showed no early interest in slavery, spoke against both slavery and abolition in the Illinois legislature in 1837, denounced mob violence at the time of the Lovejoy murder without mentioning Lovejoy, and supported the Mexican War without discussing its bearing upon slavery. He began his political life as a Jackson Democrat, became a Whig in 1830 largely, it would seem, because of his liking for Clay and his interest in internal improvements and banks, made but little impression, and that unfavorable, during a term in Congress in which his associates were mainly Southern Whigs, delivered an anti-Administration speech which was bitterly assailed in Illinois but ignored at Washington, was not called for as a speaker in the 1848 campaign, and went to New England, where he made political speeches, on his own account and not by invitation.

Meantime, while unmistakably advancing as a politician in his State, his mind had become affected. The exciting cause, as Beveridge expounds it, was apparently the tangled love affairs which eventually ended in his marriage to Mary Todd, a silly virago whose outrageous conduct he was to repay with touching patience and devotion; but his nature was melancholy and secretive, and his flood of stories and enlivening talk rolled along against a background of mental gloom. Somewhere, somehow, there emerged out of an unfavorable past certain instincts of a gentleman, but he remained throughout incredibly careless of his personal appearance, lazy and unmethodical in his temper and habits, and a dispenser of stories too vulgar, often, for the printed page. Politically, Beveridge places the turning-point at October, 1854, when Lincoln, in his Peoria speech in reply to Douglas, for the first time publicly denounced slavery. Three years before he had been opposed to the repeal of the Fugitive Slave act, and in 1853, in replying to Douglas's Richmond speech supporting Pierce, had made at his own request a speech in which he discussed "none of the real and very grave questions of the day," and which Beveridge pronounces "the strangest written and published utterance of his life." Not until the senatorial campaign against Douglas was under way did Lincoln, apparently, begin to find himself intellectually. When, at the Republican national convention of 1856, he received more than a hundred votes for President, the possibility of attaining the office dawned upon him, and what he said and did thereafter is to be considered with that ambition in mind.

This was the Lincoln whom the Republicans were shortly to make their leader, and who, after his death, was to be ranked by public opinion as one of the greatest Americans. Here, however, one must stop. What Lincoln became after 1860 will always overshadow what he was before, but no man, even in the greatest crisis, can ever break wholly with his past. It will be matter of profound regret that a book so learned, so masterly, so mercilessly dispassionate, and so well written must remain only an imposing fragment. The best that could be hoped for is that some later historian, with the ground of Lincoln's earlier career prepared as Beveridge prepared it, may with equal ability and masterfulness carry on the story to its end.

Cable and Fine Wire

Strange Fugitive. By Morley Callaghan. Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.50.

The Children. By Edith Wharton. D. Appleton and Company. $2.50.

NEITHER of these books, taken individually, remains very long with the reader, and both, it is perhaps safe to state, represent minor efforts on the part of their authors; but read in conjunction with each other they furnish a double springboard from which to launch some interesting comparisons.

Mr. Callaghan is a pat example of a good, hard-boiled writer. He is typical of a rapidly growing school. One can trace quite clearly in his work the things the school has rejected: variability or beauty of style, complication of character, neatness of construction, the exposition of a thesis or problem, the intrusion of the author's point of view, and—most important of all—the division of his personages into sympathetic and unsympathetic characters. In "Strange Fugitive" the world is the world of the tabloids, divested of romance. Jerry Trotter, the protagonist, is a primitive being with sufficient power of reflection to be uncertain about his desires, which are mainly reducible to money, power, and women. By a series of steps, too rapid and schematic to be quite real, he rises from the position of unsuccessful foreman in a lumber yard to the estate of bootlegger king. The extension of his blind will-power to power is accomplished, as is usual in such cases, by a diffusion of his sex awareness. He leaves his wife but is sufficiently uneasy in his mind to be unhappy away from her. The denouement of the story is straight cinema: sawed-off shotguns, racketeers' battles, and the brutal abrupt murder of Jerry. The entire story is conceived in terms of incident and told in a cold, vernacular prose. As has probably been remarked before, it is Hemingway carried to the point of absurdity. The style is so expressionless that it is insufficient even to project the simple figures of Jerry and his wife and their universe of bootleggers, prostitutes, and gunmen. The characters are conceived as primitive and animal: but by a curious irony they turn out to be artificial, almost dreamlike. We cannot believe in them, even as we cannot believe in the murderers and gunmen served up to us in the tabloids.

Turn to Mrs. Wharton's latest novel and you seem to step into another world. A minute ago there was nothing but blind pigs, onion sandwiches, smuggled whiskey, assault, brutality, murder, bestial lust. All this—signifying naught. Vicious energy in action, from which nothing is to be learned, no morals are to be drawn. Then, in a moment we are whisked into the Riviera with its cocktails, American millionaires, decadent heiresses, a deracinated and tired cosmopolitan society, chattering, twittering—and divorcing. Plenty of problems here: the problem of the children of divorce, the problem of the ageing woman, the problem of a rootless transplanted American society. These are not people merely coolly noted by a reportorial mind, as in "Strange Fugitive," but a group carefully selected and elaborately maneuvered so as to bring into sharp focus a set of ultra-civilized social dilemmas.

There is a corresponding difference in style. Mrs. Wharton, ever mindful of the Master, still glitters, winds, and surprises. Her paragraphs are all shows of subtlety, whereas Mr. Callaghan works equally hard to show us he has nothing up his sleeve, that he has whittled his prose down to the bone. In both cases the effect is unsatisfactory. There is a point at which directness transforms itself into banality and a point at which refinement becomes mere meticulousness.

Similarly with the question of the point of view. Mr. Callaghan, the fashion-plate hard-boiled novelist of 1928, has none at all. His characters undergo no interpretation, no criticism. The corollary is that his characters are neither sympathetic nor unsympathetic. You neither like nor dislike Jerry. Indeed, this particular result of the objective method is in modern fiction becoming so significant a factor that an entirely new attitude toward novels is becoming established. The query, Did you like the book? no longer has any meaning in terms of our identification with any of the characters. This sweeping change becomes clearer still when reference is made to Mrs. Wharton's book, which, true again to the Henry James formula, is careful to build up a character (intelligent, sympathetic, and essentially colorless—the regulation Henry James hero) through whose eyes the story, or rather the problem, is seen and who is obviously at times the mouthpiece of the author. The function of such a character is to provide for the reader a resting-place for his sympathies, to make the reader feel at home and comfortable and certain that he understands completely and judges sympathetically all that is going on (although, of course, it is the hero who is really doing this for him).

Curiously enough, however, the two books, apparently so dissimilar, are alike in their final emotional impact. Mr. Callaghan's world is so simplified and stripped that it becomes an abstraction and we believe in it no more than we believe in the crude truths which daily journalism offers us. On the other hand, the complexities of Mrs. Wharton's universe, which is a

the way Libraries choose theirs

SO MANY thousands of new books are published each year that even the largest library cannot buy them all, but must make a careful choice. Librarians, like individuals, know that their budget is limited and that they must make it cover as many of the worth-while books as they can. They know, too, that every unsuitable book they purchase means an actual loss to the library—they cannot afford to make mistakes. Naturally, the librarians have learned to use the very best methods of book selection which will insure them of getting only the books they really want.

The Opinions of More than 70 of the Foremost Reviewing Journals in England and the United States Quoted Impartially to Help You Select the Books You Want to Read.

For years libraries all over America have used a special monthly service to assist them in choosing books. They know that isolated book reviews are not dependable—that one or two critics may recommend a book for some reason when all the others write to condemn it, and public opinion later rejects the book. Therefore librarians use a service where all reviews of a book are quoted side by side, where they can be compared and an opinion formed which is very likely to be right. This book selection service is just as helpful to individual book buyers, and to all those who want to know just which books are worth reading, but until recently it has been too costly for individuals to use. Now, however, through a special price reduction, you too may have the benefit of this service at a very moderate cost.

CLIFTON P. FADIMAN

Marlowe Mysterious

The Assassination of Christopher Marlowe. By Samuel A. Tannenbaum. Privately Printed. New York: The Tenny Press.

THEY keep on killing Marlowe in new ways. The Puritans of his own days had it that he was killed by their private island God for loose living and looser thinking. The romantic dramatists and story-tellers of the past century delicately embroidered his tragedy with chivalrous motives and with Stevensonian—not to say Cabellian—gestures. J. L. Hotsen seemed, two or three years ago, to have discredited both these methods of romance by producing the report of the coroner who sat upon the case, with some associated documents, and showing that Marlowe died at the end of a drinking-bout, at the hands of a man who was defending himself against the poet's own dagger. But now comes Samuel A. Tannenbaum with an argument to the effect that Marlowe was, after all, the victim of a plot—only, of a plot so large and dim as to have been hitherto overlooked by all the investigators.

Briefly, Mr. Tannenbaum holds that the plot goes back to Sir Walter Raleigh. Thomas Kyd, arrested on charges of atheism (with other charges), believed that Marlowe had informed against him to the Privy Council. Kyd had therefore accused Marlowe of being himself atheistical and of being the companion of certain men of quality who shared his theological opinions, and moreover were in secret communication with King James of Scotland. Marlowe was under arrest, but had not been confined to prison, presumably because the Council knew that he was an agent of the Queen and of Sir Francis Walsingham. The men of quality had less to fear from Kyd, who was not a member of their circle, than from Marlowe, who was. They therefore took the shortest way with the difficulty, had Marlowe murdered by three rogues, and saw to it that the coroner found out only what he was told. Raleigh, the Earl of Oxford, the Earl of Northumberland, and Sir George Carey may have been, indeed, pained by the sacrifice of a man whom they had taste enough to consider a fine poet; but they were realists, and it is unlikely that they ever claimed that the murder hurt them more than it hurt Marlowe.

Mr. Tannenbaum's argument is necessarily intricate and hypothetical. It really depends, however, upon one point: the contention that the coroner's report was falsely rendered. The wounds described, various medical authorities have assured Mr. Tannenbaum, would hardly have been fatal. But may not the coroner have been merely unscientific? The evidence taken, Mr. Tannenbaum points out, was not taken very exactly. But may not the coroner have been negligent? Was not Marlowe, a tavern-haunter, as likely to have gone to Deptford Strand solely to drink with the three rascals as to have been lured there to be murdered? Is it easier to find a finished plot in the whole affair than to view it as a chapter of ironical accidents? Different natures will no doubt judge differently, and there can be no final judgment without further and better information. Nevertheless, it is possible for one who naturally suspects accident more often than he smells tragedy to conclude that Mr. Tannenbaum has made a very good case.

The German Outlook

Politische Prognose für Deutschland. Von Willy Hellpach. Berlin: S. Fischer.

Deutschland, das Herz Europas. Von Ernst Jäckh. Stuttgart: Deutsche Verlagsanstalt.

The Effect of the World War on European Education. By Fritz Kellermann. Harvard University Press.

MARKEDLY dissimilar as are these three books in weight and volume, and widely divergent as is their scope, they are all three symptomatic of the wave of sanguine and daring idealism which, as a reaction from military defeat, has swept with constantly increasing force through German thought ever since the breakdown of the old order.

By far the most ambitious and comprehensive performance of the three is Professor Hellpach's attempt at a prognosis of German political life of the future. In large-mindedness and versatility there is something of a Keyserling in Hellpach. A pupil of Wundt's, a doctor both of medicine and philosophy, he devoted the decade before the war to research in anthropology, sociology, neurology, psychiatry, served during the war in military hospitals both at the front and at home, after the war took charge of the Institute for Social Psychology at the Karlsruhe Polytechnic, entered politics as a member of the Democratic Party, became Prime Minister of Baden, won the nomination of his party as Presidential candidate at the primaries of 1926, but retired after the election of Hindenburg to the comparative quiet of a Heidelberg professorship. That a book by such a man upon the great public questions confronting the Germany of today should be crowded with striking ideas and original views is not surprising. Perhaps one might say it is overcrowded with them. There is something bewildering in the flood of affirmations, informations, suggestions, negations that burst upon us throughout the book, from a sharp refutation of the racial unity of the German people to a brilliant characterization of the mental traits of all its different tribes, or from a doctrinaire condemnation of voting by party ticket as undemocratic and demoralizing to the serious proposal that Frankfurt should be paired with Berlin as twin capital of the empire. With all its theoretical vagaries, however, the book is held together by one central idea and one supreme practical aim: the proof of the necessity and the possibility of making the German democratic experiment a complete and lasting success.

Is it true, as has often been affirmed, that the Germans are by nature an essentially unpolitical people? For an answer to this question Hellpach points to the last ten years. Here was a people threatened by its victors with national extinction, suffering from hunger and cold, impoverished and disarmed, torn by dissensions, without any leaders of unquestioned greatness, without any universally recognized governmental authority, facing disintegration into a multitude of political fragments. What were the forces which led from this anarchical state of 1918 to the Weimar Constitution, the withdrawal of the Ruhr invasion, the stabilization of the currency, and finally to Geneva and Locarno? Hellpach enumerates four as the principal forces.

First, the bureaucracy of the old regime. Had the old monarchical bureaucracy refused to function under the revolutionary masters of the day, complete disorganization of the empire and the states would have followed inevitably. Political instinct induced the bureaucracy to remain at their posts, even though this entailed a sacrifice of their own monarchical preferences. Second, the socialist trade unions. Had they given in to the demands of the extreme left, toward which their sympathies naturally inclined them, a bolshevist reign of terror would have been the inevitable consequence. Political instinct taught the unions to resist and to suppress every communist uprising, thereby rescuing Germany from the clutches of civil war. Third, the Catholic parliamentary leaders. Had the German Catholic Party given support to the separatist movements in Bavaria and the Rhineland—movements toward which com-

VOLTAIRE

Genius of Mockery

By

VICTOR THADDEUS

Brilliantly, passionately, yet with a keen eye for historical detail, Mr. Thaddeus presents the many-sided Voltaire, the man who walked with kings; who languished in the Bastille; who was the idol of the salons; who was a liar and a forger, yet who risked his shrivelled body and his immortal soul for human liberty. ($5.00)

JOHN SMITH— also Pocahontas by JOHN GOULD FLETCHER

Captain Smith's adventures are more extravagant than any fiction, while the story of Pocahontas reveals a passionate love that won the admiration of two worlds. ($3.50)

THIS MAN ADAMS The Man Who Never Died By SAMUEL McCOY

Did John Adams die, as it was commonly reported, in 1826? His present biographer flatly denies that he did in this mischievous biography where the author presents the fiery, frosty, bitter-tongued, lovable, passionate Puritan as an eligible candidate for his second term as President. ($3.50)

INFIDELITY

By Arthur Weigall

INFIDELITY is a story of marriage—a companionate marriage that proves legal. A young couple test this modern formula with astonishing results. ($2.50)

EMOTION AND DELINQUENCY

By L. Grimberg, M. D.

This authoritative work is a searching study of the delinquent from the standpoint of an eminent medical man. ($3.00)

THE CONQUEST OF LIFE

By Dr. Serge Voronoff

Since 1919, when Dr. Serge Voronoff first proved that he had found a method for the rejuvenation of life, the world has been waiting for this book that tells the amazing results of grafting monkey glands on men. ($3.50)

THE LIGHT OF EGYPT

By Werner Jansen

"We recommend this novel most urgently as a masterpiece of literary creation, because not only is a gigantic subject finely handled but also the reader is gripped vitally from the first page to the last." ($2.50)

QUEEN ELIZABETH And Some Foreigners

Being a series of hitherto unpublished letters from the archives of the Hapsburg family. ($5.00)

KNOCK WOOD!

mon ecclesiastical traditions seemed to dispose it favorably—the end of the German empire would have come. Political instinct impelled the Catholic Party to discountenance all such separatist movements, and thereby made it one of the chief strongholds of German unity. Fourth, the liberal party groups. If they, having for the most part been beaten at the polls, and therefore been reduced to a small minority in the Reichstag, had pursued a policy of sulking opposition, they would have seriously retarded the process of national reconstruction. Political instinct made them a most influential factor in furthering this process. For the most outstanding members of the various coalition ministries, and in fact the intellectual leaders of a new forward-looking German policy, have been liberals of the type of Rathenau and Stresemann.

A people—this is Hellpach's conclusion—which in time of direst need has shown such instinctive cohesiveness, such unerring sense for political necessity, such intuitive determination to make individual sacrifices and party compromises for the common good, has thereby proved its capacity for true democracy. The call of the future is to continue upon the lines so clearly and successfully marked out in these ten momentous years.

Professor Jäckh's little book—a collection of radio talks delivered at Berlin in the early winter of 1927—is concerned only with the foreign problems of German policy. Its lyric and seemingly chauvinistic title, "Germany, the Heart of Europe," is, as a matter of fact, meant to be the very antithesis of nationalistic sentimentality. It presents in a telling manner the central and unfenced-off position of Germany—geographical, economic, racial, intellectual—within the circle of its (now fifteen!) immediate neighbors; it brings out the inextricable and vital interdependence of this whole system of European political forces; and it draws from this situation conclusions about what seem to be the obvious demands of German conduct in international matters. Germany, unprotected by natural boundaries, without the possibility of alliances with other Powers, deprived of every means not only of aggression but even of efficient self-protection against foreign assault, intertwined with every financial, cultural, ethical interest of all her neighbors, must seek, and is seeking, fundamental safeguards of her national existence in moral international leadership.

The enlightening lectures on the effect of the World War on European secondary schools, delivered before the Harvard Graduate School of Education by Dr. Kellermann, Studienrat at Kassel, are mainly concerned with the German school reform set in motion by the Reichsschulkonferenz of 1920. They, too, are striking proof that defeat has had a truly liberating and liberalizing effect upon the German mind. For while both France and Italy since the war have restricted the programs of secondary schools to classicist and nationalist standards, Germany has internationalized them and introduced the greatest variety of possible courses of study from the whole domain of modern knowledge.

Mr. Bromfield on a New Tack

The Strange Case of Miss Annie Spragg. By Louis Bromfield. Frederick A. Stokes Company. $2.50.

FROM his first appearance in print, Louis Bromfield has known how to write a book that sounds like a major novel. We could settle down comfortably before a library fire to one of his four American panels, as we had in youth with Dickens and Thackeray, but as we could never again with Dickens and Thackeray, because of the long moralizings and sentimentalizings which somehow faded out of the pages twenty year ago but which sickly over the whole book today. We could settle down to it as we did later to the first Bennett and the first Galsworthy and the first Lawrence, although we no longer settle down with any of them. If, after we had settled down for an hour or so, we discovered that Mr. Bromfield had resorted to a rather youthful theatricalism to give his characters significance, if we realized that the smoothly flowing competent sentences, which sounded rather like reminiscent music, lacked more than a little of Trollope's wit and Jane Austen's pungency, we were still grateful to him for writing so much better and understanding so much more than most young novelists. We even went on reading him when the second and the third and the fourth novels proved to be no better, and only a little worse, than the first. But "The Strange Case of Miss Annie Spragg" is something new—or almost new.

When Thornton Wilder launched "The Bridge of San Luis Rey" on an unbelieving world, he accomplished many unexpected things. Several volumes of commentary could profitably be written on the reception of this book. It overturned accepted gods; it restored forgotten ones. And among those it restored was the story. At the time of its appearance the reader who wanted a story must for the most part choose between the mechanical oblivion offered by detective yarns and the palpitant novels written for illiterate romantics. No self-respecting novelist, or almost none, told a story. On opening the pages of a self-respecting novelist one read long confused accounts of the thoughts that were supposed to pass through the characters' minds. Or one read long painstakingly accurate accounts of wholly trivial happenings, as that the hero got up in the morning, ate his breakfast, walked to the office, dictated to his stenographer, who had a wart on the little finger of her right hand—but one read no story. And so the literate took to reading biographies when they wanted to know about people and Willard Huntington Wright when they wanted suspense. Into this condition of affairs Thornton Wilder launched his "Bridge." Not content with telling one story, it told five. And now one of the best groomed of our young novelists spins a yarn for us. The result is equally delightful whether this is due to coincidence or represents cause and effect.

"The Strange Case" has much in it besides the story, of course. It has always been a merit of yarns that the man who told them could tell much besides. But in addition it has the story, put together with no little cunning, and told in that same flowing effective style that makes it sound like a major novel. One reads it through, resentful of interruptions. Quite as resentful toward the end, long after one has discovered that it is not, in fact, a major novel.

In seizing upon the story of one of those almost legendary prairie men who became God, almost legendary although they lived so short a time ago, and in bringing this story to bear upon the lives of a group of unsuspecting people in Italy, Mr. Bromfield has spun a yarn that shows its heels to any detective story I have read. The suspense is there, the plot is there, and the materials out of which plot and suspense are concocted are interesting in themselves. Cyrus Spragg was interesting as he journeyed across the prairies, preaching the word of God, and leaving children behind him at every cross roads. Uriah Spragg was interesting in his cruel atonements for his father's lecherous life. Annie Spragg was more interesting than either, since in her curiously inexpressive and yet potent nature the qualities of Cyrus struggled with those of Uriah. The Princess D'Orobelli and Father D'Astier were interesting. It was interesting to bring into juxtaposition, as Mr. Bromfield has done, the ascetic superstitions of Primitive Methodist Americans and the pagan superstitions still cherished by peasant Italians. Priapus throws a light on Cyrus Spragg, as St. Francis and St. Catherine do on Annie.

But the book is not a metaphysical discussion. It is not, like "South Wind," a compendium of ancient learning and modern interpretations. It is the story of the scars discovered on the body of Miss Annie Spragg after she died, of how they got there, and of who inflicted them. If in the course of reading the story one thinks of many things, of the closeness of religious ecstasy to the ecstasy that comes from love, and of the closeness of religious cruelty to the perversions that spring from love denied, if one encounters an amazing number of interesting people whose lives are closely affected by the strange case, all this is so much velvet which does not for a moment detract from the interest of the story, but which instead enhances the story.

And one realizes again that Mr. Bromfield is wrestling with a big talent. If other men of smaller stature are taken more seriously by those reviewers against whom he rages, perhaps it is because they have paused in their stride to perfect themselves. Granted that one traces on every page the literary influences that have worked on Bromfield, as one traces them in almost all writers of importance, granted that he went for a while to school to the same sibylline oracle from whom Mr. Anderson learned some of the tricks of his style, granted that Mr. Horace J. Winbery and Bessie Cudlip are reminiscent of the best English literary whimsical tradition, and that Mr. Winbery's nephew's interest in the mystery of Annie Spragg is reminiscent of Brother Juniper's interest in "The Bridge," and that the sprightly vivacity of the style sometimes falls down to the level of the first sentence of Aunt Bessie's Tale—"She was not a bad girl, not really"—granted even that Mr. Bromfield never writes any unforgettable sentences or phrases, or surprises us by unforeseen felicities, this is nevertheless an exhilarating, intelligent, often brilliant book. It reveals Mr. Bromfield clearly, as reviewers sometimes like to say in moments of human frailty, as one of the most important among American novelists. This fifth and latest book is much the finest of his list.

ALICE BEAL PARSONS

W. H. Hudson

The Collected Works of W. H. Hudson. E. P. Dutton and Company. Twenty-four volumes. $192.

I HAD done my reading of Hudson in volumes of all shapes and sizes, and of all ages from 1885 to 1923, which last was the year when the posthumous work "A Hind in Richmond Park" appeared in America. And I had so associated the qualities of certain books with their bindings that when I saw their titles standing in the stately green row of this final edition I was both delighted and uncomfortable. Perhaps the old quality had gone with the old binding. But I had only to open, for instance, "Idle Days in Patagonia" to realize how well Hudson had stood the test of elaborate and beautiful publication. On the sixth and seventh pages I read this in the clear, spacious type he so perfectly deserves:

From the summit of the sandy ridge we saw before us an undulating plain, bounded only by the horizon, carpeted with short grass, seared by the summer sun, and sparsely dotted over with a few sombre-leafed bushes. It was a desert that had been a desert always, and for that very reason sweet beyond all scenes to look upon. . . . To my mind there is nothing in life so delightful as that feeling of relief, of escape, and absolute freedom which one experiences in a vast solitude, where man has perhaps never been, and has, at any rate, left no trace of his existence.

In that passage all of Hudson came back. It is, I think, the essential man speaking—the man who through twenty-four varied volumes and through a long series of friendships with some of the most interesting people in England remained gauntly alone, remained fiercely content with the world he had made for himself out of sand and tree and bird; out of almost everything, indeed, except man. The greatest literary naturalists—for another example take Thoreau—have loved solitude in some such way as Hudson did, and possibly for some such reason; solitude is the scene in which they come to life, the medium out of which they seem to walk and into which they would like to return. At any rate it is in those terms that I see Hudson. If it is not a whole view of this man who possessed so many parts, it is at least a clear view of him.

CHAPEL HILL

He wrote seven volumes of fiction, among which are "The Purple Land" and "Green Mansions." But it is not important fiction because it is the work of a man who was not really interested in men. Such of it as runs into autobiography is good, as all Hudson's autobiography is good. For mostly he treated himself, whether explicitly as in his masterpiece, "Far Away and Long Ago," or implicitly as in the fifteen volumes of essays which he devoted to animals, landscapes, birds, and only incidentally men. The sixteen volumes together compose as impressive a record as I know of one man's walk across the earth. Hudson, first in South America and then in England, walked an earth whose desolation for him was redeemed as much as might be by the beautiful strange cries of birds—everywhere these are sounding through his books, everywhere he is stopping to hear them and to make one more effort to do them justice in the words he worked so scrupulously to employ. Other things are there—a shepherd and his dogs, a hind in the city, a puma in La Plata, a yew tree in Hampshire with the graves of a whole village beneath it, a vole that runs across the road, an adder on a warm stone, a farmer's wife who smiles and gives him tea—but when these things have had their say there remains the man who walked doggedly on with some secret in his soul and who endured the earth best when across the waste of a favorite marsh there floated the voice of a hidden, awaited bird. Hudson was a wise man who had read many books and whose own books are rich in the human way. His ultimate commentary upon humankind, however, is the value he set upon a pair of wings in a lonely sky.

Fiction Shorts

Day's End. By H. E. Bates. The Viking Press. $2.

Twenty-five short tales by the author of "The Two Sisters," one of the most interesting of last year's first novels. These stories are frankly conceived in the tradition made famous by Katherine Mansfield. They are all short, poignant studies of little, frustrated lives, done with gravity and honesty. They fail to achieve real distinction largely because, while Mr. Bates's situations are invariably tragic, his people are not. They are too simply conceived and too briefly rendered. Mr. Bates's lean narratives remind one frequently of a dictum that seems obvious enough to be true: the trouble with short stories is that they are too short.

Vasco. By Marc Chadourne. Translated by Eric Sutton. Preface by Ford Madox Ford. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.50.

An extremely interesting novel which is unfortunately spoiled by a misty-mystic conclusion. Here is perhaps the clearest presentation in modern fiction of the deracinated post-war young Frenchman. Vasco's restlessness, his escape-longings, his desire to absorb elemental quietness in far-off Tahiti, and his recurrent disillusion are all characteristic of France's lost generation. It is the powerful handling of this central theme rather than the accidental de-romanticizing of the South Sea myth which gives the book its arresting quality.

King Akhnaton. A Chronicle of Ancient Egypt. By Simeon Strunsky. Longmans, Green and Company. $2.50.

Superficially this is a carefully documented historical novel dealing with the attempted political and social reforms of the "heretic king" Akhnaton and their tentatively tragic end. Actually it is a subtle roman à clef in which a parallel is drawn between the ideals of Akhnaton and those of Woodrow Wilson. We have learned to expect from Mr. Strunsky witty and incisive political analysis. We are not disappointed. As a novel, however, the book is not at all points satisfactory, suffering as it does from the great weakness of all romans à clef: our atten-

Books in Brief

The Natural History of Revolution. By Lyford P. Edwards. The University of Chicago Press. $1.75.

Professor Edwards has written an extremely suggestive book. In opposition to those who regard revolutions as more or less isolated phenomena chiefly distinguished by violence and social disruption, he undertakes to show, primarily from a study of the Puritan Revolution in England and the later revolutions in America, France, and Russia, that a revolution has its place in the evolutionary course of things, that its origin, rise, decline, and end present features which admit of generalization, and that much of the popular conception of what a revolution is like is untrue. Every great revolution develops slowly, and reaches an advanced stage only when, among other things, the allegiance of the intellectuals has been won and those who still hold power resort to oppression. Misery and oppression, however, he insists, have been greatly overstressed, as have the violence and bloodshed commonly pointed to as a characteristic of revolutionary mobs. The aim of revolution is always peace, not continued disorder, and as soon as the resistance of what remains of the old order has been broken, the work of reconstruction begins. The latter end of a revolution, on the other hand, is undramatic; it "dies out in a curiously insignificant and almost inconsequential way," leaving as a part of its legacy a period of economic chaos with which the new revolutionized order must deal. Professor Edwards admits that his study is incomplete, and that the history of minor revolutions probably has a good deal of light to throw upon the general subject. As far as he has gone, however, he has made a historical and sociological contribution of sterling quality.

This is a history of England seen through a microscope focussed upon the village of Hitchin—a rich work of creative research.

Quantitative Methods in Politics. By Stuart A. Rice. Alfred A. Knopf. $3.25.

This book expresses the present-day tendency to study social phenomena in a realistic manner. This method can be traced as far back as Aristotle, and in our own generation has been long advocated by the Webbs, Graham Wallas, and Walter Lippmann, to mention only major prophets. In the first part of the book Professor Rice discusses the problem of methodology in the social sciences. It is rather doubtful whether the author is here fully confident of himself. His analysis perhaps does not attain the solidity of that of Professor Catlin. The bulk of the book, moreover, is devoted to a statistical survey of certain subjects of political import. These studies are interesting and ingenious, and will most likely be followed up by more elaborate and ambitious efforts by other investigators. Yet it is reasonably arguable that if the present

Adventures of an African Slaver: Being a True Account of the Life of Captain Theodore Canot, Trader in Gold, Ivory and Slaves on the Coast of Guinea: His Own Story as Told in the Year 1854 to Brantz Mayer. Now Edited with an Introduction by Malcolm Cowley. Illustrated by Covarrubias. Albert and Charles Boni. $4.

This is an intermittently interesting account of the new contraband slave trade which developed after the Napoleonic wars, a trade which, as Mr. Cowley points out in his excellent introduction, closely resembled our own bootlegging industry (or Stiefelkunst, as Mr. Mencken's latest contribution would have it) not only in its romantic glamor, its violence and pitilessness and its tendency to develop a highly piratical type of freebooter, but in the actual technique of its illegal operations. Captain Canot's life seems to have been one colorful round of murders, mutinies, massacres, and mulatto mistresses. Despite all the Trader Hornish exaggeration of some of the episodes, the Captain's brutal casualness enables us to feel clearly that remarkable psychology which the highly moral Victorian age developed, a psychology that enabled them to think of black human beings purely in terms of merchandise and bills of exchange, as so much perambulating coinage. The illustrations by Covarrubias, done too obviously from photographs or sketches and executed with too single an eye to melodramatic effect, are hardly representative of his most genuine talents.

The Temptation of Anthony and Other Poems. By Isidor Schneider. Boni and Liveright. $2.

Mr. Schneider is best known as a poet for his long title-piece, a "novel in verse" which first appeared in "The American Caravan" and is here reprinted. Like the shorter poems in the volume, it is rich with energy and suggestion, though so heavily packed that it makes difficult going for the reader. The whole book, however, is the work of a deeply and strangely gifted mind; the thinness of contemporary verse will be immediately forgotten by anyone who opens it and reads it with the attention it demands.

Bambi. A Life in the Woods. By Felix Salten. Translated by Whittaker Chambers. Simon and Schuster. $2.50.

In the admirable prose of Whittaker Chambers this Viennese idyl of the woods—or so it has been called—comes as a very fresh gift from Europe to the United States. It is hardly a cheerful book, since its burden is the brutality of man, the animal with the acrid smell, toward other animals—in this case the deer. Bambi, a young deer, grows up in the book and learns wisdom chiefly from a remarkable old stag whom he meets from time to time in the forest. Their conversations, like the other conversations which Bambi has with the male and the female of his kind, are perhaps as good as such things can be, and the whole work is certainly good. But we should like to see the thing done once without conversation. It would be both more moving and more convincing.

Sophocles' King Oedipus. A Version for the Modern Stage. By William Butler Yeats. The Macmillan Company. $1.50.

Mr. Yeats's latest collection of poems, "The Tower," shows him old and tired, though still a poet with whom very few of his contemporaries deserve to be compared. Sailing to Byzantium, the first and best piece in the collection, is a declaration for the deathless and the abstract—an appropriate gesture for a poet with Mr. Yeats's past to make. And it is one the success of which should be recorded; though it should be said that anyone seeking for the first time an acquaintance with Mr. Yeats's poetry should begin farther back than this and grow old with

The Noble Savage. A Study in Romantic Naturalism. By Hoxie Neale Fairchild. Columbia University Press. $5.

A full and highly intelligent study of an idea which ran through English literature—and of course through European literature—in the seventeenth, eighteenth, and nineteenth centuries, and which still, according to Wyndham Lewis, ferments in the contemporary mind, where it takes the form of an inferiority complex felt by the white man of the Western world in the face of his black and red brothers. Mr. Fairchild traces the idea of the noble, innocent, pure, and uncontaminated savage through a great deal more literature than any public will ever want to revive, yet emerges with conclusions—not only about the creature of his research but about romanticism in general—which are of genuine interest.

A Leaf of Grass from Shady Hill. With a Review of Walt Whitman's Leaves of Grass. Written by Charles Eliot Norton in 1855. With an explanatory preface by Kenneth Ballard Murdock. Printed for the John Barnard Associates by the Harvard University Press.

Mr. Murdock seems to establish that the poem and the review here given, the one for the first time and the other in a reprint from Putnam's Monthly for September, 1855, are by Charles Eliot Norton; but there is not much to say beyond that. The poem, A Leaf of Grass, is evidently the work of one just come under the influence of the newly published first edition of "Leaves of Grass," but it is a very feeble performance in itself; and the review of Whitman, while it is, of course, interesting as proving Norton's concern with the subject, betrays none of the enthusiasm which Mr. Murdock attributes to it. The whole story, however, has its importance, and Mr. Murdock's best labor has been done in writing the history in a preface of Norton's attitude toward the bard of Manahatta.

Carlyle, His Rise and Fall. By Norwood Young. William C. Morrow and Company. $3.50.

Like Nietzsche and other dealers in paradox, Carlyle may be represented as the purveyor of much silly and dangerous doctrine by anyone who will wrench sayings out of their historical context or quote a vigorously stated half-truth while suppressing the equally vigorous statement of the qualifying half-truth. Mr. Young has used these methods without the charm of style and sparkle of malice which we have come to expect in the present tradition of iconoclastic biographies. His compilation of Carlyle's historical errors, not exceptional in the treatment of his subjects at his time, may give a salutary shock to hero-worshippers. But even the unsophisticated will hardly credit his revamping of the charge that Carlyle's German sympathies were a cause of the World War.

The Interpreter Geddes: The Man and His Gospel. By Amelia Defries. Horace Liveright. $3.

John A. Hobson has said that "among the great thinkers and workers of our age, Patrick Geddes is perhaps the least widely recognized." This skilful portrait of the man by his student-friend, Miss Defries, renders the great service of making more clearly known his thought and achievement. Myriad-sided though his activity has been, he has expressed himself consistently as a biologist through teaching; but he has taught mainly by planting gardens and planning cities. The poet is in his blood and takes honors in his philosophy, yet his creations have been not castles in Spain but solid habitations—Outlook Tower, Edinburgh; St. Andrews University, Dundee; the Encyclopaedia Britannica; the Ghent International Exhibition; the Civic Pageant at Indore; the University of Bombay; a life of Sir J. C. Bose; the University of Jerusalem; the Collège des Ecossais, Montpellier. All this in very deeds, while specialists in varying fields, ranking Patrick Geddes, use the

The NEW MORALITY

By Durant Drake

THE old morality, founded on tradition and respect for authority, is being reformed in the social crucible by a scientific, experimental attitude toward morals. Where is the jazz age going? How may those entrusted with the guidance of youth help to contrive a new morality, new codes of conduct which are consonant with the spirit of a world moving rapidly from old standards? Durant Drake discusses, in a detached and enlightened manner, the many problems of personal and group conduct that are now perplexing thoughtful men and women. This first volume in the new Philosophy for the Layman Series is a very human and readable survey for all those who are working toward a new moral thoughtfulness and a better technique for securing the common good.

The book gives the essence of a rare personality and the best of his thoughts. It is bound to interest the intelligent reader and it should find a place in every educational library, where it cannot fail to give inspiration to students whose habits of mind are being formed.

names of Leibnitz, Aristotle, Pythagoras, Bacon, Kant, and Darwin.

The Pilgrim's Progress. By John Bunyan. With fourteen illustrations after William Strang. The Bunyan Anniversary Society: G. A. Baker and Company, New York, agents. $5.

Bound in an excellent blue buckram, this volume does very well as a memorial to Bunyan in the three hundredth year after his birth. It is handsomely printed in Holland, and the etchings by William Strang are admirably reproduced. These in themselves are works of the most subtle and appealing sort, though it may be questioned whether in their soft simplicity they render the frosty peasant light of Bunyan's genius as it should be rendered. They are both more realistic and more refined than he probably would have liked.

Doctor Arnold of Rugby. By Arnold Whitridge. Henry Holt and Company. $5.

In this scholarly volume Dr. Arnold's educational theories are carefully examined by his great-grandson. Briefly, Dr. Whitridge's thesis is that, instead of being in the rear of Victorian experiments in education, politics, and religion, Dr. Arnold was actually in the vanguard. Dr. Whitridge substantiates his arguments by presenting an imposing array of textual citations and footnotes.

A Dog-Puncher on the Yukon. By Arthur T. Walden. Houghton Mifflin Company. $3.50.

A middle-aged survivor of the Klondike madness of '98 has been persuaded to recount his hoary reminiscences, and the result is a volume that is not unworthy to be placed by Mark Twain's "Life on the Mississippi." The astounding knowledge of the minutiae of their trade that Mississippi pilots had at their fingers' ends is almost rivaled by the information that Mr. Walden picked up as a dogsled runner in the great Alaskan Gold Rush. Furthermore, he has Mark Twain's love of breaking a narrative at any point to relate a salty adventure, his eye for the grossly picturesque, his sentimentality about mountains, his everlastingly conversational tone, and not a little of his Brobdignagian robustness.

Bryan the Great Commoner. By J. C. Long. D. Appleton and Company. $3.50.

Though never profound, this book is frequently penetrating and always readable. Mr. Long is perhaps too fair-minded to be a great biographer, but he is a thoroughly competent one.

All Kneeling. By Anne Parrish. Harper and Brothers. $2.50.

Chosen by the Booksellers Association as their first book of the month, this novel is a clever demolition of a stupid, vain, selfish, posturing woman who succeeded, so the author alleges, in keeping her world at her feet. Selfish, vain posturing women sometimes do. But it is a bit difficult to conceive the type of youth who would have been moved to admiration rather than amusement by Christobel's preposterous literary speeches. The book would have been cleverer if its arch fiend had possessed some of those redeeming qualities that are to be found in good and bad alike, in Mephistopheles and Aimee Semple McPherson, in Beatrice D'Este and Louis XI. It is a caricature rather than a portrait, and a full-length novel seems too liberal a canvas for its meager lines.

Rising Wind. By Virginia Moore. E. P. Dutton and Company. $2.50.

This is a historical romance of the time of the Civil War with passages of real feeling embedded in a sentimental, unreal, and unconvincing tale which, for this reviewer at least, completely lacks that ability to transport the reader into another world which is the first essential for the writer of romances, good or bad.

The Central Americans. By Arthur Ruhl. Charles Scribner's Sons. $3.

The book is subtitled "Adventures and Impressions Between Mexico and Panama," and is the running account of a journey northward through the Central-American republics—a second visit after an interval of fifteen years. The "adventures" consist of the commonplace mishaps to any voyager in tropical countries unprepared for the tourist. The "impressions" are conventional description, an occasional anecdote, a smatter of recent history, a few data concerning commerce, agriculture, and population, the author's views on the benevolence of United States aims in the Caribbean—the whole generously seasoned with foreign words and phrases—some incorrectly rendered. In the absence of Baedekers for the tropics such a collation may be useful to mid-winter, thirty-day Caribbean cruisers who want to retain the names of the countries visited, their capitals, and whether the chief product is bananas or coffee. Those who seek new or vital information about glamorous regions still largely unrevealed, or savor akin to that of the better South Sea literature, will find neither. Mr. Ruhl obviously had the correct letters of introduction, met and was entertained by the right people, has a kind word for everybody, and has brought forth another travel stereotype for a region which could yield the equivalent of a "Bible in Spain," an "Arabia Deserta," or a "Viva Mexico!"

The Orchestra Merger

THE months that have passed since the announcement have not revealed to me any of the blessings that should result from abolishing the New York Symphony Orchestra and its concerts, and combining its subscription list and board of directors with those of the Philharmonic. The official announcement offered me only nonsense, which editorial comment has gravely accepted as its initial assumptions. For example, the notion that the Philharmonic's concerts would gain artistically from the increased financial backing; when it was clear that no matter how many more millionaires paid its deficit, the orchestra would play under Mengelberg or Toscanini in the future as it had played in the past. There were decided gains from the merger, but they were all economic and accrued almost entirely to Mr. Flagler; while it is easily shown that the no less decided losses accrued solely to art.

It is a loss, for one thing, to disband an orchestra of the quality of the New York Symphony, which needed only a first-rate conductor to demonstrate that it, too, could be first-rate. Thus, under Goossens it gave the most brilliant of all the performances of Stravinsky's "Sacre" in New York, and under Bruno Walter and Gabilowitch it distinguished itself again. One of these men should, then, have been retained, or one or another of the brilliant conductors in and about New York secured, as no doubt he could have been for a price (this was all that was needed to lure Toscanini himself away from the Philharmonic). Instead the Symphony Society held on to the third-raters, and finally it quit because they did not fill the hall, as a first-rate conductor would eventually have done. Next year's Philharmonic concerts for former New York Symphony subscribers are already oversubscribed.

This, however, is itself an artistic loss. The excitement and tension at recent Philharmonic concerts have been disturbing; and so have been the people whom the excitement has caused to occupy the last available seats. I long for the time when I listened to a Philharmonic concert in a hall that was not completely filled; in an atmosphere, therefore, that permitted me to hear.

That was the time, incidentally, when I could buy a ticket for the program that interested me, instead of having to buy a whole set of tickets (and being glad to get them) for programs I do not know in advance and most often do not care to hear when they are announced.

And in this matter of programs, too, there is bound to be artistic loss. With the decrease in the total number of concerts there is bound to be a decrease in the already insufficient number of performances of the less hackneyed works; and this also because it was the New York Symphony, of the two orchestras, whose programs were the slightly less routine, the slightly more adventurous (and it was precisely for the New York Symphony that one could obtain single tickets). If at least Mr. Damrosch could make proper use of the opportunities created by his leisure, his freedom from the responsibilities of the routine conductor, his residence in America; if only he would justify his retention as guest conductor by making his few programs out of all the music which the visiting conductors neglect; but it is a safe bet that instead he will show that he can play what the others play.

The Philharmonic subscription series would better have been divided in two for Philharmonic subscribers. That would have relieved the pressure upon the Philharmonic concerts; it might even have caused a few seats to remain empty. But this blessing is precisely what the present arrangement—of dividing the Philharmonic concerts between Philharmonic and New York Symphony subscribers—was designed to avoid; increased pressure is what it was designed to achieve. For it is precisely the last few empty or filled seats that determine artistic policies for the poverty-stricken millionaires who manage our orchestras.

Drama

Genius on the West Coast

OUT of Jim Tully's "Jarnegan" two gentlemen named Beahan and Fort have made a play of the same name now to be seen at the Longacre Theater. It gets off to an encouraging start, for there is a refreshing cynicism in the atmosphere and a promise that Hollywood is about to be described by someone with an eye for its ribald absurdity. But from the moment the earnest young blue-stocking comes upon the scene things begin to go from bad to worse, and before long the dramatists—aided and abetted by the author whom they are adapting—have got themselves so involved in "star-dust" and "dreams" that even a caption writer might envy them their diction, and what started out to be a satire on the movies becomes a very good imitation of a Deluxe Super Feature. (Ask your Naborhood Theater when it is coming.)

Jarnegan, it seems, was a wild fighting Irishman who arrived at the dignity of riding breeches and a megaphone by way of jail, ditch-digging, and a medicine show. For a time he pandered to the taste of his employers and seemed subdued to the stuff he worked in, but in his heart he agreed with the blue-stocking and once he was firmly established he began to turn to those Finer Things which, in the other arts, do not cost any more than vulgarity but which, for some reason or other, can never be achieved in the movies with less than three thousand supers for the mob scene and a couple of million dollars for running expenses. It was here that the trouble began. The New York office grew restive and the local managers decided to frame a scandal on Jarnegan in order to get rid of him via the morality clause in his contract. It goes without saying, however, that the plot does not succeed and that the scandal is really fixed where it belongs upon the narrow shoulders of a man whom the audience has never liked anyway; but Jarnegan gives up what he would not allow to be taken from him. The magician of the silver screen, the one hope of the movies, goes out the door. The motley collection of pimps and tarts (pardon me if I adopt the dialect of the play) collected at Nathan Leedman's mid-night orgy is wrong if it believes that he will waste his talents in that atmosphere. For him the movies have been merely a stepping stone on the way toward what the prose poets of Hollywood call symbolically the "Dawn," the "Stars," or, sometimes, just the plain "Future."

Now the chief defect of the play lies in the fact that no one except the authors can be made to believe in the greatness of Jarnegan. They have given him all the vices which are popularly supposed to go with the Strong Man but nothing about their rough diamond is convincing except his roughness. He bellows his defiance, he spits on the floor, he drinks large quantities of gin, and he speaks very roughly indeed to all the adoring women who sleep with him whenever he is so inclined, but in the best of his better moments he says nothing which serves to distinguish him from any ghost-writer on Photoplay who is explaining in behalf of some flapper-star how seriously she takes her duty of expressing the great heart of America. As he makes his final exit he explains in a broken voice that he is "just a dung heap in search of a lily," and though that phrase is perfect cinema it is not convincing as the utterance of a man about to transcend the celluloid.

Jim Tully is known as a brutal realist. His picturesque career as hobo, prize fighter, and circus roustabout is generally accepted as prima facie evidence that he is the real thing in hard-boiled literature and it is, indeed, perfectly true that he is an excellent writer as long as he confines himself to the realistic description of low life. But there is no more naïve assumption than that which takes it for granted that the man who has seen much of the seamy side has of necessity what we call a "tough mind," for a "tough mind" is certainly a very different thing from the "mind of a tough." The heart which beats under a ragged coat is very often not only honest but sentimental as well, and there is no one who is more easily taken in by meretricious ideals than the man who has spent most of his life where there are very few, meretricious or otherwise, to be found. Now though these generalizations are not to be applied to Mr. Tully in any offensive fashion and though it is possible that he saw in Hollywood some genius whom he has been unable to draw, it is far more likely that he was himself taken in by the same sort of bluff which took in Hollywood itself. Personally I never met anyone really "hard-boiled" who had not spent most of his time learning to see through the pretense and the rhetoric of the high-falutin in those books and pictures where they express themselves most persuasively, and I have never found a triple-brass cynicism acquired anywhere except in a library. Moreover, the freest use of "hells" and "damns" is perfectly consistent with a cherubic gullibility where "aspirations" are concerned, as "Jarnegan" well proves, for it is at once profane and guileless.

In the present production Richard Bennett plays the hero with obvious enjoyment and with a fine sense of the external possibilities of the role. It does not appear to have any internal ones.

"This Thing Called Love" (Maxine Elliott's Theater) is an unpretentious but quite diverting comedy which undertakes to prove that two reasonable and considerate people almost inevitably lose all sense of the decency due from one person to another when they fall in love. The generalization is at least as true as any other ever made about the Thing in question, and the play, fragile as it is, is about as amusing as any to be seen at the present moment—when, as a matter of fact, nothing excruciatingly amusing or remarkably profound is to be discovered on Broadway.

"New Moon" (Imperial Theater) is a musical operetta with competent principals including Gus Shy, a comic with a sense of humor. There is extravagant but tasteful costuming, and music which, if reminiscent, is generally tuneful.

A PROMPT AND ENTHUSIASTIC response has been made to The Nation's poll of its subscribers in the United States to learn their preferences among the candidates for President. Up to and including October 8, scarcely a week after the ballots were mailed, 6,414 votes had been received—mostly, of course, from east of the Mississippi River. Of these Smith (Democrat) has 3,338 votes; Thomas (Socialist) 1,401; Hoover (Republican) 1,227; Foster (Communist) 231; Will Rogers (Anti-Bunk) 14; Varney (Prohibition) 9; Reynolds (Socialist-Labor) 7. In 187 cases ballots were returned stating that the recipients were undecided. Half of the total return as of October 8 was from New York State, where Smith had 1,771 votes, Thomas 783, Hoover 406, Foster 156. Illinois gives 362 votes to Smith, 194 to Hoover, and 154 to Thomas, while Massachusetts gives 183, 125, and 105 votes to the same candidates. New Jersey returns 229 ballots for Smith, 108 for Hoover, and 106 for Thomas, while Pennsylvania gives the same men 300, 131, and 92 votes respectively. Against these figures, indicating the preferences of the more progressive-minded voters, may be set the results of the poll of the Literary Digest, indicative of the more average citizenry. According to a tabulation in the issue of October 6, 514,397 votes had been cast for Hoover; 231,061 for Smith; 4,033 for Thomas; 1,972 for Foster. Of those choosing Hoover 54,789 voted Democratic in 1924. The Smith vote reveals the striking fact that 100,419 such ballots are from persons who voted Republican in 1924 as against only 85,203 who voted Democratic.

THAT HERBERT HOOVER added to his reputation for statesmanship by his speech at Elizabethton, Tennessee, no discriminating and unbiased person can assert. In the main he followed the policy he has laid down for his campaign—dwelling upon the prosperity of our people and boasting of our own country. The Scripps-Howard newspapers tried desperately to interpret him as indorsing the government ownership and operation of Muscle Shoals, but he would not be budged from his allegiance to the Coolidge policy. In a supplementary statement he makes it clear that he does not advocate the government operation of Muscle Shoals for electric power, which is the crux of the whole problem. At Elizabethton, in a panegyric on the home, he said:

From the homes of America must emanate that purity of inspiration only as a result of which we can succeed in self-government. I speak of this as a basic principle that should guide our national life. I speak of it as the living action of government in the building of a nation. I speak of it as the source from which government must itself rise to higher standards of perfection from year to year.

After reading this we are quite ready to admit that Herbert Hoover is a worthy successor to Calvin Coolidge in the art of putting words together which mean precisely nothing. It remains only for Mr. Hoover to discover the Ten Commandments and he will have reached the zenith of the oratory of statesmen in America. If he has not yet achieved this goal, he trotted out all his old stalking-horses, declaring at once that it is the Government's duty to put prosperity into the home and to see that bureaucracy does not throttle business.

NOW, MR. HOOVER made this speech about the Government's putting "material benefit and comfort into the home" in a town in which, according to the Socialist National Campaign Committee, working hours average ten or more per day. In the large rayon plant there, some three thousand girls and women are employed who begin at eight dollars a week! But waiving that, there is one most serious aspect of Mr. Hoover's speech. Whether intentionally or otherwise, he gives the impression that he has gone over to the Southern point of view on the Negro question. Thus he declared that there are no longer "mental or physical boundaries" and that "we have the same hearts and the same ideals and aspirations." This the South will interpret in only one way. Again, even the New York Times is startled by his statement: "I believe further that appointive offices must be filled by those who deserve the confidence and respect of the communities they serve." The Times perceives clearly that this, too, will mean only one thing in Southern ears. It declares that these words "will be taken there as tantamount to a promise not to appoint colored men as postmasters, United States marshals, or federal collectors of internal revenue." It will be universally accepted as meaning that if Hoover is elected he will do his best to make the Republican organization in the South "lily white." This lends particular timeliness to the article by Dr. W. E. B. Du Bois, which we print elsewhere in this issue. It is a shameful record that both of the leading candidates have made on the Negro question, and ought finally to convince Negro voters that they should cut loose from both Republicans and Democrats.

THE NEW BEDFORD STRIKE came to an inconclusive and unsatisfactory ending when the conservative local unions of the American Federation of Labor accepted a compromise wage-cut of 5 per cent against the advice of their own national officers. The original 10 per cent cut which precipitated the strike on April 16 would have reduced the average wage in New Bedford cotton mills to about $17 a week; the workers now go back with a wage slightly above $18. Was the extra dollar a week worth fighting for when the sufferings of 27,000 workers and their families are reckoned in the balance? We believe that it was worth fighting for if it had been accompanied by a thorough-going victory for labor organization in the mills. As it is, the workers are going back to work as badly organized as they were before the strike and with no adequate protection against future wage-cuts. The leaders of the conservative unions in New Bedford are honorable men who felt that they were making the best possible bargain for starving workers when they accepted the wage-cut—and no one who has an overcoat, coal, and three meals a day has the right to condemn them for compromising. But they showed a lamentable lack of foresight in not pressing more vigorously for union recognition and collective-bargaining machinery. The manufacturers in the final settlement agreed not to make wage changes in the future without a thirty-day notice, but the union is recognized only by inference.

MEANWHILE LEFT-WING LEADERS who control several thousand Portuguese strikers in New Bedford are attempting to continue the strike on their own account. They are denouncing the settlement as a betrayal, defying the police, and continuing their picket lines. They point out, what is undoubtedly true, that the great majority of the strikers were not involved in the settlement and had no voice in the vote. (Of course it can also be pointed out that the great majority of the strikers had no part in calling the strike.) Their protest has much to justify it, but the hope of continuing the strike to a completely successful conclusion is faint. The left-wing leaders are effective agitators, but they have not demonstrated the kind of wisdom which is required to deal with employers in peaceful negotiation. Most of the strikers have accepted the compromise of the conservative unions and have applied for reinstatement in the mills. The community has stood solidly with the strikers from the beginning of the strike, but the tragic fact emerges that a little group of willful employers can starve a whole community into subjection. While New Bedford employers denounce the Communists for preaching violence, these same employers have scored a partial victory against the almost unanimous moral judgment of their community by using the accepted, traditional force of class control in industry.

WHILE THE PUBLIC UTILITIES were spending millions to tell their side of the story to the public (but thriftily passing these millions on to the public to be paid on their light and gas bills and street railway fares), they were unwilling to let their own people listen to the other side of the story. They would not have Senator George Norris speak to them. They hesitated even to have Josephus Daniels, whom they considered as "harmless" as any government-ownership advocate, address a power conference unless they had someone carefully planted to answer him. Professor J. A. Switzer of the University of Tennessee, secretary of the Southern Appalachian Power Conference, wrote to Joseph Hyde Pratt, chairman of the executive committee of the conference, with regard to inviting Mr. Daniels to address the conference at Chattanooga, Tennessee, last year: "Now, if we were sure that we had somebody ready to answer the arguments of Mr. Daniels, and prepared to correct any misstatements of fact, which are the stock in trade of men like Senator Norris, I would certainly favor inviting Mr. Daniels." Mr. Daniels did not address the conference. Whether it was because he refused an invitation or because the utilities interests found no one to answer him, and so did not invite him, was not brought out in the testimony before the Federal Trade Commission. The Nashville Banner published what Professor Switzer called "a very nasty editorial" about the conference. The writer was invited to speak, but not before some one had been primed to answer him. Yet sovereign States paid for memberships in this conference, and its officials exerted efforts to make it appear that the conference was not dominated by the power companies. Meanwhile, Professor Switzer's articles against government operation of Muscle Shoals were not submitted to magazines until after officials of the Alabama Power Company had approved them.

THAT IS AN ADMIRABLE STATEMENT which Senator Raoul Dandurand, Government leader in the Canadian Senate, has made upon the question of naval disarmament. Speaking in Paris, he declared that there could be no useful results from the work of the Preparatory Disarmament Commission of the League of Nations unless Great Britain and the United States made an appreciable reduction in their naval armaments. He continued thus:

Both have signed the Kellogg Treaty by which they forever renounce war between themselves. We cannot understand why an agreement cannot be reached between the two great English-speaking peoples, allowing that their fleets instead of being opposed in naval competition should be conjoined in the sole desire of assuring the peace of the world.

This is sound common sense except that we have no desire to see the conjoined fleet of the two great Anglo-Saxon nations imposing their will upon the world. Nor is it necessary that they should. But it is obvious that those who say that the Kellogg Treaties are already as dead as door-nails will have right on their side unless there is immediate disarmament. We have pointed out from the beginning the hypocrisy of the policy of having nations declare that they have renounced war for all time and then continue to remain armed to the teeth. As it is, President Coolidge has already announced that we shall go on with the big cruiser building program which was defeated by Congress last spring and that he expects to see it enacted as soon as Congress meets in December. The one hope is that the public opinion of the world, voiced by such men as Senator Dandurand, will make itself felt, to shame Great Britain and America into action.

FOR THE FIRST TIME since the brightly gilded Diaz days Mexico has a real symphony orchestra. It was organized by the National Philharmonic Syndicate, that is, the musicians' union, on a cooperative basis. It is aided financially from government sources and also by private subscription. Among the subscribers are most of the cabinet ministers, the president of the National University, and the American Ambassador. The orchestra is controlled by the syndicate and directed by Carlos Chavez, a composer well known outside of Mexico for his extremely personal, evidently Mexican, and honest work. Since the Diaz days ingenious bolstering has been necessary to keep the unfinished National Theater from sinking into the spongy site mistakenly chosen for it. This enormous and ornate structure, with its famous Tiffany glass curtain, was designed chiefly for grand opera by an Italian architect. The revolution of 1910—which overthrew Diaz—as well as the spongy site, proved the project to be over-ambitious. With the organization of a new orchestra, however, interest has again arisen in the sadly magnificent theater, and construction has been undertaken on funds provided by popular subscription reinforced with labor-union contributions.

THE VOYAGE OF RICHARD BYRD to the Antarctic has caught the imagination of America more completely than any expedition of discovery in many years, but it does not seem to us more dramatic and meaningful than the expedition of young Dr. Stratman-Thomas, who is going to the heart of Africa to conquer sleeping sickness. Most of our readers will ask: Who is Stratman-Thomas? He is a chevalier of modern science, only twenty-eight years old, who gained his Ph.D. and M.D. at the University of Wisconsin, studied the chemo-therapy of trypanosomiasis for five years, and then decided to try his knowledge on equatorial Africa where sleeping sickness kills 100,000 people a year. Armed with six arsenical compounds which scientists consider the most effective weapons in fighting the disease, he will push into the Belgian Congo, 1,500 miles up the Congo River, and turn central Africa into a vast laboratory with thousands of natives and horses as his clinical material. The special object of his attention will be the dreaded tsetse fly which carries the germs of sleeping sickness. This fly, which was present in America in prehistoric times, is believed to have killed by its germ-carrying attack the vast herds of horses that inhabited this continent—at least there seems no better explanation of the fact that there were no horses in America at the time of Columbus. If Dr. Stratman-Thomas succeeds in his expedition he will not only protect America from another invasion of the tsetse fly but he will do for the natives of Africa what the Rockefeller Institute did for our Southern mountaineers in destroying the hook worm.

ONE SURPRISING FACT has just been established by the National Industrial Conference Board in a study on "The Cost of Living in Twelve Industrial Cities." It costs an American industrial worker almost as much to support a family at a decency level in a small city as in a large city. The difference between minimum family budgets in Cleveland and Dayton is only ninety-two cents a week; the difference between Dayton and Marion is $1.18 a week. The Conference Board chose twelve industrial cities which were classified as large, medium, and small, and the greatest "spread" which it discovered in the cost of living was that of $4.19 a week between New York City and Marion, Ohio. A wage-earner who supports his family in Reading, Pennsylvania, needs only eleven cents a week less than a wage-earner in Philadelphia. Food and clothing cost more in Leominster, Massachusetts, than in Boston. Of course these estimates are for the minimum budget only; when luxury creeps in, the cost of living in the large cities leaps up prodigiously. But the figures make an interesting commentary on the transformation of the United States into a nation of large cities. In the great city the industrial worker finds higher wages and increased freedom because of the variety of possible jobs. He gains at least partial compensation for crowded tenements and smothering subways in the speed and excitement of metropolitan life. When he is forced to live at the subsistence level, he finds that the bill is only a trifle more than it is in the small city. It is not surprising that our large cities are growing steadily larger through the influx of industrial workers.

GATE CRASHERS at a polo game! Where is there a sacred spot left in these United States for monocles and spats? Five thousand people, excluded from the grandstands, overcrowded by many thousands at the final polo game between the United States and the Argentine, waited patiently for a half-hour outside the turnstiles until they saw in the distance the twinkling feet of polo ponies, then calmly brushed the policemen aside and "crashed" the gates. What they saw was an unforgettable spectacle, an American team overwhelming by sheer brilliance one of the strongest combinations in the world. Led by the only Tommy Hitchcock, the Americans captured the unofficial world's championship, and the public captured a new toy. It is a beautiful toy, this game of polo, and one of the most fascinating of sports to watch. Horses rolled on men and the men came up smiling; mallets flashed in the sunshine and drove balls with astonishing accuracy while riders were cavorting full tilt in the opposite direction; photographers snapped consciously unconscious society folk; over there in the box sat Lord So and So. The public gaped. Never again will polo be a joy for the aristocracy alone. The American people have crashed its gates.

Herbert Hoover as a Quaker

We feel bound explicitly to avow our unshaken persuasion that all war is utterly incompatible with the plain precepts of our divine Lord and Lawgiver, and the whole spirit of His Gospel, and that no plea of necessity or policy, however urgent or peculiar, can avail to release either individuals or nations from the paramount allegiance which they owe Him who hath said: "Love your enemies."

THUS reads the "Declaration of Some of the Fundamental Principles of Christian Truth," issued by the Richmond Conference of the Orthodox branch of the Religious Society of Friends in 1887. To its members of that faith are generally expected to conform. The Constitution for the American Yearly Meetings declares "The Friends believe war to be incompatible with Christianity and seek to persuade peaceful methods for the settlement of all the differences between nations and between men. Opposition to war and non-resistance to evil have been the historic fundamental tenets of the faith of brotherly love." It was for them that thousands upon thousands of Quakers let themselves be tortured, abused, starved, and killed, as has recently been set forth anew in Mary Best's "Rebel Saints." It is, moreover, the rule of the society that "if the member does not make such profession [of faith] when he reaches matured years, his name may be dropped from the list of members, at the discretion of the Monthly Meeting." This latter rule relates particularly to those who, like Herbert Hoover, have been admitted to the Quaker faith by inheritance. When a new member is admitted, he is examined by a pastoral committee to ascertain "whether he will conform to the Rules of Discipline"—which include abhorrence of war. Three times every year, as the discipline provides, there is to be read aloud in Monthly and Quarterly Meetings this query: "Do you maintain the Christian principle of peace and consistently refrain from bearing arms and from performing military service as incompatible with the precepts and spirit of the Gospel?"

When the World War came on, Herbert Hoover, the Quaker, was overcome by those pleas "of necessity, or policy, however urgent or peculiar" which the Declaration of Christian Truth expressly says shall never release individual Quakers from their "paramount allegiance" to love and not to fight their enemies. Mr. Hoover wanted us to go into the war, worked to put us into the struggle, and with tears in his eyes on occasion declared that he did not wish his children to grow up in this world if the German militarists prevailed—an amazing position for a professed Friend to take in view of the Quaker belief that any evil may be overcome by righteous living. Since he has become a candidate for the Presidency Mr. Hoover has been going regularly to Meeting; indeed he goes to both Hicksite and Orthodox Meetings. Yet he is quite willing to take, and sees no inconsistency whatever in taking, the oath of office—and, as a believing Quaker, to become Commander-in-Chief of the American army and navy. Can he even take the oath, or will he affirm? Quakers are constantly admonished to refrain "from taking or administering oaths." More than that, in his speech of acceptance he completely abandoned the Quaker doctrine that love and not force shall rule the world by declaring that while he is possessed of a deep passion for peace, he is for great armaments on land and sea, asserting "that in an armed world there is only one certain guarantee of freedom—and this is preparedness for defense."

That, we submit, is a complete throwing overboard of the fundamental Quaker spirit and teachings. Nor are we affected by the fact that technically Mr. Hoover is not a member of the Five Years Meeting group. The true Quaker spirit is what is at stake. Some time ago we dubbed him a renegade Quaker; we do not now withdraw these words. We are well aware, of course, that thousands of Quakers bore arms voluntarily on both sides of the Atlantic in the World War and that no action against them was ever initiated within the Society of Friends. We are aware, too, that the Declaration of Faith declares that "conscience should be free and that in the matter of religious doctrine and worship man is accountable only to God." We are aware, also, that in the Constitution of American Meetings are these words: "By this high calling the Friends are pledged to the proclamation of the truth wherever the spirit leads, both in home and in foreign fields." We are conscious that this was held to excuse the notorious A. Mitchell Palmer and other Quakers, who not only threw themselves into the war but countenanced some of its most anti-Christian acts.

Yet for us, as long as words are words and deeds are deeds, we cannot see anything else than a dreadful and inexcusable lapse from the faith in any Quaker's willingness to assume command of an army and navy. Moreover, Mr. Hoover during two Cabinets has connived at murder and violence by American forces in Haiti and Nicaragua in the face of his church's injunction that there is no situation in civil or national life that cannot be otherwise settled than by force of arms. Entitled to his conscience Herbert Hoover is; in justice to the Quakers themselves he should not have redoubled his attendance at Meeting, he should have withdrawn from Hicksite and Orthodox Meeting alike. He cannot now escape the charge of insincerity and of treason to the faith he professes.

We are glad to find ourselves in accord with many Quakers on this subject. There is the American Friend, the organ of his own sect. It writes thus in its issue of September 13: "We knew that Herbert Hoover had world experience, and we had hoped that out of that experience there would be born a high idealism for World Peace. We find it is otherwise. He whom we had expected to lead the world toward disarmament points toward preparedness." This attitude of Mr. Hoover is the more extraordinary because even his chief, Calvin Coolidge, whom he praises as a model of rectitude and statesmanship, has publicly uttered words that should have fallen from the lips of the Quaker. Speaking to the American Legion at Omaha on October 6, 1925, the President said: "In spite of all arguments in favor of great military forces, no nation ever had an army large enough to guarantee it against attack in time of peace or to insure its victory in time of war." And he added this exact statement of the Quaker belief: "We know and every one knows that these old [military] systems, antagonisms, and reliance on force have failed."

Roosevelt and Houghton

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT has done a noble and a most self-sacrificing act in consenting to accept the Democratic nomination for Governor of New York. Nobody could have blamed him if he had insisted on staying in private life to complete the laborious and exacting cure which he has had to follow since his attack of infantile paralysis. He has chosen to risk the retarding of the recovery of the use of his legs in order to serve his party and its leader, Governor Smith, to whom he is devoted. But he is also serving his State. For Mr. Roosevelt is precisely the type of man who ought to be in our public life—had he been born an Englishman he would have been in Parliament years and years ago. An independent anti-Tammany Democrat, he has graced public life every time he has entered it.

One may differ with Mr. Roosevelt, as The Nation did while he was Assistant Secretary of the Navy under Mr. Wilson, but one cannot challenge his integrity, his unselfishness, or his desire to do what is right in accordance with old-fashioned American principles. It goes almost without saying that, if his health is completely restored, he will probably be nominated some day for a still higher office than that of Governor.

As for Mr. Roosevelt's ability, there can be no question about that, or about the steadiness of his intellectual development. Facing a personal disaster which would have broken and taken the heart out of most men, Mr. Roosevelt has met it with heroic courage and complete serenity of spirit. The remarkable speech delivered by him on Governor Smith at the Democratic National Convention, entitled "The Happy Warrior," is not only a measure of Mr. Roosevelt's growth but one of the best written and most honest political utterances of recent years. Differing with him as we do on certain policies, we nevertheless unqualifiedly urge our readers to split their tickets if necessary and to vote for Mr. Roosevelt. His chief rival, Attorney General Ottinger, has shown himself unworthy of public trust in that he is absolutely wrong on the water-power question. His nomination is merely a sop to the Jewish voters of the cities of the State in order to draw them away from Governor Smith. It is a political subterfuge which deserves rebuke.

Last week we gave our support to Ambassador Houghton, who is the Republican candidate for the United States Senate from New York. The desirability of his election is a matter of moment far beyond the confines of the State. He is one of the few men in the diplomatic service of whom it can be said truthfully that they have the attributes of statesmanship. His entire influence has been thrown in the direction of good will, peace, and reconciliation in Europe. He is, it is true, a manufacturer who has profited by the American tariff; it has not kept him from realizing that the worship of tariffs can become an element of extreme danger to the world; that the tariffs of Europe are a grave hindrance to its recovery. But it is the question of peace and war which concerns him most deeply. His speech at the Harvard Commencement in June, 1927, upon which we commented at length in our issue of July 13, 1927, remains one of the most remarkable utterances recorded from the lips of a diplomat.

The Law and the Lady

IN the spring of 1927 Miss Mae West fell afoul of the law while appearing in New York City in a drama of her own composition entitled "Sex." At the time of her arrest Miss West was an obscure actress playing in a small side-street theater in the upper sixties and her performance had been seen by few except the assistant critics of the daily press. But a sentence of ten days in the workhouse made a Broadway celebrity out of her, and a new piece, "Diamond Lil," shared with "Strange Interlude" the distinction of being one of the few plays which survived through the summer just past into the present season.

One might reasonably suppose that these events would have convinced the police that if they really wished to suppress the redoubtable actress-author they had best proceed about the business in a manner as quiet as possible, but instead of doing anything of the sort they have just turned on the spotlight again and given not one but two spectacular performances. On the opening night of Miss West's latest drama, "Pleasure Man," they raided the theater while the audience was still present and hauled all the performers, still in costume, to the police station. Next day the producer secured an injunction against further police interference and gave a second performance to a crowded house, but the injunction was then vacated and at the following matinee the officers of the law repeated their dramatic spectacle. During the course of the second act they mounted the stage, stopped the show with upraised hand, and before a hysterically thrilled audience once more loaded all the players into a patrol wagon. Indictments have been returned against author, producer, and stage manager, as well as against the fifty-four actors, and a speedy trial is promised.

The Nation has no intention of rising passionately to the defense of Miss West. The best that even her admirers have found to say of her is that they consider the very raucousness of her vulgarity intriguing, and it is generally admitted that she had rendered no great services to either art or sociology by her examinations of the cruder phenomena connected with that force which gave its name to the first of her successful dramas. But we have always doubted that, in general, the good accomplished outweighed the attendant evils in any sort of police interference with books or plays or pictures and, more particularly, that there was any justification for spectacularly righteous crusades like the one at present under consideration. What except a desire for sensational display can account for twice raiding a play in the most public way possible, and why should detachments of police be twice dispatched to arrest alleged criminals from whom no violence was expected?

New York remains one of the most desperately lawless cities in the world. Only Chicago rivals it in the number or atrocity of its unpunished murders, and other crimes of violence are proportionately frequent. Surely it is not over-policed and surely it needs all the time of all the policemen it has to grapple with the violent section of its criminals. Just who was being robbed or who was being killed at the exact moments when the two raids took place we do not know, but even if the answer should happen to be "No one at all," we are nevertheless convinced that the police engaged in arresting a company of mild actors—upon whom it would have been necessary merely to serve a few formal papers—would have been better employed looking for, let us say, the parties who killed one of New York's citizens in the very midst of the Times Square district in plain daylight last spring.

Now the police have richly earned the right to plead the excuse of mere thick-headedness on most of the occasions when they blunder. In general, it is not only kind but just as well to assume that mere stupidity is sufficient to account for the more ridiculous of their antics. But in the present case it is to be doubted that mere innocence is sufficient to explain their conduct and that of those who sent them. Elections are approaching and how can the watchfulness of the force be more readily or safely demonstrated than by a timely and spectacular raid upon an allegedly vulgar theatrical performance—especially when all the newspapers are sure to give the exploit full publicity? Murderers are hard to catch and also ticklish to handle. They often get away and they often hurt policemen in endeavoring to do so, but Miss West could easily be found by looking up the address of her theater in any newspaper and there was no danger that she would shoot.

The usefulness of a campaign against the stage is exactly the same as that which the thief in public office conducts against the Bolsheviks or members of the Klan against the Roman Catholic church. All are easy, all are spectacular, and all furnish an admirable means of distracting the attention from something else. Who can doubt the rectitude of a man who stands up for Pure Womanhood? Who can doubt the efficiency of a police force which swoops down so crushingly upon allegedly reprehensible actors?

Science Says—

WHEN the flivver magnate talks about history or the elevator king about the higher learning for women, his divigations are generally described as peculiarly American. These Yankees, it is said (particularly by foreigners who demonstrate their familiarity with American traditions by applying that term indiscriminately to the Kentucky colonel and the Texas ranchman), think a knack for this or that particular trade implies a general omniscience and assume that a fortune made in can-openers confers upon the maker an intuitive understanding of international politics or biblical exegesis.

The truth of the matter is, however, that when the Henry Fords and the A. B. Sees reveal an itch to exploit their incompetence they are yielding to a very widespread human weakness and, if one may judge by the newspaper accounts, the distinguished gentlemen who assembled in Glasgow recently for the annual meeting of the British Association for the Advancement of Science spent a very considerable part of their time in exposing their opinions upon a subject about which they knew nothing at all—namely, the alleged immortality of the soul. Last year, if we remember correctly, Sir Arthur Keith wandered a very considerable distance from his subject, the antiquity of man, to express at length his personal agnosticism; this year, on the other hand, the believers seem to have it. Sir William Bragg, the new president, "declared his belief in the existence of a soul and a divine being after life," while Sir Oliver Lodge thumped a Bible and expressed his conviction that "the dead live on with bodies of ether."

Now the scientists have led us to believe that they differ from all ordinary human beings in that they hold no opinions except those which are based upon evidence. They are very contemptuous indeed of all lay knowledge and they like to give the impression that no brain specialist would dare have an opinion about the stomach and that no colloid chemist would presume, even in the privacy of his home, to venture a reflection upon crystallography. We therefore wonder just what discoveries have been made between the day when Sir Arthur Keith made last year's presidential address and the day when Sir William Bragg made his. One turns eagerly to the accounts of his speech, as well as those of Sir Oliver Lodge's discourse, and one is surprised to discover that their arguments are precisely those which have been in the mouths of every piously inclined layman for the last fifty years. Lodge spoke vaguely of the magnificence of the visible universe controlled by one law, and nothing is reported of Bragg except a profession of faith. Is it possible that these distinguished men, so careful where minutiae are concerned, are willing to lend the prestige of their names to the support of the most far-reaching guesses when they have no more information than anyone else to support them? Is it possible that Sir William Bragg not only knows as little about the soul as Henry Ford but also exhibits as hazy a sense of the qualifications upon which any expert's opinion must be founded? Apparently it is.

It is true that there is nothing new in all this. Newton consented to deduce theological opinions from his astronomical observations; Pasteur, as everybody knows, compared his faith to that of a peasant's wife; and Faraday was unwavering in his loyalty to a fundamentalist sect composed largely of illiterates. But Newton was merely being obliging and the last two at least spoke only as common men and never ex-cathedra when religion was discussed. They seemed, in a word, tacitly to acknowledge what the assembled British scientists do not—namely, that the implications which science has for faith are of such a very general sort that they are equally at the disposal of layman and specialist. On the one hand, it has provided mechanistic explanations for an enormous number of phenomena which were formerly accounted evidence of a super-intelligence controlling the universe; on the other hand, it has never solved all the mysteries. Add to these facts the very dubious experiments of Lodge and his fellows with their spiritualistic mediums and you have everything that counts. Two sophomores who have read Haeckel and Sir Oliver have all the pertinent knowledge that Keith or Bragg possess, so far as the evidences for or against immortality are concerned, since none of the details mastered by the experts carry one a single step further forward in either of those directions.

The medieval priesthood achieved an authority in matters of opinion hardly greater than that which the scientist now enjoys. A sentence which begins with "Science says" will generally be found to settle any argument in a social gathering or sell any article from tooth-paste to refrigerator; but it has generally been assumed by the more thoughtful that no real scientist was responsible for most of the dogmatic guesses thus vaguely introduced. It is too bad that the British Association has put "science" on record as saying either that there is or that there is not a soul. "Science" doesn't know and "science" owes a good deal to its reputation for candor.

It Seems to Heywood Broun

HERBERT HOOVER, the great cosmopolite, has put on whiskers and now pretends that his name is Babbitt and that he lives on Main Street. Although not all his campaign gestures have been effective I must admit that this particular impersonation is superb. In fact, I don't believe the man is acting. It was the earlier role which hung on mere histrionics. Depend upon it Herbert Hoover remained Iowan whether he was called to Belgium, China, Russia, or the Far East. Never has he gone native and the most unjust accusation raised against him is the familiar one that he is at heart an Englishman. That is a libel or, if you please, a gross piece of flattery, for Mr. Hoover is essentially a Middle Western Puritan. There are virtues in this clan. Out of such stock it is possible to get something as good as William Allen White of Kansas. Hoover is smaller than that. I would hardly rate him above the shoe top of the little Emporian.

Both men have a bond in the uneasy feeling that if a thing is foreign it must be in some way iniquitous. And Bill has travelled almost as widely as Herbert. However, there never was much in the notion that travel is invariably a process which broadens the wanderer. As like as not Hoover spent his leisure moments in Australia commenting on the climate of California and it would be entirely possible to note a pensive look in the eyes of White such times as he gazes at the winding Seine. His face is sad for in his heart a strident little voice reminds him, "It's not Emporia."

One thing in Hoover's personal platform puzzles me. Mindful of the reproach that Quakers do not fight he has lost few occasions to call for an army and a navy sufficient in size to command the respect of all the world. I wonder why. In the little red school house where he learned patriotism and elementary arithmetic he must have been taught that one American can lick a dozen Britishers any day in the week and at least fifty Frogs. Why, then, need our armies be considerable in numbers? If this suggestion seem mere fantasy let me include a passage from an interview with the Republican candidate. And this particular talk was printed in the Herald Tribune, a friendly paper with no desire to show up Mr. Hoover. John Steven McGroarty, an inquiring journalist, reports Mr. Hoover as saying that "The American acts quickly, he has initiative, he responds. And in these ways, as in many others, he is different from the European."

"In the countries in which he has had such tremendous experiences," continues McGroarty, "Mr. Hoover learned, often at serious cost, that only two or three men in an average European community can be depended on for intelligent action in an emergency, while in America practically the entire community can be depended upon. For instance, during the Mississippi flood, Mr. Hoover called upon ninety communities in the South to meet quickly and effectively sudden emergencies. They were called upon at forty-eight hours' notice to feed, shelter, and in every way care for sometimes thousands of refugees. And, of these ninety communities, only one failed to function. No such achievement could be hoped for in Europe."

In other words Mr. Hoover seemed to say that civilization in such States as Mississippi, Tennessee, and Arkansas has reached a level unknown in England, Germany, and France, not forgetting the Scandinavian. This seemed to me such a preposterous contention that I felt certain Mr. McGroarty had mistaken the intent of the candidate's words and that something of the real meaning had been lost in the translation into indirect discourse. Possibly this McGroarty, so I imagined, might be a Romish spy sent to confound Hoover and the Herald Tribune. Perhaps the reporter had labored at the mighty task of making a fool out of Hoover and the still more gigantic enterprise of making a fool out of the Tribune.

But the folly was mine. I had forgotten that Herbert Hoover was about to make a speech down in the Southland and when he gets a taste of votes the man goes wild and will claw any verity. McGroarty did Herbert no wrong. His words seem to have been reflected accurately enough for there appeared in his Elizabethton address an echo of the same conception of the Southern superman as compared with the weak, degenerate brood of Europe. This came in Mr. Hoover's eloquent tribute to Main Street, the place where so many voters live. He said:

When it came to the organization necessary to meet that great catastrophe the pressure of time alone made it necessary to rely wholly upon the leadership, intelligence, the devotion, the sense of integrity and service of hundreds of towns and villages on the border of the flood. . . . In the face of that terrific problem that would test the stamina and quality of any people there was not a failure in a single case. This perhaps stands out larger in my mind than in most men because under similar conditions of great emergency I have had the duty to organize populations abroad. And in no country does there exist the intelligence the devotion, the probity, the ability to rise to a great emergency that exists in the Main Street of the American town and village. I do not wish to disparage the usefulness of Broadway, Pennsylvania Avenue, or State Street but it is from Main Street and its countryside that the creative energies of the nation must be replenished and restored.

It may be observed that Herbert Hoover made two slight slips in this speech. For instance, he might just as well have disparaged Pennsylvania Avenue because no voters live along its length. That he seems to have forgotten for the moment. Also the percentage of American nobility and efficiency has gone up a little. In speaking to Mr. McGroarty, Hoover said that he called on ninety communities and that only one failed to function. However, it might readily seem to Southern voters that Herbert Hoover was nothing but a captious Yankee if he said that only eighty-nine out of ninety Southern communities were perfect. Moreover, even in the recalcitrant community there are voters, so in the speech we have the more rolling statement: "There was not a failure in a single case."

Indeed since the beginning of history there has never been known such nobility as exists among American voters. Here is the promised land and we are the chosen people. Each of us possesses three pounds of butter and a radio. Mr. Hoover is, of course, one of the mightiest among the speckless crew. Al may be the Happy Warrior but that's a name which fades beside the title won by Herbert. He is the Perfect Hypocrite.

HEYWOOD BROWN

Is Al Smith Afraid of the South?

By W. E. BURGHARDT DU BOIS

AL FRED SMITH is not the first American politician for whom the Negroes of the United States have proved a most embarrassing stumbling block. But seldom have the implications of this situation been so clear to all Americans who are willing to think.

Mr. Smith is posing as liberal. His attitude toward super-power, toward non-partisan appointments to office, and toward prohibition give him some color of right to this definition. Toward the greater and ever more pressing problems of the distribution of income and ownership of property, he is making tentative approach by noting the economic distress of the American farmer. But all this does not prove his case, and does not make his appeal to American liberals by any means clear; for he has also made desperate effort to reassure intrenched American capital that he cannot be counted as its enemy; that he will be considerate of corporations like General Motors; and that he will take care of the interests intrenched behind the tariff. All this would make liberal support of Mr. Smith debatable. But there is another matter where there can be no debate.

Mr. Smith is silent about the Negro. Why? Certainly it is not because he has no need of the Negro vote. Migration from South to North, and from country to city, has increased the effective vote which Negroes cast very appreciably over 1916, and considerably over 1920 and 1924. We must, of course, depend upon estimates instead of actual figures, but in States where the real battles of this campaign are apparently being fought, there is a large Negro vote: in New York, 150,000; in New Jersey, 75,000; in Ohio, 125,000; in Indiana, 70,000; in Illinois, 175,000; in West Virginia, 50,000; in Kentucky, 125,000; in Tennessee, 225,000; in North Carolina, 25,000; in California, 40,000. Even Massachusetts has 21,000 Negro voters, and Connecticut, 15,000. There are probably 60,000 Negro voters in Michigan and 125,000 in Missouri. Kansas has 35,000, Delaware, 15,000, and Maryland, 140,000. Of course, in the Southern hinterland, there is little chance that any appreciable Negro vote will be cast or counted. And yet in Virginia, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Texas, and Oklahoma the Negro vote of 100,000 might conceivably be of importance if any real rift were made in the governing oligarchy.

This is an asset that no astute politician—and no one has accused Mr. Smith of not being astute—would ordinarily neglect. Moreover, the Negroes are incensed against the Republican Party and against Mr. Hoover as never before. Some defection from the ranks of Negro Republicans was felt as early as 1912, and Woodrow Wilson went out of his way to encourage it. He openly promised Negroes "Justice and not mere grudging justice." Led by the late Bishop Alexander Walters, a Negro bureau was established at Democratic headquarters and a considerable Negro vote was cast for Woodrow Wilson. But the Wilson administration disappointed Negroes even more than it disappointed other people. Wilson refused to appoint the fact finding commission which he had promised to Oswald Garrison Villard; he refused to recognize the Negro in any important appointments; his whole Negro program succumbed to the Southern oligarchy, except during the war scare. By 1916 the revolt was well over and Negroes went back and voted with docility for Mr. Hughes.

In 1920, Cox made no appeal to the colored vote and it went almost solidly for Harding. In 1924, however, revolt began again. Davis was a favorite among West Virginia Negroes, and led by William H. Lewis, the Boston lawyer, many colored voters bolted Coolidge. But all this revolt was as nothing to that which was brewing among Negroes in 1928. If Al Smith would raise a finger to assure American Negroes that, while he was not necessarily a warm friend, at least he could not be classed as an enemy, he would receive more Negro votes than any Democrat has ever received. For the first time in the history of colored Republican politics, leading colored politicians, like R. R. Church of Tennessee, refused to serve upon the colored Advisory Committee; the head of the Negro Elks openly pledged his organization against Hoover, and there was every sign that the defection thus begun was going to reach large proportions.

Nor were the reasons for this far to see. If leading Negroes repudiated Coolidge in 1924, they were even more estranged in 1928. Moreover, Hoover's silence on them and their problems has been nearly as great as Smith's. He has said not a single public word against lynching or disfranchisement or for Negro education and uplift. When it was brought to his attention that the Red Cross was discriminating outrageously against Negroes suffering from the Mississippi flood, Hoover at first denied it vehemently; afterward he named a Negro committee of his friends, headed by R. R. Moton of Tuskegee, and when this committee confirmed the evidences of discrimination, he refused to let the committee publish its findings.

In addition to this, Hoover has joined openly with the "Lily Whites" of the South,—that is, with those active Southern politicians who propose, not simply to keep the Southern Negro disfranchised, but to prevent the organization of any effective minority party in which the Negro has representation. Hoover knows perfectly well that the disfranchisement of the better class Negroes in the South delivers them into the hands of venal politicians, black and white. Hoover, Coolidge, Hughes, Harding, and all Republican candidates receive gladly the political support of these men in the national conventions. After the convention, Mr. Hoover proceeds to recognize only the white politicians who have supported him. It was very easy to find evidence for accusing Southern Negro politicians of traffic in public office. But the same accusations have been made and proven against white politicians. There is no reason to think that the accusations were any more true in the case of the colored Perry Howard than in the case of the white Bascom Slep, once Secretary to President Coolidge. But under Hoover's political organization Howard was kicked out and prosecuted, while Slep was put in charge of his Southern campaign! Every Negro political leader in the South regardless of his standing—and there are some who are honest and brave—has

Here, then, was a chance and an unusual chance for Al Smith, and not simply a chance for political maneuvering. It was a chance to attack in its stronghold the central danger of American democracy; the thing that makes it impossible for the American people today to vote logically or coherently on any subject whatsoever; and that incubus is the bloc of 114 to 139 electoral votes which are out of politics in the sense that no political discussion, no appeal to intelligence or justice, has any influence on them. This was the time for a really great statement. The Governor of New York might have stepped into the arena and said: "I believe in democracy. I believe that no one is good enough to cast a vote for his neighbor. I believe that poverty and misfortune, even if coupled with slavery and color, are in themselves no reason for caste and disfranchisement. If in spite of misfortune, poverty, and handicap a man meets the qualifications laid down for voting, he ought to vote and to be protected in his vote. He and his ought not to be interfered with by lawlessness and lynching. Education and encouragement ought freely to be offered, and every opportunity for development placed before such people."

Is there any reason why any American citizen, Democrat, Republican, or Socialist, should not subscribe to such a creed and publicly announce it? If there is, then American democracy is already a failure. If there is not, then Alfred Smith ought to have made such a statement. Moreover, I violate no confidence in saying that he was asked and urged to do it and that he refused.

A number of enthusiastic colored folk and friends of colored people put before the advisers of Governor Smith several possible statements which he might make to show that at least he was not an enemy of the American Negro. He refused to say a single word. He refused to let even indirectly anything go out from his headquarters which should seem to represent him as friendly to black men. Negro Democratic headquarters were indeed established but they were not allowed to have offices in the regular Democratic headquarters but were given a small "Jim Crow" annex where they exist without real authority, without explicit recognition, and without the slightest initiative.

On the other hand, explicit and repeated anti-Negro propaganda is being sent out by Democratic headquarters. When the Klan accused Governor Smith of having as his private stenographer "a Negro wench," Democratic headquarters at Washington on September 8 sent out the following release:

Governor Smith does not have, and never has had, a Negro stenographer, and in the employment of Negroes by the State of New York under his administration this has been done only to fill such jobs as they are given in the South, to wit: porters, janitors, charwomen, etc.

The interesting thing about this statement is that it is perfectly true. In all Governor Smith's long career, he has sedulously avoided recognizing Negroes in any way. He has twice vetoed bills which would have given a colored magistrate to Harlem. He has never given a Negro any major appointment. He has seldom been willing to receive a Negro delegation and it is doubtful if he has met personally in all his career a half-dozen of the 250,000 Negroes of his State.

At one time the leaders of his party in New York

City recommended that the late Colonel Charles Young be made head of the new Negro regiment authorized under the direction of the Democratic Governor Sulzer. This regiment had not been organized because of the question of colored officers. The State National Guard was determined that there should be no colored officers, and gave as an excuse that none was qualified. But Charles Young, then a Major in the regular army and a West Point graduate, was a man not only of stainless personal character, but of well-known military ability. The army would have been perfectly willing to lend him to the National Guard. Governor Smith was asked to appoint him. He peremptorily refused and placed a white man at the head of the colored 15th Regiment.

Now why should a man otherwise in many respects liberal and likable, who has himself come up from the common people, show himself so illiberal and petty toward the Negro? It is because Smith has been afraid of the South, and is so today. He probably first ignored the Negro because, with East Side ignorance, he knew nothing about him, and shared the East Side's economic dislike of Negro labor competition: a dislike which was back of the Irish anti-Negro riots before and during the war, in Philadelphia and New York. As Smith began to develop in political power and ambition, he recognized that if he wanted to carry the South he must be orthodox on the Negro according to Southern traditions. He has been so, and, in the future, according to Congressman Hill of Alabama, "Governor Smith says he will let us handle the Negro problem as we see fit. What more could we ask?" Then, again, his liquor program and his religion have stirred up enough trouble and revolt south of the Mason and Dixon line. Smith is determined, therefore, not to say a single word that will enable his enemies and the Ku Klux Klan to fasten the title "Nigger-lover" upon him.

This is unfortunate for the Negro. But it is far more unfortunate for the American people. It means that no attempt to liberalize either the Republican or the Democratic Party, or to start a new third-party movement, can succeed as long as the present disfranchisement of the Negro supports a Solid South. Few Americans yet realize this. Many simple souls have a distinct hope that the Democratic Party may yet figure as a liberal party. They have an additional hope that it will never be necessary in the future, as it has not seemed necessary to these liberals in the past, to take any stand or attitude with regard to the so-called Negro problem. They propose to go on, ignoring the fact that the eleven Southern States, with an increase of population of more than 200 per cent since 1870, and with a theoretical doubling of the electorate by woman suffrage, did not, between the election of 1872 and that of 1924, increase its voting population more than 131 per cent, and that in five States of the Southern South the voting population has actually decreased in fifty years. In other words, a rotten borough system has been built up in the South which has disfranchised 5,000,000 voters and put the political power of a third of the nation in the hands of fewer than a million voters!

The political power of this rump electorate is astonishing. They send forty-five congressmen to Washington, while a million voters on the Pacific Coast send but twelve! They keep their Congressmen in office for long periods, thus enabling the South to monopolize a large number of the chief committee appointments. What chance is there that this political power will become radical or even liberal? Not the slightest. Now and then we may get some wild talk from Tillman or Jeff Davis or Caraway. You may get gestures from Carter Glass and taunts from Pat Harrison and solemn rhodomontades from Swanson of Virginia. But when it comes to votes, in every case the Solid South will be found to be the tail of the conservative reactionary North, and not a single reform movement, no punishment of swindlers, no real investigation of political evils, can depend upon Southern support. The Solid South cannot be liberal. It is built upon the disfranchisement, not only of 2,000,000 Negroes, but of many more than 2,000,000 whites. It is built on widespread ignorance and intolerance; crime and lynching; peonage and slavery. Its business is to choke off all discussion among liberal whites in the South; to stop all political independence, social freedom, or religious liberalism. For any sane liberal in the United States to think that this body of death is going to be permeated by liberal opinions is clear evidence of incipient softening of the brain.

If now the Southern Democratic bloc cannot become liberal, what chance is there that the Northern Democrats will become liberal? None at all. In Northern States they may temporarily follow liberal principles. But nationally they must do as Smith has done: make peace with plutocracy and repudiate the simplest principles of democracy.

There are a number of hopeful souls who continue to believe that the very ineptitude of the two old parties is going to lead, one of these days, to a triumphant third party. These dreamers insist that this already would have happened if third party advocates could only "agree." This is nonsense. When and where have liberal reformers ever agreed in advance on main matters of reform? Certainly not at the birth of the Republican Party in the United States or at the birth of the Liberal or Labor Party in England. Widely divergent liberal panaceas are slowly pounded into shape at successive elections as certain of them gain popular support. By a slow process of selection and elimination, the program of a third party is clarified and solidified, and slowly one of the old parties dies. This program is impossible in the United States because the one political party, the Democrats, which is nearest moribund in its ideas, cannot die; it uses the political power of disfranchised Negroes and disfranchised whites to keep itself so large a minority party that any diversion of liberals from the Republican Party simply throws this more reactionary party into power. That was the clear case in the celebrated election of 1912. It was the largest influence in the election of Coolidge, when at the last moment voters became convinced that a vote for La Follette was practically a vote for the Democrats.

The same situation is before us today. Liberals may, if they will, vote for Al Smith. But a vote for Al Smith is a vote for the Bourbon South, and that reactionary bloc will not let Smith take a single really liberal step. They will stand with the Republicans for super-power, for high protection, for disfranchisement, and for war made by an army and navy which they overwhelmingly dominate. On the other hand, if the liberals turn and vote for Norman Thomas they throw their votes away just as surely as when they voted for Robert La Follette. Under the present distribution of electoral votes Norman Thomas has no chance of carrying a single State even if he should receive 6,000,000 popular votes. All of which shows that the problem of Negro disfranchisement is not a problem of the Negroes; it is a problem of democratic government in the United States.

Blundering Through the Campaign

By FRANK R. KENT

SO far as the so-called strategy of this Presidential campaign—or for that matter, any Presidential campaign—is concerned, it is largely lodged in the minds of the political publicists of whom the 1928 crop is particularly large and pontifical. These being as a rule more imaginative and ingenious, if less practical, than the political managers who are—even the best of them—never very smart, they evolve in the course of the campaign many interesting ideas nearly all of which are utterly foreign to the thought of the professional campaign directors and their candidates. The truth is that on both sides there is this time the usual blundering confusion, blind bewilderment, haphazard, bumble-puppy management and blithe tossing of money to the birds. The country has grown greatly in four years, the reach of the radio has vastly increased, the avenues for expenditure have multiplied, all of which means that the business of electing a President is on a somewhat larger scale than ever before. But basically it is the same. There is nothing at all deep or subtle or artful or skillful or novel about it. There is in neither camp anything approaching a definite, concrete policy not wholly obvious. There is in neither a party-unifying, country-wide issue. The nearest approach to one is prohibition which has split the top rails off both party fences and let loose an unprecedently large flock of bolters whose floppings and flappings from one side to the other have been one of the features of the fight. More than in any other campaign of our time this struggle is between the two men rather than between their parties—one colorful, vibrant, shrewd, and calculatingly candid, a seasoned politician, a campaigner of rare talent and resources, an adroit maker of news: the other utterly inexperienced in politics, making his first campaign dull as ditch water on the stump, without fire or eloquence, inept in matters of publicity, inapt as to phrases and forms, but backed by the weight of the majority party and with his normal advantages increased by the prejudice against the religion of his opponent. It is the striking contrast between the personalities and careers of the candidates that makes the campaign unique, not its conduct by the committees. So far as they are concerned it is nearly all old stuff. Invariably and inevitably national campaigns consist in collecting as large a campaign fund as possible as soon as possible and spending it as quickly as possible. It is not good business to spend money before you earn it but it is good politics. Seventy per cent of the campaign fund goes in one form or another for publicity. The balance is divided between the payrolls, which are always monstrous and absurd, and the national committeemen in the so-called doubtful States—more of them this time than ever before—who serve as the channels for distribution. The one new thing in this connection is the fact, frequently enough commented upon in the daily press in the early days but not much mentioned now, that for the first time in many years the Democrats have enough money really to make a campaign, to meet the other side—at least financially—on even terms. To tell the truth, they not only this time have enough to do that but they have more. They have not only more money, and are spending more than the Republicans, but they have more than any other party has had in the past. This is largely due to the small group of extremely wealthy personal friends of Governor Smith who, headed by Mr. Raskob, sit in the General Motors Building headquarters and underwrite the deficits as fast as they develop, and who will in the end be found holding the bag for no small sum. They are, however, exceedingly cheerful about it, earnestly determined that this time the Democrats shall not be defeated through lack of money for any “legitimate purpose.” This is a situation so entirely strange to Democrats that some of the Senatorial gentlemen around headquarters have not in more than two months quite got used to it. To those practical enough to know how vital is election-day money in the precincts, this new Democratic affluence is a sufficient guaranty that there will this time be no debacle such as occurred in 1920 and 1924. For the rest what each side is doing to corral the 266 electoral votes necessary to a choice is obvious enough. From the start the plain game of the Republicans has been to let the other fellow take the offensive and themselves sit as tight as possible. Always that is the part of wisdom for the party in power. It fits in wholly with the Hoover desire, is exactly suited to the Hooverian mind.

The Republicans can lose a number of electoral votes and still win. Based on these facts the idea of the Hoover campaign from the start has been to avoid costly blunders, make as few speeches as possible, keep wholly free from personalities, state his views when necessary with dignity but always without heat, stress the prosperity issue, as far as possible ignore his opponent, and devote his energies mainly to the work of organization primarily designed to hold his party lines intact, counting largely upon normal numerical superiority and the “business interests” for success. In the last two weeks the “under cover” drive of the Republican management has been to strengthen Mr. Hoover among three classes of voters with whom he is admittedly weak—the Germans, the farmers, the Negroes.

On the Democratic side any such passive and defensive campaign as this would be exceedingly ridiculous. All the logic of the situation casts Smith for the role of aggressor. He must attack and not defend. It is his job by combined assault and appeal to tear away from the Republicans at least sixty of the electoral votes got by Coolidge in 1924. As the candidate of the minority party out of power it is up to him not to sit still but to force the fighting. It so happens that this is as much to the taste of Smith as the other sort of campaign is to Hoover, and it will not be denied that he has made a good campaign. To get anywhere, however, he has to effect a combination of States which on the surface at least seems incongruous and unnatural—almost in fact, impossible. He must hold the so-called Solid South, which is dry, Protestant, and full of Tammany hostility, gain the New York group which is Republican, industrial, conservative, and wet, and then carry a certain number of the restive and radical agricultural States in the northwestern tier where the Non-Partisan League formerly flourished and the late Robert M. La Follette had his greatest strength. In any normal campaign and for any normal candidate to achieve this would be equivalent to a political miracle. Even for Smith with his amazing vote getting record, his flaming personality and fighting ability, it must be conceded the odds are against him. There is, too, danger as well as difficulty in this effort to unite the conservative, not to say reactionary, East with the Progressive, not to say radical, Northwest. He might, for instance, lose both. Up to the present time—the first week in October—however, he has not only avoided disaster but returns to New York from his first speech-making tour having apparently gained a fair fighting chance in at least six western States where the regular Democratic vote had almost disappeared—and gained this chance without really impairing his conceded strength in New York and the East. His success in the West makes it possible to visualize victory for Smith even when you concede his weakness in the border States and the possible loss of one in the South. The chances are still against him, of course, but several things contribute toward keeping the odds from being too depressingly heavy. One of these is that the fat, full condition of the Democratic treasury enables the Party to pour money into the doubtful States following the dent made by its candidate instead of as has been its custom, letting him down with a bump by going broke just at the critical moment. Another is that the extraordinarily well handled Smith publicity—ininitely better than the Hoover brand, which has by the way been notoriously bad—has enabled him to get away with a practical out and out endorsement of the economically unsound equalization fee and a practically open advocacy of government ownership of public utilities, without raising the sort of protest among business men and their pet newspapers which the Bryan governmental ownership for railroads speech raised in 1908. The cry of “economic heresy” has so far been but feebly raised against him and the accusations of “socialistic tendencies” have come from ineffectual sources.

There is nothing normal at all about the campaign. There are currents running this time the depth and strength of which no one can now accurately determine. In any event while the present Wall Street odds of three to one on Hoover (they may change before this article is printed) are probably justified by past political performances, the situation is not well enough in hand on the Republican side to prevent very real apprehension from being felt among the less smug and more clear headed of the Republican managers. It is true the support of the bigots in the South and the unquestioned tendency of the women generally to vote for Hoover are assets peculiarly his own and not to be discounted. They make doubtful certain States in the South. They give him a better break than any Republican is normally entitled to in the border States of Tennessee, Oklahoma, and Kentucky. On the other hand there is an undeniable and conceded drift away from Mr. Hoover and toward Mr. Smith of the three classes of voters mentioned above—the Germans, the farmers, and the Negroes. These constitute the cornerstone of the Republican Party in the country. How great the disaffection this time among them there is of course no means of knowing. It is sufficient, however, to preclude in informed Republican circles anything even approximating the confidence of the Harding and Coolidge campaigns. To succeed Smith must carry the so-called Solid South and his own State of New York. So far as the first prerequisite is concerned he is compelled to leave things largely to the South itself, with such help as can come from the General Motors Building. As for the second he has greatly increased his chances by the dramatic drafting of Franklin D. Roosevelt. To the practical effect of the Roosevelt nomination in New York, must be added its excellent psychological effect over the country.

Cross Currents in Italy

By MARY KELSEY

I CROSSED the Italian frontier into France with my note book hidden in my lunch-basket. There was a very real sense of relief when the customs official scratched his white cross on that modest article of travel, for I had learned only a few days before, from one of the foreign newspaper correspondents resident in Rome, that everything sent out of Rome by the journalists was censored.

I was evidently not the only person on the train who approached the frontier with uneasiness. Two men in the corridor outside my compartment carried on a whispered conversation which seemed endless, their faces within an inch or two of each other. The phrase "state socialism" escaped them once, and with the memory of the recent trial of the communists in Rome, just condemned to twenty-one years of prison for having secretly circulated a small newspaper which did no more than expound the communist philosophy—one of my friends had received it regularly from an anonymous source—the reason for their caution seemed not far to seek.

In Rome there is indeed a constantly present undercurrent of uneasiness. No one feels quite secure there. Any foreigner may be stopped at any moment in the street and his papers demanded by any one of the fifty or sixty thousand members of the Fascist army, a body entirely independent of the national army, and far more formidable as it has numerous dangerous privileges. Among them is the right of arrest at sight. One does not willingly offend any one of the black-shirt gentry who are to be seen everywhere, revolver on hip, and very conscious of their power. Arrests are common and rather uncomfortable stories circulate freely. One hears of dinner guests arriving prematurely, hurried to the police-station for walking up and down in the street in an innocent effort to pass the time till the appointed hour. One misguided tourist, I was told, who at the gate of Mussolini's gorgeous villa had inquired if Il Duce really lived there, was brought guide-book in hand summarily before a Fascist official as a suspicious character.

People, even foreigners, hesitate to speak of Mussolini publicly now in any way, and the subterfuge of calling him by another name is commonly resorted to. "But no longer Smith or Jones," I heard one American woman resident in Rome, say to another. "The Fascist police recognize those names now. We call him Armstrong. It seems symbolic."

There is no doubt of the Fascists' belief in direct action. The following rules of the Fascist militiamen clearly express their creed.

The ten Commandments of the Mititiaman:

1. Remember that the Fascist must not believe in perpetual peace.
2. The days of prison are always merited.
3. The mother-country is served even if the sentinel only guards a can of gasoline.
4. A companion in arms must be a brother. First, because he is living with you. Second, because he thinks as you think.

5. The rifle and the cartridge pouch have been given to you not to be kept greased alone, but to be used in time of war.

6. Never say that the government makes you pay, because you are part of the government, and you wear the uniform it gives you.

7. Discipline is necessary. With out it there would be no army—only confusion and defeat.

8. Mussolini is always right.

9. Disobedience is not pardonable in a Fascist.

10. One thing must be held above all: The life of the Duce.

All the power of the present Italian government is being devoted to impressing these rules on the youth of Italy. The young people are being trained—and in large measure they lend themselves with ardor to it—to dedicate their lives to the furthering of the Fascist ideal. The troops of little black-shirts from eight to fourteen years of age, which one meets marching smartly through the streets, and the many young men, many of them of a fine and generous type, that one sees wearing the Fascist emblem, attest the devotion that it inspires among young people. Few older men wear the emblem, and it is a fair generalization to state that they are almost always inferior in type to the younger adherents. With the older men one feels the pressure of expediency. With the younger it is a vocation. Yet it is striking that the red, green, and white emblem is seldom seen save in the coat-lapel of "white-collar" men. The workers seem to belong to another world.

Yet it seems that the workingman has in a very real sense greatly benefited by the Fascist regime. During the last few months I was told that Fascismo had, not in its machinery which had tended the other way, but in its legislation, distinctly tended toward the left. A whole series of measures relative to the workers have lately been put into effect. The eight-hour day, old age pensions, and unemployment insurance have all been established by law, and the workers of Italy today possess many advantages that might well be copied in democratic countries. But these measures were first introduced by Signor Nitti into the Italian parliament, as he himself explained to me.

It was the proprietor of my hotel who first spoke to me of these reforms with a certain heat and obvious sense of personal hardship though in his button-hole he wore the Fascist emblem.

"Everything is done for the workers today," he said. "All the new measures are to the disadvantage of the employers. All our books are examined and our employees receive a definite share of all our profits. They were never so well off before. It is we that are squeezed."

And indeed the change in the condition of the Italian worker, in contrast to what had existed at the time of my last visit twenty years ago, was startling. They were uniformly well-fed and neatly dressed and the filth and degradation that was unescapable twenty years ago had almost disappeared. I noticed also a difference in the young girls of the well-to-do classes. They were to me the most striking and the most charming thing in Italy. Everywhere I went I met them, daintily dressed, healthy, normal, self-reliant, going about alone with a superb independence, and perfectly qualified to take care of themselves. They represented to me an Italy new-born. And in still another direction I saw a change for the better. The ill-fed and overworked horses, which had been omnipresent in the old days in Italy, were entirely non-existent. Mussolini had personally ordered that anyone seen driving a suffering or ill-fed horse should lose his license. No such horses are to be seen today.

Everything that is done in Italy that is of any importance is done at Mussolini's personal order. "All his subordinates, newspaper editors as well as public officials, have simply ceased to function independently," a careful observer said to me; "they have suspended the faculty of thought." Even details such as the selection of juries of art is left to the decision of Il Duce. Like the Fascist militiamen, the official world accedes to the dogma that Mussolini is always right.

In every department of Italian life today Mussolini is the arbiter. It was through him alone that the long-projected railroad to Ostia, the ancient sea-port of Rome, was finally built and put into operation, to the delectation of the modern city that flocks to its sands and finds there a healthful and delightful playground. It is to Mussolini, too, that the magnificent electrification of a large portion of the Italian railway system is due. It is by Mussolini's wish that the Roman salute has become the national greeting and at his fiat the boy-scout that shakes hands instead of saluting commits a felony. And by Mussolini's command birth-control has become a crime meriting the severest punishment. For Mussolini is the exponent of the great imperial destiny of modern Italy, the doctrine that carries thousands of Italians who for years have felt in political eclipse, after him. The methods of Fascismo may be abhorrent to them but national pride brings many into the ranks of his supporters, and every department of Italian life today is required to dedicate itself to furthering the imperial ideal. At the industrial conference just concluded this fact was made clear to the group of important captains of industry gathered there. The silk trade must not organize for the advantage of the silk trade. It must organize in order that the silk trade may become an efficient prop in the economy of the Italian nation, and every industry must prepare itself to work with every other industry, for that end alone.

This at least is not a contemptible form of nationalism. There is something fine in its demand for the devotion of every citizen, and the nationalism which finds such expression as that which through posters in every tram-car exhorts the travellers not to swear "for the honor of Italy" has in it something that is undoubtedly worthy of respect.

But can such aims be realized by the will of one man? Is Mussolini, indeed, always right? The National Library at Rome is opened freely to everyone who cares to go there to read or study, save for one small section which can be reached only through special permission from the Minister of the Interior. In this department are filed away all the early speeches and writings of Il Duce!

In the Driftway

WHILE the United States wrestles with the prohibition issue the Drifter gets a message from a friend who has been summering on the English downs:

Yesterday I went off for a trip alone, taking buses to a point some twelve miles to the west (of the village Steyning) and then walking. At noon one comes to a village inn. Being a gentleman—a fact attested by possession of a walking stick and by naught else—one chooses the door marked "Private Saloon" and enters a small, low room with one or two tables and benches, and pictures on the wall of Sussex landscapes. One goes to the counter with its discreet window in which appears a head—male or female as the case may be—and says: "A half of bitter, please." This one takes to the table by the window, blows off a mess of pipe ashes, and produces a pair of sandwiches from the rucksack. Or if one is really thirsty one gets a pint straight in a huge glass of legal standard and dimension, and this, if taken not too leisurely and before the stomach is quite replenished with food, is pretty sure to have the most gratifying and poetical effects. And so one staggers on.

* * * * *

SOON, the letter goes on to say, another microscopic and forgotten downland village comes in view on the further rise of land, and presently you wander among thatched farmsheds and steadings, in search of the churchyard.

There it is on its little circular mound just beyond the one tidy and habitable-looking house in the place—the rectory, no doubt. This is old ground. There is the huge yew tree, centuries old, before the entrance porch. The old flint walling is cracked and patched and the mullioned perpendicular windows, their moldings all but washed away by the dissolving rains, are sagged all awry with the steady shifting and settling of the entire fabric which holds them. Not a soul is near, but birds, perhaps, are nesting in that entrance porch and fly forth at your approach.

THE Drifter's correspondent, who happens to be an architect, then continues:

Most often you descend a step or two onto the stone-paved floor of the nave, as if the structure were indeed in a process of settling itself into the earth, and grass and oak trees would presently be flourishing above the site. But something, if not the actual present work, has endured here now at least a thousand years—possibly a good half of a millennium longer; for these old parish churches are all on sites of sepulture going back before the advent of Christianity. The circular or once circular mounds on which they invariably stand are considered to be the gigantic barrows of Celtic chiefs—they are quite obviously man-made. And these churches are principally places of burial. In here the weather has often spared the carving of the capitals and the great chancel arch, and grotesque, crude heads still leer at you from the corbels. . . . But one must be getting on. There is so much ground to be covered, and if it be not yet two o'clock one can still get another bitter in the licensed cottage down the lane; for thereafter you must be thirsty until 6 p. m. This is the measure of restriction which England has adopted in lieu of prohibition.

THE Drifter recalls one poet who wished to be in England in April. He issues no embargoes on the other months; just now he feels he would like to be in England any time in the year.

Smith and the Liberals

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Your editorial of September 26 "Should Liberals Vote for Smith?" cannot be praised too highly for its conscientious impartiality. Nothing could be finer evidence of integrity in the cause of liberalism than your refusal blindly to sponsor the candidacy of Norman Thomas, who is, undoubtedly (like most things unattainable), more to the heart's desire than Smith. But I do not think you give all the reasons why liberals should vote for Smith; nor do you seem to get the full importance of the reasons you do give. This is due, I believe, to the fact that you do not keep the liberal voter consistently in mind, as evidenced in your opening comment on Mr. Earle's letter. Mr. Earle, you write, "declares that intolerance and bigotry are the controlling issues in this campaign, but to others there are far more important questions, notably that of prohibition, and whether Tammany Hall shall be allowed to enter the White House in the person of Governor Smith." This comment shows fundamental confusion on the point at issue; for who are these "others"? Are they liberals? They cannot be! Because to liberals there are no questions of far more importance than intolerance and bigotry; and, moreover, prohibition is part of that issue as far as liberals are concerned. Mr. Earle was clearly writing from the standpoint of the liberal; and intolerance is always the issue with him.

From the standpoint of the liberal, and only from that standpoint, what advantage is there in having Smith rather than Hoover as our next President?

(1) Smith (you grant) will make over the Supreme Court in a more liberal way than will Hoover. Considering the great powers of the Supreme Court and the fact that justices usually live an uncommonly long time, outlasting several Presidents, is not this reason for Smith of more importance than you give it? Significant reform measures have failed to pass in the Supreme Court in recent years, by one vote. Will it not be a decided gain to have such measures pass—even if by only one vote?

(2) Smith (you again grant) has become the "symbol of tolerance in American life—racial, religious, and social tolerance." Is there anything more important for liberalism than that America should stand behind that symbol, supporting it? Liberals must be fully aware that Smith's failure will not leave us with the status quo; racial and religious enmity will increase by leaps and bounds, reaching, if not surpassing, post-war hysteria. We do not have to guess about this. What happened in Maine?

(3) Smith has brought New York ahead of all other States in social welfare legislation. Social welfare reform has always been close to the heart of liberals. You ignore this third recommendation Mr. Earle brings for Smith.

These three reasons, I thoroughly agree with Mr. Earle, are in themselves sufficient to make every enlightened liberal vote for Smith. And The Nation has not presented one cogent argument against this conclusion. The liberal must always seize the opportunities for advancing a step further on the road toward a liberal civilization. If liberals can secure, by one election, a better Supreme Court, better social welfare legislation, and greater religious, social, and racial tolerance (in addition to saving the country from a serious setback in these respects) is it not enough for them? Since when have liberals expected to win all their ends at one swoop? Granting even that Smith is no better (though no worse) than Hoover on national economy, imperialism, and disarmament should any liberal be therefore in doubt as to whether he should vote for Thomas and express his feelings or vote for Smith and do some good? Does any liberal think that even if Thomas were elected he would be able to achieve everything—or even very much? Let liberals reflect on the fate of Ramsay MacDonald and the political deals he made to stay in office! Our national Socialist Party is sufficiently in the realm of the future to be able to be utopian in the present. It can still have a consistent and fine-sounding platform, and its political alliances can still be very chaste. But the platform and alliances will be vastly different whenever that party becomes serious enough to grapple with the real present.

Smith's program you are quite right in saying "everywhere stops short of firing the blood of a true progressive." Smith is not the leader of a progressive party, and to vote for Smith the liberal need not delude himself into believing that he is. Smith is not the liberal candidate; but by means of Smith liberals can make important gains. And that is all they should worry about.

Thomas and a New Party

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Your editorial leaving it to the conscience of each individual Progressive whether to vote for Smith or Norman Thomas states the issue so clearly that I fail to see why you did not urge the support of Thomas. Along with every sensible Progressive, you favor a new party, a labor party, in this country, on the obvious ground that the Democratic and Republican parties are hopeless. The only way to express such an opinion is by voting for Norman Thomas.

A vote for Smith cannot possibly express any desire for a new party, because the vote of a Progressive when given for Smith, is indistinguishable from a vote for Smith because the voter is a Catholic, an hereditary opponent of the Republicans, a wet, an open-shopper and anti-labor man like Raskob or Woodin, or a Tammany supporter and beneficiary like Kenney.

While Smith has enemies which have gained for him the sympathy of some Progressives, those enemies of his are also the enemies of Norman Thomas, and Smith has friends among open shoppers, contractor bosses, and grafting politicians which any honest Progressive would repudiate.

Cambridge, Mass., September 22

ALFRED BAKER LEWIS

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The issue is not tolerance, Professor Earle and many others to the contrary notwithstanding. Does the good professor really believe that, if Smith is elected, the Arkansas swamp-rooter, the Georgia cracker, the Kansas City Rotarian, will as a consequence become more tolerant? Surely he realizes that tolerance is the flowering of a slow and painful growth with deep roots forming a complex social and cultural network, and not the result of a political campaign.

Prohibition is of course not the issue, except as a vote catcher used by cheap politicians. Everyone knows that neither the election of Hoover nor that of Smith will affect in the least the practical problems of prohibition, with its ramifications of bootlegging, raids, smuggling, etc.

Your own editorial points out the real issue—then fails to draw the inescapable conclusion. The real issue is the foundation of a permanent party of the farmers (no fake farm relief) the city workers, and in general, the people of moderate or scanty income, to oppose the domination of the country by great accumulations of capital. The start made in 1924 by the 5,000,000 votes for La Follette should be continued and made permanent. Merely to vote against Hoover is to lose sight of the main issue. To vote for Al Smith because he is a likable human being, with glimmerings of social vision, is the acme of futility, for a true progressive. To vote for Norman Thomas, not because he is incomparably superior as a man (a true statesman worthy of the best old American tradition) but because he stands firmly on the real issue, the founding of a party of the masses with a sane and decent program based on the facts of present day economic life—that is to use your vote intelligently, if your liberalism has any solid foundation. A vote of even 3,000,000 for Thomas would do more to clear the path for the alignment that is bound to come ultimately than the election of ten Smiths or the rolling up of millions of votes against Hoover.

Geographical Liberalism

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Discussion in The Nation and elsewhere as to whether liberals should vote for Smith or Thomas lacks reality for one simple reason: it assumes that liberals are all in like situations. Such is far from the case. Some of us live in Louisiana, some in New York, some in Michigan. If you live in Michigan, you waste your vote if you vote for Smith. He hasn't a chance there. If you live in Louisiana you waste your vote no less; Smith is sure of the State's electors no matter what the tiny liberal minority do.

But if you live in New York or Massachusetts, your vote may help to determine whether Smith or Hoover appoints the successor to Mr. Justice Holmes (not to mention the judges of the lower federal courts with their sweeping powers of injunction). To refuse Smith your support in such a case is a serious responsibility. But a few thousand votes for Thomas in Louisiana and Michigan help measurably to give him and his party an impressive showing. Not a single such vote is really wasted; it is a contribution to a realistic division in American political life.

Mencken in 1936

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Bravo on two counts: Heywood Broun's article on Hoover's Hypocrisy, and second, the Protestant Menace, both in your issue of October 3. Heywood Broun has been my bible since I started reading him, and your paper seems the proper place for him. In The Protestant Menace, the last sentence reads: "If they (the Protestant bigots) continue, they will make decent people hope, as an object lesson, for the election of a Catholic President in 1928, a Jew in 1932, and an atheist in 1936." Fine stuff! I had it all set that Mencken would be our next President in 1932, but since he fits into the 1936 category, I can afford to be patient and noble and let you have your way in 1932.

Plates Wanted

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: My car and I, as we set our wheels upon the State highway and fall into line in the Great Parade, have suddenly become conscious of our nakedness. Can you tell us where we can get a pair of "Thomas for President" plates, one to hang across the radiator, the other to decorate the spare tire? Lacking these, we might get along with a couple of "Faster with Foster" signs. Or we'd risk it with a plain Will Rogers.

Until we can cover our shame we dare not face another Sunday afternoon.

The Catholic Menace

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I cannot refrain from expressing my dissent from your position on the Catholic issue in the campaign as illustrated, among others, in the editorial "The Protestant Menace," in the current number. (I am not a Protestant and have no religious connections.) The fallacy throughout your reasoning is your taking for granted that there is nothing fundamentally dangerous in the Catholic system itself. We cannot ascertain the meaning of that system by reading merely Catholic lay writers, unless they have the visible sanction of the highest Catholic officials, the Pope and the highest Catholic pastors, who take their orders directly from him.

The writings of these supreme officials who are alone Catholic authority portray and present the Catholic system as something that is emphatically menacing to human liberty and to this country's choicest principles and ideals. The Protestants who are resisting Smith's election on religious grounds are fighting to preserve these principles, which at other times you and The Nation struggle valiantly to protect and preserve.

So it is now these Protestant ministers and laymen who have changed places with you, are doing the work you generally do and ought now to be doing, while you, having switched over to the other side, try to defeat and discredit them. The only extenuation for your desertion of your own principles is your belief, if you do believe it, that the American Catholic laity will not follow and obey the Pope and his enunciation of Catholic principles to their final conclusions. That is a wide departure from The Nation's usual critical sagacity and is wholly unwarranted.

Hoover the Incomparable

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I am returning my postal card for The Nation's straw vote with a good firm X for Hoover. Does The Nation look forward with eagerness to the prospect of the liquor business revived, legalized, monopolized, and handed over to Tammany Hall? As for the immigration question, you carry in the same issue (that of Oct. 3) a regretful wail over the closing of doors to aspiring immigrants, and some statistics about enormous numbers of unemployed workers. Does The Nation believe that a hearty invitation to all aspiring immigrants would help the unemployed workers?

I read a large number of editorials on Governor Smith's attitude on farm relief. About half of them stated that he was clearly for the McNary-Haugen bill, half said he was emphatically against it, and one editor said he didn't know exactly where the Governor stood on the question. Does The Nation know? Nine years ago a man whose political record is one which The Nation would delight to honor and whose political acquaintance is nation-wide was discussing the records and capacities of past Presidents, and said that if it were possible to draft the best mind in the world to our service we had it in Herbert Hoover. "But," he added, "you'll never have a chance to vote for him. The politicians are afraid of his shadow now, and will never let him come within a mile of the nomination." The Republican "Old Guard" didn't want Hoover. His running mate, Senator Curtis, didn't want him. The people forced that nomination. If The Nation thinks that Hoover was soiled by his brief association in the Harding Cabinet, with Fall of the oil scandal, what does it think of Smith's nearly life-membership in Tammany? I have heard no indorsement of Fall from Mr. Hoover, but Smith's indorsement of Charles Murphy and of Tammany is unqualified.

Prologue to a Reading of Poems

By JAMES RORTY

My Lords and Ladies, lo, the hour is here
Wherein it plainly will appear
Unto this chosen company, this sturdy rout
Of poets, scribes, and diners-out
Whether or no you showed a lack of wit
In coming here to hearken and to sit While I immodestly go through again
The ancient ritual of pain,
Brave with the painted masques of mirth
That joins a man unto the earth
And to himself, and to the high gods
Who torture him with silver-singing rods.

This we call art, my friends: to eat
This pain as others eat
Bread, to be denied all else and yet to live
And grow greater than self, and give
The honey of peace, the wine of power;
To give, not share, no, scarce an hour;
Instead to feel the unforgiving scorn
Of the great dead, and the unborn
Heroes, who one day will rise and shout
The words we mutter, and the faiths we flout.

This we call art, my friends. I wish, I'm sure,
It were a thing less exigent, less pure.
We all agreed it is too bad
The lady must be wooed, or else not had.
But that, my friends, is art; it's not too late—
The evening's young—to make another date.
Gut you to a nunnery, my girl, and you, my son,
The loud bassoon has only now begun
To sound within the festive hall
Where you need scarcely feel at all.

What, you would linger? You deserve indeed
A priest less surly, and a greater need
Of loaves and fishes. Mine the sin
If you go hungry. Let the play begin!

An American Pilgrimage

The American Renaissance. By R. L. Duffus. Alfred A. Knopf. $4.

FOR some time now the educational epidemic in this country has been ravaging the provinces of fine and applied arts. Whether the extended infection of American youth by ancient cultures will produce an entirely new kind of living art or merely a new immunity to art seems to be the question that is troubling the prophetic visions of our period. "The American Renaissance" has been written with an intention of discovering some sort of answer. Whatever one may think of American art, about which this book really says nothing at all, one learns that it is being taught almost with hilarity; one realizes, moreover, that this survey of teaching aims and methods is an example of an egregiously expert journalism, so finished as to become itself a kind of objet d'art.

Mr. Duffus assures the reader that the inquiries reported in this volume were begun with a definite hope which had been incited and abetted by the program of the Carnegie Corporation of New York City. This ambitious hope was three-fold: first, that there were enough "signs of an esthetic revival in America" to make a search for them worth while; second, that these signs would lead to the discovery of what forms such a revival might take; third, that an itinerant investigation would reveal "what the typical American approach to the arts might be." But lest a reader be frightened by the solemnity of this prophetic undertaking, Mr. Duffus has with engaging charm molded his information into "the record of a more or less random pilgrimage." Thus, his book is not a catalog but a selection of examples vividly presenting the facts, the points of view, the atmosphere, even the possible weaknesses of a variety of educational projects in the arts: fine, applied, professional, communal, musical, and dramatic. This information concerning purposes and methods I have seen recorded in no other book; the contrary nature of the subject matter itself insures amusing reading. But an insidious finish destroys the critical value; in each section Mr. Duffus smooths away the sharp edge of exact analysis by a professional journalist's formulae—dreadfully cheerful congratulation of all concerned upon the enthusiastic and successful growth of each institution.

It is a temptation to quote at length from Mr. Duffus's description of the various institutions which he classifies under the epithets "cultural," "practical," and "adventurous." The diversity of aim strikingly illustrates the complex nature of American education in the arts:

The colleges begin with purely cultural, consciously impractical courses about the fine arts. Little by little, under one pretext or another, the actual practice of the fine arts creeps in. Spokesmen for the universities openly lay claim to the professional art school, as they have done to the professional schools of medicine, law, and engineering. Schools of the crafts approach the fine arts; schools of the fine arts find new value in the workmanlike integrity of the craft schools. Teachers of the arts realize more and more that their work is not half done if they do not enable their students to fit into an actual, industrial, commercial world. Industry feels the need of better design and goes to the art schools to find it. Museums remove the dust from their exhibits.

The contradiction of these enthusiasms, methods, aims raises very embarrassing questions concerning the nature of art itself, the place of the artist in our civilization, the virtue of system in an artist's training as against freedom and adventurous individuality. These questions might indeed have been the substance of a significant book. But Mr. Duffus is so positively open-minded that a flame of reflection has no chance to kindle. This allows him to proceed to the modest but pernicious error of his conclusions.

The aggressive optimism of his faith in esthetic renaissance arises from two pieces of sophistry typical of American illusion concerning our cultural ascendancy. In the introduction Mr. Duffus lays the responsibility for what our art will be upon the shoulders of destiny, not upon the body of our conscious critical convictions. To claim that art criticism, as such, has little direct connection with the practice of art is one thing. But to generalize this into the belief that taste has no connection with the practice of art is to empty the notions of art and of culture of their necessary essence: discrimination. The second instance of sophistry occurs in the last two pages of the book. Because the American scene seems to suffer boredom from an over-dose of success in material affairs, and because, as a reaction to this, the activity of art schools is said, by the teachers and artists who talked to Mr. Duffus, to be "intense," he believes that he perceives the dawn of a renaissance. But the assurance is not reasonable. Any conclusion, any prophecy about an American renaissance must necessarily arise from more than a record of the quantitative increase in school registration. It must arise logically from some understanding of what we mean by art and an examination of the stuff produced by the schooled artists. There is no definition of art in this book; there is no examination of the stuff going by the name of art. What are the architectural firms about? What are the successful artists doing? What of the esthetic consequences of economic standardization? On these things the book is silent. Enthusiasm, money, intense pedantry or practice in the schools will not answer the question which this book holds as central: "What sort of person the American artist ought to be"—a question which, stated even in these moral terms, searches to the heart of an American cultural enigma.

Wholly Mexican

El águila y la serpiente. By Martin Luis Guzmán. Madrid: M. Aguilar.

MEXICO, that much talked-of land, has always been strangely taciturn regarding herself and her problems. The fatalistic impassivity with which she has accepted her tragedies seems to brand protest as unnecessary and even unbecoming. Her code would seem to be that the only fitting rejoinder to outrageous fortune is action, when possible; and when not, patient endurance. The rebuke of Guatemoc, the Aztec chieftain, to one of his nobles who cried out when they were being tortured to reveal the hiding-place of their gold: "I am not in a bed of roses," has in it something symbolic of the attitude of Mexicans in general toward the long and bloody turbulence which has been their history for so many years.

One notices this particularly in her literary production, which is the manifestation by which a foreigner can best judge. Only in a slight degree, as compared with other of the Spanish-American countries, where conditions are partly analogous, has Mexico produced what might be called a political literature. Especially is this in striking contrast with what took place in the Argentine, where for a hundred years every form of literary expression has gravitated about the problem of her crystallizing nationality; and even today, when this has become history, it furnishes the theme of her most valuable works.

The great majority of Mexican poets, essayists, and novelists may be read without ever finding other than the most incidental allusion to the drama in which they live and move and have their being. There is the fragrance of the gardens and pleasaunced lawns of Versailles; Neo-Classicism's mythological re-creations; the conventional piquancy of the Latin Quarter; and, more recently, the ultimate essence of Proust, Joyce, and the "ultraistas," as they are known in Spanish; Russia or the Far East; little of Mexico.

But in "El águila y la serpiente"—on Mexico's flag an eagle clutches a writhing serpent—from the pen of a hitherto unknown journalist, Mexico contributes a description of the most dramatic and sensational episode of her revolution—that featuring Pancho Villa—which is at the same time a great book, one of the best, perhaps, that has been written in Spanish America. It immediately invites comparison with that masterpiece of the Argentine, Sarmiento's "Facundo"; one and the other center around the figure of a guerrilla leader, whether patriot or bandit or a mixture of both, one is at a loss to know. (If Guzmán can think only of a jaguar when he meets Villa for the first time, Facundo Quiroga was known as the "tiger of the plains," and there must have been many other points of resemblance between them.) But whereas Sarmiento's book is a passionate invective against a state of affairs and those he believes responsible for it, neither present-day esthetics nor the Mexican temperament favor diatribes. In keeping with the modern sensibility, Guzmán's book is all in a muted tone; there is a certain detached aloofness, as of not wanting to attach too much importance to anything, even in his moments of deepest impression. In this volume of intimate history Guzmán has employed, with singular felicity, the cinematographic technique of the new literature. He has attempted no rigid sequence of events, nor has the book any apparent central plan. A series of episodes succeed one another, each complete in itself, and yet together giving the substance of the Mexican revolution from the assassination of Madero to the taking of Mexico City by the Zapatistas. Guzmán was active in the revolution against Victoriano Huerta, served in the early government of Carranza, became a part of the conspiracy against Carranza. The pages are a series of conspiracies, assassinations, treachery, and terror; and yet the author's detachment, and indifference to his own danger, and a certain reckless gaiety—almost infantile at moments—which a prolonged state of revolution always engenders lend a lightness to what would otherwise be a record of horror.

But the author's attitude is leagues removed from callousness toward the brutalities he witnesses. Quite the contrary: here is a sensitive, generous man who entered the revolution filled with idealism. The book is as much a record of his own disillusionment as of his country's; against the vain pomposity of Carranza, the formless energy and ferocity of Villa, the sly treachery of self-seeking politicians, and the dumb, animal aspirations of the Zapatistas—in spite of many who are imbued with the author's own generosity—his illusions crumble, and his only refuge is flight. One feels with him an infinite anxiety at the end when almost by a miracle he has escaped from Villa's wrath, and the train creeps haltingly along the neglected roadbed. "Mexico is so big. Still 1400 kilometres to the border."

It is very difficult to understand anything so deep, so complicated and so aggravated as Mexico's revolution. (It is and always has been one revolution.) But in "El águila y la serpiente" one feels it, and this is an important step toward understanding. Not merely the events and the characters are Mexican; the whole tone of the book, its restraint, its irony, the good taste with which even the most gruesome episodes are recorded, its subtle humor, and the impassivity before referred to, stamp it as indelibly Mexican.

Three Novels

The Invader. By Hilda Vaughan. Harper and Brothers. $2.50.

Mrs. Conover. By John Metcalf. Boni and Liveright. $2.50.

The Gallant Came Late. By Marian Storm. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $2.

MRS. WOOLF observed recently that although nothing sounds easier than to write with the nuances and the amiably confidential tone of conversation, one has only to try the trick to discover how unexpectedly difficult it is. Similarly, nothing would seem easier than to convey the heat and immediacy of feeling to paper. If a writer can do nothing else, people often say, he can at least convey his own strong emotions strongly to us. Hence the popular misconception that there is at least one real book in every person. But as I plow through the many new novels that have reached my desk this fall, I conclude that it is quite as difficult to convey emotion in words as it is to write naturally. Every human being manages to feel with some degree of violence a number of times in his life. In youth most of us feel with such uncomfortable violence so much of the time that we are almost relieved when we find ourselves sliding into the less ruffled waters of maturity, and even these whip themselves up all too often into tropical hurricanes. A writer is presumably a human being whose emotions are even more violent than those of other men, since they harry him into the considerable labor of literary composition; and presumably a writer, when casting about for a subject, selects one that has aroused or can arouse keen feeling in him. Yet the general run of novels fail completely to retain any of the heat that must have been present at their inception.

These three stand out from among the undistinguished many chiefly because each of them is passionate and real in its own way. The idealistic doctor and the charming girl who float on the surface of Hilda Vaughan's tale might have been manufactured by any well-disposed romanticist; but the tempestuous, avaricious, ruthless love of her Welsh farmers for their bleak mountain soil is conveyed with a passionate realism that makes the book notable. There is no easy romantic ink in the pen that draws Daniel Evans for us. We see him with all his sins on his head, sly, unctuous, when slyness and unctious help his cause, sensuous, a wistful stranger to love and friendship, but, because of his courage, his passionate persistence, his resourcefulness, deserving nevertheless his proud title of king of the countryside.

John Metcalf's grimy London suburb seems equally full of deep if not always intelligible feeling, but the critics who have compared the unhappy love affair of Mr. Metcalf's Kenneth with that of Philip in "Of Human Bondage" are wide of the mark. The reader leaves Somerset Maugham's great book with the feeling that he has spent some weeks floating in an open boat on a turgid flood-swollen stream. The reader also leaves Mrs. Conover with a sense of being dazed and lost. But in the first book he has floated on a stream of vexed and vexing emotion. In the second he has wandered about lost in the unnecessary opacities of the author's presentation of a simple tale. Mrs. Conover never emerges as the malignant figure she was clearly intended to be. She is simply a very old friend who makes the headlines in our papers with almost tiresome regularity, the woman who has been taught to regard the natural joys of the body as sinful, and who for a time discovers a satisfactory substitute in emotional religion, only to find herself presently staring in horror at the same sin again. Lost in the shadows of Mr. Metcalf's book there are, however, various people whom we know would be interesting if he could, for a moment, manage to get them into the light. And there is a constant undertone of moody passion that makes one go on reading from page to page.

"The Gallant Came Late" arouses a special tenderness in me. The story of the little dreaming girl and her lonely father in the house on the Carolina mountain side is charmingly told. To be sure there were never a father and daughter since time began who were quite so continuously and exquisitely considerate of each other; yet the tale as it is told conjures up such a relationship as it seems in retrospect, and so preserves its inner truth.

This book also might have been called "The Invader," for it portrays the power of love to overturn completely everything that had seemed to have value in a life before its appearance. This is a theme that has never been adequately developed, and Miss Storm's story is, interiorly again, profoundly true. It seems to me a pity that the concrete episodes she has hit upon to develop this theme should have such a false, almost movie-like atmosphere about them. It seems to me quite unthinkable that the girl we know in the first part of the book should have thrown her talent and her little fortune away in order to maintain a luxurious apartment and to overdress herself for a lover who didn't even demand such a sacrifice from her. One questions at once the genuineness of the talent that is so caverlierly sacrificed, one questions the reality of the great voice teacher who would banish one of her most promising pupils for a single disobedience, one questions the quickness with which Allard decided to prevent the birth of her child, and one questions even more the violence of her grief once the deed was done. But one does not question the genuineness of the experience Miss Storm has tried to dramatize with these unfortunately chosen episodes or the genuineness of her talent.

by MARGARET MEAD

*H*AVELOCK ELLIS says of this provocative comparison of adolescent folkways in Samoa and the United States: "It is not only a fascinating book to read, but most instructive and valuable. The great master in these fields is Professor Malinowski, and I could not pay higher tribute to Miss Mead than to mention her name in connection with his."

Bronislaw Malinowski, of London University, says: "An absolutely first-rate piece of descriptive anthropology, an excellent sociological comparison of primitive and modern conditions in some of the most problematic phases of human culture. Miss Mead's style is fascinating as well as exact . . . an outstanding achievement."

European Diplomats at Work

British Documents on the Origin of the War, 1898-1914. Volume III: The Testing of the Entente, 1904-1906. Edited by G. P. Gooch and Harold Temperley. London: His Majesty's Stationery Office. 10/6.

In this third volume of the British war documents, covering the period when the Anglo-French agreement was young and the Morocco dispute was looming upon the European consciousness, little but amplified detail is added to the understanding of British policy. It was a period of trying out the ground; and the difficulties of diplomacy are illustrated in the conflicts of opinion within the Foreign Office. Sir Eyre Crow's bitter marginal comments upon documents relatively friendly to Germany are often as amusing as they are enlightening.

Survey of International Affairs: 1925. Volume I: The Islamic World Since the Peace Settlement. By Arnold J. Toynbee. Volume II: By C. A. Macartney and others. Supplement: Chronology of International Events and Treaties, January 1, 1920-December 31, 1925. Compiled by V. M. Boulter. Oxford University Press, American Branch. Prices, $8.50 and $4.25 respectively.

The Royal Institute of International Affairs is making itself useful to the rest of the world. The factual summaries of these annual "Surveys" are invaluable to the serious student of international politics; although, perhaps, future volumes might usefully pay more attention to the economic developments which in the long run shape politics. Possibly the quotation from a New Orleans business man introduced into the discussion of Mexican affairs—"No nobler ideal was ever conceived by mortal man than to raise up ten millions of people to the point where they've gotten purchasing power"—is a step in this direction. Inevitably, prepared in England, these volumes have betrayed a certain European bias; the 1925 issue is the first to include a section on the New World. Wisely, no effort is made to limit the ground covered to the date of the volume; the histories of the Locarno pacts, of the Chinese Eastern Railway, of the Shanghai dispute in the volume for 1925 go back a decade and are carried forward in some cases to 1927. Mr. Toynbee's volume on the Islamic World goes back half a century in explaining the abolition of the Ottoman caliphate, and his story of events on the north coast of Africa covers the entire post-war period.

A History of European Diplomacy, 1914-1925. By R. B. Mowat. Longmans, Green and Company. $6.25.

Save for bits of personal description or characterization here and there, Mr. Mowat's book is dry reading, but as it is fairly comprehensive, well arranged, and literally crammed with facts, it should on that account be very useful to any one who needs to refresh his memory regarding the period with which it deals. The author's point of view may be gathered from his praise of Sir Edward Grey; his smug assertion that the publication of the famous White Paper of August, 1914, "placed the policy of Great Britain in a clear light and created a conviction in the rightness of her actions which nothing has transpired to dim"; his patronizing remark, apropos of the controversy over contraband of war, that "the British navy has always been something of a dominating (only unfriendly critics would say domineering) influence on the high seas," and that "on this account the people of the United States, who have a fine naval tradition, have always scrupulously examined the attitude of the British navy toward their shipping, and have been, quite naturally, a little sensitive about it"; his acclaim of Venizelos as a great statesman who, "as far as a historian can judge . . . has always been right"; his amazing statement that the Treaty of Versailles "contained a fairer adjustment of territories than had previously existed," and his description of Chicherin at the Genoa conference as looking like "a clever bourgeois . . . something saturnine, watchful, and uneasy about his countenance . . . sometimes sanctimonious, always a little insolent." The book is dedicated to the president and faculty of the University of Wisconsin, from which fact it may apparently be inferred that the substance of the book was originally delivered as lectures at that institution. The Drafting of the Covenant. By David Hunter Miller. Putnam. 2 vols. $15.

Every phrase or mere word of the Covenant of the League of Nations is here traced through the session of the commission which composed it, to Wilson's, House's, Lord Phillimore's original drafts or the later insertions, additions, and compromises of French, Italian, British, and American experts. It is a work of microscopic scholarship, infinitely documented, a minute medical record of the birth-throes of an international constitution.

Music Munich and Salzburg

AS music-drama the first act of "Tristan" at Munich was much better than at Bayreuth, and in fact something of an achievement. The setting had appropriate strength and sombre magnificence of coloring, where the Bayreuth setting had been pretty and fussy. And there were the same strength and color, in place of the customary white, in the costuming of Isolde, who in addition was played by a woman of regal stature, Elizabeth Ohms. Again, the very roughness of the orchestra, its faster tempos, might be taken as dramatic vigor. But in the second act the musical weakness of the participants resulted in disaster. Under Knappertsbusch the orchestra sounded at times like a routed army, and was badly out of tune, with the horns off-stage producing only indistinguishable wheezes.

I fled to Salzburg, only to be entertained by the dismal sputter of damp powder. The Festival began this year with a visit of the Leningrad Opera Studio, the name of which promised great things, but which in fact gave performances that were pretty awful, except for the singing of two basses and of a remarkable contralto named Presbajenskaya. Thus, the only good performance technically—of Mozart's "Bastien et Bastienne"—was bad nevertheless because it was wrong: it took the form of an amateurs' rehearsal which in effect poked fun at the opera instead of projecting the humor in it.

Of the customary performances by the Vienna Opera forces there is a different story to tell. I heard first the famous production of "Fidelio" with Lotte Lehmann, conducted by Schalk. This production, it turned out, deserved its fame, but not because of Lehmann—the quality of whose singing was beautiful but not remarkable, and who exhibited only annoying operatic conventions as an actress—nor indeed because of any individual. The very fact that there was no outstanding personality in the company, except perhaps Richard Mayr, may be the reason for the peculiar excellence of the performance, its dramatic and musical unity: the principals seemed willing and accustomed to work together and to be taught the details of the conductor's musical conception. This was also true, of course, of the orchestra, the Vienna Philharmonic (which is also the orchestra of the opera company), whose playing was easily the biggest single contribution to the performance. These

Professor HARRY ELMER BARNES, America's most brilliant historian, says:

Among the influences making for civilization and decency in the United States must be ranked the work of the group whose activities centre around the Modern Quarterly, under the leadership of V. F. Calverton and Samuel D. Schmalhausen. Indeed, they must be accorded the position of intellectual primacy among those in this country who unite confidence in the scientific view of man and nature with a faith in the capacity of the proletariat to undertake the direction of society in behalf of the service of the many rather than the profit of the few. They are probably the closest American analogue of such English circles as those represented by the Fabian Socialists, Havelock Ellis, Bertrand and Dora Russell and Eden and Cedar Paul. In other words, they are the "highbrows" of American social and intellectual radicalism. Their works lack to be sure, the poise, finish and organization of their English affinities, but what they lack in mellowness they supply in vigor and enthusiasm.

observations can be repeated for the other performances conducted by Schalk that I heard: of Mozart's "Magic Flute," which, I should add, suffered from cumbersome staging and an inadequate Queen of the Night; and of Schubert's Mass in E flat. In all of Schalk's performances one was presented with the results of the pains that had been taken in preparing them; one felt that Schalk himself was no longer necessary, that the orchestra, with its own understanding and his training, could play as well without him.

The performances of Bruno Walter, on the contrary, after all preliminary rehearsal, were delivered white-hot; and quite apart from this were the finest I heard at Salzburg. Under him the orchestra showed what it was capable of: in a brilliant performance of Schubert's C major symphony, an equally fine performance of the "Unfinished," a performance of the Rosamunde music that had to be heard to be believed, but above all in the performance of Mozart's "Così fan tutte." I had no ears for the singers, and certainly no eyes for the shabby set. My attention was claimed by Walters riant, alert, unobtrusively pointed accompaniment with orchestra and, on occasion, with piano. He does not conduct all music equally well (who does?); I am told that Kleiber surpasses him in the bigger Mozart, and indeed that Richard Strauss surpasses everyone; but a "Così fan tutte" better than Walter's I cannot conceive of.

A few of the advance reports, then, I found exaggerated. Such reports have caused us to import musicians who have disappointed us; they therefore deserve and reward discussion. In general it is not the single judgment of a critic that is perplexing, but his pair of judgments; in particular it is not the warmth over a Gertrude Kappel or a Lotte Lehmann, but that a critic should speak as warmly of them as he did formerly of greater artists. It is not surprising—in the absence of greater conductors and in view of his own actual competence, the more favorable conditions under which he works in Europe, the very nature of his limitations of repertoire and style—that in central Europe Furtwaengler should be considered a greater conductor than he turned out to be in New York; what is surprising is that people should consider him fabulous ("fabelhaft") who have heard the truly fabulous conductors of the past. It is not surprising that some should find Knappertsbusch fabulous; what is bewildering is that it should be the person who has just used the adjective of Furtwaengler and who, on the other hand, is able to appreciate how poor Von Hoesslin is. Again, those who value Beethoven and Mozart should not find much nourishment in Pfitzner or Bruckner; and certainly if, as it turns out, they are merely fascinated, as Germans are apt to be, by formalistic intricacies, they should not rate Bruckner higher than Brahms.

It is the reasons for all this, when one can discover them, that are interesting. We Americans cannot appreciate Pfitzner, runs the argument, because his is the expression of something essentially German. At the same time, in the case of the conductors, we are told the sad story of the perversion of German music—Beethoven, Schubert, Schumann—which is national, by Jewish musicians who are international. In other words, the great common virtue of Furtwaengler and Knappertsbusch is that they are German and not Jews. (We must, we are told, hear Knappertsbusch conduct not Wagner but Beethoven; and similarly most of the third-raters turn out to be first-rate only in Bruckner). But since we do appreciate the Germans Beethoven and Schubert we should be able to appreciate the German Pfitzner; and if instead we find Pfitzner sterile, it cannot be merely because he is German. Furthermore, if we appreciate Beethoven and Schubert, the theory of music being national begins to look slightly cock-eyed; and it looks worse when we remember how Koussevitzky conducts Debussy, Monteux or Goossens conducts Stravinsky's "Sacre," Toscanini conducts Wagner, and the international Bruno Walter conducts the German Schubert or Mozart. And what, may I ask, is there essentially German about Mozart?

Drama

A Cowards' League for Peace

PLAYS about the war have generally beat the big drum. Whether militantly patriotic or aggressively non-resistant they have celebrated the heroic virtues and they have done scant justice to those numerous Americans whose disinclination to be shot was due less to the high moral fervor of the theoretical pacifist than to a simple and quite understandable preference for the pleasures of a quiet life. On the whole, literature has not concerned itself enough with the many quite agreeable people who have no taste for martyrdom upon any altar and it is for this reason that I hail "The War Song" (National Theater), whose chief virtue lies just in the fact that it dares to choose such a man as its unheroic hero.

When the war broke out Eddie Rosen (ingratiatingly played by Mr. George Jessel) "plugged" the patriotic ditties of tin-pan alley in the various vaudeville houses of this city because song plugging was his business, but he was far more interested in the welfare of a nice old Jewish mother and in the charms of one Sally Moss than in the various abstractions which were supposed to take precedence over them. He knew that he would be a bad soldier and, after the draft board drew his name, a bad soldier he was—amiably incompetent, completely unheroic, and miserably out of place. His companions liked him and so did the officers, whom he obligingly helped back to their quarters when they were too drunk to find their own way, but the guard-house knew him well and on the eve of a battle he was far more likely to be thinking of the troubles in the flat back home than of the alleged outrages perpetrated by the Huns in Belgium. Finally, the last act discovers him safely a prisoner behind the German lines, but his mother is dead and his sweet-heart has defected. Decidedly he had not been much good to War and decidedly War had not been much good to him. He was, the heroic would say, not big enough for it, but the fact remains that he was a considerably more likable human being than many who were.

Now "The War Song" is not a great play. In the first place, pathos, upon which it chiefly depends for its effect, is one of the least satisfactory sentiments upon which drama can depend because, even when it is frequently relieved by comedy, as in this case it is, it leaves the spectator somehow let down, and it is incapable of producing that tonic effect which makes either comedy or tragedy exhilarating. The present play does, moreover, frequently skirt near the edge of obvious sentimentality and it is marred by occasional lapses into the manner of the sob-story. But it is both honest and intelligent at bottom, and to me it suggested a project which I shall now unfold.

Opponents of war have always proposed to prevent it by an appeal to various human virtues. They have urged that the effort be directed toward making men more intelligent, on the one hand, and, on the other, more inclusive in the love which they bear toward their fellow man. But all the virtues, and particularly that of intelligence, are very difficult to cultivate wholesale and they are, moreover, always sensitive to various specious appeals like that of the war "to end war" or "to save civilization from the barbarians." Personally, therefore, I very much fear that the human race will never be good enough or intelligent enough to refrain from fighting, but fortunately there are various vices which ought to be easily cultivatable and equally effective. Indolence, cowardice, and love of ease certainly promote peace and certainly none is rare. For one martyr willing to lose his life in the interests of international good-will or even to undergo the discomforts of prison for the sake of making a spectacular protest, there are hundreds who would be glad to indulge a harmless selfishness if only they were given proper encouragement. Perhaps, after all, the real hope lies rather with the Eddie Rosens than with those who have only their nobility to guide them when the trumpet calls. I propose, therefore, a Cowards' League for Peace, international in scope, and with membership open to all those who for any reason, good or bad, will promise to keep out of all armies whenever possible by whatever means they can. It will appeal to many who are not conspicuously intelligent or even particularly noble, but it is numbers that count either in making an army or destroying it. Our patron saint will be, not Tolstoi or Gandhi or anyone like them, but the poet Horace, for when Horace threw down his shield at Philippi and ran away he did so not at all because he was an internationalist but simply because he had a great disinclination to dying. As for our slogan, I suggest either "Cowards Arise!" or, if that be considered to embody a paradox, then "Cowards Lie Down!"—anywhere and behind anything that happens to be handy.

Among the other new plays of the week the most amusing is "When Crummles Played," presented by the new English repertory company at the Garrick Theater. The Crummles referred to is that traveling impresario who appears in "Nicholas Nickleby," and the present performance includes a burlesque presentation of "George Barnwell" done more or less in the manner of the "Fashion" revival. It is staged with considerable spirit and it is quite entertaining. "Elmer the Great" (Lyceum Theater) is the baseball play which is attributed to Ring Lardner but which Mr. Lardner professes not to recognize in the present version. It was probably very good in the original form but something of a mess as it now stands, for Mr. Cohan has transformed the ivory-headed pitcher into a hero and replaced most of the original satire with homely sentiment. "Chee Chee" (Mansfield Theater) is a lavish musical comedy which concerns itself with the emotions of the Son of the Grand Eunuch just before promotion to his father's important office.

their own thinking

THE leading article in Harpers Magazine for October will bring joy to the readers of the NATION however it may be reviled in certain quarters. For in "The Blue Menace," Oswald Garrison Villard scores the bigotry that burns in thousands of our leading citizens, making them oppose all liberal thought under the cloak of patriotism.

In fact, the whole October number is significant. Look carefully at the titles below. The variety is impressive, and the subjects are not only varied but important. Each month, Harpers Magazine presents a miscellany of reading that reflects the eager energetic modern mind. Particularly the Harper readers whose chief characteristic appears to be a combination of intellectual curiosity and a strong distaste for the second-rate.

In spite of the extraordinary increase in the circulation of the new Harpers Magazine there remain some of our rightful readers who are not yet on our subscription list. Perhaps you are one of those essential Harper readers who has not yet come to know his particular magazine. An excellent opportunity for this introduction is offered you below. Why not cut the coupon immediately and become a subscriber to Harpers Magazine for six months at only half the usual price!

The United States as Guardian of Europe

THE following article from L'Echo de la Bourse of Brussels expresses a significant reaction to the Kellogg Pact and to the increasing power of the United States in European affairs:

The Kellogg pact had hardly been signed when Mr. Briand saw himself compelled to speak to the Germans at Geneva in an extremely frank language, so frank that the German press now places the Quay d'Orsay statesman in the same category with Mr. Poincaré. This famous pact, far from marking a turning point in history—just remember the frightful outpourings of poetic enthusiasm on the part of certain French papers—leaves nations and men with their traditional interests, their appetites, instincts, grudges, and vices.

After all, only one thing interests us: Will it have any effect? Our conviction is that its only effect will be of a psychological order. This is quite evident, as material penalties are not provided and as the "law of peace" only calls for lofty adjectives and adverbs. The Kellogg pact is an instrument of propaganda; it works for peace by the method of suggestion. That is a method to which risks are attached.

Mr. Henri Lambert, whose audacious studies of political economy are well known and who has always thoroughly penetrating views, tells us that he does not share our opinion, but at the same time he presents the Kellogg pact to us in a very crude light. His communication deserves to be placed before our readers. It reads as follows:

"The Kellogg pact will, in my opinion, and contrary to the opinion expressed by the Echo de la Bourse, not have any effect as a moral undertaking, at least if only the direct consequences are considered. Taken in itself, the mutual promise of the nations never again to make war on each other (although they have not been able to solve to their mutual satisfaction any of the grave questions which profoundly divide them) is the most flagrant childishness and stupidity to which diplomats, statesmen, and princes have ever subscribed in the course of human history. But considered in its indirect consequences—and apparently altogether overlooked—the Kellogg pact has an importance that cannot be over-estimated: it assures in an absolute manner the peace of Europe for many years to come. The astonishing part is that no statesman, no political writer of the Old and the New World, has pointed this out. It does not seem to have dawned on them at all.

"As a matter of fact, it is inconceivable that in future the United States should lend its financial, industrial, and commercial assistance, in the shape of credit or supplies of provisions, arms, and ammunition, to a nation or nations that are aggressors. And it is almost as inconceivable that they should refuse this assistance to the victims of aggression. Now in Europe there will for a long time be no nation, not even England, capable of facing a war in which it would meet as adversary the financial, industrial, and commercial power of the United States.

"The Government of the United States has thus become the supreme arbiter of European international politics. For it is clear that in its eyes the aggressor will always and inevitably be the nation which it considers in the wrong, and the victim will always be the nation, rightly or wrongly, which it considers in the right. Geneva will always be careful not to be at cross-purposes with the American Government, and, furthermore, the latter would entirely disregard Geneva's opinion. Europe is thus under guardianship. The 'great statesmen' of Europe have thus been caught in the trap which worthy Mr. Kellogg has quite innocently set for them. The pacific destiny of the European peoples is thus fixed under the financial hegemony of America. We have to live under the rule of this 'Pax Americana.'

"Is this an evil?

"If only a month ago somebody had done me the honor of asking my opinion as to the problem of peace, I should have replied that the solution could only be found in Free-Trade. I might have added that lacking such a solution, lacking the real 'peace by right,' there remained the 'peace by might.' Now, what has happened? Instead of having followed the road of economic and free-trade pacification, Europe sees its international problem settled by the financial power of America. It is true that this settlement by financial power is preferable to any settlement by military force. But, all the same, it is a great humiliation, particularly for our leaders and great politicians.

"As a matter of fact, Europe was incapable of saving itself by its own will and its own means. Not one of these statesmen, not one of the political writers, not even one of the economists and sociologists, seems to have had the least idea of the three great questions, questions of life and death, with which Europe is confronted: the question of international relations, that of social relations, that of the organization of parliamentary democracy. That explains the constant and patent failure whenever they face any of these problems.

"It is therefore a good thing, desirable and necessary, that Europe was placed under guardianship. Evidently the American statesmen and leaders know no more about this than ours. Manifestly they see even less clearly the true conditions of stability and progress of civilization. But they will be politically honest. (I say 'politically' and add that in purely European questions their impartiality may be admitted.)

"My conclusion is that, particularly with regard to the small nations like Belgium, it will be better to live under the tutelary direction and supervision of the United States than under those of France, Germany, or even of England.

"After all, the main thing is that peace in Europe is assured for a long time to come. Let us hope that in the meantime the statesmen and great politicians of Europe and America will see the problem clearly—an elementary problem for anyone facing it in a spirit of truth and justice—without considering the dangerous ineptitudes now in favor at Geneva, as, for instance, 'peace by disarmament' or peace 'through application of the treaties in force.'

"HENRI LAMBERT

"P.S.—Among other exigencies the United States will probably in the end proclaim that of the open door and of equality of rights in the colonies elsewhere and they even may admit it in their own colonies. This would indeed be a great step forward."

The interpretation of our esteemed correspondent appears to us interesting principally because it corresponds to the impression, to the unexpressed sentiment, of millions of Europeans. The United States does not want any more war in Europe: that is the origin of everything. They tell us so very politely, proposing to us a pact which all nations sign on the footing of the most perfect equality. But as a matter of fact, they "impose" peace upon us. They fear our incapacity to establish it ourselves and they intervene with authority. It cannot be denied that the Kellogg pact is the affirmation of their guardianship.

Beneficent guardianship? Yes, in principle. As a matter of fact, the American nation is guided by interested motives. What will happen if these motives change? There lies the danger. Preparing for that day the European nations should organize peace on a European plan and should show themselves

An Open Letter to "The Best Minds"—

You are the mental upper crust of America—the top one per cent. The Associate Editor of the Encyclopedia Britannica, Professor Walter B. Pitkin of Columbia University, has written a book about you and your dilemmas. The Twilight of The American Mind is not only a bold excuse in social prophesy, but is positively exciting because Professor Pitkin demonstrates, with erudite research but racy style, a—That by 1975, America will approach a platonic aristocracy of talent.

b—That very few high grade intellects can succeed in business.

c—That American business is now organized. A man with a high grade mind has to use it a few minutes a month to hold his job.

d—That our new mechanized civilization is precipitating a major crisis in American Education.

sufficiently strong and capable to maintain it by their own forces—even against the United States.

The fact that both Europe and America are protectionist involves us in a vicious circle. We will get away from it if we allow the Kellogg pact to develop its psychological effects. It has a virtue of propaganda. It reinforces a movement of opinion the force of which is not negligible. Let us hope that it will induce the peoples of Europe to ponder their humiliation and to seek peace in the suppression of the causes of war!

Why Not?

HIS EXCELLENCY General Frits Holm, G.C.G., G.C.H.S., LL.D., D.C.L., Royal Yacht Club, Copenhagen, is circulating through the world a new plan for abolishing war. His "Projected Law—The Enactment, Promulgation, and Enforcement of which will prevent war among nations" contains, among other things, certain unique suggestions:

The following measures shall within ten hours after the beginning of hostilities or the formal declaring of war be carried into effect, to wit: there shall be conscripted as simple soldiers or simple sailors, with rank of privates, for the earliest possible participation in actual hostilities against the enemy under fire, the following persons:

1. The head of the state, if male, whether president or sovereign.
2. All male blood relatives of the head of the state having attained the age of sixteen.
3. The prime minister and other secretaries of state, as well as all under and assistant secretaries of state.
4. All male representatives elected by the nation for legislative work, except such members as voted openly against said armed conflict.
5. All bishops and prelates, or ecclesiastics of similar rank, of the nation's Christian and other churches who failed publicly to oppose such armed conflict.

The above enlistments as privates are for the duration of the war and are enforced in disregard of the individual's age or condition of health, upon which the military medical officers will pass after enlistment.

The wives, daughters, and sisters of the above-mentioned persons shall be conscripted as simple nurses or servants for the duration of the war for service only at the front as near actual hostilities under fire as dressing stations or field hospitals are established.

THE WHISTLES OF BOATS in the harbor and the whir of airplanes overhead announced to New York the approach on October 15 of the airship Graf Zeppelin even before it came in sight around the edges of the downtown buildings. A hundred thousand heads were stretched out of office windows; crowds stood still in the streets and gazed at the narrow slices of sky visible between the buildings. Then quietly and with an air of supreme unconcern the great boat flew, or rather floated, into view. It passed quickly, without effort or even the appearance of motion, over the city; turned again; flew south and then out over the harbor. It was hard to believe that so serene and mighty a bubble could ever have been tossed about by storms, or bobbed in the wind. But the end of the voyage of the third airship ever to fly across the Atlantic Ocean must have brought relief to its sixty persons aboard as it did to millions of other people on both sides of the sea. The long trip; the stormy, unsettled weather; the scanty and conflicting reports; the thrilling tale of repairs made in mid-air over mid-ocean—all served to create a sense of uncertainty and anxious concern. Flying the ocean either in plane or airship is not yet so casual and safe a business that the element of excitement has been lost. Not one person looking out of New York's windows but felt a breathless moment of triumph and relief when the great cloud-like ship swept over the towers of the city.

GOVERNOR SMITH still has two and a half times as many votes, in The Nation's poll of its subscribers in the United States, as his nearest rival, Norman Thomas. The total now stands: Smith, 6,317; Thomas, 2,542; Hoover, 2,526; Foster, 396, with the rest scattering. Taken by States Smith carries the South over Hoover by three and a half to one; New York goes to Smith by five to one. North Carolina, that much-debated Southern territory, gives almost six times as many votes for Smith as for Hoover; Virginia gives more than four times as many. Wisconsin, which Republican managers are trembling over, votes nearly three times as often for Smith as for Hoover; Minnesota, also a Republican stumbling block, has two and a half times as many votes for Smith. In the entire list of States Hoover wins but one: South Dakota, and there Smith is only five votes behind. Illinois still has two Smith votes to one for Hoover. Meanwhile, in a surprisingly large number of cases, Norman Thomas matches or betters the Hoover vote. In the old South he is behind, as in the Southwest and in rock-bound Vermont; but in New York and New Jersey, in Pennsylvania, in the Middle West, and in the far Northwest he polls as well as or better than Hoover. In only three States is the Thomas vote within 50 per cent of that given to Smith: Colorado, Rhode Island, and—shades of Cabots and Bradfords and Lowells—Massachusetts!

BOTH ALFRED E. SMITH and Herbert Hoover have made their tariff speeches and both utterances are to their discredit. Governor Smith's is the worse by a good deal, for he has, besides flinging over the historic policy of his party of advocating tariffs for revenue only, set forth a program which after all differs from Mr. Hoover's merely in degree. More than that, he has taken to his breast that device for fooling the American people known as the Tariff Commission, promising to revamp it if he is elected. We have no doubt that he is perfectly sincere in his belief that he can work out a tariff which will favor all the people in the community and will permit of no special privilege. But that is the veriest nonsense and he might just as well promise the voters that if elected he will institute at once a regular line of Zeppelins to the moon. He obviously has not the faintest idea what the protective tariff really is. There is less excuse for Herbert Hoover's economic blunders because he is popularly supposed to be an authority on the mechanics of international trade. As it is, his address is a mass of contradictions. The whole thing was skilfully written for the audience to which he appealed, but it is superficial and unsound to a degree and not even wholly consistent with his previous utterances. We shall give more space to both these speeches next week.

SENATOR THOMAS J. WALSH has uncovered another oil scandal. It is only a mild scandal compared to the stench of Teapot Dome, but it involves Hubert Work, former Secretary of the Interior, now Mr. Hoover's campaign manager. Walsh charges that Work while sitting in the Coolidge Cabinet last February renewed a contract with the Sinclair Crude Oil Purchasing Company under which the government will lose over $2,000,000 because it sells oil from the Salt Creek, Wyoming, fields to the Sinclair interests at a price considerably below the market. The original five-year contract under which Sinclair buys this government oil so cheaply was made by ex-Secretary Albert B. Fall in 1922, and it appears that Fall gave the Sinclair interests an option to renew the contract at the old price for another five years. This option, Senator Walsh declares, was illegal because Fall gave it to the Sinclair interests secretly and no mention of it was made in advertising for bids. But Work, Attorney General Sargent, and his assistants held that the Sinclair option was legal, and they renewed the contract in February, selling the oil to Sinclair while certain Kansas oil companies were clamoring to buy it at a higher price. The government's legal advisers may be correct in maintaining that the government is compelled by the law to recognize the Sinclair option, but the Administration's handling of the case arouses grave suspicions. The Department of Justice, according to Senator Walsh, will not make public its legal memoranda on the subject, and the case which the Senator makes against the legality of the contract is apparently sound. Can it be that the Administration is seeking to evade exposure until after Election Day?

ONE SHOULD NOT CONFUSE the Scripps-Howard chain of newspapers with the independent and distinct group of James G. Scripps. In his article on California Is for Hoover in The Nation of October 10 George P. West mentioned the Los Angeles Record as a Scripps-Howard newspaper when in fact it belongs to the latter group. H. B. R. Briggs, editor of the Record, in a telegram to The Nation, dated October 11, asking for a correction, says that his journal has been advocating the candidacy of Governor Smith and he adds this prediction:

I hazard an humble opinion that Smith today has a good fighting chance to carry Hoover's home State and that he can cinch that chance if he comes here in person and takes an unequivocal stand for public distribution as well as government generation of Colorado River water-power. Senator Robinson, in response to the Record's blunt demand, definitely committed himself to this in his San Francisco speech Wednesday night.

Another reader of The Nation in Los Angeles, Mary Elizabeth Paddock, also sends words expressive of optimism in regard to Governor Smith's chances. She writes:

California is not going for Hoover. Smith is now in the last quarter and going strong while Herby is waddling past the first post. At the movies Hoover's picture brings, at best, only a ripple of applause, while Smith's appearance brings pandemonium. . . . If I am mistaken I will see that you get a box of the finest grape fruit procurable when the new crop comes in, but for heaven's sake don't turn Republican on that account!

The temptation is strong, but we've already said too many uncomplimentary things about Hoover to hit the G. O. P. trail at this date. However, we shall not forget about that grape fruit when come the ides of November.

THE LAST POLITICAL PRISONER in the United States was recently released, according to the records of the General Defense Committee of Chicago. He was Leo Ellis, a member of the Industrial Workers of the World. He was convicted under the California criminal-syndicalism law in 1920, but did not begin to serve his term, set at two years by the prison board, until 1926. Of 531 cases brought under the California statute there were 164 convictions, but there are now no prisoners under the law left in either San Quentin or Folsom prisons, although Jack Beavert, because of some mental disorder, was sent to the State hospital at Talmadge when his sentence expired last April, and he is still held there. The prisons of the other States are also empty so far as convictions under sedition or anti-syndicalism laws go, which is reason for thankfulness, but it must not be forgotten that two groups of practically political prisoners are still behind the bars—Mooney and Billings in California and the Centralia victims in Washington. A petition for the parole of the latter men has just been denied by the State board, but we are glad to note that the Puget Sound conference of the Methodist Episcopal church has voted to make an investigation of the case in spite of the protest of the First Church in Centralia. In an editorial entitled Sacco and Vanzetti—A Call for Action, published on August 22, we said there was no national organization fighting for the release of either Mooney and Billings or the Centralia group. We should have said there was no national organization working solely for such release. The International Labor Defense, 80 East Eleventh Street, New York City, has made the release of the California and Washington prisoners one of its major efforts, and we understand that steps are under way to organize a new national committee which shall devote itself solely to the release of Mooney and Billings.

COMMUNISTS ARE NOT ENTITLED to the protection of the Constitution in the opinion of various local police officers in Kansas, New Jersey, New York, Ohio, Pennsylvania, and West Virginia where election meetings of the Workers' (Communist) Party have been broken up or prohibited. In Nebraska the American Legion is trying to keep the Communist candidates off the ballot; in Pennsylvania many Workers' Party leaders have been arrested and charged with violation of the sedition act. The most disgraceful destruction of civil liberties has occurred in New Bedford, Massachusetts, where police authorities decided to suppress the Communist remnant of the great textile strike by sheer force of riot sticks. After the conservative unionists had returned to work, Police Chief Samuel D. McLeod instituted what he described as "a cleaning and sweeping-up process" by arresting twenty-seven left-wing strikers on charges of vagrancy and rioting. "We arrested persons," he said, "who we know have not worked since April 16 (the date when the strike began), and who have not satisfied us as to their visible means of support." Since when must an American worker on strike have a visible means of support? The Communists have called off their part of the New Bedford strike and the reign of police terror is over, but the action of Chief McLeod and the acceptance of his policy by the city will leave a permanent stain upon the record of New Bedford justice.

WITH THE TREMENDOUS INCREASE of automobile accidents our system of handling damage cases by jury trial has become a national nuisance. The court calendars of our cities are as badly overcrowded as our streets and, nourished by the law's delay, "ambulance chasers" and claim agents feed upon the victims. Justice Wasservogel of the New York Supreme Court has just issued an illuminating report on the legal aspects of the accident industry in which he suggests—an idea we have already discussed—that our larger cities might provide for personal injuries from automobiles by a special compensation law similar to workmen's compensation laws, which would take most street injuries out of the courts. Justice Wasservogel also suggests several important safeguards for accident victims who under the present system may be exploited by lawyers and claim agents. Compel the lawyer, he says, to make his settlement of a fee in the presence of the court and do not allow him to take more than one-third of the damages (lawyers quite frequently take one-half). Also, make it compulsory for the damages to be settled in the presence both of the court and of the injured person so that the latter will be sure of his share of the payment. In regard to perjury in judicial cases Justice Wasservogel believes that we have tried to punish it with over-severe penalties. Juries do not like to send men to prison for several years for lying, but they are quite willing to jail them for a few months as an object lesson.

WE HAIL THE NEW Nationalist Government of China with mingled joy and skepticism. All friends of the Chinese revolution are glad that the Nationalist dream of political unity is at least nominally realized, for nothing could be worse than perpetual civil war. Moreover, China is probably wise to choose as executive Chiang Kai-shek, who became head of the new government on October 10 at Nanking. As Chinese generals go he is tolerable. He will have under his direction at Nanking all the machinery necessary for a genuine civilian government, with the best minds of young China cooperating through the quasi-democratic committees of the Kuomintang. The question is: Will that civilian machinery really govern China, and will it preserve any of the social ideals of the revolution? It is at this point that skepticism overtakes us. Chiang Kai-shek seems to have renounced altogether the dreams of social reconstruction advocated by Madame Sun Yat-sen, Eugene Chen, and Wang Ching-wei at Hankow. He has brought into the new State Council five war lords who, together with himself, control six great areas in China, Chang Hsueh-liang in Manchuria, Feng Yu-hsiang in Honan, Yen Hsi-shan in Shansi, Li Chung-seu in Hankow, Li Chai-sum in Canton, and Chiang himself in Nanking and Shanghai. The supreme test of the new Chinese regime will be its ability to compel these six war lords to obey a civilian government.

WHEN THE CANADIAN GOVERNMENT formed the Canadian National Railways by merging the Canadian Northern and Grand Trunk lines in 1922, to be publicly owned and operated, there were those who insisted that the government had a white elephant on its hands. Their fears have turned out to be groundless. In the first seven months of this year its gross earnings were $146,505,000, as against $135,037,000 for the same period last year, a gain of 8.49 per cent. More important is the increase in net earnings—from $17,200,000 to $23,486,000, a gain of $5,288,000, or 29 per cent. One of the factors that make this showing particularly interesting is the competition between this government road and the Canadian Pacific, a well-managed, privately owned system. At first the Canadian Pacific was in a better financial position—and still is—but the Canadian National, as the figures indicate, is growing up with Canada. And Canada, apparently, profits by the rivalry; it costs the Canadian farmer on an average ten cents less per bushel to send wheat of Western Canada to ports of the Great Lakes than it costs the American farmer to send the wheat of Montana and North Dakota the same distance to our own lake ports.

MARIE FEODOROVNA is dead—the “lady of tears,” the most tragic figure among the crowned heads. Not even the Empress Eugenie's chronicle of misery and grief exceeds hers. Both were as if created to convince the world that the path of glory leads but to the grave as surely among queens as among peasants; that royalty wears no talisman against sorrow. Born the Princess Dagmar of Denmark, fate affianced her to the Czarevitch Nicholas of Russia and fate stole him away from her through his death from lung trouble a few weeks before the date for their marriage. In accordance with his dying request, she married his brother on October 26, 1866. Fifteen years later the Czar Alexander II, her father-in-law, was assassinated by Nihilists as he was driving through the streets of St. Petersburg. Her own husband Alexander III died in 1894 at the age of forty-nine. It was her son who was the last of the Romanov czars. It was her son to whom she once said, “Nicholas, be Czar”; he who called the first Hague Conference for peace, whose statesmen later insured the World War by mobilizing after their feeble Czar had ordered them to refrain. It was he who, with his whole family, was murdered in that horrible cellar at Ekaterinburg. But not in her belief. To her end she was persuaded that he lived in hiding. Before her collapsed the whole great Russian fabric, the great empire built of blood and tears and human misery that the Romanovs might rule and the aristocrats play in the splendor of their riches created by the backs of the mujiks. Only Denmark was left to her, and Maria Feodorovna returned to her ancestral home if not to her ancestral faith, but not until the war had ended and the revolution had plainly come to stay. And there she died.

ALICE HAS FOUND A HOME at last. Recently the world gasped to hear that Dr. Rosenbach of Philadelphia, the prince of book buyers, had paid $75,000 for the manuscript of Lewis Carroll's “Alice in Wonderland.” Alice was to be taken out of her native country, which had bid in vain to keep her, and exposed to the chill winds of an ocean voyage, the harsh stares of unfriendly aliens, the cold hands of a strange, un-British proprietor. Her affectionate friends in England were alarmed for her safety, but they need not have been, for it has been amply demonstrated that she has friends in America as well who love her no less. Not only has Eldridge R. Johnson paid Dr. Rosenbach $150,000 for the three Alice items—the manuscript and two first editions—but Mr. Johnson has placed the books on exhibition at the Free Library in Philadelphia and will leave them there as long as sufficient persons seem to be interested in them. After that they will tour the country; almost every large city in the United States has begged that the manuscript be exhibited there while the tour goes on. When the trip around the country is over Alice will come home—to Moorestown, New Jersey, where Mr. Johnson will keep her safely and tenderly, one is sure, for the rest of his life. Not for the rest of Alice's life, for book collectors do not live that long. Alice is at present sixty-three years old, but there is every indication that she will live forever.

The Real Issues of the Campaign

THEY are forgotten—the real issues of the campaign. They have been thrust aside, pushed into the background by issues created by the personality and the faith of one of the candidates. It is Rum, Romanism, and Tammany Hall (in place of Rebellion) of which we hear. It is an alarming, as well as a highly discouraging, phenomenon. We sympathize entirely with Nicholas Murray Butler's admirable letter to Michael Williams, editor of the Commonweal, upon the religious hate and bigotry brought out by this campaign. President Butler said in part:

Men and women who continue to call themselves Christian, at their head great companies of those who for some inscrutable reason feel they have been divinely appointed to preach the gospel of Christ, are betraying that Lord and Master as truly as did Judas and denying Him as truly as did Peter. Men and women who with calm effrontery continue to call themselves followers of Thomas Jefferson and believers in his political doctrines are daily contradicting by voice, by pen, and by deed the most fundamental of all the principles which that great philosopher taught. . . .

To what a pass has the nation come when millions of those who have passed through the common schools, and many of them also through institutions of higher education, are still the willing weapons of a religious hate and a malice that are as immoral as they are un-Christian and anti-American!

The bringing up of these issues has put into the background the fundamental principles upon which the campaign ought to be fought. There is only one candidate who has been steadily pounding upon the economic questions which the public ought to be discussing, upon the question of the control of the government of this country by organized wealth. He, it is needless to say, is Norman Thomas. One may agree with the Socialist platform or one may not, but the fact is that it alone continues the fight which was also waged in varying degrees and on different platforms by Theodore Roosevelt and Woodrow Wilson in 1912. It matters, of course, profoundly if we are going to slip back into an age of bigotry and religious hate and passion. We thoroughly respect those who find this the paramount consideration in the campaign. But at bottom remains the question which will not be denied: Shall the people rule in America, or shall the corporations and their tools, the bosses? This question is eternal until it is answered aright. If it is thrust into the background now, it merely means a delay in facing it, for faced it must be.

In an artificially stimulated and maintained prosperity we are declining to grapple with fundamental economic conditions. The condition of the woolen and cotton industries, the serious unemployment, are glossed over by Mr. Hoover and his associates, or they are misrepresented, as Secretary Davis has misstated the question of unemployment. The coal industry is, if anything, in greater chaos, and there is no leadership from within or without. In the field of water-power the country faces an issue of stupendous import. Shall the last of our great natural resources be utilized for private profit, or shall they be reserved, developed, and if necessary managed, directed, and operated by governmental authority?

In the railroad field no one knows where he stands—certainly not the railroads. The merger program sponsored by the recent Congressional act has been the subject of endless hearings and debates. It has progressed not one step. The oil industry cries out itself for a dictator who shall limit production, stop the frightful waste, the wild competition, the over-supply in a business which a couple of years ago was reported to be so near extinction as to menace the continuance of the automobile. Everybody admits that the prosperity of the farmers is the very essence of a sound economic life, and yet neither of the leading candidates has advanced a really constructive suggestion.

But leaving these basic economic problems, there are great human issues about which almost nobody speaks—greater economic security for the worker, to be obtained through old-age pensions, insurance against sickness, accident, and unemployment; and in still other ways. Year after year has passed since Secretary Hoover called his Conference on Unemployment in 1921, but we are wholly without provision to meet another emergency. Our lawmakers can draft laws to make Wall Street safe for the most gigantic speculation in modern times, but no one can draw a bill to provide machinery to function when millions are out of employment. No one is planning, outside of the Socialist Party, for greater industrial democracy and greater economic justice. It is only now, nearly at the end of the Presidential campaign, that the leading candidates have begun to discuss at length the protective tariff—that great source of corruption, that great machinery for the creation of economic injustice, that great creator of privilege.

Then there are the vast issues of war and peace, with all their ramifications. The invasion of foreign countries by American troops, our relationship to the other nations of the earth, the foreign debt to us—can anyone say with a straight face that these vital questions, which may mean life or death to hundreds of thousands of American boys, have been adequately discussed in this campaign? Certainly not by the two major parties. Governor Smith has kept almost as far from the Caribbean as from the Negro problem in the South, and neither he nor Mr. Hoover has had one word to say about the disenfranchisement of millions of our fellow-citizens. Mr. Hoover is concerned with our outward safety. Like the Czar of Russia and Kaiser Wilhelm he has put his faith in military and naval defense, and then has subscribed to the crassest possible policy of isolation and of national selfishness.

A thousand wrongs in American life cry out to high heaven for redress, but we are told to consider how rich and how happy we are, and how we can add to that happiness and prosperity at the expense of other peoples. And even this prospect is overshadowed by the steam and smoke engendered by the fires of religious hate, bigotry, and prejudice. Those are right who declare that the battle for personal liberty, for freedom of conscience and thought, must be fought anew in every generation. It will be fought out, and so will the struggle as to whether the United States is to be the property of a favored few or of the great masses of the American people whose labor and whose toil create the wealth that we have.

Hoover and the Scripps-Howard Press

HOW long will the Scripps-Howard newspapers continue to support Herbert Hoover? It seems incredible that editors who supported La Follette in 1924 should now engage in a national campaign for a candidate who is opposed to every progressive ideal which led La Follette to break with the Republican Party. If these editors had changed principles with the new allegiance, their position would be more comprehensible, but they have not—at least not officially or publicly. Hearst with all the vagaries of his temperamental career never made himself more ridiculous than the Scripps-Howard editors have done in trying to picture Hoover as a liberal on the power issue after his speech in Tennessee.

In his address at Elizabethton Hoover said not a word about Muscle Shoals, although it is a leading issue in the campaign and Tennessee was the logical place for a commitment. He deplored government intervention in business and praised our regulation as adequate to meet abuses. Coolidge himself could not have made a speech more satisfying to Samuel Insull and the National Electric Light Association. Edward J. Meeman of the Scripps-Howard Knoxville News-Sentinel hit upon one sentence which read:

There are local instances where the government must enter the business field as a by-product of some great major purpose, such as improvement in navigation, flood-control, scientific research, or national defense, but they do not violate the general policy to which we should adhere.

Mr. Meeman asked Hoover if Muscle Shoals was one of the "local instances." Mr. Hoover said that it was. Whereupon the wires of the Scripps-Howard newspapers all over the country hummed with jubilation. "Herbert Hoover," said the New York Telegram, "has strengthened his hold upon liberal voters by declaring for continued government ownership and operation of Muscle Shoals."

Mr. Hoover immediately went into conference with his advisers and produced a statement which revealed his real attitude. He had been correctly quoted, but the inference about government operation was pure moonshine. "There is no question of government ownership about Muscle Shoals," he said, "as the government already owns both the power and the nitrate plants." He declined to utter a syllable about short-term leasing or government operation, or the Norris bill for government development of Muscle Shoals which Congress had passed and Coolidge had killed by a pocket veto.

What should the Scripps-Howard papers have done? For four years they had been assailing Coolidge for his Muscle Shoals policy, and now their own favorite had made a statement which, as the New York Herald Tribune said, "was accepted as being in line with the refusal of President Coolidge to sign the Norris government-ownership bill." The thing to have done would have been to tell their readers in plain language what had happened: Hoover had not said one word to indicate that he believed in the government operation of Muscle Shoals, which was the crux of the whole problem and the thing which the Scripps-Howard papers stood for.

Instead of doing this the Scripps-Howard papers came out on the two following days with editorials hailing Hoover's indorsement of the government ownership of Muscle Shoals as a significant "public stand." "Government ownership of such a vast enterprise as Muscle Shoals," said the New York Telegram, "is the nation's safeguard against extortionate exploitation by the private-power interests—power being a natural monopoly and thereby subject to the instincts of greed to which private initiative is heir." Not a word to indicate that the power interests also accept the government ownership of Muscle Shoals and that all they want is the right to exploit on their own terms the development which the people have paid for. On October 13, 1927, the twenty-six papers of this chain carried a letter signed by Robert P. Scripps summarizing the Scripps-Howard platform for the campaign. The platform demanded that the United States recognize its position as a member of a community of nations looking toward reduction in armaments, that civil liberties should be protected, that sumptuary and so-called "moral" legislation should be restricted, that public interest should be made paramount in electric-power development with honest experiments in government operation, and that the oil-lease corruption should be officially condemned.

Where does Hoover stand in regard to these policies? He does not champion the League of Nations or a general disarmament program; he has nothing to say against the Administration's invasion of Nicaragua; he is silent on Tom Mooney, Centralia, and the widespread destruction of civil liberties in time of strike; he is siding with the diehards in "moral" legislation; he opposes government operation of water-power systems and declares that State regulation is adequate to control the power trust; he has never officially or specifically repudiated Fall, Doheny, Sinclair, and Hays. How long will the Scripps-Howard papers run with the hare and hunt with the hounds?

The Authors of Books

WHEN Thackeray read "Jane Eyre" he wanted to see Charlotte Brontë, for he supposed the author of this novel to be a highly interesting person. And from her letters, as well as from the information about her very remarkable family that we now have, we know her to have been interesting. But Thackeray, after long delays and many hesitations on the part of Miss Brontë, got her into his house one evening for dinner only to discover that it was quite impossible to converse with her. Not only was she so impressed by him that her tongue became tied; she was no talker anyway, and after a painful hour the author of "Vanity Fair" slipped away to his club, leaving the others who bore his name to struggle with the silence and the social ineptitude of the author of "Jane Eyre."

It is an old story. We have heard of a brilliant American editor who, having introduced a promising Western novelist to the public through his pages and having enjoyed his correspondence with her at a distance of some 1,100 miles, rejoiced at the news that at last she was traveling to New York. He made sure that she should come to his office and go out with him for lunch. The only trouble was that they had nothing to say to each other, and that in consequence she seemed dull—as doubtless he did also.

It is an old story that we seem never to remember when a new occasion arises. We are perennially deceived by what is known as the personality of an author into believing that this personality clings to his person as well as to his page. We make too much of the fact that a few famous writers have been famous talkers to boot; as, for example, Ben Jonson, Samuel Johnson, Byron, Shelley, Coleridge, Carlyle, Wilde, and Shaw. For these there have been hosts that entirely lacked the power to convince anyone that they could have produced their books through other means than magic. The nothing that we know about Shakespeare makes us suspicious that this man who peopled so vast and picturesque a world of people was no person in himself, was disappointing to meet, was quite dumb perhaps when called upon to speak. While Aeschylus and Sophocles moved easily in the society of Athens and became popular personages, Euripides seems to have been a retiring poet who made little or no impression. Chaucer was described by himself, and pictured by a contemporary artist, as one who kept his eyes on the ground and said few words—none of them, it is possible, inspiring. There is a long list of literary figures who could not have charmed audiences with their tongues if they had desired; they had impediments in their speech. This is true of two of the greatest living English novelists, as it was true of good-natured Oliver Goldsmith. And who of those who in this century were fortunate enough to catch an occasional midnight glimpse of the valetudinarian Marcel Proust in Paris—he nursed his asthma in a sealed and padded room out of which he went only in the middle of a clear night—could have had the slightest inkling of the masterpiece he was painfully bringing to birth out of the deep memories he marshaled with some mysterious strength.

We are not saying, of course, that every writer will be disappointing when come across in the flesh, but only that there is no rule in the matter—and no necessary connection whatever between the arts of literature and conversation. If one's favorite novelist is like his books, so much the better perhaps; but we do not advise the devoted reader to seek that author out. Many have gone to hear their heroes and heroines lecture, and most of these have been bewildered by the stupidity of the performance. Artists notoriously have little to say about their work. And this is proper, since we are coming more and more to understand the processes by which the work is produced. It issues, one discovers in many cases, from a personality which is not, strictly speaking, the author's personality at all, or in any event is purely an artistic personality. Artists surprise themselves by what they write, and are not lying when they insist that they do not know where their ideas, words, and characters come from. A little more belief in the classic doctrine of inspiration would save our hero-hunters much pain and disillusion.

So we hope that there will be an end some day to the tiresome exploitation by publishers and booksellers of literary persons who in this public sense do not exist. We can wish for these persons nothing nicer, we think, than neglect—and the right to go on working at their books, which we in our turn shall praise or blame merely as books.

Mussolini the Humorist

PREMIER MUSSOLINI has just interviewed the editors of all the Fascist newspapers in Rome, and has shown himself a better dictator than journalist, and a better humorist than either. His suggestions must have caused his hearers to writhe, the more because he is in a position to see that his slightest wish is carried out. "Some newspapers," said the Duce, feel the need to inform their readers that "A young professor shoots his wife," as though this was of interest to anyone except the professor's janitor and his immediate relations. Other papers dish up again for the thousandth time the mystery of Prince Rudolph at Mayerling, and others reprint to the point of nausea stories about the American colored dancer, Josephine Baker, or the so-called "Black Venus." All this is harmful to the education of the masses.

The education of the masses, "great national problems"—these should be Fascist news features, and the stuff of the headlines. If the public craves sensational stories about colored dancers, cure them of this childish taste by a discussion of the Italian state and a veneration—not too highly colored—of the Duce himself. For, in a most emphatic sense, Mussolini is the state, he is Fascism, he is—and he would not deny it—Italy.

Nor was the great man any less forthright on the subject of freedom of the press. It is not reported that the editors sat up in their chairs and gasped; probably they are by now incapable of surprise. But they listened to this:

The old accusations that Fascist tyranny suffocates the freedom of the press no longer receive any credit. The Italian press is the freest in the whole world. . . . Italian journalism is free because it serves only one cause and one regime. It is free because within the limits allowed by law it can exercise, and does exercise, the functions of control and criticism and propulsion. . . . They [Fascist journalists] do not await orders day by day. They have these orders in their consciences.

In other words, tie a horse up with a short rope, beat him over the nose if necessary, and it is altogether likely that he will not only turn docile but act as if he enjoyed doing so. The Italian press is free—to praise Fascism; the Italian press is free—to extol the glories of Italy under Mussolini; the Italian press is free—to offer every insult to foreign states that the Italian army makes possible, to editorialize with the utmost braggadocio about Italy's plans for world domination, the advent of the new empire of the Caesars. But let a newspaper editor or news writer, native or foreign, doubt this program in the columns of a newspaper printed in Italy and he and his paper are doomed to extinction—he to jail or to the islands of exile, or to constant surveillance at home, the paper going to the hands of some Fascist who hears orders in his conscience without having to be told them.

Mussolini made one more request of his editors: They should not, he begged, use exaggerated praise when speaking of himself. "For instance," he said, "anyone can say that as a player of a violin I am a very mediocre amateur." As a violin player, then, he is an amateur; as a novelist, as a recently reprinted novel shows, he is hardly that. But his forte is humor.

It Seems to Heywood Broun

A POLITICAL leader kneeling by his bed at night may be pardoned if he prays with bitterness, "Good Lord deliver me from ever having to depend upon support from liberals."

They are smooth stones like those which David gathered in the brook and no man in difficulties does well to rest his weight upon them. Surely at the present time there ought to be a liberal revolt against the personality and policies of Herbert Hoover. His program is a complete repudiation of all the things which progressives have held dear and yet there is no rumble of marching men nor any swinging cloud to indicate that the liberals have taken up arms and are moving to defend the right.

As usual the ranks are facing in several directions. Certain liberal forces remain with Herbert Hoover. The Scripps-Howard newspapers, for instance, support the Republican candidate because, as far as I can gather, of some intuitive feeling that the man can't possibly be as stuffy as his speeches. Curiously enough Mr. Hoover has been singularly successful in making crumbs suffice to comfort vast multitudes of his supporters. Not since the miracle of loaves and fishes has any large group of people been able to subsist on so little.

Certain believers in modification of the Volstead Act still follow in the train of Hoover for no better reason than that he called Prohibition an experiment. Since the man has not advocated that every agriculturist be boiled in oil Borah and others insist that he is friendly to the farmers. His vaguest word on water power is sufficient to convince the Scripps-Howard forces that all the more rational implications of his words are actually not true and that when Mr. Hoover is done with campaign necessities he will stand revealed as a man of foresight and of courage.

But after all who am I to endeavor to create a creed for liberals? There is no Pope for progressives nor any sort of clearing house. It is entirely possible that to some people Herbert Hoover may seem a spear thrust against the belly of privilege and corruption. By what process of reasoning such a decision can be reached I do not know. However, no barriers can justly be set against those who conscientiously skip with the Fighting Quaker. I listened once to an Irish orator who was speaking for peace and unity in his distressed country. Although a Catholic and a champion of the Republic he tried to prove that there was no necessary breach between himself and the men of Ulster. Brandishing his arms above his head he declared to an enraptured audience, "I have never said an unkind word against the Orangemen, ignorant, bigoted, and deluded though they may be." And some such blessing I would wish upon the heads of all those who follow Hoover and still call themselves progressives.

Having snapped at one hand which feeds me I might go on to say that the nature of support given by The Nation to Al Smith is hardly such as to encourage any man to face a hostile world with nothing but liberals at his back. In the case of The Nation the choice is not easy. Much can be said to justify the liberal who votes for Norman Thomas. And that "much" should be said and reiterated. After all it is in character for a liberal to see both sides of any question.

However, he should not emulate the donkey who, seeing both haystacks, could not move in either direction. There is a tendency among progressives to give so much time to the weighing of candidates that the election is over and done with before they have reached a decision to take any effective action.

I do not contend that Smith is the ideal leader to bring us all to a new freedom. None can deny he is a practical politician and that he has come up from city streets through the aid of Tammany. At this point I might interrupt cynically to say that he could hardly have risen from that lowly estate through the help of any reform organization. The children of darkness are more energetic and up and coming than the children of light. But anybody who thinks that Smith was swallowed by the Tiger which he rode is simply unobservant. Al has carved the animal as neatly as Mowgli skinned the big beast in the first Jungle Book. It is preposterous to think of Smith taking orders from Olvany. The leader of the Hall functions in name only. When Al cracks the whip Tammany will play dead and also roll over.

However, this digression gets me away from one of my chief complaints against the liberals. Of course the deepest hell should be reserved for Borah who has gone completely regular. But then I never did think of Borah as truly a liberal. He was always a man to quit cold when he hit the line of scrimmage. It is against better men than Borah that I complain. Where does Norris stand now that the fight has begun and where is young La Follette? In a sense they have given support to Smith but it is wholly of a negative character. They have not come out for Hoover. They have, it is true, expressed sharp disagreement with certain of his policies. But when a man belongs upon the barricade it is a little disheartening to find him sitting on the fence.

To an enormous extent liberalism in America has been nothing more than a policy of negation. This does not seem to me unimportant. During a Coolidge era it is well that there should be some to keep on sniping even when there is no possibility of victory in a pitched battle. Frankly I do not think there is the slightest chance for victory now. Hoover is deservedly the favorite at three to one and the odds are likely to go higher. But political developments in America do not depend alone on victories. Most good causes have been won by progress made in spite of many reverses. Little by little right comes to its own innings. And when, pray, did liberals ever win a clean-cut victory without first taking many a licking? What are they afraid of now—Norris and La Follette and the others? It will not do for each liberal simply to save his own skin and a local ticket.

A rousing vote for Smith will make it possible to elect a progressive in 1932 but if the Governor of New York goes down to crushing defeat in November there will be little reason to expect anybody to stand for office on a liberal ticket for the next ten years. Nor would there be much reason why anybody should. Liberals can't always be lone wolves. Now is the time for all good men to come to the aid of the party.

HEYWOOD BROWN

The "Race to the South Pole"

By EARL HANSON

WHEN the winter's Antarctic show is over and the two explorers, Byrd and Wilkins, have returned, one of them will have the honor, as far as the public is concerned, of being the first to fly to the South Pole, while the other will be a sort of also-ran, a second-best who was too slow or too unlucky or both. It makes no difference that Wilkins will probably not fly within a hundred miles of the pole, as he purposely went nowhere near the North Pole this year. To those whose knowledge of him is casual, he is that British fellow who got some publicity for being the first to fly over the North Pole from America to Europe. The fact that Amundsen, Nansen, and Stefansson, most of the Arctic men, and most of the world's geographers and navigators proclaim his flight the greatest Arctic flight ever made has been largely forgotten because it was not the first.

Let him complete his Antarctic flight before Commander Byrd completes his, and he will be hailed in half the newspapers in the United States as being the first to fly over the South Pole, thereby putting considerable tarnish on Byrd's golden crown—even if Byrd actually does become the only expedition commander to reach that mathematical point by airplane.

Both Byrd and Wilkins are perfectly aware of this, and I believe that both must also be aware that the glory of being the first to ride in an airplane over that particular country must at best be somewhat shopworn after several people have traveled over it on foot. But both are perfectly helpless. They can only announce their plans, voice their protests, go ahead with their work, and let the public, or at least the newspapers that claim to exist by virtue of knowing exactly what the public wants, keep on talking about the epic race to the South Pole and distribute the glory after the thing is done. And both are perfectly helpless, too, in that they must pay a certain amount of attention to their glory. To an explorer the word is synonymous with publicity, and without publicity he has the devil's own time raising money for expeditions.

Commander Byrd has definitely announced that he wants to fly to the South Pole over approximately the same route that Amundsen followed on foot, from the Ross Barrier and probably the Bay of Whales; also that he and his staff want to tackle some of the more pressing scientific problems that remain to be solved in the Antarctic. Sir Hubert Wilkins intends to fly from Deception Island, off Graham Land, to the Ross Sea, over absolutely unknown territory, keep his eyes open on the way, and pick out a possible site for a future meteorological observatory. Wilkins is embarking on a reconnaissance flight as the beginning of a program that will cover years of careful observation. Byrd has announced nothing for the future. His Antarctic work, as far as we know, will begin and end with this one expedition.

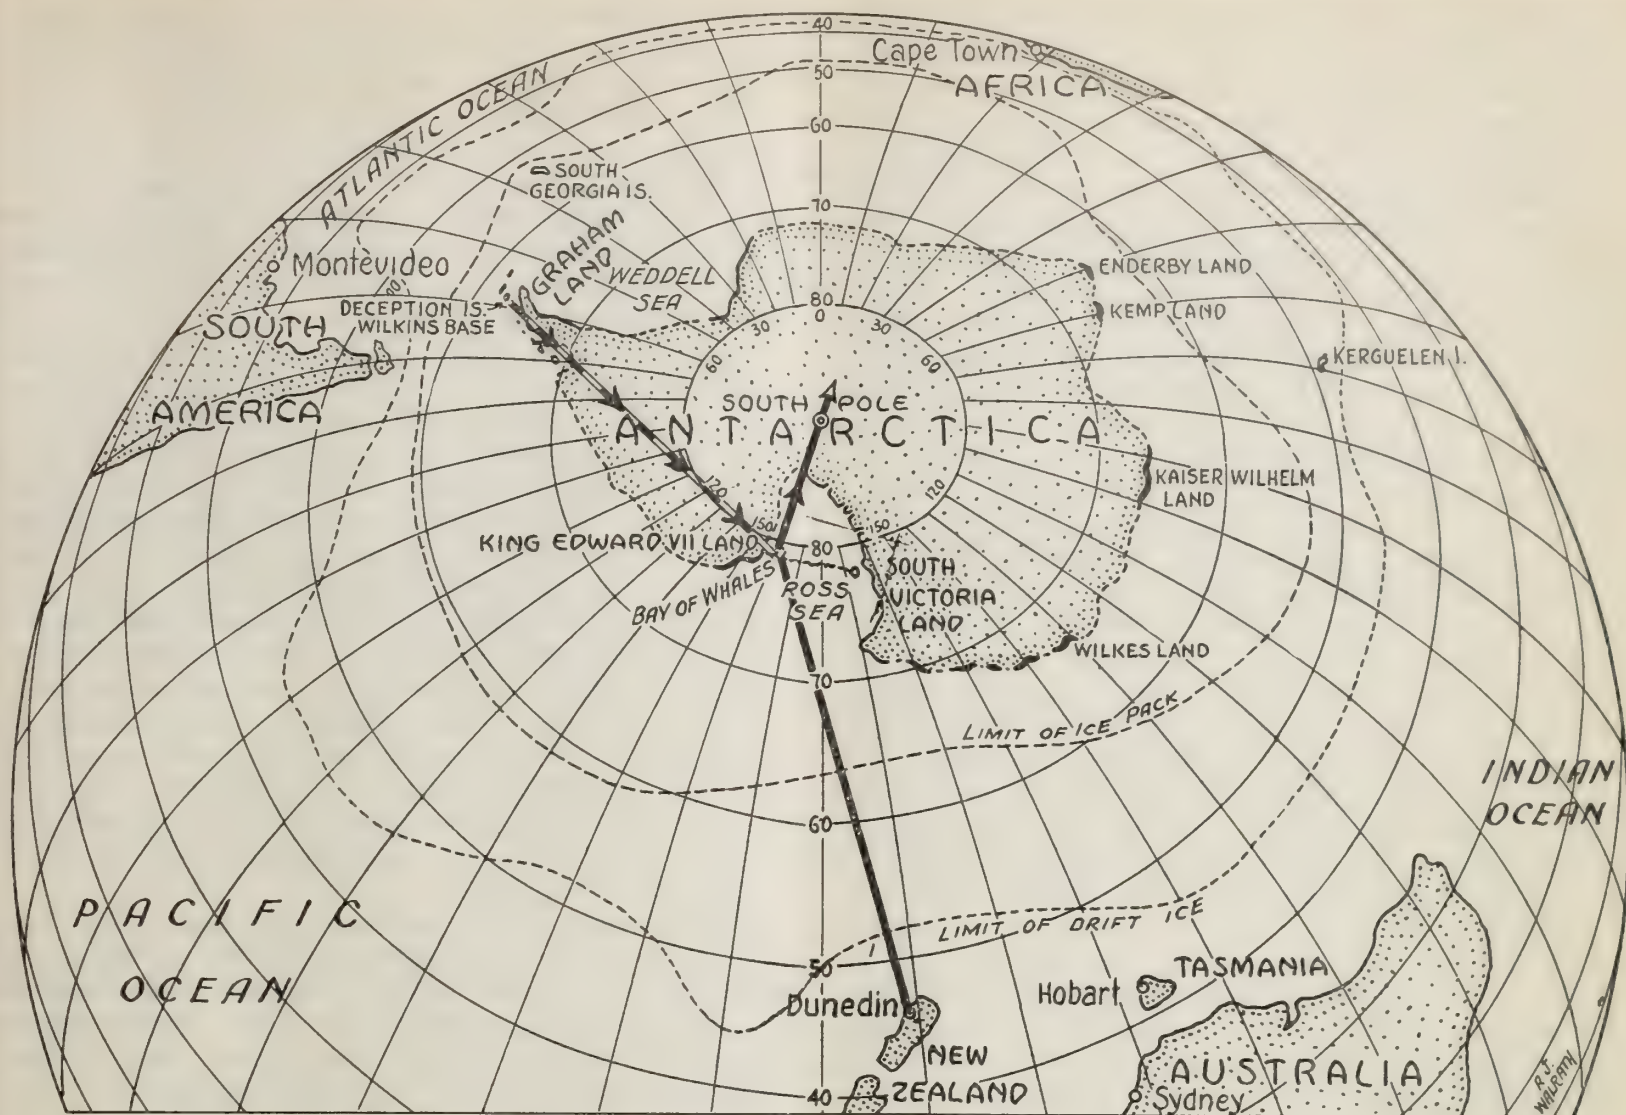

In Commander Byrd we have the highest type of "modern explorer," one who is a genius at raising funds for large expeditions, who leaves no stone unturned to insure the safety of himself and his men. His two ships, the City of New York and the Eleanor Bolling, are on their way South, manned by the eighty expedition-members and loaded with some thousand tons of materials and supplies—planes, food, clothing, houses, motor-sleds, dogs, a completely equipped staff of radio experts, tons of coal, and indoor games—everything that science and enthusiasm can provide to make his expedition safe, sane, and comfortable. He himself, a few of his scientists, and the remainder of his supplies have just left from the West coast on the whaler Larsen, to join the expedition in New Zealand. For every phase of the work he has a separate expert, assisted by several volunteer workers. Everything is carefully planned, every contingency provided for. As far as anybody can tell, only one big factor must remain untested until the time of actual trial—the moral factor. Will the expedition hold together? Will the volunteer-workers be amenable to discipline? Will the scientists cooperate or will each jealously protect his own field of endeavor as the most important in the whole job? Byrd himself lacks one other thing—experience in living and traveling in polar regions. He has flown in the Arctic to be sure, but he did his living on ships. It is not so fortunate that in case of serious trouble, in case it is necessary for him to walk back to the base after a forced landing, it may be necessary for somebody else to tell the commander how to proceed, and how to keep from freezing to death.

In Wilkins we have exactly the opposite. He has cut down his equipment to an absolute minimum and must depend on himself and his knowledge and experience to do the work and pull him out of difficulties. He and Eielson are taking two planes and two extra men. The expedition has just been transported as passengers and freight on a Munson liner to Montevideo. On October 24 they will sail on the steamer Victoria to the Antarctic. As in this year's Arctic flight there will be no base-ship and almost no ground-organization. The extra plane will be along principally for the sake of its parts interchangeable with those of the other and possibly useful as spares. The flight from one sector of the Antarctic to the other will be made without enough gasoline to enable the men to fly back again. They must depend on a chance whaler to take them home from the Ross Sea. Even their communication facilities are poor, for Wilkins has repeatedly demonstrated that the best of radio sets is liable to be of no use to him in emergencies because he himself is at best a poor radio technician. Most of the labor and all of the scientific work will have to be done by Wilkins and Eielson, and in case of a forced landing they will have to walk out alone and unassisted—over the windiest, one of the coldest, and probably the most lifeless region in the world. His plans are an enormous, almost an arrogant demonstration of self-confidence. Even the Royal Geographical Society, in presenting him with a gold medal for his brilliant achievements in Arctic flying, saw fit to give with it an anxious word of warning about the necessity of providing for possible trouble.

I am not so certain that Wilkins is not better provided for possible trouble than any other explorer in the field today. He has not only the necessary psychological qualities, a keen, active mind that functions perfectly in the face of seeming disaster, but the experience as well. He has spent years in the Arctic and the Antarctic, on land and on sea-ice, living and traveling with Stefansson and Shackleton under all conceivable conditions, flying, walking, traveling with dogs, summer and winter, sometimes "lost," in fair weather and foul. He was thoroughly trained in the technique of polar life and travel by Stefansson—probably the greatest expert in the world today on these subjects, not excluding his own teachers, the Eskimos themselves.

And Wilkins and his methods have been tested. In 1927 he and Eielson, without more equipment than they will take to the South, came down on the sea-ice a hundred miles north of Alaska and walked to safety in some eighteen days without trouble or fuss. The whole world on the other hand knows what happened to the Nobile expedition when it crashed only twenty-two miles from land.

If we regard the Wilkins-Byrd performance as a race, the betting must be about even. But barring accident it must be preponderantly in favor of Wilkins. Commander Byrd's million-dollar expedition is too ponderous, too cluttered up with materials and safety plans and specialized experts who are still absolute greenhorns under polar conditions, to give him a real chance for speed. Barring accidents it seems inevitable that Wilkins will sneak out under Byrd's nose and complete his program before the Americans get a real start. The fact that Wilkins is planning to end his flight on the Ross Barrier, in the immediate vicinity of Byrd's camp and perhaps in the camp itself, makes the prospect all the more dramatic.

Let us, on the other hand, admit the accident. If anything happens to Byrd while away from his camp, he can be aided by his own organization. He will have a splendid radio in his plane and a radio engineer to operate it. He will have several more planes that can go out and locate him, and if necessary dog teams and tractors to go and bring him back. Let him crash one plane and he will have three others in which to fly to the pole.

If Wilkins crashes somewhere on the Antarctic continent, there are only two things he can do. One of them is to sit by his radio and pound out S O S calls as Nobile did this year, and to wait for his other plane to get him, provided it is still intact. The other is to pack the needed belongings on his back or on a sled improvised from a plane-ski and to walk to the coast. Once there, being an expert hunter, he can probably get enough seals and birds for fuel and food to last him and Eielson indefinitely until some whaler picks them up. The chances are that he will do the latter. His record does not lead one to suppose that he would lure others into the task, extremely hazardous to inexperienced men, of going in to find him.

There is of course another possibility, with an ironical twist as far as a race is concerned. That is that Byrd would go to "rescue" Wilkins. On second thought I would call it a probability. Let us grant Wilkins all the knowledge and experience a man can have to make him self-sufficient, let us grant that his skill gives him absolute safety if only he comes down with a sound pair of legs. In the event of a crash, Byrd would still fly out to give him a lift, because that is what any decent human being would do.

Most present-day work in the Antarctic must be regarded as so much laboratory work, as research in abstract science. It is perhaps because it is difficult for the public to understand, or difficult for a newspaper reporter to point out, the value of abstract knowledge to our modern life that the adventurous and sporting sides of exploration are played up so much. The value of scientific research is only proved in the light of future applications and those who are not prophets must take it on faith. We can point out a few of the many questions that remain unanswered regarding the Antarctic; our children and grandchildren may be able to point out the benefits derived from the fact that they are answered. The mere fact that here we have a continent as large as the United States and Mexico together, and almost totally unknown, is a challenge that must be met.

But some of the tasks of Byrd and Wilkins do have direct application to our own lives. Through such efforts as Nansen's in the Polar sea, Mawson's in the Antarctic, and Hobb's in Greenland the world is only lately beginning to realize that the weather near the poles has a tremendous influence on the weather in inhabited countries, and that no really accurate method of weather forecasting can be worked out until polar meteorology is fully observed. Wilkins's program then, of eventually establishing some twelve meteorological stations on the Antarctic continent, is of importance to every farmer and every navigator in the world, and especially to his countrymen, the Australians. For few if any countries are so under the influence of Antarctic weather as Australia.

There is one major geographical problem that Wilkins may be able to clear up by traveling close to the pole: Is Antarctica really a continent, or it is an archipelago of islands, perhaps a group of two large islands? The mountains in the American sector are distinctly related, in rock-structure, to the Andes; those in the Australian sector are entirely different, being similar to the Australian rocks. Are these two kinds of rocks joined together or are they separated by a sea channel, running perhaps from the Wedell Sea to the Ross Sea? Wilkins's flight may definitely dispose of the term Antarctic Continent as his flight this year definitely did away with Crocker Land and Bradley Land in the Arctic. It would take many flights in many regions to confirm the continent.

Byrd's scientific plans are somewhat more refined and less fundamental. His scientists will undoubtedly add greatly to our knowledge of the zoology and bacteriology of that almost lifeless region. They will endeavor to make as close a study of the geology as possible. It is not likely that they will miss as many glorious chances as Amundsen did, to bring back carefully selected and well-annotated rock specimens. They may find enormous coal deposits and valuable fossils as Shackelton did, proving that the ice age did not always hold sway down there. They will carry on experiments to determine if the ice is receding or gaining or standing still, if the ice age is gaining or losing in intensity. Byrd's experts will attempt to measure the thickness of the ice with an adaptation of the sonic depth-finder. They will study the aurora, perhaps attempt anew to explain it, and certainly to draw quantitative conclusions as to its effect on radio-static.

Whether or not that enormous land mass around the South Pole ever becomes really "useful" to us, whether or not it will ever become a source of wealth and therefore habitable, remains for the future to decide. But the future will base its decision on the work of the present, on the results gained by such men as Wilkins and Byrd.

Austria's Fascists

By G. E. R. GEDYE

[Mr. Gedye's article was written a week before the demonstration in Wiener Neustadt on October 7 which, contrary to expectations, was entirely peaceful although accompanied by the arrest of some 200 Communists.]

Vienna, October 1

THE long-anticipated crisis in the matter of the Socialist and Fascist armed bodies in Austria (to which reference has been made more than once in these columns) definitely confronts the country. It has not come in the anticipated form of a coup d'état but in the typically Austrian form of an elaborately staged opening act of civil war, with date announced well in advance, with the aid of the state railways sought by and accorded to the contending parties (for whom special trains will be run to bring them into the necessary dangerous conjunction on October 7 at Wiener Neustadt), and with a strong body of militarized gendarmerie and probably also of troops in attendance to keep the ring if that prove possible. No theatrical production could have had a better press agent than the "Austrian Civil War" has automatically acquired, and the world's critics in the shape of war and special correspondents, together with photographers and film men, will, thanks to the world-famous Austrian Gemütlichkeit, be able to arrive on the scene well before the production, having traveled down in comfort and selected hotels at leisure. How different to last year's riots on July 15, when those not resident or accidentally in Vienna, found themselves cut off from all possibility of reaching the scene of action (thanks to the transport strike) until the "story" was at an end.

It is certainly well for Austria that if the crisis had to come, it should have had all this preliminary discussion and advertisement, for with the eyes of the world upon them, both sides will be trying to secure the best possible press. But one cannot refrain from asking whether it need really have got as far as this at all. If the situation had to be summed up from the point of view of allotting blame, one might say that the Socialists began it, but that they have been long outstripped by the Fascists in dangerous folly. The Socialist force, the Republikanische Schutzbund, grew directly out of the Revolution. The Volkswehr, the army that took over the name and a fraction of the duties of the Austrian Imperial Army, was definitely "captured for socialism" at the time of chaos which followed the dissolution of Imperial Austria. Political propaganda on a large scale went on regularly in the army, which was eventually organized in two camps, bourgeois and socialist, both being officially recognized. In view of the success of the bourgeois parties in securing a footing in the army, and of the Allied limitation of its strength, the Republikanische Schutzbund, a non-official body of trained and disciplined men, was started by the Socialist Party. They were supposed to be unarmed, and never paraded with arms, but in point of fact both they and the Frontkämpfer Monarchist and Nationalist irregulars are known to have secured considerable stocks of small arms—unlimited pistols and revolvers, very large stocks of rifles, and a certain quantity of machine-guns.

Side by side with their unacknowledged function of providing a Socialist Praetorian Guard, the Schutzbund began to perform very useful duties. At all big political demonstrations, particularly on the occasion of protest marches through the streets of Vienna, the members of the Schutzbund were on duty in their capacity of Ordner—a kind of unofficial trades-union police. Their uniforms gave them authority, they had learned discipline, they could obey as well as issue an order, and they were accorded a ready obedience and cheerful cooperation by the non-uniformed workers whom they accompanied. In view of the peril of plundering in the days of starvation in Vienna, it is difficult to say that the Schutzbund has been nothing but a danger to the state. But from the start their existence as a military formation—even apart from the possession of arms—was in flat contradiction of the disarmament clauses of the Treaty of St. Germain. In consequence of the Austrian failure to disband both the Schutzbund and their enemies, the Hakenkreuzler, the Frontkämpfer, and other Nationalist armed irregulars (as well as on account of the obstinate resistance of the Austrian munition factories to the demands for the destruction of munition-making machinery), Allied Control, under the slightly more euphonious title (in Austrian ears) of "Organ of Liquidation," remained in Vienna until last summer. Inertia triumphed over military and financial superiority, however, and the control officers finally shrugged their shoulders and left their task of securing the disarmament and disbandment of the Austrian irregulars all unfulfilled.

The Heimwehr, originally called Heimatwehr, were a slightly later formation. They did not spring directly from the ruins of the old army, but were recruited during the inflation years, when every province was prepared if necessary to desert Vienna, the center of socialism and starvation, and go elsewhere. The province of Vorarlberg negotiated for union with Switzerland, Tyrol for union with Germany, and the Allies actually stepped in and prevented Salzburg from proving by plebiscite her overwhelming enthusiasm for the Anschluss. The figures of the partial results, together with record of the Allied interference are graven in the old gateway just opposite the main bridge over the Salzach in Salzburg City today. The Heimwehr were the armed forces recruited by each province to enable it if necessary to assert its independence from "Red Vienna." As the separatist movement died away while the Austrian Republic began to assume definite form, the Heimwehr lost its original significance.

Unfortunately, instead of dying out, the local irregulars, particularly in the Tyrol, began to be reinforced by some of the very worst elements from Germany, the members of the Orgesch, the "Organization C," and other anti-republican, terrorist bodies, composed of the most desperate and most extreme ex-officers and ex-soldiers of the Hohenzollern armies. The Socialists in Vienna have recently published some surprising details of the connection between some of these people who found refuge in the Tyrol when obliged to flee Germany, either because of their suspected connection with such crimes as the murder of Walter Rathenau or because of their complicity in the Kapp Putsch. Worst of all, the famous German terrorist, Hauptmann Pabst, became a leading figure (behind the scenes) of the Tyrolese Heimwehr.

The whole movement became, except in Tyrol, quite negligible until after the Vienna riots of last summer. Then the Heimwehr saw their chance. Though the Vienna Socialists, doctrinaire Marxists as most of their leaders are, and much as trade and industry complains of the burden of their purely Socialist system of taxation, are the sworn foes of anything approaching "Dictatorship of the Proletariat," and are besides convinced adherents of democratic parliamentarism, the Austrian peasant or small provincial was easily persuaded of the reverse. The dislike which he had felt first for Hapsburg Vienna (which he called the city of idle lackeys) and then for starving Vienna (which he feared would confiscate his country produce), was easily transferred to Red Vienna, which he was assured was about to communize the whole country. But instead of trying to fight socialism with the proper parliamentary weapons, he allowed himself to be enrolled in the Heimwehr of Hauptmann Pabst, who then secretly became the chief organizer.

The Heimwehr, there is little doubt, is possessed not only of abundant revolvers, rifles, and machine guns, in part stolen from Austrian arsenals, in part sent into the country by Hitler and his friends in Bavaria, but has also a limited number of field-guns hidden in the Tyrolese Alps. This the Allied Control Officers always suspected, though they were unable to lay their hands on any. In many an isolated mountain village for the last six months a stray visitor could hear the crackle of musketry over the week-end, and on inquiry would be frankly told by the peasantry that it was practice for "the reckoning with Vienna." For the decision to take 18,000 men to Wiener Neustadt, an almost entirely Socialist industrial town, there is as much justification as there would be for the "British Fascisti" to march 18,000 men in military formation around the most Socialist suburb of London. The Socialists, fearing that the next move would be to make the long-promised coup, decided to send a force of some 50,000 Republikanische Schutzbund to Wiener Neustadt on the same day.

The Austrian Government declares that the prohibition of either demonstration would be an infringement of the "right of free assembly." The Socialist proposal of a law to prohibit all demonstrations by either body for a year does not go nearly far enough, though it would certainly avert the immediate danger of October 7. Everyone declares that his "prestige" is engaged, and that no compromise can be effected. Certainly the leaders of both Heimwehr and Schutzbund, whatever their secret hopes and fears for the future, now hope that a clash will be avoided on October 7—but the Heimwehr refuse to hear of the general prohibition which the Socialists demand. The blame at the moment thus rests with the Fascist Party. All, incredible as it sounds, that the Austrian Government will do is to see that a sufficiently large force of police, gendarmerie, and a reserve of military is available. No attack will be planned by either force, but tempers could not run much higher than they do, and both the Communists and the German Nationalist desperados will be on the qui vive, eager for a chance to provoke the conflict.

What the Farmer Is Up Against

By ROBERT STEWART

THE agricultural question is the most vital problem confronting the country at the present time. Its solution calls for real statesmanship on the part of the government and for real business ability on the part of the farming industry itself. It is not merely a question of adoption of a farm-relief bill which will placate the disgruntled voters of an important section of the country and thus relieve immediate political pressure from that source. Neither is the agricultural situation of today merely a development of the war period. It was rapidly approaching a crisis long before the war. War and post-war conditions simply accentuated the situation and served to call attention to it in a more dramatic way.

In the swing from prosperity to depression in 1920-1921 the per capita income of the non-farm population decreased only 3 per cent, while the per capita income of the farming population decreased 50 per cent; the non-farming population long since recovered from this blow, while the farmer population still is suffering from it. The agricultural worker in America, however, has long been on unequal terms with the worker in other lines of human endeavor. The farming industry in 1850 received only 34.6 per cent of the national income, although 44 per cent of those in gainful occupations were employed in agriculture. It required the labor of three workers in agriculture in 1850 to obtain the same compensation as two workers obtained in other occupations. By 1920 it required the labor of five workers in agriculture to obtain the same portion of the national income as was received by two workers in other occupations.

The farm problem in the Middle West and Far West at least is inextricably associated with the question of land values and land speculation. In many rural sections more money has been made through buying land and holding it for an advance in value than through actual farming operations. In the past one needed only to buy land on a margin, and hold it long enough, to double one's money. As a result, land speculation rather than farming has been dominant in the minds of some farmers and many bankers in the Middle West during the past few years. This condition was intensified by good prices for farm products during the war period. Some farmers and many speculators and bankers got caught at high tide, and when farm prices fell they were left with high-priced land on their hands which they could not unload. Moreover, the land policies of the government in the past have promoted speculation in farm lands. These policies have resulted also in much marginal land having been brought under cultivation. Such land should never have been broken by the plow but should have remained in sod or forest. It produces meager crops at high cost of production without profit to the operator. Nothing on earth can be done for the farmer, either by the government or himself, who produces only eight or nine bushels of wheat per acre. The farmer on marginal land ekes out an existence and hangs on in the hope that the prevailing speculation in farm lands will enable him to pass the land on to the other fellow at a profit. The elimination of marginal land from cultivation is one phase of the general agricultural problem which must be solved. Such land is well adapted to forest and pastures and must eventually revert to that state. Can the government assist in this step by a modification of its land policies?

While the farmer's share of the national income is low, his share of the tax burden is unusually high. In 1913, according to a report of the Department of Agriculture, taxes on farm property were about one-tenth of all farm receipts, less other expenses, while in 1921 they were about one-third of farm receipts. For example, a study of a given group of farms in the heart of the corn belt in 1913 showed that the farm income, including the owner's labor, profit, and interest on capital, amounted to $1,147 per farm. Taxes took $112 of this, or 9.8 per cent. On this same group of farms in 1921 the farm income was $771. Of this sum taxes took $253, or 33 per cent. The farmer's income decreased, but his taxes increased. In 1914 farmers paid $344,000,000 in general property taxes in the United States, which was roughly equal to two-fifths of the entire wheat crop that year. A decade later, they paid $797,000,000 in general property taxes, equal to the entire wheat crop. Eighty to 90 per cent of the farmer's taxes are local, and the largest items are for support of good roads and better schools. It is essential that we have good roads and better schools, but the burden for their support should be more equally distributed and the farmer should not be bankrupted in supporting them. During the year ending March 15, 1926, according to the United States Department of Agriculture, sixty farms out of every one thousand changed hands. Twenty out of the sixty changed ownership because of foreclosures, bankruptcies, or forced sale for taxes. The solution of the problem of local and State taxation calls for real leadership.

Most agricultural products are bulky and must be shipped long distances to the point of consumption at high cost for transportation. The farmer pays the freight. One of the most important needs in regard to transportation of farm products is the adjustment of freight rates as between the long haul and short haul, in order that the distant producer and the nearby farmer may both have substantial justice. Industrial leaders may assist materially in the solution of this part of the general farm problem by helping in the decentralization of manufacturing plants. Is it not possible in a greater measure than is now done to move the industrial plants out into the agricultural sections where food is produced and thus assist in the elimination of excessive freight rates?

The farmer is frequently condemned for not making as great a use of power machinery in his farming operations as manufacturing industry has in its line. The American farmer, however, has made greater strides in this direction during the past fifty years than has been made in all the previous history of the world. He is rapidly substituting power machinery on the farm for human labor. The use of the combined harvester, pulled by tractors, which cuts and threshes the wheat in one operation has increased markedly in certain sections of the wheat belt during the past few years. This method of harvesting and threshing wheat has reduced the labor cost required to produce an acre of wheat from seven hours to about four hours. This development will undoubtedly materially influence wheat production in many of the older sections of the country. There has also been a far-reaching change in the rapid substitution of tractors for horses on the farm. During the five-year period 1920-1925 the number of tractors on the American farm more than doubled, owing to the development of small tractors and the continued high cost of labor.

There are many farms in America, however, that are entirely too small to permit of the efficient use of tractors or power machinery. The initial cost of such machinery is too high and the cost of operation would be excessive because it would be idle so much of the time. This creates a problem for the small farmer. What shall he do? Is he doomed to extinction as was the small manufacturer of two hundred years ago?

Farming in the United States has slowly been undergoing an evolution from "a mode of living" into a business. In early colonial days the farmer produced not only his food but also his fuel, material for shelter, and wool which was spun into home-made clothing. He bought little and sold less. Taxes were nominal and interest charges were unknown. Money was needed only for the purchase of powder for his rifle and salt for his table. The farmer was self-sufficing and economic returns bothered him not at all.

Today the farmer must pay heavy taxes and high interest charges. He sells most of what he produces and buys much of what he consumes—all of his clothing, machinery, fuel, and material for shelter. Cost of production is an important consideration for him. Yet most farmers in America do not know what their production costs are. And the cost of producing a given farm commodity varies very widely on the various farms of the land. In 1919 the Department of Agriculture made a study of the cost of producing wheat in the wheat belt of Kansas, Missouri, Nebraska, Minnesota, North Dakota, and South Dakota. The average cost of producing winter wheat was $1.87 per bushel, but the cost of production varied from $1 per bushel to $8.20 per bushel. The average cost of producing spring wheat was $2.65 per bushel, but the cost of production on the several farms varied from $1.10 per bushel to $14.40.

The method of distributing farm products often works to the disadvantage of the farmer. Agencies for the distribution of food products are well organized, fully financed, and efficiently managed. The individual farmer, owing to the small scale of his operation, lacks adequate financial backing and proper market information and is, therefore, often unable to bargain successfully with these agencies for the sale of his product. The farmer, therefore, has a distorted view of the middle man whom he regards as a gigantic monster riding rough shod alike on the shoulders of the producer and consumer.

The only solution of the difficulty of distributing farm products is through organized effort. An organized group of farmers can secure capital, information, and efficient management which will permit the group to deal successfully with marketing agencies for the sale of farm commodities. The successful cooperative marketing association will use all of the present marketing agencies but in a more efficient way. Such organizations must organize locally on the basis of commodities, but to be effective must be federated into State and national groups. Such organized groups will be in a position to secure efficient management and finances not only for their own needs but also for their individual members. Such organizations cannot be run on the principle of a town meeting by the individual farmers. Responsible management must be in charge. The farmer must never forget that his problem is primarily one of individual production.

A Visit to Tom Mooney

By NORMAN THOMAS

AT the end of a lovely ride around San Francisco Bay were the gray walls of San Quentin prison. The gates opened to us, for we had a letter from the warden permitting us to visit Tom Mooney. In the office of the captain of the guard we got permission to add Mat Schmidt's name to Tom's at the suggestion of a friend whom we had seen the night before.

We waited in the visitors' reception room until our names were called. The room was almost filled with relatives and friends of prisoners—mostly women—waiting their turn. The door to an inner room stood open and gave us unsought glimpses of the greetings of mothers, wives, and sisters with their men. What tales of suffering, sordid and tragic, that room could have told! What dramas lay behind the kisses, poignant and conventional, that we saw!

Before long our names were called and we went in to find seats at a long table at the other side of which, across a low partition, the prisoners sit. Schmidt was the first to come in—a fine figure of a man, clear-eyed and hearty. The long, dreary years have set well on him since the famous McNamara affair in which he was implicated. There is not much he doesn't know about machinery. He has congenial work, some freedom of the grounds, and a great deal of salty philosophy to sustain him.

"Well," his greeting ran, "you had to leave the church to find freedom and I had to come to jail to find solidarity." Jails, he thinks, can't be much improved without making them better than the outside prison of the working world. The road to freedom is not to be afraid of jail. "I have more freedom to talk than you. What could they do to me? Throw me in jail?"

In the present labor movement and its leadership, with few exceptions, he sees little hope. Yes, he knows what is going on, for he can get books and magazines in jail, though it is a little harder now that some Baptist preacher-convict has set himself up as censor of "bolshvist literature"! Schmidt is full of plans for the new jute-mill machinery he is designing and of laughter at the poor taxpayers who must pay for it and for keeping able-bodied men shut up. Lincoln Steffens is working on his case and there is some sentiment for a pardon. One McNamara is free and the other is the oldest prisoner in the jail.

Then Mooney joined us. The other prisoners wore a not unbecoming gray uniform—indeed in San Quentin, as in other jails, one felt that the prisoners averaged up in looks rather better than the guards—but Mooney had on a white duck suit. His color was good and his step brisk, though he was in the third day of one of the periodic fasts by which he hopes to keep the upper hand of some sort of infection by which death almost opened the doors of his prison ahead of the laggard steps of justice. He lives to get justice. Men tell you that Tom Mooney is bitter, untactful, unreasonable. They say he ought to take a parole, which, by the way, there is no certainty that he could get, and for which he, as an innocent man who does not want freedom with a string on it, will not apply. I tell you that Mooney's courage and hope are things to marvel at. It speaks ill for men in labor and liberal ranks that they should have any time for criticism of this American Dreyfus from whom eleven years of life have now been taken by a society which for at least nine or ten years has known that he was innocent beyond a shadow of doubt. All their time for criticism should be spent on this ghastly act of injustice.

Around the naked crime of the execution of Sacco and Vanzetti Governor Fuller and his supporters can clutch the poor rags of belief, real or pretended, in the guilt of the two Italians. The Centralia victims did shoot, though in self-defense. But in the guilt of Mooney and Billings for the bomb outrage on San Francisco's Preparedness Day no intelligent man believes. Their colleagues were all acquitted, the perjured evidence against them has long since been confessed. The jury and the prosecuting attorney have joined in petitioning for their pardon. Judge Franklin A. Griffin, who sentenced them, is one of the most earnest workers for their vindication.

Just now Mooney has new hope. The quasi-progressive Governor Young, political protege of Hiram Johnson, has seen a committee, listened to Frank Walsh's oral argument, and has before him a complete brief, including strong letters from Clarence Darrow and the judge, copies of which Tom read us. Organized labor, too, is rousing itself again after an apathy which, even if less sinister than Mooney thinks, is at best a sorry reflection not only on the political weakness of some of its self-important leaders but on their lack of passion for justice, especially when the victim of injustice might be a bit of a nuisance to them if he were free.

As for me I am somewhat pessimistic. Hiram Johnson's complete silence all these years is ominous. Governor Young has already had plenty of time to act. Even though innocent of this crime Mooney and Billings are agitators whom the California business interests like to see in jail. It's easier to keep them than to catch them again. To rout this abominable attitude requires the pressure of an informed and convinced public opinion. Mooney can stand prison better than we can stand having him there. A country which after the Sacco and Vanzetti case keeps Mooney and Billings in jail is a country without elemental knowledge of what justice means.

There is another timely aspect of this question. The same waters that wash the gray foundations of San Quentin wash the shores of Palo Alto where Herbert Hoover has his lovely home. The President of the United States cannot pardon Mooney. But if a candidate for that office is a Californian, almost neighbor to the prison and fully acquainted by Mooney himself with the facts, then no political expediency or legalistic evasion can justify his silence. We have a right to know how a President would react to this human problem and to take his measure if he is as silent and as acquiescent in this monstrous crime against American freedom as he was in the oil scandals.

In the Driftway

THE Germans, admittedly, are good linguists. It isn't just an accident; they have to be. We Americans are probably the worst linguists in the world. That isn't an accident either; it is because we can get away with it. Living in an isolated, largely self-sustaining land, with prodigious natural resources and a fabulous industrial prosperity built upon immigrant labor, Americans generally go abroad in a privileged capacity. They are travelers seeking pleasure, or business men with fat checkbooks. As a New York engineer in South America once put it when the Drifter asked him how well he spoke Spanish: "I don't speak it. I make the greasers under me learn English."

* * * * *

THE best linguists are found in small countries like Holland and Switzerland, where the inhabitants have to be all things to all nations. But among the larger countries the Germans stand high as linguists. Germany is a new country which has had to make its way in the world by building up foreign trade competitively. It has had to learn language. But the Teuton's devotion to theory sometimes leads him into egregious blunders and over-confidence in using foreign language. The Drifter has some translations sent to this country for editorial use by one who apparently had no qualifications for the work other than possession of a German-English dictionary. In a sketch characteristically entitled "The Both Rivals," the translator revels in perfect German syntax as follows:

Between Burghausen and Neustadt was standing a silent enmity since decades, which, of course, got abroad hardly. But if it made perceptible itself once, so it grew directly to flaming "rebellion." Indeed I don't know so right, what was the matter of this enmity. Burghausen was a small residence, therefore an officialstown. In consequence of this, it disposed of nearly all schools, the German Empire was rejoicing of these. So it was evident that it got a bataillon of infantry for garrison. Moreover princely grace had furnished it with concert and theatre, wherein the court-band performed an excellent music the most. Hence it was explicable that pensioners, persons of private means, functionaries and the widows of them liked to strife after the small residence for years, while the strangers it searched on account of its excellent situation for days and weeks.

HAVING looked on that picture, now look for a moment on this:

In comparison with it the smaller Neustadt with its only fourthousand souls was furnished almost step-motherly. It was situated in a fruitful dale no doubt, but it was without any wood. A railway-line was connecting it with the larger towns indeed; alone the narrow stream, which was leading through the small town had no water enough, that it might be made navigable. On the other hand there were grown in this drink-needy town and neighborhood two breweries, and near the station by and by had settled one sugar-factory, one malt-kiln, and one sausage-factory.

BUT confidence, even over-confidence, is as necessary to become a linguist as to become a swimmer, and the writer of the above may yet attain a perfection in the English language as great as that of—ahem, say Herbert Hoover.

Our Readers and the Campaign

Vox Populi

FROM the avalanche of letters which have poured in upon us in the closing weeks of the campaign we select the following excerpts with apologies to the writers for the necessary abbreviation:

It seems to me that the liberal progressive vote should be cast to give the Catholic, Tammany, Democrat a chance to breathe some of his fire into our money-grubbing, pastor-ridden, hen-pecked citizenry.

Far Rockaway, New York

ALBERT KESHIN

Have not "liberals" voted long and often enough for illiberal tickets? Why not face the issue squarely and vote for Thomas?

New York

NEWMAN W. HESS

At least The Nation has a sense of humor. When a magazine prints a fabrication of false statements, throwing muck at a man like Herbert Hoover, and written by one such as Heywood Broun, I am sure it must have been an attempt (on the part of the magazine) to be humorous. By what achievement in life does this cynical, unethical dispenser of literary garbage assume the right to attack the personality of Herbert Hoover?

New Haven, Conn.

RUSSELL L. RICE

I am a member of the Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America. Four years ago I could hear the workers discussing the then coming Presidential election. With them it was a case of elect Coolidge or else there would be no jobs. Alas and alack, the mighty "Cal" is still at the helm and there are no jobs. Thirty-four thousand union carpenters in New York and scarcely work for one-third of them!

Brooklyn

TIMOTHY O'BRIEN

The following are taken from the thousands of comments which came in on post cards for The Nation poll:

For Hoover

Why a Progressive should vote for Smith I can't see!!!

With booze as bait the Pope is fishing to catch the American government.

Can't vote for any Fundamentalist. Would like to vote for Thomas if he had a chance.

I vote for Hoover to save the country from Smith.

For Smith

Not that I indorse all his views but that I desire to put tolerance in religion to the test.

Because he is liberal enough by a small margin to make a protest vote unnecessary.

I am voting Democratic because of Mabel. I despise her!

Choice of evils.

A liberal Republican and I are pairing on Hoover and Smith by promising both of us to vote for Thomas. Thus the Republican-Democratic situation in the State is left unchanged for originally he had intended to vote for Hoover and I for Smith, but as an important by-product the Socialists get two more votes.

Because I hate Hoover so much.

I prefer Thomas but, as he has not a ghost of a chance, I will do the next best thing.

For Thomas

No choice between the Republicans and Democrats. They are both bad—Tammany Hall and the Ohio gang. Smith is intolerable as a life-long professional politician of Tammany Hall.

If I can vote twice the second one will be for Will Rogers.

My conscience says Thomas, my mortgage says Hoover, my gay moments say Al.

How else can a Nation reader vote?

My reason for sending you my card inclosed in an envelope is that I don't want my neighbors to know who I am voting for. Call it cowardice if you will, I can't make up my mind to sacrifice the good-will of the people who have always been kind to me. [From a country subscriber in New York.]

The Sorry Liberals

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In The Nation for October 3 you describe Borah as the "sorriest figure in this campaign" and say that "he can no longer be carried on the roster of independents and progressives." While I certainly agree with your estimate of Borah, I must say that he does not present nearly such a "sorry figure" as the so-called liberal or progressive who formerly supported Debs or La Follette but who now has deserted Norman Thomas for Smith, nor is there any more reason to strike Borah from the roster of progressives than there is to strike off the supporters of Smith.

Those who support the candidates of either of the two old parties support the platforms of those parties and thus the exploitation of the workers and the rule of this country by Big Business. Those who vote for Smith must also vote for Robinson, who has consistently furthered race antagonism in the South and been an ardent suppressor of the rights guaranteed to the Negroes by the Constitution. Those who vote for Smith vote against the labor movement and for the labor policy of the Raskobs, du Ponts, Owens, and the other anti-union employers who are financing Smith's campaign. They also vote for the water-power policy now supported by the General Electric Company and against the Canadian plan which distributes electricity without private profit at two instead of six cents a kilowatt hour. They sanction the silence of Smith on Tammany corruption and tactics in exactly the same way that Republicans, like Borah, sanction Hoover's silence regarding Teapot Dome. They vote against a man like Thomas, who has fought valiantly for civil liberties, who went the limit for the unconditional freedom of Sacco and Vanzetti, and who is now fighting for the freedom of Mooney and Billings and the other class-war prisoners. Finally, they vote as did the Liberal Party of Great Britain when it was still a factor, to prevent the growth of a third party with a really constructive program for the abolition of exploitation, poverty, unemployment, and war.

Dry and Liberal

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Why is it that whenever you refer to the followers of Herbert Hoover, you classify them as bigoted, intolerant, prejudiced, and snobbish? You say that the attempt to alter the Volstead Law will arouse to "a still higher pitch those who are for prohibition with all its faults. With them the campaign now becomes a holy war. Gradually, we regret to say, the flames of intolerance and bigotry rise higher." Cannot a person be a non-fanatical, unbigoted, even tolerant Dry? You have hit the nail on the head when you say that a number are going to "vote for Hoover . . . simply and solely in order, as they think, to save prohibition." I grant that there are fanatics who go out for prohibition. But I claim that there are a good many people who have honestly read both sides of the question, talked both sides of the question, and put some thought into the matter, who believe that on the whole the country is better off under prohibition than it was before, and who cannot see how modification of the Volstead Act is going to be any better enforced than is the act as it stands today. How else can these people vote than for the dry candidate? There are other issues, to be sure, but this issue has been made one of present importance, and not by the bigoted, intolerant, prejudiced either. Fair play, Mr. Editor, please! We are liberal and we are dry.

Virginia Doubtful

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In connection with your political straw vote I am sending you some data that may be of interest. Last week we had such a vote here among the students of Virginia Polytechnic Institute, 945 voting, and the majority for Smith was 127. Normally the majority would be about 800 for the Democratic candidate. Then again we had a vote in the University Club, composed of faculty members. There Hoover got sixteen votes and Smith five.

The average Virginian, if he votes for Smith, will do so because he is the party nominee not because he cares to see him President. And the reason why Smith is hard for Southerners to swallow is on account of his Catholic affiliations. The people down here, the Protestants, like individual Catholics but they fear the coterie that controls the Catholic church.

The Klan from Within

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I attended a meeting of the Ku Klux Klan recently in a rural community of central New York. As I entered the room I noticed a red cross fitted with red electric lights which stood out against the dull green roller-shade of a window. The second story of the Grange Hall was full of farmer-folk sitting on ill-matched chairs and on rough benches along the sides of the room; the young people looked about them with some animation while older eyes gazed fixedly in one direction.

From in front of the red cross came a voice that seemed cramped in that small room. The band stopped its slow doleful interpretation of patriotic airs. The speaker said:

Look in the World's Almanac (about page 600)—called the World's not because it tells about the whole world but because it's published by a Catholic newspaper, the New York World—and you'll find a list of foreign countries. Go down the alphabet to the R's, and find Rome, Church of.

Read what it says: Principality with sixteen million, or sixteen thousand, square miles, over three million people, chief potentate the Pope. It adds, and this is what I want you to get, "and with subjects in every land." "Subjects in every land!" When a subject of a foreign country wants to be one of us we make him denounce the potentate and laws of that country and take up ours. But do we ask this of a Catholic, a subject of the Church of Rome? No! But a Catholic is loyal first to Rome and then to whatever country he happens to live in. When Alfred E. Smith swore to defend the Constitution of New York State his first allegiance was to the Church of Rome. Do we want as President of the United States a man who goes to welcome the ambassador of a foreign potentate, a prelate from Rome, and who will crawl on his hands and knees up the steps of the City Hall to kiss his ring?

In my opinion, of course, I don't know how you people feel about it, that was an insult to each one of us. He was saying, "Here is New York State; take it, it's yours."

Now I want you to consider some of our sacred American institutions, institutions that our forefathers suffered to found and which they have handed down to us as a legacy. There's the separation of church and state, a thing that Rome has always fought. When Mr. Tumulty, a Catholic, was Woodrow Wilson's private secretary, the Pope sent over two commissions to intercede for recognition of Rome by the United States. Wilson refused both times. But if Smith had been President he would have gone to Congress to beg for that recognition. He wouldn't have dared not to.

There's another sacred American institution, the public schools. Do you know what happened down in New York last year? The public schools couldn't take care of all the children, and the Board of Education wouldn't build any more. So the officials looked around and found lots of empty seats in the parochial schools. Maybe this just happened, and maybe it was all a cunningly devised plan. A hundred mothers sat on the steps of one school all night to see that their children should not go to parochial schools. And yet New York City, with Governor Smith's approval, paid four million dollars to the parochial schools for educating its children!

These institutions are peculiarly American. They are sacred to us. We must fight if need be to keep them safe. I seem to see the huddled figure of a soldier at Valley Forge, clothed in a threadbare blanket and hugging a musket to his breast. He is thinking of a home over yonder where a wife croons a lullaby. Next morning his stark body is buried, and that mother tells her children of Daddy who never came back. He gave his life to preserve these sacred institutions, and when I think how little we are giving. . . .

Tammany and Womanhood

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In the issue of The Nation dealing with the subject of "Whispering Campaigns," there is an article by the "Unofficial Spokesman" in which he refers to the pamphlet "Tammany Hall and Womanhood" as "violent" and emanating "from Hoover's home State," presumably Republican.

May I call your attention to the fact that the writer of the pamphlet is a Democrat and liberal in theology as in politics; that this liberalism and her influence for sane thought and truthful statements prevented the exclusion of The Nation from the Public Library here, when its "violence" was resented by many patrons? Also that for months she made a careful study of Tammany Hall and in writing her pamphlet discarded all but evidence from court investigations and legislative records? If the pamphlet is "violent" it is the facts published widely in the New York press and other standard papers which make it so.

Runaway

By MARK VAN DOREN

I saw a white-haired child
Go through the sunny grass;
I heard the under-noises
Stop to let him pass;
Deciding then that never
A thing so silent was

As this white head in the wheat
Upon this windless day,
Moving as if all childhood
Marched with it away—
Leaving us our wisdom
And nothing at all to say.

This Week Sex in the South Seas

SOMEWHERE in each of us, hidden among our more obscure desires and our impulses of escape, is a palm-fringed South Sea island that looks very like the picture on the butcher's calendar—sea, sand, sun, a languorous atmosphere promising freedom and irresponsibility. It is to that island that we retire when we grow bored and confused by jobs or political campaigns or city life or—more particularly—with husbands, wives, or children. Thither we run to escape conflicting standards, the difficulties of an age without faith; to find love which is free, easy, and satisfying.

When you read "Coming of Age in Samoa"*—as you should do—you will probably be astonished to discover how like a South Sea island that South Sea island can be. Sea, sand, sun—all are there, and simplicity and absence of conflict. It is a world in which life is gay and children are not very troublesome and love is kind and uncomplicated; where food and clothes are few and easy to get. Sex experience is frequent before marriage, almost to the point of promiscuity. Jealousy is rare. Violent and possessive emotion is held to be in poor taste, but frigidity does not exist. The routine of life is simple, quiet, and unhurried.

Margaret Mead, the author of this book, spent eight months in the island of Taū in the Manu'a Archipelago of Samoa studying the psychology of the adolescent girl. She lived for much of the time as an adopted daughter in a Samoan household and became intimately acquainted with the behavior and feelings of a group of girls in a social structure fundamentally different from our own. She wished to discover whether the Samoan adolescent was subject to the mental disturbances which are considered in Western civilizations the inevitable concomitant of the physical changes of puberty. She found that the young girls in that particular island group live through no period of stress. They experience love from the time they are physically and mentally ready for it. They swallow, without pain or ecstasy, a pleasantly diluted dose of the Christian religion. They assume adult family responsibilities as a matter of course. The Western conception of the family unit composed of father, mother, and children does not exist. Instead, children are brought up in rather casual, shifting congeries of relatives living together. No single passionate parent-child relationship has an opportunity to spring up. Every adult in the household is more or less in loco parentis to every child. The older children are shouldered with the actual care of the younger ones.

Thus the Samoan girl leads a busy, unconscious existence in which impulse and duty appear to play pleasantly correlative roles. Her life as well as her environment apparently fits the fantasy that has become a symbol of relaxation and release to the harried child of the machine-made West. Would we then exchange our unsatisfied desires and complicated choices for her more even progress in the world? Probably not. On closer inspection several flaws appear in that picture of warm, idyllic simplicity. The discrepancies between fantasy and fact lie at the very heart of Samoan sex freedom. In the first place personality and individual differences, the objects of such tender consideration in most Western lands, are ignored—both publicly and privately. Skill is admired; but precocity is frowned upon. In the family children have no opportunity either to become spoiled or to feel neglected and misunderstood; they are simply members of a group with certain functions to perform. Only in the dance do virtuosity and individual peculiarities win applause. Human relationships are formalized and depend little on the appeal of one personality for another. Boys and girls are so severely separated before puberty that a keen antagonism—not personal but sexual—develops and continues until it melts in the warmth of adolescent desire—again not personal but sexual. Love is expressed in the formulae of romantic attachment; but a deeply personal feeling between a man and a woman has little chance to flower. The whole basis for emotional intensity is lacking. Fidelity is treated with humor; jealousy with contempt. Even close friendships based on personal preference are absent.

A Samoan philosopher might maintain that a balanced emotional life either in adolescence or after can be achieved only through freedom from the strain that arises when individuals stress the importance of their personal feelings and preferences and abilities. Emotions can be freely expressed only when they are not intense; with intensity come conflict and jealousy and a frequent inability to express anything at all. George A. Dorsey, biologist and author of "Why We Behave Like Human Beings," is quoted on the jacket of Miss Mead's book as wondering "if we shall ever be as sensible about sex as the Samoans are." Miss Mead herself is less sweeping. She believes that children in Western countries should be loosed from the entanglements of too intense parental love. But she expresses a reasonable and civilized doubt of the Samoan attitude toward personality and toward adult emotions. If love can be freed from conflict and life made simple only at the price of our cherished personal relationships, who of us is ready to pay it? Let Mr. Dorsey set out for Samoa if he will. Most of us probably will read Miss Mead's impressive study and then continue as before to cling to our difficulties and our delights, with occasional impulses of escape to the expensive simplicity of the South Seas.

H. G. Wells Outlines the Future

The Open Conspiracy: Blue Prints for a World Revolution. By H. G. Wells. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $2.

IF this review were to appear in a newspaper that might reach a hundred million people, I should cheer Wells's book, full cry and without reservation. It shakes up established complacency, challenges the unsatisfactory present, and has vision of a better world; and that is what the hundred million need and probably will not get. As this review is for a periodical whose readers are already accustomed to revolutionary ideas and do not need to be waked up, I shall lean a little the other way. This is a short talk between friends who wish to breathe together (for that is what conspiracy means), and who are open to any plot to get the will and intelligence of us all directed and organized.

Wells has an alert mind and he cannot write a page without striking fire, hitting off some provocative suggestion. His nervous sharp English is a delight to any person who likes the game of words. But what have we? The first business of expository writing is to be precise. This small book contains no blue prints. Blue prints give exact dimensions; by them you know the length of a steel girder, the precise direction of a tunnel boring under the Hudson, or the size of a closet door. Wells, who is all for science, efficiency, accuracy, gets his terms wrong at the start.

Then he calls his book a religion. Perhaps it is religious in the sense of devotion to an idea. Nevertheless it is an unfortunate word to use, for it has a connotation of ceremony and theology. And there are no gods in Wells's world commonweal, except the most abstract kind of Absolute or First Cause which could arouse enthusiasm only in the breasts of a few philosophers. Wells's new republic which is to include all mankind is wholly mundane; it depends on the study of biology, economics, and education. Nothing is said about art and poetry, but it may be taken for granted that in a world economically healthy the fine arts would flourish as never before and there would be a release of imaginative forces.

Wells is impatient with the world as it is, and so are many of us. He finds that to work toward any kind of tolerable and reasonable civilization, much must be destroyed. His constructive ideas are necessarily vague, for he is looking toward a complete regeneration of society. His vigor, his concrete thought, really lie in his contemptuously humorous assaults on the world we live in. Of the American financier, who to Wells is not a criminal oppressing the poor or a spider coaxing flies into his office, he writes:

The real interests of the great industrialist or financier lie in cosmopolitan organization, and the material development of the world commonweal, but his womenfolk pin flags all over him and his sons are prepared to sacrifice themselves and all his business creations for the sake of trite splendors and Ruritarian romance.

He despises our traditional reverences:

Flags, uniforms, national anthems, patriotism sedulously cultivated in church and school, the brag, blare, and bluster of our competing sovereignties, belong to the phase of development we [the Open Conspiracy] would supersede.

At times he has a messianic egotism; he is a pioneer and prophet and he is a little scornful of other prophets. "The 'class war' of the Marxist is merely a poor snobbish imitation" of the arrogance of the upper classes, "a pathetic, stupid, indignant reversal of and retort to the old arrogance, an upward arrogance." The Communist Workers' Republic of Russia is after ten years of experiment only unifying cant, though there may be ideas in all these experiments which the Open Conspiracy can assimilate. The Labor movement is also on the wrong road or a very short road. "The Labor revolutionary ... believes that every one is as capable as anyone else if not more so." Wells believes that the ideas of the world are made by the intellectual minority. That does not mean the economic minority, for ideas may come from any class, "privileged" or poor.

The purpose is to group and consolidate all capable, intelligent people, but at first only in clusters here and there for propaganda, education, intellectual contest. Some actual physical fighting may be necessary if inferior people resort to force against the new world. But the early leaders toward that new world must work by peaceful persuasion, self-discipline, and sacrifice. Gradually the Open Conspiracy will spread until it conquers the world and makes it a fit place for all mankind.

That idea has been cherished by many kinds of internationalists, pacifists, socialists, anarchists, and other thinkers and dreamers, rational or poetic. But how? The concluding words of this book are: "Saving the impact of some unimagined disaster from outer space, the ultimate decision of the fate of life upon this planet lies now in the will of man." That is, for all its eloquence, close to nonsense. A student of philosophy like Wells should know that the will of man has only a small though important part to play in his destiny, collective or individual. His nature is complicated and the forces that surround him on this planet, without any unimagined disaster from outer space, are often in bewildering conflict with his will.

This book is not a blue print. It is a first sketch, an introduction to future books by Wells. He says that he has "schemed out a group of writings to embody the necessary ideas of the new time," a sort of "Bible," which may become obsolescent, but the substantial method of which will remain. He considers his "Outline of History" the first part and promises as the second part "The Science of Life" and as the third, "The Conquest of Power." It may be that this new Bible like the older one is to be divided into historical books and prophetic. Before we join the Open Conspiracy we shall have to wait for the prophecies. And they will have to be more definite than the present book, if we are to feel that we have a guide or even a guiding idea, anything to take hold of and work at to bring us one step nearer to the "World Revolution."

JOHN MACY

William Randolph Hearst

W. R. Hearst, An American Phenomenon. By John K. Winkler. Simon and Schuster. New York. $4.

MR. WINKLER has expanded into this volume some articles which originally appeared in the New Yorker.

His is the first effort to treat at length what is indeed an American phenomenon, albeit a very unhappy one. Here are gathered more of the facts which go to make up the life-story of Mr. Hearst than have yet been made accessible. None the less, Mr. Winkler could have dug out a good many more. He seems, for instance, to have taken only those documents in regard to his subject brought out by the inquiry of the Senate Judiciary Committee into war propaganda which have already been published. There are many more that deserve notice. Again, he has not touched in any way upon the Central Pacific episode in Mr. Hearst's early career, which led to the charge that he had taken money from that railroad. Nor has he mentioned the speech delivered in Congress, by Grove L. Johnson, father of the present Senator Hiram Johnson. Surely no more terrible indictment of a semi-public man was ever talked into the columns of the Congressional Record.

For the rest, Mr. Winkler handles his matter well and entertainingly and gives in the main a valuable and entirely honest picture of one of the most singular and unhappy figures of our times. Hearst's contradictions, his vacillation, his rare genius as a purveyor of sensationalism, his extraordinary mastery of his trade, his mania for collecting, these and much more are well set forth. Not, however, the injury that this man has done to the press as a whole, or his complete lack of principle, or the untold misery he has inflicted upon the endless victims of his remorseless sensationalism. Like others, Mr. Winkler seems blinded by Mr. Hearst's financial and circulation successes. Incredible as it seems, he really believes that Hearst has been "more of an asset than a liability to America" and that "he has awakened the public consciousness of the average citizen to such an extent that no political boss of the type of Buckley, Tweed, or Croker will again flourish in any American city . . .!" This in the face of the revelations as to Mayor Thompson of Chicago, Boss Hague of Jersey City, and all the loathsome police and political corruption of Philadelphia!

Again, Mr. Winkler is sure that Mr. Hearst has made impossible in America any such "politico-commercial alliance as that of the Standard Oil and Mark Hanna." Yet this was written just after the revelations of the politico-commercial alliance of Messrs. Doheny and Sinclair with the rascals of the Harding Administration, which would have resulted in the stealing of hundreds of millions of dollars from the American people if it had not been for the watchfulness of Robert M. La Follette, an alliance far more dangerous than that of Hanna and the Standard Oil.

No, Mr. Winkler's book is easy reading and of distinct value, but it does not approximate the definitive life of this particular phenomenon of whom Mr. Winkler is a lively chronicler, but no judge.

What's Happening in American Labor?

American Labor Year Book (1928). The Rand School of Social Science. $2.50.

Don't Tread on Me. By McAlister Coleman and Clement Wood. Vanguard Press. Fifty cents.

Spies in Steel. By Frank Palmer. Denver (Colorado) Labor Press. Fifty cents.

The Workers' Party and the American Trade Unions. By David Schneider. Johns Hopkins Press.

THERE has never been a comprehensive saga written about the American labor movement, though it is a theme worthy of one. This lack is undoubtedly due to the fact that it is an organic human movement. It has great weaknesses and great strength; it is many-faceted; it has several faces with which it greets the employer—and as many again for its own membership and friends. One might as well try to write the story of what is wrong with man. Everything and nothing! To the conservative old-line trade unionist the policies of the present trade-union movement are right. To the younger progressive unionist the labor movement has ceased moving. The trends are backward trends relative to the ideals of the workers' republic in Russia or the accomplishments of organized labor abroad. Certain specific studies, however, are being made of tendencies in the American labor movement.

The "American Labor Year Book" of 1928, issued by the Labor Research Department of the Rand School, is an excellent almanac of events and issues in the workers' world. Almanacs usually contain pure scientific facts unadulterated by personalities and whimsical temperaments. Consequently, these almanacs are rarely used by the layman who has no desire to call upon his imagination to dress the facts into generalizations that he can understand. The "American Labor Year Book" gives the developments in American industry, commerce, and finance. It adds to this factual information a paragraph describing the effect of these trends upon the plight of the American farmer and worker. The book is enhanced in value by an analysis of the fundamental economic problems which will constitute the political issues this fall.

ROBERT M. MCBRIDE & COMPANY
NEW YORK

In a compact booklet of less than a hundred pages Frank Palmer has exposed the most insidious and effective weapon used by organized capital in industrial warfare—the spy system. Several years ago the labor spy was described in a comprehensive survey of his activities in many industries. Mr. Palmer has limited his investigations and secured his documentary evidence from the steel trust in the Mesaba Iron Range.

There are other weapons, to be sure. These are described by Clement Wood and McAlister Coleman in a book on the injunction, the court, the publicity agent or industrial-relations expert, the boycott, the “yellow-dog contract”—all modern implements of industrial conflict. The authors make an unusual plea—“What is sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander.” If Capital uses such weapons in a successful offensive against Labor, why should not Labor use the same weapons in an aggressive warfare against Capital? They urge Labor “to assume the aggressive in legal matters, thereby removing some of the inequalities of the usual industrial dispute, establishing precedents in favor of labor, and creating new respect for the labor movement on the part of its members, the courts, and the public.” It is to be doubted whether such an offensive can be effective in a country where justice is so indissolubly linked with the vested interests. It is also to be doubted whether the organized trade unions have sufficient strength, sufficient spiritual integrity, or a sufficiently large purse to enter the legal tournament and demand justice for workers.

In a well-documented dissertation Mr. Schneider presents the facts concerning the most recent trends in the trade-union movement—the left-wing and Communist influence upon the American trade unions. He traced the history of insurgent movements in six of the largest unions—including the machinists, the united mine workers, and the needle-trades unions. He has attempted to make as scientific a study of controversial situations as it was possible to make. He has been unable to indicate the nuances of economic opinion, the conflicts of personalities, and the rigidity of certain union leaders—some of the real factors in the upheavals within the unions. Consequently he has not told the entire story. Neither has Mr. Schneider answered the many questions which the student of labor is asking. Why were the so-called radical unions the first to be propagandized by the Communist movement? Why did not the Communist Party attempt to organize the millions of workers in the industries unscathed by union control? Why did the American Federation of Labor leaders fight so bitterly the aggressive philosophy of the Communists and yet engage little of its energy in an aggressive offensive against the great industries fighting the organization of workers? It may be that these questions cannot be answered in the heat and passion of the fray, and yet they must be answered if Communist influence on the trade unions is to be understood.

Better to Come

Lost Address. By Chard Powers Smith. Houghton Mifflin Company. $2.

CHARD POWERS SMITH'S second volume of verse appears in the American edition accompanied by the rather annoying fanfare of the publisher's blurb and some meaningless superlatives excerpted from English newspapers.

Readers who hurdle this barrier, however, will find a good many things of interest and some of value. The volume is superior in variety and in net accomplishment to the first collection. It remains for the most part, however, the attempt of a talented and mentally alert person to write poetry out of the periphery of a consciousness not yet analyzed or disciplined. The result is a succession of literary and rather derivative tours de force interrupted now and then by the emergence of the author in a relaxed and native moment which reveals a core

PROHIBITION

LEGAL AND ILLEGAL
By Howard Lee McBain

This sane, dispassionate book removes prohibition from the tumult of the political arena and presents it as a legal question—but with a light, racy, readable touch. What can be done under the law to change, nullify, enforce or modify the Eighteenth Amendment? What can a dry or wet President do to Prohibition as a national social policy? If you prefer rational knowledge to emotional clamor you will read PROHIBITION LEGAL and ILLEGAL. $2.00 of genuine mystical perception, clothed in simple and accurate language. This happens most frequently when Mr. Smith is responding to the stimulus of a powerful natural environment, as, for example, in the sonnet entitled Badlands:

A blue and silver evening solitude,
The coliseum of earth's youthful powers
Of colored fire and steam and lava showers,
Now cemeteried under hills of mud.
Fissured and hachured battleground where stood
The Indian gods and died, now battleground
Of snakes and rabbits. With a silver sound
The moon leaps up. The old gray earth is wooed.

Her wrinkled beauty loses place and age,
Hooded in night-blue clouds that will not rain—
A desert whose immeasurable disdain
Remembers Indian-like her youthful rage,
Breathing forgotten legends through the sage,
Chanting a desiccated cricket strain.

Mr. Smith seems determined to write for a public more discriminating than the poetry societies or the Athenia Clubs of the provinces—or the English newspaper critics. One therefore confidently expects another volume in which "beauty" will never be aspostrophized, but will manifest herself more often, in which the word "dream" will be used less expansively; in which Mr. Smith's increasing technical competence and power of self-criticism will surpass his present derivations.

Fiction Shorts

Jingling in the Wind. By Elizabeth Madox Roberts. The Viking Press. $2.

With the best will in the world, one can do little more with this satiric extravaganza than chuckle appreciatively at occasional flashes of fantasy and nod heavily over the remainder of the book. Miss Roberts's intention is not at all clear: part of the time she appears to be poking fun at ol' man Babbitt, part of the time flying off into humorous irrelevancies, and part of the time merely indulging in high-flown and turgid prose. "Jingling in the Wind" will puzzle the many admirers of Miss Roberts; but it will not cause them to look forward with any less anticipation to her next novel.

Good-Bye Wisconsin. By Glenway Wescott. Harper and Brothers. $2.50.

"Good-Bye Wisconsin" is a collection of tales (some of them hardly more than sketches) preceded by a remarkable initial essay which strikes the keynote of the whole volume. This poetic evocation of the mysterious Middle-Western land warns us that Mr. Wescott is not dealing with standardized and molded mechanisms, but with unformed beings, with an America, perhaps, still to be born. The stories themselves are of unequal merit, the worst of them suffering from a calculated vagueness that is merely an inverted over-emphasis. Their main value is that they indicate, not conclusively but with a proper tentativeness, that in a land which our most popular novelists have found swarming with drummers and soft-headed farmboys, there is serious and tragic material for the adult novelist.

Nightseed. By H. A. Manhood. The Viking Press. $2.50.

Very original short stories of macabre and other-worldly quality by a new writer, hailed by Arnold Bennett as one of the finds of the year. One of the most refreshing things about Mr. Manhood is the fact that he does not follow in the footsteps of Katherine Mansfield. While many of his tales strain for mysterious, muted effects which do not quite come off, not one of them but is clearly the product of an independent temperament, a little too fond of strange and tortured phrase-making, perhaps, but otherwise gifted with a veritable sense of style.

Nothing Is Sacred. By Josephine Herbst. Coward-McCann. $2.

The life of a mean, gray, middle-class American family set down in a designedly mean, gray, middle-class American prose. Miss Herbst is as skilful within the limitations of her manner as anyone could possibly be; and she extracts from the petty tragedies of her characters more than one would think conceivable. Fiercely honest as this recent type of realistic writing is, it leads one to suspect its intrinsic artistic importance. The more one reads of Mr. Callaghan and Mr. Herrmann and Miss Herbst and even Mr. Lardner and Mr. Hemingway the more one feels that they, as a group, have essentially the same temperament that one feels in the nineteenth-century pessimists. But whereas Leopardi and James Thomson lived in a romantic era and could therefore express their personal despair in the form of lyric outcry, our contemporary defeatists must disguise their intimations of futility with an over-conscientious objectivity. At times it seems as if Miss Herbst's carefully flattened style and piteously truncated characters were merely the inventions of a sophisticated intellect that is choosing this more difficult and delicate method in order to express indirectly a sense of complete fatigue. For if we do not consider it as a projection of a personal pessimism, Miss Herbst's novel, admirable and intelligent as it is, is in the end unmoving. The author is so adept that within a few pages she has communicated perfectly an atmosphere of sodden hopelessness; one hardly needs to read much further, unless one's intent be slightly masochistic.

The Boy in the Sun. By Paul Rosenfeld. Macaulay. $2.

The theme of this novel by one of our most widely known critics is familiar: the struggle between a sensitive youth and his father, complicated here by the problem of race-consciousness. The treatment is fresh-visioned and at moments moving: one would expect no less from Mr. Rosenfeld. Most readers, however, will quarrel with the style—jeweled, oblique, and imagistic, much too labored for the rather simple fable. The prose of Mr. Rosenfeld is really a reversion to Victorianism. Like the elders of that day, he chooses to call a spade an agricultural implement; and though the disguise is adopted for aesthetic rather than moral reasons it is none the less irritating.

Ariadne. By Isadore Lhevinne. The Globus Press. $2.50.

A mad, frenzied tale of the pursuit by an artist of an impossible woman-ideal. Overwrought and grandiose as much of "Ariadne" is, it remains an arresting book for those who are not afraid of the terrible beauties of delirium. Dr. Lhevinne's horrible pictures of leprous Siberian villages may be pure invention, but they have a macabre quality that sticks in the mind. Occasionally the prose reaches high points of poetry, and as often sinks into bathos and jargon.

Costumes by Eros. By Conrad Aiken. Scribners. $2.

Mr. Aiken's second collection of short stories is slightly inferior to his first, "Bring, Bring," but it should be read. Somehow they seem a little literary and worked-over, these tales in which all sorts of delicate changes are rung on the erotic motive. The best of them, perhaps, are the lighter satires, such as The Necktie or The Professor's Escape, which capture a note of elegant, whimsical humor that seems thoroughly un-American. More American, perhaps, is the pervasive sense of sexual frustration and inarticulateness which lies at the base of almost every story in the volume. The first tale, Your Obituary, Well Written, is a remarkable fictional transmission of the personality of Katherine Mansfield and it catches far more directly than ever did Henry James the peculiar characteristics of a certain type of modern literary temperament.

Some Grave Doubts About Goethe

IF the nineteenth century had a universal genius that genius was Goethe. No other writer of modern times has impressed the whole Western world so profoundly or so long, and no other has seemed so adequately to voice its complex aspirations. In him if in any one the conflicting elements which go to make up its soul were synthesized, and critics must, with a sort of desperation, profess their faith in the supreme greatness of his "Faust." It is near enough to us to be ours in a sense that the other accepted masterpieces are not, and in it, if anywhere, are we adequately expressed. In a dozen other works we have, to be sure, aspects of the modern soul impressively set forth, but what, except "Faust," have we to put beside the supreme achievements of Dante and Chaucer and Shakespeare and Milton? Where else should we turn in the search for something so inclusive and so complete and what, if our faith in that should be lost, remains for us to do except to confess that the grand style disappeared with Milton from off the face of the earth, that "we" (for Goethe is one of us as Milton is not) have lost an art that others had?

Moved, perhaps, by some considerations such as these the Theater Guild has chosen "Faust" (Guild Theater) as the object of its first experiment with the classics. For the purpose it has imported a director from Germany, where they are supposed to understand such things, and it has intrusted the preparation of the mise en scène to Lee Simonson, who is certainly one of the most resourceful of our stage designers. To the performance one goes, accordingly, with a sense that a good deal is at stake and from it one comes away with a sense which can only be described as one of depression. Dudley Digges (to whom the honors of the evening go) is an impressive Mephistopheles who gives to the Devil that streak of mere vulgarity which is so important a part of Goethe's conception; George Gaul is an acceptable Faust; Helen Chandler, a charming if not particularly profound Marguerite; and Douglass Montgomery an effectively passionate Valentine. Yet the fact cannot be escaped: "Faust" moves through its many scenes with a meandering listlessness and reaches, with the death of Marguerite, a pathetic conclusion which, so far as the theme of the play is concerned, is no conclusion at all.

Under the circumstances the safest thing to do would be to lay the blame upon some head less well protected by fame than that of the author. One might, for instance, suggest learnedly that the present production cuts the text at various points and that it somehow misses the profundities of the original. Or one might, on the other hand, speak no less learnedly of the unacted and unactable Second Part, protesting against any judgment of the whole based upon a consideration of nothing except a fragment. But two facts remain, first, that this fragment is, for stage purposes, the only whole we have and, second, that it is very difficult to put one's finger upon any defects of the present production sufficiently serious to account for the ineffectiveness of the play. There remains, therefore, nothing to do except to suggest, with all deference, that "Faust" is not a supremely great drama; that we tend to think of it as such because we think of it not by itself, but in connection with all the greatness that was Goethe, and assume that it expresses all that he either expressed elsewhere or wished to express. The problem which he intended to state and the synthesis he intended to achieve are not present there in any adequate form, even though hints of them are.

To say this is not, of course, to deny that the play has its Olympian moments, for there are magic lines and there

THE HEALERS

By DR. B. LIBER

A unique, extremely original story of an ideal, almost impossible, struggling truth-seeking physician, who at last leaves his practice and becomes a tramp. Many phases from his most intimate life, his childhood, sex development, love and disappointment are told. But it is mainly an exact description of all the healing professions and quacks, with many details about their shortcomings and criminal practices and a relentless picture of the social background of disease.

The truth about medical science and practice, chiropractic, nature-cure, etc.

FROM THE PRESS:

"An unusual book. An honest and courageous setting forth of puzzling problems of healing."

"Smashing attack against the entire practice of medicine as it exists today: . . . Recalling the jeremiads of the old Hebrew prophets. . . . More absorbing than any detective story."

" . . . This sounds like crankery, but Dr. Liber is really quite sensible, just a bit too sanguine and his book makes interesting reading."

"Each page is a gem, thrillingly interesting, fiction style, but such blistering truths offered that one is amazed at the stupidity and crudeness of the human race. . . . From the writer emanates a golden glamor of idealism. . . . The leading figure, whose career from childhood, medical training, the first bitter entrance into his professional life, his romance, disappointment, all exquisitely pictured. . . . The heart of a musician, the soul of a poet, the conception of an artist, the brain of a philosopher, the perspective of a scientist. . . . Some parts remind us of Tolstoy—down in the dregs of life which we want to ignore. . . . See life, as it is, stripped of satins and silks. . . . Like an oak on the high cliff, storm beaten by the opinion of all healers, the author stands, challenging the world. He favors no one. With the larger good of the suffering public in mind the book is courageous and combative."

"Contains brilliant passages and would do every one interested in health problems an immense amount of good."

"According to Dr. Liber's conception, the social role of the Doctor is not only the passive one of facing disease. He should include in his art the highest aims, political, scientific and artistic under a new motto, Healthy Men In A Healthy Society."

FROM READERS.

"A revelation. I wish it could reach every one of our suffering humanity."—The book of the century. Not merely true, interesting and educational, but a great inspiration for a better and more useful life."—"An excellent novel. The hero is a character portrayal without parallel in American literature."

FROM PHYSICIANS.

From Dr. O. G., one of the most prominent men in his specialty:

"Your book is wonderful. It certainly reflects marvelously the kaleidoscopic mirror of medical life. Had the profession at large followed you as their pioneer, we would have no more abuses and fakes. I admire your courage to continue this uneven struggle against the Demigods of science."

From DR. JAMES P. WARBASSE, prominent surgeon, author and leader of the American co-operative movement:

"This book is highly informative and interesting. . . . The doctors will not like it because of the fulsome criticism of their profession. . . . Its chief value will be to those who are interested in the sociology and economics of medicine and the problems of medical practice. . . . There is too little criticism of the modern practice of medicine from the inside. You place the medical profession under obligations to you for your wise and helpful criticisms."

THE LATEST—FROM DR. S. D. SCHMALHAUSEN, author of "Why We Misbehave":

"One revolutionary physician.—In a recent issue of The Nation, Mary Reed writes intelligently on Soviet Health and says: 'It is a rule of Soviet medicine that every doctor shall be a teacher as well as a healer.' Dr. Liber, more than any other physician in America, fulfills this humanistic conception most completely. . . . It is alarming to realize how few critics within its own ranks the regular medical profession has produced. . . . How pleasant and astonishing it is to find one medicine man (who believes very little in medicine) speaking out so lucidly and courageously as Dr. Liber does in this altogether enlightening and delightfully readable book. 'The Healers' might be characterized as a sociological novel with an autobiographical slant. When I try to answer the question as to what is the beautiful merit of this fine work I seem to think of the quality of sincerity as somehow nestling in every living part of it. Such flaming sincerity produces a kind of dramatic and poetic effect that many a more literary handling of material cannot create."

"Dr. Liber's mind cannot fit into any of the familiar medical grooves, regular or irregular, for the sufficient reason that a mind capable of sustained criticism and sincerity and humility can never fit into any of the traditional and conventional molds. To one who has any residual doubts about the quality of mind and heart present among our professional groups, let him read, for the sake of dramatic contrast, this touching and intelligent book. The only other kindred work I am acquainted with which can at all compare with 'The Healers' is the profoundly human 'Memoirs of a Physician' by Veressaiëff. Dr. Liber's sociological novel is quite as human and much richer in knowledge and information and critical episode."

"As the sincerest of anarchists, Liber yet knows how to extend the hand of fellowship to the Soviet Republic. He cannot share the provincialism and egocentricity of the typical anarchist. As a doctor he is simultaneously interested in organic medicine, psychotherapy, education, art, and most impressively of all, in humanity. I doubt whether there is any other person in or out of the medical profession in these materialistic States who has served the humble so generously, so cordially, so understandingly."

"Our great physician-teacher possesses the imagination of an artist and the beautiful buoyancy of a child. A rare human being."

are sublime episodes. Consider for a moment the early scene in the study during which Faust, aspiring after transcendent wisdom and convinced that merely human life has no longer any hold upon him, is about to drink the poison goblet, when the sound of the Easter music, remembered from childhood, revives in him the sweetness of his humanity. Surely the ending of that scene upon the triumphant exclamation "Earth hath her child again" is as sublime as anything in modern literature. Or, to take another example in a different mood, consider the scene in the kitchen where the romanticism of Faust and Marguerite is played against the cynicism of Martha and Mephistopheles in a fashion which invests the whole scene with the spirit of a wisdom transcending any which either of the contrasting moods can achieve alone. If the play as a whole fulfilled the promise of the first of these episodes, or if it moved consistently upon the level of the second, it would be as great as anyone can imagine it, but in sober fact it does neither, and Marguerite, more than anyone else, is to blame.

By rights her story is no more than a minor episode. Though the seduction of a virgin may properly be a part of Faust's great adventure it was by no means so nearly the whole of it as this drama would seem to indicate. The play breaks in the middle and comes very near to being her story rather than his. Sentimental gallantry was Goethe's besetting sin and it so seduced him here that he abandoned the attempt to write a philosophical tragedy in order to devote himself to the composition of a pathetic idyl from which the legend of his hero was never successfully extricated. Nor does the fact that the simple have lavished their affection upon little Gretchen indicate anything except the enormity of his divagation. There are, as a result, great moments in "Faust" but there are also scenes which deserved nothing better than to be set to music by Gounod—that eternal fount of toilet water, as Huysmans called him.

Eva Le Gallienne signalized the reopening of her Civic Repertory Theater with two new productions: "The Would-Be Gentleman" and "L'Invitation au Voyage." The first is a rather free adaptation of "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme," which turns Molière's satire into a boisterous but amusing farce; the second a skilful translation by Ernest Boyd of a very tenuous piece by Jean-Jacques Bernard. It is very mildly interesting and might adequately be described as not very much ado about nothing at all.

In "Straight Through the Door" (Forty-ninth Street Theater) and in "By Request" (Hudson Theater) is demonstrated the melancholy fact that a good actor cannot do very much for an indifferent play. In the former, William Hodge illuminates his little piece with humor and ease to no particular end; in the latter the Nugents, father, son, and daughter-in-law, walk through their scenes like the experienced hands they are. If Elliot Nugent could make it so "By Request" would be a first-rate comedy. But it is only mildly entertaining and quite harmless. The spirit of Rupert of Hentzau returned to Broadway in "The Command Performance" (Klaw Theater). A painfully handsome hero—Ian Keith—and a heroine with modernistic morals ornament a plot which is as thick and soft and warm as ever. "Billy" (Erlanger's Theater) is quite the freshest musical comedy of the season and is graced by a charming young lady named Polly Walker. "Ups-a-Daisy" (Shubert Theater) is remarkable only for the humorous and exciting agility of Buster West and the wild syncopations of a red-headed hoyden named Nell Kelly.

Japanese Propaganda

JAPAN is now making determined efforts to win the support of American public opinion for her policy in Manchuria. Her representatives in this country have two objects, to prevent the State Department from making an open attack upon the Japanese policy in Manchuria and to gain financial assistance for the development of Japanese undertakings there. The following article, written from the point of view of liberal Chinese opinion, is a shrewd analysis of Japan's American propaganda methods. It is from the China Weekly Review of Shanghai, edited by J. B. Powell.

The Japanese Government, according to reports in the semi-official news reports and press of Tokio, is planning to send a number of high-powered propagandists to the United States for the purpose of explaining to the American people the true virtues of Japanese policy toward China. Which indicates that Japan is not entirely satisfied with the results obtained by her other paid writers and propagandists already in the United States who have been advocating cooperation between America and Japan in a "strong" policy toward China. Among those whose names have appeared in the newspapers as possible members of the new propaganda corps are Viscount Kaneko, Viscount Shibusawa, Mr. Tsurumi, Dr. Nitobe, Baron Fujimura, and Dr. Dan Takuma, the latter being a high official of the Mitsui Company.

The purpose of this move, according to the press reports, is to convince the American people that Japan has been moved entirely by altruism in trying to block the unification of the Three Eastern Provinces, Shengking, Kirin, and Holungkiang, with the Nationalist Government at Nanking. Japan would also attempt to make the American people believe that some 25,000 to 50,000 troops are being maintained in Manchuria and 12,000 troops in Shantung Province, entirely for China's good. Then, in addition, this new corps of propagandists would attempt to explain to the American people that Japan's opposition to the revision of her commercial treaty with China and her insistence that the old treaty of 1866 is still in force is purely for the benefit of the Chinese people in that it prevents the Chinese Government from increasing the tariff rates on goods imported into China from Japan.

These are the major problems which Japan would attempt to explain away by oratorical and journalistic methods, but beyond them there would be many speeches to be delivered about Japan's "highly important position" as a sort of bulwark against the spread of Russian communism and bolshevism on the continent of Asia. Each of these Japanese publicists would, in all probability, carry with him a set of maps of Manchuria and Mongolia, not to mention the newly discovered territory of "Barga," for the purpose of showing to the American people how necessary it is for Japan to exercise control in these areas in order to prevent Russia from grabbing them. Then, finally, there would be much to say about the necessity of Japan controlling these areas as a necessary outlet for her surplus population and as a source of supply for her industrial development. It's a rather large program which General-Baron Tanaka, Japan's militarist Premier and Foreign Minister, has mapped out for the new propaganda corps which, we suppose, is to be used to replace or supplement the work of those already in America, including Messrs. Kawakami and George Bronson Rea, who fight the battles of the South Manchuria Railway in America, and their associates in China, Messrs. Henry Kinney and George E. Sokolsky, who perform a similar service in China by getting out literature here for dispatching to the United States. It is probably due to the magnitude of the job that several of the men named in the preceding paragraph have expressed considerable hesitancy in accepting the appointment as unofficial ambassadors to the United States.

General-Baron Tanaka has been guilty of innumerable blunders in his China policy since he became head of the Japanese Government, but any attempt to bolster up Japan's present "strong-arm" policy toward China by conducting a propaganda campaign in the United States probably would result in a still greater blunder. Practically all of Japan's expensive propaganda campaigns in the United States in the past have ended disastrously for Japan. About ten years ago the Japanese financed an extensive campaign of oratory and written publicity in America on the immigration question, the purpose being to convince Americans that California, Oregon, and Washington should be opened up as territories for Japanese coolie immigration. It is reported on pretty good authority that the idea of "quota" immigration, that is, immigration based upon a percentage of the nationals of the various foreign countries already in the United States, actually originated with the Japanese propagandists sent to America. Well, after several years of high-powered propaganda, Congress did adopt a "quota" immigration law, but, owing to the intemperate remarks of the Japanese Ambassador in the United States, who began talking about "grave consequences," Congress went ahead and barred the Japanese out altogether. Then, following the Washington Conference, the Japanese government-owned South Manchuria Railway financed an equally extensive publicity campaign in America the general purpose of which was to induce American capitalists to lend their money to the Japanese for the exploitation of Manchuria, hoping in this way to make America a partner in Japan's policy of aggression in China's Three Eastern Provinces. The South Manchuria Railway ran full-page advertisements in all of the leading American magazines and newspapers, all of which were carefully written to convey the impression that Manchuria was a separate country and not a part of China.

The culmination of this campaign came last year when Mr. Thomas W. Lamont and his staff of experts from J. P. Morgan and Company and the National City Bank of New York came to Japan and entered into negotiations with the Japanese financiers for a $40,000,000 loan to the South Manchuria Railway. Well, that carefully planned publicity campaign was knocked into a cocked hat in short order when the Nationalist Government and the Chinese chambers of commerce and bankers associations got busy and explained just what was behind the Japanese attempt to borrow American money for use in the exploitation of Manchuria.

Japan's good propaganda money was thus worse than wasted, for when the real facts became known in America, public opinion reacted against Japan with disastrous consequences and the reaction in American public opinion also did not help Morgan and Company and the National City Bank of New York. . . .

Japan's trouble with American public opinion is a fundamental one which cannot be cured by propaganda no matter how skilfully prepared or extensively disseminated. Japan suffers in American public opinion because of a lack of frankness in respect to her relations with her near neighbor China. Japanese delegates go to international conferences and make promises and affix their signatures to documents guaranteeing the territorial, political, and administrative integrity of China and then the Japanese Government, or at least the military clique in Japan, attempts by oblique methods to undo what the Japanese delegates have officially promised. The result is that Japan is always regarded with suspicion in the United States and the more the propaganda the greater the suspicion.

The Churches and Peace

TO Alfred W. Martin, delegate of the Ethical Culture Movement, we are indebted for a brief summary of the recent Universal Religious Peace Conference at Geneva.

Never before was there convened an assemblage such as met at Geneva, Switzerland, September 12-14. It was composed of 124 persons, representing a remarkable variety of religious opinion and affiliation. They were invited by the Church Peace Union (founded by Andrew Carnegie) to come together to discuss the possibility of holding a Universal Religious Peace Conference in 1930 and, if held, what it might be expected to accomplish in the field of religion toward establishing international peace. The attending delegates included Hindus, Buddhists, Zoroastrians, Confucians, Jews, Mohammedans, Greek Orthodox, Roman Catholics, Protestant Christians, evangelical and liberal, Quakers, Theosophists, Bahais, and Ethical Culturists. It was unanimously voted to prepare at once for the proposed World Conference and to have it devoted exclusively to three distinct objects:

1. To state the highest teachings of each religion on peace and the causes of war.
2. To record the efforts of religious bodies in furtherance of peace.
3. To devise means whereby men of all religious faiths may work together to remove existing obstacles to peace; to stimulate international cooperation for peace and the triumph of right; to secure international justice, to increase good-will and thus bring about fuller realization of the brotherhood of men.

The official document presented by the committee appointed to draft a statement of conference aims read in part as follows:

Even as nations have been learning that no one of them

suffices to itself alone, but that each needs to help and to be helped by others, so also the religions of the world will come to see that each must seek to serve and to be served in the work of peace, and to go hand in hand toward the common goal.

Hence it was resolved that a Universal Religious Peace Conference be held, to put in motion the joint spiritual resources of mankind; and that, without attempting to commit any religious body in any way, the conference consist of devoted individuals holding, or associated with, recognized forms of religious belief.

The universal conference designs neither to set up a formal league of religions, nor to compare the relative values of faiths, nor to espouse any political or social system.

Of this conference the sole purpose will be to rouse and to direct the religious impulses of humanity against war in a constructive world-wide effort to achieve peace.

HERBERT HOOVER'S MUCH-HERALDED speech in New York City turned out to be the duller and most wearisome of the entire series of statistical essays which he has dubbed campaign speeches. There was indubitably genuine enthusiasm in the cheering which continued for twelve minutes when he rose to speak. Within three minutes, however, people began to leave, and before the speech had ended several thousand of the twenty-two thousand people who were there had left. It passes our comprehension how a public man with Mr. Hoover's reputation for brains and ability could face such an audience, be the recipient of such enthusiasm, and yet be unable to arouse a single emotion or to say one word of human warmth to thrill or stimulate his audience. Again and again he labored his favorite issues of prosperity and what he calls progress; his best phrase was that the country had gone "from the full dinner pail to the full garage" under beneficent Republican leadership. Many of his statements were utterly misleading, as, for instance, his comparing the functioning of the railroads under war-time government control with private operation in the piping times of peace and his references to governments of Europe under socialist control and management. But ride his hobby of taking the government out of business he must. Of course his assertion that government management is always bad is nonsense. If it were true, then the government should immediately relinquish the carrying of the mails, the operation of the Panama and Cape Cod canals, the Alaska railroad, the national parks and forests, and all the rest of the multitudinous business enterprises in which it is today engaged.

TO OUR READERS in the States concerned we again urge that they cast ballots on Election Day for the return to the Senate of Robert M. La Follette of Wisconsin. Hendrik Shipstead of Minnesota, Burton K. Wheeler of Montana, Lynn J. Frazier of North Dakota, Robert B. Howell of Nebraska, and C. C. Dill of Washington. We feel, as we said in our issue of September 12, that the return of these men to Washington is of paramount importance to the cause of progressive popular government. Not quite so unqualifiedly we indorse also the reelection to the Senate of David I. Walsh of Massachusetts, Hiram W. Johnson of California, Kenneth D. McKellar of Tennessee, and M. M. Neely of West Virginia. In spite of many vagaries and his indifference toward Mooney and Billings, Johnson has come out so well on the power issue that we think he is needed in Washington at this time. Walsh generally aligns himself in the popular interest, while McKellar and Neely are supported by the People's Legislative Service. We have not mentioned parties in referring to these men because their services have not been along party lines. Among new candidates we have already indorsed Alanson B. Houghton in New York because of his personal worth and his excellent outlook on foreign affairs, while the People's Legislative Service rejoices that Representative Tom Connally is in line in Texas to succeed Senator Mayfield. So far as the House goes, we add only a word to commend the reelection of Victor L. Berger of Milwaukee and Fiorello H. La Guardia of New York City, both highly useful and independent members.

SMITH CONTINUES TO LEAD The Nation's poll of its subscribers by a margin of more than two to one with Norman Thomas in second place and Hoover a close third. The vote now stands Smith, 6,804; Thomas, 2,780; Hoover, 2,761; Foster, 428; Will Rogers, 26; and the rest scattering. New York and California have cast the most votes, and in both States Smith leads with Hoover in third place. The poll gives little indication of a farm revolt in the Middle West, since Hoover is running a close second to Smith in Iowa, Kansas, Nebraska, and Minnesota. While the Literary Digest's poll indicates that Hoover will cut deeply into the solid South, our subscribers in all the Southern States are overwhelmingly loyal to the Democratic nominee. Some doubt is thrown upon the Literary Digest's figures for the South because of that journal's underestimate of the Davis vote in 1924. The Nation regrets that there is no trustworthy method of recording the electoral choice of all of its readers in this poll. We have circulated ballots only among our 25,000 mail subscribers in the United States; our 12,000 to 15,000 newsstand readers have not been reached. The high proportion of returns from our subscribers underscores what the enormous registration of voters has already indicated, that there is more interest in the coming election than in any Presidential contest in this country in many years. A complete summary and analysis of The Nation's poll will appear in the issue of next week.

THAT IS A REMARKABLE DOCUMENT which was published on October 20 by forty-five distinguished Southerners: bishops, college presidents—eight of them—teachers, editors, professional and business men and women. What was its purpose? Something unique: a demand that the race issue be not dragged into this campaign. Ever since Reconstruction it has been the habit of Southern politicians to ride into office on the backs of Negroes—by abusing them. There being no State issues, and no contest between parties, the game has usually been to see who could denounce the Negro loudest. In this campaign there has not been the slightest excuse for lugging in our colored fellow-citizens; there have been enough other “horrible” issues. Yet the day this manifesto appeared the Republican headquarters felt compelled to issue a denial that Mr. Hoover had “danced with a Negress.” As for Governor Smith, he has been portrayed in the South as that most dreadful of persons, a “nigger-lover,” and his managers have felt compelled to deny that he ever employed Negro stenographers or that he has appointed Negroes to any higher offices than the menial ones they fill in the South. The forty-five Southern objectors to this nauseating kind of un-Americanism speak out well when they say in their manifesto:

It is our hope that no one will be deterred by them [anti-Negro appeals] from calmly considering the real issues and voting his honest convictions; and certainly that no one will allow them to inflame his mind with antagonism toward our Negro neighbors, who too long have been pawns in the game of politics. Any attempt to influence men and women with an issue so untimely is unworthy of the white man and unjust to all.

When one considers the conservatism of the South and the general fear of being denounced as Negrophile, this is almost an epoch-making statement.

PROFESSING ATHEISM is a dangerous business in the State of Arkansas. Charles Smith, president of the American Association for the Advancement of Atheism, is serving a twenty-six-day term in the jail of Little Rock because his attacks upon the proposed anti-evolution law which comes up for a popular vote at the next election were “calculated to provoke a breach of the peace.” A Little Rock judge refused to allow him to testify in his own behalf because he would not importune the Deity to assist him in truth-telling, and Mayor Charles E. Moyer declared: “No atheist will be permitted to maintain headquarters in Little Rock if I can prevent it.” Mr. Smith was fined $25 and costs but refused to pay his fine and is serving his sentence as a protest. Meanwhile the State of Senator Joseph Robinson has otherwise distinguished itself by its interpretation of law. A correspondent in Little Rock writes to us as follows:

The legislature of the State, meeting in special session, passed a resolution barring from employment by its sage body any man or woman who would not sign a pledge to vote the straight Democratic ticket in November! Coercion? Oh, no. The people of the North and East have no idea of the coercive efforts, the intimidating methods, being used in this Presidential election in the South. Negroes are being used to form Negro Smith clubs, while freely it is said: “Hoover, if elected, will put the Negro in office over Southern womanhood.” Three judges, two Democrats and one Republican, are at each polling place by law—but the Democrats choose the Republican judges!

THE NEW OIL SCANDAL, described in last week's issue of The Nation, has burst like a stink bomb, leaving a most unholy odor in its wake. The Government's contract with the Sinclair interests for the oil of the Salt Creek fields, which Secretary Hubert Work renewed last February, was pronounced invalid on October 16 by Attorney-General Sargent. The contract, it will be remembered, contained a secret option granted to Sinclair by Albert B. Fall allowing the Sinclair interests to renew the agreement at the old rate and thus beat certain Kansas oil companies willing to pay a much higher price. It now appears that Attorney-General Sargent did not pass on this contract officially when it was renewed last winter, and allowed Senator Walsh's protest concerning its legality to lie on his desk from March 2 to October 16. Then, two days after the New York World had exposed the affair, Mr. Sargent sent his opinion. Why did Mr. Sargent keep silent about a fraudulent contract for seven months, and why did Mr. Work renew a contract with so notorious a customer without adequate investigation? The action of the Department of the Interior in canceling the contract after public exposure with no adequate explanation for the delay can only be interpreted as a confession of guilt. Even the Scripps-Howard newspapers have interrupted their eulogies of Mr. Hoover to demand the removal of Hubert Work as director of the Republican campaign because of this scandal.

NINE MONTHS AGO public-utility officials were assuring Senators that they would give “full cooperation” if the Federal Trade Commission instead of the Senate would investigate them. Now they have defied the commission, convincing Commissioner Edgar A. McCulloch that they have information they do not want the people of the country to know about. Josiah Newcomb, counsel for the Joint Committee of National Utility Associations, says the conflict “was perhaps inevitable when the commission began its investigation of the separate utility companies as distinguished from their associated activities.” So the Electric Bond and Share Company, which according to Raushenbush and Laidler has, with the General Electric Company, “a certain influence” over about half the power industry, has declined to answer questions about its disbursements for propaganda and politics. The commission can go to the courts to compel witnesses to answer, or it can furnish the Department of Justice with evidence of their defiance as a means of prosecuting the officials, but the fact that there appears to be a way to take the case all the way to the Supreme Court means that the investigation can be halted just as it was about to reach the financial operations of the utilities. It took the Claire Furnace case seven years to go through the courts, and although the Federal Trade Commission won—without, however, a full decision on its powers—it was then too late to go on with the investigation undertaken at the behest of Congress. This, no doubt, is the consummation aimed at by the utilities. Even if they lose in the courts, they will have had many more years in which to concentrate control, forestall federal regulation, prevent investigation, and fill the heads of the public with their dishonest propaganda.

ONE OF THE COUNTS on which Governor Smith is most frequently assailed is his affiliation with Tammany Hall. It is a real weakness in his candidacy, but if political spellbinders wanted to enlighten the people instead of merely to corral their votes, they would have to go on to say that, unsavory as the history of Tammany Hall has been in New York City, the record of the Republican Party up-State has been a match for it and not infrequently the two organizations have worked hand in glove to defraud the electorate. One of those who has taken special pains to attack New York's Governor because of his association with the Tiger is that gentle and lily-white Portia, Mabel Walker Willebrandt, who owes her own political ascendancy to the grace of the unimpeached but far from unimpeachable Harry M. Daugherty. Mrs. Willebrandt has been quoting, as her authority for the rottenness of Tammany Hall, from that excellent work the eleventh edition of the Encyclopædia Britannica, giving chapter and book. It is impressive, but if anyone should take the trouble to verify the reference he would find something which Mrs. Willebrandt must have failed to notice. He would discover that the article concludes (volume 26, page 392) with the following sentence: "The power of the organization [Tammany Hall] in the State and in the nation is due to its frequent combination with the Republican organization, which controls the State almost as completely as Tammany does the city."

THE BERLIN NEWSPAPERS are ringing with protests at the treatment of the passengers on the Graf Zeppelin. They were received at Lakehurst "as if they were criminals," surrounded by police and customs officials, and rushed off to a room, where they were kept standing for three hours, there being only two chairs in the room. Nobody was allowed to leave, the excuse being that if the doors were opened the 250 reporters would rush the room. The passengers were kept on their feet until finally their baggage was brought in—the delay was due to the fact that as each piece of luggage was removed a corresponding weight of ballast had to be put on the Zeppelin. Through some blunder or misunderstanding no order was received from Washington to grant the passengers freedom from search, and examination at Lakehurst presented extraordinary difficulties. The result is humiliating and is not compensated for by the cordial official welcomes in New York and Washington. We would, however, like to assure the Berlin press that possibly the travelers of the Graf Zeppelin were lucky that their pockets were not searched. This is an ungracious business for the United States to engage in, and every year it rouses the anger of thousands of foreigners who should be our friends. It is, however, an accepted concomitant of that protective tariff to which both Messrs. Smith and Hoover are expressing themselves as so devoted.

THE BEARING OF THE OFFICERS of the Graf Zeppelin since their arrival has been admirable. In a modest and illuminating address at the dinner given by the German-American Chamber of Commerce, Dr. Eckener made it clear that he regards himself neither as a hero nor the pioneer of a regular airship service to begin tomorrow. He warned his hearers that large sums of money were needed and equally large additional stores of knowledge, notably meteorological. As for speed, airships, he declares, can be made to go much faster but they must be larger and carry more engines. That there will be a regular passenger service eventually he is entirely certain. He considers a two days' flight from Europe to New York entirely feasible, but only after a lapse of some time. At this stage he wishes $14,000,000 to build additional vessels and equip the line to give a biweekly service. It is significant that Henry Ford's chief engineer has been to Lakehurst to talk over the problem. It is an adventure that Mr. Ford could well embark upon. Sooner or later this method of overseas voyaging must be tried to the fullest extent.

THE ECONOMIC AND FINANCIAL recognition of Russia grows steadily more complete and definite. A contract has been signed by the Amtorg Trading Company, acting for the Soviet Government, and the International General Electric Company for the sale of at least $21,000,000 worth of electrical equipment for export to Russia. Amtorg will pay 25 per cent of the agreed price in cash; the remainder will be paid over a period of six years. It is said in Washington that the negotiations leading to this agreement were carried on under the eye and with the approval of the Department of State. It is also said that this approval represents no change of heart or policy on the part of the United States toward Russia; the long-term credits, secured by the guaranty of the Russian State Bank, are looked upon as merely the necessary arrangements incidental to a strictly commercial contract. It will be recalled, however, that last year the State Department forced the Chase National Bank in New York to discontinue the sale of certain Russian railway bonds which it had placed on the market. Loans to enterprises under the authority of the Soviet Government were to be prohibited as strictly as loans to the Government itself. But in the light of this ruling of the Department of State the Journal of Commerce (New York) on October 18 comments editorially on the recent electrical contract, and asks:

Wherein does this transaction differ from the railway-bond transaction? The Soviet Government controls both the railroads and the State Bank. Morally as well as legally, the two transactions are very close. The head of the Amtorg in this city speaks of the contract as "a decided forward step in the growing commercial relations" between the two countries, and he is right. It is also a step on the part of the State Department toward a position which to the average man appears to be very different from the one it formerly occupied.

TO BRING ABOUT more friendly understanding between the Occident and the Orient the first India Conference of America is being held in New York City. The East has been traditionally a mystery to the West. India is a strange and even forbidding name, and the purpose of the present series of meetings—to make available "a comprehensive knowledge and reliable information about India and her people, her art, philosophy and religion, her ancient civilization and her modern problems"—can bring nothing but good to India and America both. An exhibition of modern Hindu paintings is being held concurrently at the Corona Mundi galleries; the conference itself consists of lectures and discussions, notably "India Free—Within or Without the British Empire?" with Herbert Adams Gibbons, Robert Morss Lovett, Harry F. Ward, and others as speakers. And most interesting of all, for those who wish to know more of India, Mrs. Sarojini Naidu is here as a lecturer on India's womanhood. Mrs. Naidu is a leading feminist; she was president of the Indian National Congress in 1925-1926; she is a poet as well as a publicist. As an unofficial ambassador from the ancient, splendid East to the vigorous young West, she brings friendship as well as understanding.

"The Dirtiest Political Campaign"

THE nearer the end of the Presidential campaign comes, the worse it appears. One must go far back in our history before one comes across a similar era of Know-Nothingism, or rank, passionate prejudice. Even then it seems on so small a scale as to be trifling by comparison. As we write, two weeks before the election, there is a genuine prospect that the Solid South will be broken at last. For what reason? Some profound political principle? Some grave question of State's rights? Some determination to alter a domestic or foreign policy? Some decision to rebuke a party which has been corrupt and faithless in office? Not at all. What has stirred the South to its depths is frankly the possibility that a Roman Catholic may be elected President. There is, of course, deep and sincere feeling on the prohibition question. Although no President can change the prohibition law or alter the Constitution, the prohibition forces are declaring that the principle is at stake and that cry is seized upon by multitudes, which are eagerly seeking an excuse to cover their religious prejudice, their bigotry, their total lack of understanding of that liberty of conscience and of belief which is the very cornerstone of the American republic.

Not only in the South is the poison at work. Everywhere one goes in the North it is prejudice which seems to be electing Herbert Hoover—prejudice against the Pope; prejudice against Tammany Hall; prejudice against the man who waxes ungrammatical as he waxes eloquent; prejudice against his wife because she has not enjoyed the opportunities for leisure and culture that have been the good fortune of some Presidents' wives; prejudice because Al Smith represents the immigrant part of our population. From a cold northern New York town near the Canadian border comes this telegram: "Mysterious night riders have just deluged this town with obscene political literature. Will The Nation not take a stand for political decency in the dirtiest political campaign ever waged in the United States?" This is symptomatic. At Democratic headquarters there is a collection of anti-Smith literature to stagger the beholder in its falsity, its vulgarity, its crassness, and its appeal to the lowest passions. It is hard to conceive of anybody's stooping lower.

Nor is Mr. Hoover wholly escaping. Stories that he sought to become a British citizen, that he is not qualified for legal reasons, are coming into the open. It is hard to foretell what may take place between now and election, but nothing could surprise any observer who knows what is going on under the surface and has gauged the venom and hate and passion with which the campaign is being carried on.

We must confess to both disappointment and shame. Disappointment that a campaign like this could not have been kept on a decent level, and shame that our nakedness is thus exposed to the world. We cannot but hang our heads when we think of the effect that all this will have upon foreign observers. They will once more say that we are a land of barbarians, and that, whenever we desist from the chase of the almighty dollar, we reveal an attitude of mind no whit different from that which led to the killing of the witches in Salem. Indeed, it goes further back. How far are we from the days of Huss and the Inquisition? In calmer moments, however, we cannot but wonder if there are not some positive gains despite all the muck and the murk. At least we have become excited over a political campaign. We have roused ourselves from the apathy of eight and of four years ago when it seemed as if the American people would never again take anything but a languid interest in their politics; when a party caught red-handed in corruption, in bargaining away a birthright of the American people in return for bribes and for the payment of campaign debts, could be returned to office as if its record were of the whitest.

After all, we must ask ourselves whether what we are witnessing today is not merely a revelation on a large scale of the religious stupidity, blindness, and intolerance which came to light in the Scopes case and in the efforts in other States to compel science and learning to stand still at the behest of superstition, of long since outworn beliefs in miracles and the supernatural. Are we not, perhaps, profiting by the self-exposure of this campaign? Are we not having the benefits of a cold douche to bring us to a clear-eyed vision of how backward we still are in some of the physically greatest stretches of the country? It is something to know where we stand and what we are. Let us hope it will make some Americans realize the gravity of the evil of denying free speech, free assembly, and justice in the courts, against which The Nation has been inveighing year in and year out. They are all tied together, make no mistake. Lynching, the Ku Klux Klan, the denial to Communists of the right of peaceful meeting, as narrated by Scott Nearing elsewhere in this issue, and the bigotry of some Protestants—these are all of the same warp and woof. As long as they exist the American democracy is in danger. As long as they are before us The Nation, at least, will continue to blow its call to the ramparts with all the power that it has. It was not necessary for our subscriber quoted above to ask us to take a stand against what is going on; that has been our historic position.

It is our misfortune, however, that we have not been able, for the first time, perhaps, since the McKinley and Bryan election of 1900, to give positive advice to our readers. Our own staff is divided in its view. There is no doubt that Norman Thomas has waged the finest campaign and that his platform far more nearly approximates the standards and ideals of The Nation than does the Democratic. But from other points of view the present emergency is so great that many will overlook everything else save the height to which the tides of prejudice have gone in order to rebuke this treason to Americanism at the polls by voting for Smith. Alas, the verdict of November 6 will not be clear-cut on any issue! This vice of our governmental system remains—that it is of the rarest that an election is confined to one question. The prohibitionists, the religious fanatics, the preachers of "prosperity," the champions of the protective tariff—each of these and various other groups will claim the victory for itself and each will interpret it in its own way. To our readers we can again only appeal not to cast their ballots for Herbert Hoover, but to choose between Smith and Thomas, as their consciences shall dictate.

How to Sell Books

E. HALDEMAN-JULIUS has won a place alongside of Woolworth and Ford. During the last ten years he has sold more than 100,000,000 copies of his Little Blue Books and in "The First Hundred Million" (Simon and Schuster, $3) he has just published a candid analysis of his methods which reveals him as an indubitable master of that great modern science which is known as "merchandising."

In a very general way he knew to begin with what he wanted—to sell cheap reprints of standard books—but within the limitations established by that purpose he was willing to give the public what it wanted and he has employed all the resources of a very shrewd mind to find out what that is. Beginning with nothing except a few guesses to guide him, he gradually developed an elaborate system by which the pulling power of every advertisement and the salability of every title were checked, and he acted ruthlessly upon every suggestion that his information furnished him. Every book that failed to sell the required 10,000 a year was sent to a "hospital" where its defects (commercial, not literary) were analyzed and doctored; every book that failed to respond to treatment was dropped and some other, carefully selected, was substituted in its place. The classics must be sold—that is the purpose of the enterprise. But what classics, under what titles, and by what methods—that was for the public to say. Such canniness will be called genius by some and cynicism by others, but the fact remains that the success of any similar enterprise is to the success of the Little Blue Books far less than the success of any other cheap automobile to the success of the Ford. Mr. Haldeman-Julius adapted the methods of mass selling to books and as a result he actually sold books in masses.

What are the lessons which he learned and what are the principles which he followed? As one might expect they are simple, and as one might expect they reveal that the masses respond only to very simple appeals. In general people have a passion to read about three things: sex, self-improvement, and what may vaguely be called "daring" attacks upon respectability, especially religion. They will buy a book whose title suggests any of these three topics and, except in certain exceptional cases, their interest is languid in any title which does not. Therefore, the simplest thing is to work in one or the other of the tested appeals by hook or crook, and to do so is an almost infallible remedy for any "sick" classic. In 1926 a translation of Hugo's play sold 8,000 copies under the title "The King Enjoys Himself"; in 1927 it sold 38,000 copies when offered as "The Lustful King Enjoys Himself."

If the book is such that sex interest cannot possibly be suggested, then one of the other two dependable appeals must be called in. Whistler's "Ten O'Clock" goes much better if it is called "What Art Should Mean to You" and, in general, there is something magic about the "How to" or "What You Should Know" title, so that Schopenhauer's "Art of Controversy" and De Quincey's "Essay on Conversation" both leaped forward when they were respectively retitled "How to Argue Logically" and "How to Improve Your Conversation." "The Truth About" this or that also goes very well, doubtless because it faintly suggests more or less esoteric revelations, and so does any other suggestion of the dangerous or the forbidden. But sex remains the surest of all appeals. Gautier's "Golden Fleece" is dead, but takes on abundant life when it is called "The Search for a Blond Mistress," and Maupassant's "Tallow Ball" finds many readers under the title "A Prostitute's Sacrifice." Nor can it be said that the interest in sex is, like that in certain other subjects, very much more conspicuous in one section of the public than another. Readers of The Nation buy as much Voltaire as they do Nietzsche; readers of Liberty do not; but the two publics are almost equally interested in love. In fact, statistics reveal only one paradox. Readers of the Pathfinder (a periodical with an almost exclusively rural circulation) displayed more interest in "The Art of Kissing" than did the readers of the New York Times, but this is probably to be explained less by any difference in degree of interest in the subject than by the fact that New Yorkers are more likely to think they know how.

A good many people will shudder at many of Mr. Haldeman-Julius's methods, and the academic will gasp at the taste displayed in many of his rechristenings, but it is not by pleasing the academic that millions of anything whatever are sold. His defense is that though he changes titles he does not change books and that the text of "The Lustful King Amuses Himself" is perfectly authentic. In any event, one thing is certain: The question which he poses at the head of one of his chapters "Are Americans Afraid of Sex?" need never be asked again. Ask rather if cats hate fish or Italians spaghetti. The answer is, in slang phrase: "They eat it up."

Britain Talks Politics

IN the British general election which will take place next year, probably in June, the real struggle lies between Labor and the Conservatives. Fortunately for the British electorate, neither religion nor pseudo-prohibition will be allowed to divert attention from what the New Statesman calls a "choice between a government that drops a tear over the poor on suitable occasions and a government that hates poverty and will wage steady war upon it." Whether any party can win a clear majority in the House of Commons is not plain. Of the 615 members of the House today the Conservative Party has 415, Labor 160, and the Liberals only 40.

Labor Party leaders are talking of an absolute majority after the election, but few observers share their optimism. To increase their membership from 160 to 308, an absolute majority, the Laborites must win a considerable proportion of the countryside away from its Conservative allegiance, an achievement which presents as many obstacles as the capture of the rural Midwest of the United States by the Democratic Party. The highest vote that the Labor Party has ever had in the House of Commons was 192, when Ramsay MacDonald undertook the premiership in 1924 with minority support. Since then the Liberal leaders have rejuvenated their ancient cohorts and are making a strenuous bid for Labor's place as His Majesty's Opposition. It would be a miracle if they emerged as the second party in the state, but they will embarrass Labor by splitting the opposition to the Baldwin regime.

The Labor Party is desperately poor, while both the Liberals and Conservatives have relatively large campaign chests. Lloyd George's famous post-war chest has been only partially dissipated. Money determines the result of an election quite as much in Great Britain as in the United States. Every candidate for Parliament must deposit about $730 as a guaranty that he represents a substantial portion of the electorate, and must forfeit that deposit if he fails to poll one-eighth of the vote. It is disastrous for the Labor Party when it must deposit funds for its relatively poor candidates and then lose those funds. The one compensation for this risk is that the Labor Party is seldom forced to contest a district against a Communist candidate, since the Communist candidate is rarely willing to gamble upon his ability to win one-eighth of the electorate. In addition to its other difficulties, the Labor Party's financial strength has been greatly depleted by the Trades Dispute Act, forbidding the automatic collection of Labor Party dues from union members.

In spite of these handicaps the Labor Party is bound to increase its membership in the House of Commons because of widespread economic discontent. The army of the unemployed, as Mr. Hobson points out elsewhere in this issue, has increased by a quarter of a million—the September figures indicate an increase to 1,324,700. The Conservatives cannot ignore this issue, because they came into power largely by making promises that they would relieve the unemployment crisis.

Unemployment, a protective tariff, and the Anglo-French naval agreement are the three leading issues of the British campaign thus far. The Conservatives were badly beaten in a general election when they attacked free trade openly, but they are edging toward the protective system again in spite of their rebuke at the polls. This drift toward protection will be fought bitterly by both the Liberals and Labor. Likewise both Liberals and Labor unite in condemning the Anglo-French naval accord.

If the election could be confined to foreign policy alone, the Labor Party might win a clear majority, for the Baldwin Government is unpopular after its failure to reach a solution of the disarmament deadlock at Geneva and after the Anglo-French fiasco. Ramsay MacDonald struck a popular note at the Birmingham conference of the Labor Party when he demanded that the Government accept a plan for general international disarmament in successive stages.

The keenest interest in the British election will center in the possibility of a Labor-Liberal coalition. What will Labor do if, for example, the election results in a House of Commons composed of 285 Laborites, 285 Conservatives, and 45 Liberals? Both Labor and Liberal leaders indignantly reject the suggestion of a coalition, because militancy is "good politics" and talk of compromise at this stage would weaken the intensity of the fight for various constituencies. But it is easily imaginable that Labor might choose to enter a coalition cabinet with the Liberals, as the lesser of two evils, and work out a moderate program of next steps in economic change, with a cautious Laborite like Philip Snowden as Chancellor of the Exchequer.

For the sake of the mental health of the British Labor Party we hope that it will not be offered the choice of a coalition with the Liberals. Its "reconstruction program" has already been sufficiently diluted by the necessity of compromise. Moreover, Mr. Lloyd George is not a healthful bedfellow for leaders of the proletariat.

Business Is Not Business

SOMETIMES the shock of realizing the vast and all-inclusive machinery used by the public utilities to direct public opinion in their favor is relieved by humorous revelations of the gullibility of those "high-powered executives" who are supposed to be so much more efficient than executives chosen by the people could be.

There was the case of Mrs. Clare Ketchum Tripp of Seattle, whose name appeared as author of monographs about the public utilities sent to the public schools of Washington and Oregon. The Oregon Public Utility Information Bureau paid her $100 a month for a "membership" in her Washington-Oregon Industries Education Bureau. ("She called it a membership. . . . Since she called it a membership, we called it a membership, too," testified the manager of the bureau.) But the Oregon utility bureau wrote the monograph and paid all the costs of its publication and distribution. Judge Robert E. Healy, chief counsel for the Federal Trade Commission, could not discover just what services had been rendered by Mrs. Tripp in exchange for the $100 a month paid her by the Oregon bureau and a similar amount paid her by the Puget Sound Light and Power Company. Of course, she made the "contacts" necessary for getting the monographs into the schools, but in other States the bureaus themselves were able to do that work.

The naive Mrs. Tripp, although the monographs signed by her explained all about rate regulation and other fictions of the utility business, told the Federal Trade Commission that she thought the Interstate Commerce Commission regulated the rates of public utilities!

Mrs. Tripp's monographs appealed to sectional prejudice by teaching the school-children that the dividends and interest paid by privately owned utilities were all paid to local citizens, and used to "swell the volume of trade," while "without exception" bonds upon a municipal lighting plant were held by Eastern investors, "and all the money paid as interest upon these bonds each year goes out of this State."

Then there was the contribution in excess of $84,400 a year paid by the utilities to E. Hofer and Sons' "Industrial News Bureau" of Salem, Oregon, for sending his anti-government ownership and other "anti-radical" editorials to all the country daily and weekly newspapers in the United States—some 13,000 or 14,000 publications. When new "subscriptions" came in to his bureau, the "service" was not extended. The additional money was merely used "to keep the service going."

If State commissions and boards concerned with regulating public utilities would profit by the Federal Trade Commission's investigation of the utilities, most of the propaganda activities could be stopped with little difficulty. All these boards and commissions need to do is to examine the "operating costs" reported by the utilities, and eliminate from them such items as the $100 a month paid by the Puget Sound Light and Power Company to Mrs. Tripp, the $7,000 a year paid by the Public Service Corporation of New Jersey to Hofer's agency, and all the other hundreds of thousands squandered by the utilities in propaganda. If the utility companies had to pay these "expenses" out of their own coffers instead of out of the consumer's pocket, there would be less propaganda.

Smith, Hoover, and the Tariff

By OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

CARL SCHURZ records that he once, in reply to a question from President Grover Cleveland as to what he considered the paramount issue, urged that the President take up the tariff. He adds: "I shall never forget what happened. The man bent forward and buried his face in his hands on the table before him. Finally he straightened up with the same directness and spoke: 'I'm ashamed to say it, but the truth is I know nothing about the tariff. Will you tell me how to go about it to learn?'" Perusal of the tariff speeches of Governor Smith made at Louisville on October 13 and of Herbert Hoover at Boston two days later compels me to the belief that both of these men are just about in the position of Grover Cleveland as recorded by Mr. Schurz, only that they do not know it. Governor Smith certainly has the same excuse for ignorance. Like Mr. Cleveland he has been absorbed in State issues until his nomination and, like him, he never made any claim to economic training. Mr. Hoover lays claim, however, to being internationally minded, and as Secretary of Commerce has had eight years of supervision of American trade. Yet there is hardly one of the hoary old protectionist fallacies for which he has not fallen.

Governor Smith is pitiable because he seems totally unaware that the Houston platform and his own words constitute a complete break with his party's historic tariff policy. Governor Smith apparently does not realize that he has wiped out the distinction between the two great parties on this issue, and that so far as he can do so has made their respective tariff positions merely a question of the degree of protection. He has allowed himself to be bluffed into saying that he does not favor a wholesale downward revision of the tariff, that he is for a tariff commission and intends to rehabilitate it and to draw fine men to it by paying larger salaries, although that body has been only a sorry joke on the country from the beginning, and that he will put an end to the tariff's sheltering "extortion and favoritism." Next, he assures the country that if elected "it will be the prime aim and prime purpose of a Democratic Administration to extend the benefit of tariff favors to all classes, and to spread prosperity generally throughout the United States." This is such a farrago of utter nonsense that Governor Smith's champions must wish that some economic school-marm had taken him on her knees and told him in a few words what the American tariff is.

Had this happened Governor Smith would have learned that the tariff was originally introduced to protect the infant industries of the infant republic, and that it was not until 1840 that the argument that it was necessary to protect American labor against foreign labor was heard; that thereafter this cry was maintained by the protected manufacturers, who used it as a smoke-screen not only to assure themselves extremely high profits, but to extort from the public higher and higher prices; that there has never been a Republican or a Democratic tariff which did not shelter "extortion and favoritism," and that the only way the latter can be excised is not, as Governor Smith suggests, by banning a general tariff revision downward and reforming it schedule by schedule, but by laying the ax to the entire system. More than that, his own party's history shows how absurd it is for Governor Smith to pledge his word that he would keep the tariff free from "extortion and favoritism." Both Grover Cleveland and Woodrow Wilson were bent on doing the same; both accepted villainous compromise tariffs full of extortion and favoritism—a quarter loaf instead of a whole one—rather than obtain no revision at all.

The great truth which Governor Smith utterly overlooks here is that in the last analysis it is Congress that makes or unmakes tariffs, and not the President. Congress has permitted a tariff commission to come into being only because it knew that it would take forever to go through the whole list of rates and that it could cut off the commission whenever it saw fit. Only a handful of Congressmen or Senators has complained because to date the result of the commission's work has been a lowering of the tariff only on Bob-White quail, Canadian-grown cherries, mill-feed, cresylic acid, and paint-brush handles. As for Governor Smith's proposals of a non-partisan commission of five to be appointed by him in place of the present bi-partisan commission, that sounds well, but in practice it could achieve very little. But if Governor Smith were to have a Democratic Congress to vote him his commission and if he got his five "best minds," how could they eradicate the graft, the favoritism, and the overcharging of the American people that are synonymous with protection?

Again, somebody should have whispered into Governor Smith's ear that until Hoover did so not even the wildest tariff maniac ever suggested that the tariff helped everybody. The Hannas and Quays, the Cannons and Allison and McKinleys never did, at least with any enthusiasm or conviction. They were frankly out for the manufacturers and pretended to be for their employees. But they had to concede at least that the tariff blessings were only indirectly felt by the great masses of middle-class Americans on the farms and in offices.

But Governor Smith promised the workingman out of his utter ignorance of all these things that "the Democratic Party will not do a single thing that will take from his weekly pay envelope a five-cent piece." In his next breath he promised the American farmer that "the Democratic Party will do everything in its power to put back into his pocket all that belongs there." To this he added: "And we further say that nothing will be done that will embarrass or interfere in any way with the legitimate progress of business big or small." He obviously does not dream that all of this is absolute party treason. He does not suspect that thereby he takes his party squarely over into the Republican camp, not only by forgetting—if he ever knew it—Cleveland's historic demand for a "tariff for revenue only," but also because he accepts the Republican doctrine that it is the Government which is responsible by its acts for the prosperity of the individual. Against nothing else in its history has the Democracy stood more firmly than against benevolent government paternalism. At least someone should have tipped off the wearer of the brown derby to the fact that the tariff, since it is essentially a caste system, is in its very nature and origin a special privilege bestowed by the Government upon certain favored classes who for various reasons cannot make any money, or as much money as they would like to make. It is, therefore, absolutely inimical to the doctrine of a square deal to all and no favors to any man. But what Governor Smith does not know about the tariff would fill volumes.

As for Herbert Hoover, it is a curious fact that he, too, cannot see the complete contradiction in his demand that the Government be kept out of private business and his insistence upon more and higher tariffs. What does the Government do when it, through Congress, votes a tariff schedule? Why, it goes into partnership with each business man for whose benefit it checks or destroys free competition from abroad, thus artificially limiting the supply of goods available for our use. Henry Ford has opposed a tariff on American automobiles because he saw that it created waste and extravagance in business. But Herbert Hoover, the apostle of efficiency in business, is for it at all costs.

Let us take a specific example: the woolen and cotton industries in New England. They are down and out, Mr. Hoover suggests in his Boston speech. Here is what he says about it:

No tariff act is perfect. With the shifting of economic tides some items may be higher than necessary, but undoubtedly some are too low. This is particularly true so far as New England is concerned.

New England has many protected industries. One important branch of them, the cotton and wool industries, have not for the past few years been in a satisfactory condition. They comprise about 26 per cent of New England's industrial life. Their depressed condition has not been peculiar to New England. The same situation has prevailed throughout the world and is due largely to the same factors, style changes, production in new areas, and decided changes in the trends of consumption.

There has been less hardship in the United States than abroad, and that fact has been due to the partial protection afforded in the tariff against inundations of foreign goods.

Now, the existing cotton and wool tariffs were written by the Massachusetts protected industries themselves. They boasted of it. At last, they said, they had received just what they wanted. But Mr. Hoover suggests that their serious prostration is due to lack of still higher tariffs—although he also suggests the other reasons. May we assume that it was due to “the shifting economic tides”? Partially, in so far as styles have changed—your zealous protectionist has not yet forbidden by law the changing of styles—but I don't see why he should shrink from it to fill the dinner-pail. Still, Mr. Hoover explains that Massachusetts has suffered less than have other countries from style changes, thanks to the blessings of the tariff. Next, he suddenly admits that “both the world situation and the domestic are improving.” How can that be if others have no tariff and we have ours? More than that, there are, he says, “omens of much broader significance which sustain me in my beliefs.” Here the omens are in his words:

As never before in the industry there is demonstrated a will to pool its best brain-resources in the solution of present and future problems in order that there shall be mutuality of benefit to manufacturer, worker, and consumer. Elimination of waste in production and distribution are [!] in progress. Security and steady employment are more assured than for a long time past.

How is this? We had thought that it was the tariff which did it all. The industry has always said so, and Mr. Hoover has just declared that it was the fact that the tariffs were so low which made the mischief. Now he says that better brain work, cooperation, elimination of waste in production and distribution are of very considerable value and that, in consequence of these things and not because of the magic of the tariff, “security and steady employment” are in sight. He carefully forgets to add that the New Bedford workers have been driven back to work with a 5 per cent wage reduction.

It is Southern competition, not foreign competition, that is shutting up the New England mills, and Mr. Hoover knows it. It is Southern low rates of wages, Southern low standards of living, Southern night work, combined with Southern natural advantages, that have worked havoc in New York and New England. Under the self-same New England-written tariff that has seen New England mill gates closing, Southern textile manufacture has gone on from strength to strength. Yet Mr. Hoover believes that the New England industry, if modernized by cooperation, by better brain work and machinery, and by the elimination of waste, can overcome this deadly, uncontrolled, and uncontrollable Southern competition. If he is right, what has become of the Great God Tariff, from whom all blessings flow? Logically, of course, he ought to insist that New England be given a tariff against Mason and Dixon's land.

Of course, nobody thinks of such a thing. Everybody knows that if the New England woolen and cotton industries cannot compete with the South they will go under precisely as the iron industry of New England has yielded to that of the Middle West, and the farmers of the East have given up trying to compete with the large-scale farming of the West. Mr. Hoover declares that “the American protective tariff is the only good insurance to our 600,000 families who earn their livelihood in the cotton and wool manufacturing industries. . . .” Nonsense! Nothing can insure their livelihood, and certainly the tariff is not doing it today; for New England operatives walk the streets while the spindles hum in Southern mills. And suppose a new process or product should come in? Rayon has just put many silk factories out of business. What did the tariff do there? It could not protect them against an economic readjustment. All efforts to keep alive by subsidy an industry that cannot stand on its own feet are wasteful, and economically uncalled for.

What, I hear people say, you would calmly let a great industry with its huge capital investment and 600,000 families go down? Kind friends, it happens every day—these incidents of the “shifting economic tides.” Were there not more than 600,000 families put out of business when the automobile arrived? Where are the livery-stable keepers, most of the harness-makers, and the blacksmiths, where are many of the dealers in fodder and grains? They have turned to other jobs, not without suffering and loss of capital. That is unavoidable as long as the world is economically constituted as it is. Any new invention, any new device, may work havoc any day. If the cotton and woolen industries of New England have sunk so low that they can survive only by reducing wages to an unbearably low standard, they ought to die, and their place ought to be taken by others that will utilize the peculiar advantages that New England has today by comparison with other sections of the country. But it remains to be proved that the New England textile industry cannot be saved in the face of Southern competition by the right application of brains and enterprise, just as the textile industry of Old England has maintained itself for a hundred years in the face of the growing competition of other countries. Mr. Hoover knows this as well as anybody else, and his invocation of the tariff god is little better than a deliberate distraction of attention from the only thing that can possibly insure the future of New England's textile industry, or indeed of New England industry in general. New England has weathered many a storm, but it has done so by using its brains, its ingenuity, its courage, and its hard work, not by beseeching the federal government to call off the hurricane.

Let us take one more example of the utterly specious and misleading arguments which Mr. Hoover has advanced as to the tariff. He brings out the hoary old statement that "65 per cent of our $4,185,000,000 of annual imports are admitted free of duty because they are raw materials, tropical products, and other articles which we do not ourselves produce." This argument is one of those half-truths which are worse than a downright misstatement. It does not in the least justify the inference which Mr. Hoover would have his hearers draw from it, that the tariff is really quite reasonable, and that foreigners have no ground for complaint. As a matter of fact, the tariff would not be liberal if it shut out all the present taxed imports by duties of 1000 per cent so that all our imports would come in tax free. Why should we tell the Europeans that 65 per cent of our imports come in free of duty when most of these free goods are the product of Japan, China, the Argentine, British India, the Malays, Egypt, while the agricultural and industrial products of Europe are taxed at prohibitive rates, at times as high as 500 per cent ad valorem? Mr. Hoover's argument here is pretense and humbug, and so is his extraordinary discovery that our tariff is not decreasing the ability of foreign countries to pay their debts to the United States. He confesses that if we still had "direct barter of goods between nations" this would be a "sound" argument. But he devises the extraordinary explanation that our trade has become "polyangular," that it is not barter! How can a man who pretends to be an expert in trade and worthy to be President of the United States show himself so utterly ignorant of the history of trade? Polyangular trade has been with us since we began to have overseas commerce. Were Mr. Hoover to study the history of our clipper-ship era, for instance, for only five minutes he would discover how they took American goods or food stuffs to England, carried British manufactured goods to China or India, and then returned to America with a full cargo from their Asiatic port. Does Mr. Hoover pretend that this was not polyangular?

The solemn spectacle of these two Presidential candidates making fools of themselves on the tariff in the hope of catching votes is enough to make an intelligent American blush when he gets over laughing. Fortunately forces are already powerfully at work which in due time will make it impossible for public men to live by such nonsense. Meanwhile honest men can at least stand up unterrified for the truths understood by every economist since the days of Adam Smith, truths which every competent student today testifies are more important than ever before in history to the establishment of the peace and prosperity of the world.

England's Industrial Outlook

By JOHN A. HOBSON

London, October 10

FOREIGN visitors in England are struck by the contrast between the apparent prosperity as attested by the lavish expenditure of all classes upon comforts, luxuries, and amusements, and the discouraging reports of manufactures and commerce issuing from trade and official sources. How is it possible for a people carrying a dead weight of a million and a quarter unemployed workers over a period of some five years to indulge in such expensive ways of life? It is not as if we lay in the trough of an ordinary trade depression from which we had reasonable expectations of an early emergence. The pretense that we are on the highway to full economic recovery on a pre-war level, put forward by optimistic politicians and business men from time to time, is now abandoned by almost all our prophets. The adverse trade balance of 1926 and the poor recovery of last year was, of course, imputed largely to the deflation of prices subsequent to our return to the gold standard in 1925, and the effects of the general strike in 1926. But our continued debility, after the worst effects of these events have passed away, is a source of deep discouragement. Our burden of unemployed is nearly a quarter of a million heavier than a year ago, and the trade still done in many staple industries is unprofitable, and shows no signs of early improvement. Moreover, the industries thus languishing are those great staple metal and textile industries which were throughout our manufacturing career our chief source of strength for purposes of foreign trade and home employment, together with coal mining, the basis of our whole machine industry. Nearly one-half of the unemployment in the recent returns is attributed to coal, engineering, shipbuilding, iron and steel, while cotton and wool and pottery figure heavily in the account. Though prices and wages are lower in these competitive export trades than in the "sheltered" occupations that cater for a purely national market, they do not enable us to maintain the profitable and expansive markets which we held up to 1921.

The disastrous situation in the coal fields, where the surplus labor never to be reabsorbed amounts to a quarter of a million men, only presents in an exaggerated form the wider problem that confronts us, a great maldistribution of labor forces, due partly to temporary war and post-war requirements, partly to the new distribution of production and of markets throughout the industrial world accelerated by post-war policies. The truth is, of course, that even before the war Britain's supremacy, so long held in the world markets for textile and metal goods, was being successfully challenged by Germany, the United States, and in Asia by Japan. Our backwardness in the development of electric energy for industry, and the growing use of oil for transport and for industrial fuel, together with the working out of many of our best and most available coal seams, were contributing to weaken our position in the heavy industries. Nevertheless, if a good peace had been made, with economic sanity in its wake, the rapid resumption and normal expansion of trade relations would have let us down much more slowly. But the bad finances and the burst of protectionism in almost all industrial countries reacted injuriously on our foreign markets. Many of the countries which formerly purchased our metals and textiles have set up for themselves, intrenched behind high tariff walls. It is not so much that other exporting countries are outcompeting us, though in some branches of trade this is the case. The important fact is that foreign trade in the aggregate has not shown any adequate expansion. The proportion of British exports to world exports remains about where it was in 1913, that is to say about 13 or 14 per cent. But the values of this export trade have not increased commensurately with the rise in wholesale prices, so that it must be concluded that there is some shrinkage in the physical volume of this trade.

But leaving foreign trade for the moment and turning to the true index of economic success, the physical volume of our material production, this past year shows no appreciable change. Though the current volume stands at a somewhat higher figure than in recent years, it has not kept full pace with the rise of population. It is still true, as Professor Pigou's "Memorandum" of a year ago indicated, that there is a slight fall of real income per head of the population, as compared with 1913. What then of the "prosperity" which, as I said, was so apparent to the foreign visitor? Can it be real? In a sense, yes. There are a number of new trades in which large incomes have been made, and some established trades that have shown profitable expansion. Among the former the most conspicuous are the electrical trades, motor cars, artificial silk, and chemicals, among the latter the drink trade and tobacco, in spite of the high taxation which should, but does not, deter their consumption. The national expenditure upon alcoholic drinks about keeps pace with the enlargement of the money income, though so large a part of the price is absorbed by the public revenue that the annual consumption of alcohol per head is appreciably reduced. The tobacco trade flourishes exceedingly, enlarged by the new demand from women smokers, and the wasteful substitution of cigarettes for pipes.

Important changes have been taking place in the distribution of the national income. On the whole, they have been favorable to labor. It is generally admitted that there has been a small increase in average real earnings, in spite of the decline in income per head of the population. This gain has virtually been absorbed by women workers (more numerous and better paid) and by wage-rises of unskilled labor. The majority of skilled workers are probably receiving about the same real wages as in 1913. Moreover, it must not be forgotten that a general reduction of working hours has taken place, in spite of the unwillingness of our Government to commit itself to the international convention. Add to this that a large portion of the working-class income is derived from war pensions, old-age pensions, unemployed benefits, and poor-law allowances.

Finally, there is a marked advance in the profits of distributive trade, especially in its retail branch. This is registered in the expanded margin between wholesale and retail prices which war conditions brought about. When wholesale prices fell substantially, as they did after the collapse of the post-war boom, retailers did not lower their prices proportionately. Partly by local agreements, partly because they were aware that most consumers had got accustomed to high prices and did not know better, the ordinary shopkeeper kept up his prices or lowered them slowly, with the result that in recent years he has been making profits far exceeding the pre-war limits. In many of the food shops and drapery stores quite considerable fortunes have been made. Official investigators into the retail cost of certain foods and coal have been baffled by the secrecy and intricacy of the bookkeeping; but no doubts exist that the retail bourgeoisie all over the country has been doing very well.

This apparent prosperity is witness of this less in a measure to the fact that out of a national real income not appreciably greater than in 1913 a smaller proportion is saved, i.e., put into new capital goods. The two chief changes in distribution of the national income, viz., the larger share taken by the state for public services and pensions, and the increased share going to the wage-earners, reduce the rate of saving and proportionately increase the rate of spending. For the great bulk of the saving is normally achieved by businesses placing undistributed profits to reserves, and by well-to-do individuals investing their surplus incomes. Both these sources are now curtailed and their losses are certainly not compensated by any large increases of working-class savings. Whether this reduced rate of saving is detrimental to the recovery of British industry depends upon the view taken as to the relation between spending and saving. Holding, as I do, that the normal tendency in Britain has been toward over-saving (i.e., an attempt to increase capital at a faster rate than the demand for fresh commodities requires), I cannot regard as evil a change in distribution which at once enlarges state expenditure and working-class expenditure, though involving a diminished rate of national saving. There is no ground for believing that our depressed trades are suffering from any want of capital. Unemployed labor is confronted by unemployed machinery and plant, and working capital is obtainable in reasonable sums for any of these businesses which can show there is a profitable sale for the goods which their unemployed capital and labor could produce. Some of our economists, among them Mr. Keynes, appear to hold that we are investing too much of our annual savings abroad, too little at home, and would like to see some restrictions upon foreign investments. Now, though there is no doubt a great deal of social waste in unregulated capitalism, this evil is even more prevalent in home investments than in foreign. Would it be a good thing for us to stop the flow of British capital into the development of Argentina or of Russia, in order to stimulate further expansion of the cinema trade or greyhound courses? There is a strong trend of public opinion in England favorable to some public control over the flow of new productive capital, which finds interesting expression in the recently published Liberal Industrial Report. But that control should not force new capital into home employments irrespective of the claims of foreign fields of investment. Such a policy would be fatal to a country which in the future, as in the past, is dependent for her main supplies of foods and raw materials upon other countries, many of them requiring foreign capital for their development and exploitation. It is perhaps reasonable to expect that, if a distribution of income favorable to the workers should be obtained, by a union of public policy and trade-union action, the demands for home consumption will so expand as to require a larger proportion of our new capital for home industries. But it will continue to be advantageous for us to do our share in developing those backward countries upon which we depend. None of the schemes for stimulating British agriculture can go far toward diminishing our reliance upon foreign foods. Nor is it likely that emigration on Empire lines or otherwise can dispose of any considerable part of what appears to be our surplus population. Though birth control is operating on our population so as to bring it to a standstill at no distant time, we must remain a country dependent for vital needs upon the large purchase of foreign goods. This brings us back to the essential problem, "Can we continue to pay our way in the world, so as to maintain our large population upon the higher level which civilization demands?" Our net excess of imports of goods and bullion over exports last year was £392,000,000 and cannot be put lower for the current year. How, then, did we pay our way last year and add to our capital account abroad a sum estimated at £96,000,000? The £488,000,000 required for this operation are thus accounted for:

Estimated net income from overseas investments .....	£270,000,000
Estimated net national shipping income.....	140,000,000
Estimated receipts from short interest and commissions .....	63,000,000
From other sources.....	15,000,000
	£488,000,000

Assuming that no fresh cataclysm of war or revolution breaks upon the world, our widespread investments should not fail us. More precarious perhaps are our important contributions from shipping and banking. For the rising mercantile marine of America and other countries may contest and diminish our supremacy in the carrying trade, while any large loss in our carrying trade would also bring a shrinkage in our banking receipts and other commissions. It is, therefore, no wonder that foresighted business men and politicians are concerned at the huge and growing gap between our imports and exports of goods. If we are to live safely in the future, we must, they urge, increase our export trade or reduce our import trade, or do both. And just here we enter several fields of bitter controversy.

If we are to retain and expand our foreign markets in the heavy industries and textiles, we must reduce our cost of production to the lower level of our foreign competitors, and the simplest and most effective way of doing this is to cut wages. So we find great ironmasters, like Sir Hugh Bell, supported by academic economists, urging the immediate reduction of wages in those sheltered trades, such as railways and the public services, where real wages have risen considerably above the pre-war level. These wage reductions, lowering the costs of transport and relieving taxation, would, they argue, enable the unsheltered trades to bring down their costs with comparatively small wage-cuts to a level enabling them to retain their home markets and to compete for foreign markets on equal terms with continental rivals. The advocates of this policy usually express regret for wage reduction but assert its necessity as a condition of trade survival and progress. We cannot otherwise, they say, compete with the lower costs of Germany or Belgium, or the mass production of great protected countries like America. British trade unionism is, of course, up in arms against this proposal, denying that wage-cuts are the right methods of reducing costs. Other more intelligent labor leaders recognize that lower costs are needed, but insist that they should be obtained by better organization and improved technique. Socialists argue that the needed "rationalization" and economics of salesmanship can only be effected safely by public ownership and administration. But many of them are ready to admit that such sudden wholesale socialization is impracticable, and they are prepared for an interim policy of cooperation with employers.

But a real advance along this line of cooperation and rationalization necessarily means standardization, regulation of output and of prices by suspension of competition within each trade. What security is there that strong trades, in command of some key position, will not blackmail weaker trades by high charges or take it out of the ultimate consumer? In a word, are we in for an era of large uncontrolled cartels, each taking out of the total pool of wealth what its own strength enables it to get, and distributing it in high profits and high wages to its own capitalists and workers? This would be in effect the substitution of another sort of industrial war for the present class war. It would not be industrial peace. This seems so obvious that even so cautious a body of men as that which undertook the recent Liberal Industrial Inquiry found it necessary to back their plan for rationalization and cartellization by some shadowy schemes of public control.

But the difficulties of the situation are well illustrated by the failure of the attempt to get the depressed spinning trade of Lancashire to enter an effective combination. Individualism and secrecy are so deeply set in our industrial traditions that it is difficult to expel them, even when plain necessity seems to dictate this course. This difficulty is linked with a slowness to appreciate the importance of scientific research and financial reconstruction upon modern lines, on the part of our older business men.

This brings me to my final point. The conservative business man sees only one way of salvation in our present predicament, that is a protective tariff. He calls it "safeguarding" because he gibes at a plain challenge to our free-trade policy. Primarily he desires to keep out foreign goods of his particular kind from the British market. But, as he recognizes that other trades have other markets to safeguard, as a politician he favors a general tariff, at any rate for manufactured and semi-manufactured goods. The remnants of our war-tariff, with the McKenna safeguarding duties, gradually extended over a large number of minor articles furnish an effective "thin end of the wedge," with which full-fledged protectionists hope to destroy free trade. The experience of several general elections during the past twenty-five years has made them shy of entering another avowed battle against free trade. And yet an extension of safeguarding to so fundamental an industry as iron and steel could not fail to raise once more the whole issue. It is probable that no clear authoritative lead will be given, but that each conservative candidate in the critical elections of next June will be free to place safeguarding in the forefront of his appeal. The real struggle is between the creative forces of science and industry, reorganizing British industry along lines of higher efficiency with a more equitable distribution of the fruits of industry, and a belated and calamitous attempt to buttress up obsolete and obsolescent trade methods by the costly artifice of tariffs.

Free and Fair Elections

By SCOTT NEARING

COAL miners, steel-mill workers, smelter workers, railroad workers make up the bulk of the population in northern West Virginia. Many of these workers are foreigners. Most of them are unorganized. The Workers (Communist) Party is on the ballot in West Virginia. It therefore has the same status as any other political party in this campaign. The party has been making an intensive drive in and about Wheeling. Its campaign slogans have been: Organize the unorganized; the six-hour day; the five-day week; unemployment insurance, and other like demands. It has made its appeal directly to the workers by distributing leaflets at the factory gates and by house to house distributions of literature in the working-class neighborhoods. A political rally has been announced for each night.

The police of the Wheeling district have met this campaign of the Workers (Communist) Party as follows:

1. On Tuesday, October 2, a hall was engaged at Woodward, a small coal town near Wheeling. An hour before the meeting was scheduled to begin the police called upon the hall-owner, told him that no meeting would be allowed, and threatened to arrest him and anyone that attended the meeting if he opened the hall. The hall-owner refused to open the hall, and the meeting was not held.

2. On Wednesday, October 3, a hall was engaged at Elm Grove, another small industrial town in the Wheeling district. The police repeated the same tactics. The hall-owner, in this latter case, however, under threat of suit for breach of contract, opened the hall. The chairman rose to begin the meeting. He was arrested before he had spoken two sentences. The other speaker then rose. He was also arrested after he had said, "Comrades and fellow-workers." Both speakers were taken to the Wheeling city jail, charged with disorderly conduct, and held in $50 bail for court.

3. The main election rally had been scheduled for Friday evening, October 5, in a large Wheeling hall. On Friday morning announcements of the meeting were distributed at the mill gates and the mine entrances all over Wheeling. When meeting-time came there were about 300 persons in the hall; the lobby was crowded and the streets were lined with people who did not care to go into the hall, which had been in the possession of the police since 7:30 p. m. The chairman rose at eight o'clock:

"Comrades and fellow-workers: This meeting is held under the auspices of the Workers (Communist) Party. The party is a legal party in the State of West Virginia . . ."

Two policemen seized him and led him away.

The next speaker got to his feet:

"Comrades and fellow-workers . . ."

He was seized by two policemen, dragged across a chair, and taken off the stage.

The third speaker repeated the performance after a policeman had turned to him and said, "Your turn next." The three were taken to the police station, charged with disorderly conduct, and held in $50 bail.

All three meetings were announced as political rallies. There was not the slightest sign of disorder at any of them. The only roughness was that of the police at the third meeting, when they were arresting the speakers.

Speakers for the Workers (Communist) Party went to Cannonsburg, Pennsylvania, on Wednesday, October 10. A meeting had been announced for that night in the Labor Temple to discuss the issues of the Presidential campaign. The speakers reached Cannonsburg from Pittsburgh at about seven o'clock, and went directly to the Labor Temple. A fair-sized crowd had collected. It looked like a good meeting. But there were no women in the audience. That was ominous. The reason for their absence was explained by the local committee. There had been rumors all day that the State Troopers would break up the meeting.

Shortly after the speakers reached the Labor Temple a report was brought in that the troopers were mobilizing. Ten minutes later came the news that they were on their way to the hall. Meanwhile the chairman of the meeting (who had come down from Pittsburgh) was announcing some literature. He was in the midst of his talk when the troopers entered. There were twelve of them. They carried long riot sticks, tear bombs, rifles, revolvers. They wore their helmets into the hall and lined themselves against the wall on one side of the room. There they stood, throughout the meeting, smoking, talking, their helmets on their heads. The miners stood the ordeal well. When it was understood that the troopers were coming a committee was called together and word was passed around that there should be no disturbance. From the time the troopers entered the hall the audience let them severely alone and listened to the talks of the speakers. A court stenographer, brought in at the instance of the District Attorney of Washington County, sat in the front of the room, taking a stenographic record of everything that was said. Any local man opened his mouth at his peril. The meeting went on for about two hours. The troopers were restless at times, walking about and talking together. One of them dropped his club noisily. The miners were stolidly attentive.

At length the principal speech was over. The chairman took a collection and then called for questions and discussion. One of the troopers stepped forward.

"Is this a public meeting?" he demanded.

He was told that it was.

"Where is your American flag?" There was none.

"Under the Act of 1920, the speakers at this meeting and every person in this audience is liable to arrest for holding a meeting without a flag," he announced.

An effort was made to find a flag. The caretaker of the building had locked the flag in a locker and gone off.

"All right," said the trooper spokesman; "that settles it. This meeting is over." There was some protest.

"I said," the trooper repeated, "this meeting is over, and that's all there is to it." He motioned to his men, who came to the front of the hall. "Now file down those stairs and get out of here," he ordered.

The twelve armed troopers moved threateningly toward the crowd. There was a brief moment of hesitation. Then the crowd dissolved and went off down the stairs. The speakers were held; their names and addresses were taken, and they were lectured on the importance of having an American flag at all public meetings. One of the troopers, then turned to the leader of the troop:

"Do you want to hold them?"

The leader made a negative sign, and the speakers were permitted to go from the hall. The miners were still standing in knots down in the street. On an order from the troopers they slowly dispersed.

In the Driftway

IT seems to the Drifter as if there must be others who, like him, find themselves baffled by the treatment of a "big story" in the metropolitan newspapers. When something of unusual current news interest occurs it has become the fashion to devote not several columns to it, as once, but several pages. Yet these "big stories" are rarely of permanent consequence. They are the sensations of a moment, commonly forgotten within a month, and worth not more than five to fifteen minutes of the half hour that the average busy person has for his newspaper. What can such a person garner in five minutes out of several pages? So little that the Drifter has practically ceased to read at all these "big stories." He glances at some of the headlines and, if there are any specific details about which he is curious, asks some friend who seems to have had the time and the zeal to wade through the morass.

* * * * *

THE Drifter has in mind at the moment the treatment of the arrival of the Graf Zeppelin by the press of New York City. With the exception of three columns on the first page and the usual amount of advertising inside, the Times gave up the first nine of its pages to reading matter and pictures of the dirigible. Of reading matter alone there must have been close to 35,000 words. Now the Drifter is an experienced newspaper reader, and has a more serious interest in airships than the average person, but he admits he gave up in the face of this barrage of words. He skimmed a few headlines and let the rest go until he could find it in more compact and convenient form somewhere else. What the Drifter would like to have found in his newspaper of that morning was a plain factual account of 500 to 1,000 words, without effort at word-painting or effect, of the important features of the Graf Zeppelin's trip. He would have been glad to have this accompanied by a few columns devoted to special aspects which he could glance at or skip according to the headlines. But somewhere, preferably under the big head on the first page, he wanted a short, simple statement of the most salient points. He didn't look at all the newspapers, but from sorry experience he is convinced that none of them had it. Instead they carried leading stories on the front page which began: "Out of the gray mist blown in from the tumultuous Atlantic, a great gray shape appeared over New York's downtown roofs yesterday afternoon"; or: "Weary and disabled after its heroic fight with fierce transatlantic gales, the giant airship Graf Zeppelin pushed its blunt nose into view over New York harbor yesterday afternoon, and after circling the city came to rest like a tired bird at Lakehurst." And so on for several hundred words.

* * * * *

YES, the Drifter surmises that not alone for him, but for many others the "big story" is overplayed by the modern metropolitan newspaper. It's hard to see what any of us are going to do about it, though, for the development has the strength of a trade practice which hardly any journal would dare defy by itself, for fear that it would be thought unenterprising and out of step. But what a ridiculous riot of paper and ink it is!

Our Readers and the Campaign

From The Nation's post card poll we take the following comments:

For Thomas

A vote for principles. If all progressives would do the same, we'd win!

I am not a Socialist, but think a new, constructive party is needed.

Thomas stands for the things The Nation approves. Why does not The Nation stand for Thomas?

No use to vote for something I do not want when Big Biz has no choice between Al and Herbie.

Smith will carry Milwaukee County and possibly the State because of the progressive aid, but the only party having real principles is the Socialist as I see it.

How can any intelligent person vote any other way? There is no difference in the two old parties. Hoover and Smith are tarred with the same stick and a vote for either one means an indorsement of things as they are.

I am inclosing my vote in an envelope. I am a small-town school-teacher, and even such a socialistic tendency as I am expressing on the inclosed card would prove disastrous to my future. [North Dakota.]

For Smith

Used to vote Republican but Teapot got too large.

Normally we should vote for Thomas; the Hoover menace is too great and too real to take chances.

One vote for Smith—but I am the only "black sheep" in the clan!! Everyone else is for Hoover. They read the Philadelphia Public Ledger.

I organized the first Socialist local in this State but the party has degenerated.

As the lesser of two evils and not with the slightest conviction that I am saving my country.

From all indications Smith will carry Wisconsin by 100,000 majority.

Because he has a pleasant face. Not believing that any of the other candidates except Hoover and Smith have any chance at all I vote for Smith, as Hoover is but a fatter Coolidge and I hate to see the latter in the Newsreel.

Normally it should have been Thomas, but to help defeat Hoover I must vote Smith.

Merely to combat our dangerous bigotry. I should like to see a Mohammedan elected next in 1932.

As I hold a political job under a Republican administration I am red hot for Hoover, but when I vote it will be for Smith—and there are others.

It appears that Al will carry North Dakota, a Republican State, by 10,000 majority.

And I'm a Stanford graduate at that! What heresy!

Am registered as a Republican! Am also a "Dry"! Also Protestant! Voting for Smith strictly on his record of achievement in New York.

I favor Thomas's platform, know it is impossible of achievement, and have a pious wish that Smith may further some progressive principles in spite of his company.

This Smith vote is simply a "swat" for the thoroughly detestable Hoover.

For Hoover

Although a lifelong Democrat in principle, I am voting for Hoover as a protest against the reign of the King of the South—the Negro. He dominates our thoughts, our actions, our lives. He is the background against which our lives are lived.

My vote is a counsel of despair. It is not as a liberal that I am to vote for Hoover, but as an owner of California real estate which I wish to sell. The longer Hoover "candidates" the less I like him, so I hope November 6 will come quickly.

Hate to give him my vote, but fear the Catholic menace!

Am a Nonpartisan Leaguer, too, but I can't see a Wet Tammany. I believe, also, Hoover will attempt farm problem solution.

Here are 257 votes from the State of Idaho for Hoover from faculty and voting students.

I am disgusted with the bigotry issue manufactured by the Smith forces and being capitalized by them.

He will get an overwhelming majority in this State (Washington).

I would vote for Smith except for his liquor record and attitude.

Because of Great Lakes-Waterway and harmful possibilities to free speech from Catholic appointees of Smith.

Others

Have admired Smith's acceptance speech as well as later speeches, but think our President should possess more dignity and reserve than Smith has shown, and then his terrible New York dialect and expressions.

My vote for Will Rogers or Thomas. Here's another group I'd like to vote for: Clarence Darrow, Ben Lindsey, Arthur Garfield Hays, and the Editor of The Nation. From the State of Despair (New York).

Will Rogers. Being in Pennsylvania a vote for Thomas would not be counted anyway.

Mississippi Speaks

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: If you want to know what one part of the South thinks about Herbert Hoover read this editorial from the Jackson, Mississippi, Daily News:

We are for the Democratic nominee for President because God meant Mississippi to be a white man's State, and it can be kept a white man's State only by the Democratic Party.

Since 1860 the Republican Party has catered to the Negro, endeavored to give him social and political equality in the South, and only the courage and resourcefulness of the Anglo-Saxon race have prevented the Republican Party from doing so. If Calvin Coolidge, Andrew Mellon, Herbert Hoover, and other Republican leaders had their way about it, the South would today be under the domination of Negro politicians. That's why we have no patience with and mighty little respect for any Southern white man who is today giving aid and encouragement to the Republican Party.

Smith and Birth Control

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Politics make strange bedfellows. Surely there have been none stranger than the liberals, the "progressives," the champions of freedom who are supporting Governor Smith because of his stand on prohibition. Verily they are straining at a gnat and swallowing a camel. In all tolerance and in all respect, to brush aside the religious aspect of this campaign is to remain stupidly satisfied with a superficial tolerance, and to ignore its profounder and most interesting aspects. "As a man thinketh, so is he. . . ." No one, surely, would say that Governor Smith, if elected, would act in a manner disloyal to the great church in which he was born and brought up. He cannot go against its edict.

Father P. J. Ward, of the National Catholic Welfare Council of Washington, D. C., has defined the attitude of the Catholic church concerning the morals and habits of non-Catholics: "It is her duty to interfere and block all legislation that will adversely affect the morals of non-Catholics as well as Catholics because she feels that these are her children, though they have been led astray by error. The Catholic church never loses the hope that non-Catholics will be some day counted in the fold. Therefore, it is necessary to supervise all social and moral legislation."

The same authority has assured us that the Catholic church is opposed to birth control because it interferes with the plan of God, "who intends that people who marry may do so for the purpose of procreation or may live in each other's love in strict continence, like brother and sister. Marriage without the desire and responsibility of parenthood, or not lived in strict continence, is immoral and sinful." Such is the attitude of the National Catholic Welfare Council concerning birth control. Would Governor Smith dare or care to oppose its mandates in wielding a powerful opposition in any legislation involving the conscious control of procreative faculties aiming toward racial health or toward the improvement of child life and the decreasing of infantile and maternal mortality rates? No. His mind, admirable as it may be, is oriented in the direction of his church. It is attuned to the closed world of preordained Catholic morality, which refuses to recognize that one man's virtue may be another's sin, or that in the realm of ethics the last word has not yet been uttered.

The question is not merely one of Governor Smith's liberality or open-mindedness. It is of powerful institutional forces, which will inevitably and with quiet power unconsciously direct his activity. Let us not forget the career of John Purroy Mitchel. The frying-pan of prohibition may be uncomfortable; but shall we, on that account, cast away the precious freedom of our hard-earned "ethics of the dust" for a closed world of an alien and imprisoning morality?

MARGARET SANGER

Disgusted

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: To recommend to the liberals to vote for a candidate because he is an "engaging and winning personality" is quite as insipid as to advise a sick person to engage a doctor because of blond or black hair. The other week the otherwise splendid Heywood Broun made the statement that this is the first time that both old parties are so unlike; now, what can one say to that? Is it possible that the mirage of an oasis in the "Dry Sahara" has led his otherwise firm pen into an historical perversion? Did Wall Street ever divide its support so nearly evenly as in this coming election?

Who Is Responsible?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In our car, temporarily parked in front of our home in a residential section of this city, was found a pink card with no identification mark except the union label of the Allied Printing Trades Council of Indianapolis. The text follows:

ALCOHOL SMITH'S PLATFORM

Alcohol Al for President,
I stand for whiskey and bad government;
My platform is wet and I am too,
And I get my votes from Catholic and Jew.

The ignorant wop and the gangster too,
Are the trash I expect to carry me through,
And when I land in the White House chair
They can all be damned, for all I care.

I'll rule the people and the Pope rules me,
And the people's rights you will never see,
And the Protestant heretics who vote for me
I'll reduce to abject slavery.

Indianapolis, Indiana, September 24

The Catholic Defense

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The opposition to Smith in the South may be rated at 10 per cent prohibition, 10 per cent "Tammany," and 80 per cent religion. In my family we are all Catholics and we have lived here forty years. We are now maintaining a dignified silence except when necessary for our own defense. Straton helped Smith. His words were so bitter the press would not print them. To combat prejudice we are using the following circular:

CATHOLICS DO NOT BELIEVE

That the Pope is God.
That the Pope can do no wrong.
That the Pope has temporal rights in America.
That the Pope can claim their political allegiance.
That the Pope can nullify laws, oaths, or contracts at will.

THEY DO NOT BELIEVE

That the marriages of Protestants are invalid.
That married Protestants are living in sin.
That the children of Protestants are illegitimate.
That contracts with Protestants may be broken.
That Protestants may be hated or persecuted.
That Protestants will all be damned.

THEY DO NOT BELIEVE

That public schools are an evil.
That they ought to be abolished or destroyed.
That they ought not to be supported by taxes.
That education ought not to be universal and free.
That it ought not to be compulsory where necessary.

THEY DO NOT BELIEVE

That they can buy forgiveness of sin.
That they can purchase freedom from Purgatory.
That they can get indulgence to commit sin.
That sin can be forgiven without repentance.

THEY DO NOT BELIEVE

That images may be worshiped.
That any body or thing may be worshiped or adored "in the heavens above, or the earth below, or the waters beneath the earth" but the one true God.

Anna Maria, Florida, October 11

The Great Issue

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Today Democrats and Republicans alike favor a protective tariff, the present economic system, competition in armaments, protection for war and the outlawry of war, collection of war indemnities and war debts, farm relief, reduction of taxes, good and honest government, and the so-called Monroe Doctrine. It is, indeed, maintained that there are two issues between them, viz.: Whether a Roman Catholic should be elected to the Presidency and whether the Eighteenth Amendment and the Volstead Act should be repealed or modified. But neither of these is even referred to in their platforms. Officially both are in favor of Article VI of the Constitution, which declares that "no religious test shall ever be required as a qualification to any office of public trust under the United States" and of the Eighteenth Amendment, which prohibits the manufacture, sale, and transportation of intoxicating liquors, and both pledge themselves to enforcement of the Volstead Act. Millions of Republicans would vote against a repeal or modification of Article VI, and millions of Democrats would vote against a repeal or modification of the Eighteenth Amendment, if they had a chance. There is no party alignment on either of these questions, and neither will be settled by the election of Mr. Hoover or Mr. Smith.

Mr. Hoover seems to approve of the Eighteenth Amendment and the Volstead Act as "a noble experiment." If he is elected, his enforcement policy is not likely to differ from that of his predecessors, which appears to have given no satisfaction to any party and pushed into the background more vital concerns. Mr. Smith seems to disapprove of the Eighteenth Amendment and the Volstead Act, and privately promises to recommend to Congress legislation defining what is meant by intoxicating liquor and submitting to the State legislatures the question of permissible alcoholic content. If he is elected, his enforcement policy, so far as the government is concerned, is likely to be a repetition of that followed by his predecessors, with more agitation of the public mind, and without any definite change of policy. In neither case will the will of the majority be ascertained, in neither case will there be a hearty cooperation in carrying out a well-considered and generally accepted plan for reducing a recognized evil.

What is significant in the present situation is the growing realization of the need of a more direct and effective expression of the will of the people. The terrible and humiliating experience of the World War and its aftermath has focused the attention of thoughtful men and women everywhere upon this need. Citizens want an opportunity of voting directly on questions that vitally concern their life and welfare. They desire to have a more effective control of their national and international policies. Where the representative system, so indispensable in a democracy, has been supplemented by the plebiscite, as in Norway and Sweden, it has made for progress, liberty, responsibility, and contentment.

With us, the vote in the electoral college rarely, if ever, indicates what the will of the majority is as regards any particular issue. Hence the overweening interest in the personalities of the candidates, their private opinions, friendships, domestic affairs, and social graces. This tendency is accentuated by the large constitutional authority and the vaguely defined discretionary power of the Presidency. Millions voted in 1916 for Mr. Wilson because he had kept us out of the war. Yet in full view of the untold misery and moral degeneracy the war brought upon the world, and the frankness amounting to cynicism with which its economic causes are admitted, neither of our largest political organizations has even proposed that the question of whether we should engage in war, affecting the life of every citizen, be submitted to the vote of the people.

It is possible that the minor concern about prohibition may prove an entering wedge, and that a fresh attempt to solve the problem of a just equilibrium between local autonomy and centralization may point the way. Many citizens naturally are loath to relinquish every hope of affecting by their vote the immediate result, and arguments are advanced with some plausibility in favor of boring from within in one or the other of the larger parties. But there are also many who feel that in the long run most is gained by voting as nearly as possible for one's real convictions, and by encouraging such voting.

The Socialist Party has again raised, in an unmistakable official statement, issues of prime importance. It is for the national plebiscite and against minority rule; for a peaceful settlement of differences between nations and classes and against war and preparation for war; for control by the people of its public policies and against secret diplomacy; for a democratic association of all peoples and against international government by strong military Powers; for a more equitable distribution of wealth and against production for private profit assisted by special privilege; for the maintenance of the liberties guaranteed by the Constitution and against their suspension at any time.

Wherever these principles have won the approval of a majority and the group upholding them has been intrusted with the administration of public affairs, as in Great Britain, the Scandinavian countries, and Germany, it has not only furthered helpful social legislation, but has also shown a remarkable moderation and readiness to cooperate with other groups for the common good. Its candidate for the Presidency is a man of keen intelligence, wide knowledge, sturdy independence, warm sympathy with all sorts and conditions of men, personal integrity, and rare moral courage. He stands four-square on a platform that is significant, consistent, and forward looking. Personally, I count it a privilege and a duty to cast my ballot for the electors of Norman Thomas. Government by the people appears to me still to be the paramount issue.

Save North Carolina!

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I wish you could find it in your heart to come out more strongly for Al Smith. I think you might if you realized what his candidacy means to the South. It has temporarily resuscitated what a North Carolina journalist called "that body of political death," the Democratic Party in the South. Down here we have taken our Democracy, as we have taken our Protestant church affiliation and our social standing—from our fathers, without scrutiny or question. To many of us this year it is a new and wonderful thing that Democracy can be not merely respectable, but actually thrilling.

To you it may seem a matter for slight remark that a candid Wet is running for the Presidency. To us, in our aridity, this Wet is as bold as David when he sallied forth against Goliath. It may be interesting to you, but not phenomenal, that a Roman Catholic is the Democratic nominee. To us, accustomed to domination by the evangelical clergy, this Romanist is little less than a Canute, challenging the waves of Protestant bigotry which threaten to overwhelm us. In brief, he is an exciting and romantic figure, a Lochinvar out of the North, sent by a kind heaven to break the usual tedium of Southern Democratic politics.

Against Governor Smith in North Carolina is ranged almost every element which has held this State back for the last sixty years, although all his opponents, of course, are not of these elements. But the fight for him here is simultaneously a fight for the freedom of the State.

Hoover's Record

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: There are thousands of liberals and independents who are not satisfied with the fairness of your political reporting and comment, and especially your implications as to the motives of those who are supporting Mr. Hoover. Why, for example, is it charged that those who support prohibition are "religious bigots" hypocritically using the issue as a mask for religious prejudice? A man could be Protestant, Catholic, or even atheist and still regard alcohol as a social poison like opium, legitimately subject to the police power of the government.

There is no use pretending that either candidate is a radical or even, in the popular sense of the word, a liberal. They are both able, upright, and humane conservatives. Since no liberal choice is this year possible, why should a liberal be ashamed of voting for Mr. Hoover on his record as food administrator in Belgium and the United States, as relief organizer in Poland, Germany, Austria, Russia, and the Near East, and as Secretary of Commerce in the Cabinet of two administrations? Why should it be illiberal to point out that Mr. Smith's political career, full of achievement though it was, has not outpassed the bounds of a single State? Is it altogether an irrelevant appeal to prejudice to state that, while Mr. Smith has in great measure transcended his Tammany origins, we might prefer a candidate who never belonged to any city or State machine and who, though he sat in an administration with corrupt men, was hated by them and had their opposition in his campaign for the nomination? Tammany supported Smith for nomination as well as election; did Thompson of Chicago, Fall of New Mexico, Daugherty of Ohio, or the adherents of Watsons, Willis, or Goff show any preconvention enthusiasm for Hoover? Vane, indeed, at the eleventh hour and fifty-ninth minute came to Hoover's aid, but the Hoover boom was started by men like Vernon Kellogg and other liberals and men of science away back in 1920.

A Difference

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In your editorial of October 17 entitled Herbert Hoover as a Quaker you attribute a quotation to the American Friend, the official publication of the Five Years Meeting of Friends in America, which should have been credited to the Messenger of Peace. By a publication arrangement the latter is included once a month within the covers of the American Friend, but the two papers are in reality separate publications.

Real Wages

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I read with much interest and approval your general onslaught on Mr. Hoover's speech on prosperity. His estimate of an increase of 50 per cent in real wages since 1914 is wrong, if you use the only figures which we have, namely, average real earnings of employed workers. This does not allow for unemployment, for which at present we do not have any good continuous index through the years, although I hope to have one ready in a few months. I greatly appreciated the kind words which you wrote about my own study, but I am compelled to point out that I showed an increase of about 26 per cent from 1914 to 1926 and not 15 per cent, as you state.

Father Duffy Replies

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: A reporter called me up today to tell me that Dr. E. Boyd Barrett had written to The Nation that Father F. P. Duffy had described his treatment by the New York Board of Education as "medieval bigotry." I knew that I had not expressed myself to Dr. Barrett or to anyone else in such terms, and I called him up to ask him by what right he was so quoting me. He replied that he had no right to quote me, and, as a matter of fact, had not quoted me. He could not have had a clear recollection of his own letter, for a glance at it proves that he does quote me.

The fact is that I never formed any convinced opinion about his difficulty. I had it at second hand from a friend who asked me to help him because he needed the chance. Not so long ago I myself was informed by the Director of the Lecture Bureau that he regretted he could not use my services as a lecturer on account of the reduction of the appropriation for that purpose.

When I called Dr. O'Shea on the telephone last June in Dr. Barrett's behalf, he told me that no policy of restriction was maintained except that of debarring anti-national speakers. I took up Dr. Barrett's cause, not in any crusading spirit, but in my accustomed neighborly, friendly mood. I may say that he makes it blamed hard to be his friend.

Fresh Air for Liberals

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I wish The Nation would come out positively for Smith. I admit one must swallow something to do this. I cast protest votes for Debs and La Follette and would do it under other circumstances for Thomas, for he is a fine man. But there seems to be a small chance that Smith may be elected, and should we not do everything we possibly can to enlarge that chance? Smith is evidently a growing man. I don't see why he should let the Raskobs and Hagues dominate him as President any more than he has let Tammany dominate him as Governor. There is a bare chance of the liberals coming to the surface again for a breath of fresh air if Smith is elected, and should we not take that chance and do our part to insure its realization? I want an opportunity to breathe a lungful of fresh air again after all the miasmas of the Harding-Coolidge era. Isn't a protest vote this time too academic? Let The Nation come out for Al and blast Cal.

By STERLING NORTH

Throw down your shovel, kid, and get a gun.
You'll work a thousand years at this and that;
And what the hell's the difference? When you're done
You're done, take it from me. You won't get fat
Digging ditches; you'll sweat in the hot sun
And freeze in winter. Get yourself a gat
And show these cock-eyed babies where they're at.
I wish to God that I was twenty-one.

And maybe when you're forty-five, my boy,
You'll even shake the mayor by the hand.
And when some bozo drills you, or you die,
They'll put you in a box worth twenty grand
With roses eight feet deep upon the lid
That spell "My Pal" or just "We'll see 'em, kid."

This Week The Good Fanatic

CERTAINLY, John S. Sumner and John Roach Straton must be called fanatics. William Jennings Bryan and Wayne B. Wheeler were fanatics, too. There are others, living and dead, who could be named, and, running over the list, I find that I dislike almost every one of them. Such persons are disagreeably tinged with abnormality; in a world full of a number of things they seem to be interested in just one, and to be happy as kings only when they are making other people miserable. The single track along which their minds roll seems in each case to lead through arid country toward dismal destinations. And that raises the question whether fanatics are not merely persons who passionately believe the wrong things. Or perhaps there are bad fanatics and good fanatics.

If there are, then Susan B. Anthony was a good fanatic. It is hard, indeed, for me to admit that she should be tagged with that label at all. In reading the story of her astonishing life by Rheta Childe Dorr,* I found myself trying to invent reasons for exempting her. For certainly one must like Susan B. Anthony. Although she devoted herself throughout a long life to the cause of women's freedom, although she was stern and unflinching and allowed neither herself nor her followers to rest along the way, the people who knew her most intimately loved her best. In spite of this I suppose we must agree that Susan was a fanatic. The sorry state of women in the nineteenth century so stirred her resentment and pity that no other emotions could burn as brightly in her heart. She worked for temperance, it is true, before she took up the cause of women; but the treatment of her sex even in the ranks of the temperance organizations drove her back to the main track. She worked for the abolition of slavery, and became one of the leading organizers and speakers in the group that contained William Lloyd Garrison and Wendell Phillips and Frederick Douglass. But after the war these men refused to link the cause of woman's suffrage, which they had always supported, with the question of enfranchising the black men of the South. "It is the Negroes' hour" was their slogan. So Susan and her friends turned back with stubborn determination to their own fight.

Susan never married and had little time for personal relationships outside of the few friendships that grew out of the common battle. She thought, worked, traveled, talked for the freedom of women. Such deep emotion, such endless loyalty sunk in an impersonal course must always seem abnormal to ordinary people living in ordinary days. But there are times that breed fanaticism, times when to be normal means to rebel, when an easy acceptance of the world reveals nothing better than a flabby mind and weak nerves.

Susan B. Anthony was born in a liberal Quaker household; her father believed in her capacity and encouraged her. She was intelligent, strong, ambitious. And, as such a girl must, she stubbed her toe with almost every step she took on the laws and conventions of her day—from the time when she entered Miss Deborah Moulson's Select Seminary for Females where some learning was combined with the "Principles of Morality, Humility, and the Love of Virtue," until she began teaching school at a salary of $2.50 a week succeeding a man who had received $10. Everywhere she found women discriminated against and circumscribed, whether they labored at home or attempted to earn a living "in the world." America struggled in the clutches of two forms of human slavery, that of the Negro and that of women. If the former was more obvious and brutal, the latter was quite as effective and as demoralizing. As a grotesque and sinister background for the figure of Susan, Mrs. Dorr has painted an unforgettable picture of women's life in this country during the early years of the suffrage fight, when a married woman could not own property or make contracts; when her wages and even her children belonged solely to her husband; when only a few, ill-paid trades were open to women and no colleges or professional schools admitted them. Let those of us who fancy ourselves too knowing and too "normal" for fanaticism consider what our own emotions would be in a similar state of society. Like Russia before the Revolution; like Ireland under the Black-and-Tans; like China in the last five years—the United States in the middle nineteenth century demanded martyrs and warriors. As well ask William Lloyd Garrison to be cool and balanced in the face of Negro slavery, as to tell Susan B. Anthony that she should cultivate other interests than the cause of equal rights for women.

Perhaps the objection to our objectionable present-day fanatics lies in the causes which animate them. The abolition of freedom and intelligence seems to be the chief purpose of these advocates of blue laws, censorship laws, prohibition laws, anti-evolution laws. But the cause headed by Susan B. Anthony, despite its entanglements with the mighty Puritan tradition, was essentially one of liberation. We may laugh at Susan and her friends—they were earnest, single-minded, indignant people—but in that act we pay tribute to their work. For they died in the very process of giving birth to a society so comfortable and free that it can afford to laugh at fanatics—even good ones.

Aldous Huxley Again

Point Counter Point. By Aldous Huxley. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $2.50.

THOSE who have read Aldous Huxley's novels as they appeared will find nothing in "Point Counter Point" to surprise them except the increased richness and solidity of its satire. The very first of his short stories announced his theme and exemplified his method, but it is not likely that even their author suspected how these stories would expand into longer and longer novels or how every addition to his knowledge and wisdom would fit the pattern there laid out. He has gone on year after year saying the same thing and yet saying it with such unflagging vivacity and such increasing richness of illustration that to many (myself included) he has not only been perpetually interesting but has come to seem the most considerable of those writers who have taken the contemporary intellectual as their subject.

What attracted us first was the depth of his sophistication; among the many smart young men he seemed quite the smartest. No other impudent modernity, no other insolent flippancy in the treatment of respectable platitudes was so accomplished as his and no one else seemed so capable as he of vindicating, by the width of his knowledge and the force of his mind, his right to be scornful. But soon we came to see how far he rose above those of his contemporaries who were content to raise an easy laugh and to float with their characters down a stream of cocktails and kisses. He was impelled to understand the forces which had produced the phenomena he was describing and to grapple with the problems which, whether they are aware of it or not, lie unsolved in the minds of those living, as most sophisticated people do today, on the loose. Without destroying his lightness of touch, even without abandoning the farcical elements which always play a part in his novels, he has managed to make them serve as vehicles for a most comprehensive analysis of the contemporary soul. In them religion and science and sociology wear motley, but they join issue and the joke which knowledge has played upon human nature is fully revealed.

"Point Counter Point" runs to over four hundred closely printed pages peopled by a score of the most diverse characters. They range all the way from Lord Edward Tantamount, the grave survival from Victorian biology, to sick little Spandrell, the latest model of the eternal wastrel, and they gyrate, one and all, in that spiritual void to which modern thought has reduced them. Tantamount can go about grafting the tails of newts upon the shoulder-blades of the animals from which they have been cut in order to see what will happen; Spandrell can conduct his experiments also with the more esoteric vices; but neither they nor any one else in the book can discover any direction to take which promises them anything at the end of the road.

"What a relief!" said Lord Edward, as he opened the door of his laboratory. Voluptuously, he sniffed the faint smell of the absolute alcohol in which his specimens were pickled. "These parties! One's thankful to get back to science." Illidge shrugged his shoulders. "Parties, music, science—alternative entertainments for the leisured. You pays your money and you takes your choice. The essential is to have the money to pay." He laughed disagreeably.

But the cream of the jest is simply that there isn't any choice except a choice of escapes. Most choose cocktails and kisses and they are not much more futile than those who pretend graver preoccupations. Illidge seeking social righteousness and Spandrell seeking a thrill assassinate the leader of the British Fascisti; Burlap, editor of a mildly pious literary weekly, slips gently into his lady-assistant's bed; Lord Edward sticks to his newts. Of which is the kingdom of heaven?

"Point Counter Point" is a terrible book, endurable only because it is also hilarious, and it illustrates once more how remarkable is the balance which its author is able to maintain between mere wit on the one hand and mere indignation on the other.

There were moments in certain of his earlier books ("Chrome Yellow" for example) which did not rise above smartness and which might conceivably have been written by any one of the innumerable clever young men who constantly thank heaven that they are so naughty; there were, on the other hand, moments in "Antic Hay," the most impassioned of his novels, when loathing made him write with the turbid vehemence of a Huysmans; but he is most characteristically himself when he manages, as in "Point Counter Point" he does, to achieve some mood, some acceptance of the material with which he deals, wholly his own.

It is neither the lightness of the joker, the detachment of the pure artist, nor the self-righteousness of the Juvenalian satirist, for he is himself too much a part of the confusion which he describes to attain any of these; but it is something which does enable him to maintain a sort of balance in the midst of events where all balance has been lost. The motley world which he describes—a world in which all sorts of people, from the frank wastrel to the scholar, are united by a common inability to think their way through the confusion of their age—is a painful one and its creator is, at bottom, as lost as any of his creatures, but his very ability to describe and to analyze supplies him a refuge. He looks down from no mountain top and achieves no real serenity; he solves no problems and he sees, in a word, very little further than his characters do. Yet he manages to exist—to live and to write—in a world where all of the others die some kind of death.

The Tender Swede

Good Morning, America. By Carl Sandburg. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $3.

CARL SANDBURG is celebrated as the laureate of industry, the bard of belching chimneys, the chortling lyrist of noontime when the meat-packers sit in their bloody leather aprons and swap jokes before the whistle blows one o'clock. He is called modern because of this. And he is modern, probably. But not altogether because of this.

What right, for instance, would such a poet have to preface his latest volume with thirty-eight Tentative Definitions of Poetry among which were the following?

Poetry is a projection across silence of cadences arranged to break that silence with definite intentions of echoes, syllables, wave lengths.

Poetry is the report of a nuance between two moments, when people say, "Listen!" and "Did you see it?", "Did you hear it?", "What was it?"

Poetry is a slipknot tightened around a time-beat of one thought, two thoughts, and a last interweaving thought there is not yet a number for.

Poetry is an exhibit of one pendulum connecting with other and unseen pendulums inside and outside the one seen.

Poetry is the journal of a sea animal living on land, wanting to fly the air.

What has all this to do with a Hungarian steel-worker and his wife eating bananas and throwing the skins out over the cindery acres of Whiting, Indiana? Nothing, directly; and the fact should be recognized more frequently than it is. All this has to do with Sandburg himself, with the way he sees things—or rather with the way he times his blood as he renders in rhythm the things he sees.

He is, in truth, and with every new volume he becomes more palpably so, a very subtle and loving recorder of unsubstantial things. He happens to be under no illusion that smokestacks and pickle-carts are less "poetical," less unsubstantial, than moonbeams and beautiful children, and so in our amazement we have identified him with the former class of objects. But he is quite as much at home in the latter class, and I suspect that as time goes on he will take up his residence there. Certainly in the present book there is a great deal of attention paid to grass roots, spring winds, and early morning moons. And certainly it is the attention of a man who knows better than any of his contemporaries how to put a flowing world on paper. His humor is here, and his talkiness, and his love of American lingo. And, of course, there are skyscrapers and waterfronts, not to speak of old flagmen and persons named Iglits. But all is noted by a tender brain to which no difference appears between "a hard old earth" and "a sweet young earth."

John Dewey's Humanism

The Philosophy of John Dewey. Selected and Edited by Joseph Ratner. Henry Holt and Company. $4.

PHILOSOPHY has always vacillated between the task of understanding the complexity of the world, in all its brutal indifference to human aspirations, and the need to enunciate in a logical way the import of human dreams. In the intensity of their longing for the good, philosophers often thought they were analyzing the world before them when they were in truth expressing their own desires. When their systems somehow failed to square up with the facts of experience, they hung to them by denying the validity of experience because of its alleged superficial and chaotic character. And since their dreams seemed to point the way toward the melioration of human conditions it was easy to think of them as noble, although for all their nobility they remained strangely ineffectual. On the other hand, thinkers who deemed the first necessary step toward melioration to be an actual understanding of the world, or who, perhaps indifferent altogether to melioration, desired only to slake their thirst for understanding—these were considered supine slaves to facts, when not dangerously immoral.

The criticism which has been leveled against Mr. Dewey seems never to have considered the above truism, and for this reason it has radically misunderstood the aim of his philosophy. Because he was concerned with "attempting an analysis of experience as it is humanly lived" and not as he, or preferably some ancient Greek, thought it should be lived, his philosophy has been called a philosophy of pragmatic acquiescence. And because he was concerned with disentangling a confusion of classic metaphysics between the meaning of natural and moral ends, he has been accused of making of means objects of worship. It has been urged by his young literary critics that Mr. Dewey has suffered from the pioneer urge to do, to accomplish, but always to do and accomplish something material. Upon the doing he has been said to place the emphasis, never upon the enjoyment which should be the fruit of all activity. And this attitude, it was insisted, leads him to undervalue contemplation, which is obviously the proper end of a rational life. But confusion as to ends has been indeed on the part of his critics, who have directed against his factual analysis of experience a moral criticism on the basis of prejudged standards. Obviously it was not analysis his critics wanted of him: analysis, unless previously pledged to a cause deemed by them noble, was held of no importance. What they wanted of him was a certain kind of uplift; they wanted him to proclaim unconditionally the absolute supremacy of the contemplative life.

In truth, Mr. Dewey has never attempted to deny the validity of moral ends, if these be considered tentative demarcations projected upon the course of events, and based upon subjective value judgments. Nor has he denied the moral importance of whatever satisfaction we may derive from the use of tools for their own sake. He has had occasion to repeat very often that the motive for the pursuit of knowledge is not always instrumental. What is more, he has indicated that if activity is not to become drudgery we must enjoy its tools directly. But he has insisted that moral ends must not be considered as natural states of perfection which events must inevitably approach. The confusion between the two kinds of ends springs naturally from a static conception of the universe. Now science, revealing nature as in a state of evolutionary flux, has abandoned the old logic and has come to conceive knowledge—on a logical plane—as an instrument in the pursuit of further knowledge, whatever the psychological motive for its acquisition may be. But modern philosophy has hesitated between the ancient attitude and the modern. For though it has been eager to make its obeisance to science, it has retained its loyalty for the classic attitude toward a static universe.

Mr. Dewey conceives philosophy mainly as analysis; this is what is really meant by experience as method, criticism of criticism, as he has called it. And in his own practice he has shown preference for the analytic rather than for the formative aspect of philosophy. But a man alive to the issues of his day cannot be a disinterested thinking machine and Mr. Dewey has no desire to be one. With his analysis, therefore, he has found it necessary to pass certain radical criticisms upon modern life: his concern with education, with democracy, with social psychology, with the economic quarrels of the day, has been more than a passive disinterested one. His way of looking at the world in terms of its evolutionary possibilities has led him into a social consciousness illuminated by progressive liberalism. And yet, though his indictment of American civilization has been as radical, though not as acrimonious, as that of his young critics, they have objurgated him because of what one of them has smartly called his pragmatic acquiescence. Mr. Dewey's attitude is not one of supine acquiescence. His philosophy, rightly understood, is a humanistic one. Its emphasis upon the meaning of tools and instruments is calculated to make us realize their possibilities for humanistic purposes. And its denial of the usefulness of final ideals, barren as it may seem to any one prejudiced by the conception of a static universe, is also humanistic. For it makes us sensitive to the possibilities for good held by the immediate and the transient, and it forces upon us the duty to make use of the immediate and the transient if it is true that we are really interested in progress. Because Mr. Dewey has been one of the most productive of contemporary thinkers this selection will be welcomed not only by the public in general, but even by students of philosophy. Mr. Ratner is to be thanked for it.

Beneath Tropic Seas. By William Beebe. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $3.50.

A QUARTER century ago William Beebe dived into the Bay of Fundy and swam excitedly along the bottom, ten feet below low tide, feeling himself "on the borderland of the vast unknown" with something very like planetary space just beyond his nose. He wrote, too, of what the dredge brought up "from bottoms ten to twenty fathoms below the surface, deeper than mortal eye can ever hope to reach."

Three years ago, at Galapagos, with an air helmet over his head, he sat on the sea-bottom forty feet below the surface, and watched the sharks swim past. Last year, offshore at Haiti, he dropped a full ten fathoms, sixty feet below the tossing waves, where he had thought mortal eye could never hope to reach, knelt in the slime, and collected "great maggoty of holothurians, worthy tenants of this world of ooze"; and he announces "my next goal will be one hundred feet."

"Below Tropic Seas" is his report to the lay world of the bottom of the sea of Port au Prince. A few miscellaneous chapters are added, apparently because the publishers thought the book must have at least 200 pages, but the first ten chapters are enough. The Antarctic continent is more familiar territory to most of us than sea-bottom a few miles from New York or Haiti. Beebe writes:

The general impression of hours and days spent at the bottom of the sea is its fairy-like unreality. It is an Alice's Wonderland, where our terrestrial experiences and terms are set at naught. The flowers are worms, and the boulders living creatures; here we weigh but a fraction of what we do on land; here distance is sheer color and the sky is a glory of rippling light. Here we can support ourselves with the crook of our little finger, and when we let go we fall too slowly for injury. Until we have found our way to the surface of some other planet, the bottom of the sea will remain the loveliest and the strangest place we can imagine.

To walk along sea-bottom, through canyons of coral, with groupers and sharks and squids and six-foot tarpon watching, would be exciting enough for anyone, but Beebe has an Elizabethan enthusiasm for its color and drama. He exhausts his vocabulary attempting to find words for the shifting pastel tints of sub-sea landscapes; he is palpitant with excitement watching the emotions of sea-worms or exploring the labyrinth of a giant sponge. And he has the power of communicating his excitement to the reader. He is least satisfactory when he attempts to be philosophical; but any newspaperman will recognize that Beebe is a superb reporter; and it is something new in literature and in life when a first-rate reporter walks, with eyes wide open, along the bottom of the sea.

Biographical Briefs

Dostoevsky, The Man and His Work. By Julius Meier-Graeffe. Translated by Herbert H. Marks. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $6.

That a great critical work upon Dostoevski is needed appears incontrovertible. Yet, though good minds have attempted it, none has succeeded. Soloviev's work is a complete traduction. Middleton Murry's fails, though interestingly and excitingly, by supplying too much. André Gide in his lectures did well to limit himself and by his sharp limitation managed to insert a wedge of illumination; he is, nevertheless, limited. Julius Meier-Graeffe, in the present volume, is often useful, always sympathetic, but he so surrounds the object of his criticism with a hedge of blustering love that, though one admires the solicitude, one cannot see the object. He becomes, rather than Dostoevski's critic, Dostoevski's spokesman. The long analyses of the novels, done with the best will in the world and the completest fidelity, betray, as any such method must, the spirit of the books. In a treatise so lengthy and so necessarily philosophical one finds certain lacunae: to what literary use, for example, did Dostoevski put the Kant and Hegel which, together with a German dictionary, he so passionately asked his brother to send him in Siberia?

Charles Dickens: a Biography from New Sources. By Ralph Straus. Illustrated. Cosmopolitan Book Corporation. $4.

One hardly knows what to admire most in this book: its deftly manipulated scholarship, its thorough but never maudlin sympathy with its subject, its style both exuberantly Dickensian and adroitly waggish, or its inclusion of invaluable material perhaps justifiably withheld by Forster. Everybody already knew that Dickens was histrionic in everything—dress, diction,

A THIRD PARTY

THE ARBITRATOR is a third party among magazines—for the under-dog and snappy.

Don't throw away your subscription on a paper which will always say what you wish to hear. Read dangerously! Examine the world as it is presented each month free from preconceived opinions or established customs. Have faith in attaining the unattainable—the real outlawry of war, abolition of poverty, unveiling of superstition and securing of justice—by political means.

The Arbitrator has supported La Follette and now urges a vote for Norman Thomas. It exposed the Sacco-Vanzetti frame-up, and requests the release of Mooney, still in prison after a fraudulent conviction. It has urged an all-inclusive arbitration treaty and federal laws controlling power, regulating child labor and lynching, limiting profits, establishing minimum wage laws, unemployment insurance and old age pensions. It supports Spiritual Evolution as a substitute for theology. The September issue contained a remarkable revelation of finger printing by "Margery," in October there was an analysis of how Jesus would vote, and in November will be shown the modern idealist's position.

Send a dollar to cover a year's subscription for yourself and some timid conservative, who will be notified that it comes from "a mutual friend."

and actual interest in both producing and taking part in plays—but nobody has hitherto revealed how tremendously histrionic he was; everybody already knew that his family life was not happy, but never before have definite and voluminous reasons for that unhappiness been made public. What an actor-manager the stage lost because he spent most of his time in writing—and, contrariwise, what an even greater novelist the world lost because he devoted such vast nervous energy to the stage! This is decidedly the most informative, illuminating, and charmingly written bit of Dickensiana that has appeared for years.

John Wesley. By Abram Lipsky. Simon and Schuster. $3.

Though written in a commonplace style, this is a shrewd, businesslike, and eminently fair-minded book. Mr. Lipsky has no bias whatever; he is interested solely in the personality of John Wesley and the tremendous effect that personality made upon the world. The results of his labors, which include new material of importance not hitherto available in popular form, will not particularly please most Methodists; but—a consideration of far more moment—they would quite certainly have pleased John Wesley.

Prisoners All. By Oskar Maria Graf. Translated by Margaret Green. Alfred A. Knopf. $4.

Oskar Maria Graf is the type of bewildered, teary, and excitable social-revolutionary poet whom only war-time Germany could have produced and who could have risen to prominence only at a time when standards of character were in the most complete flux. This self-pitying, wordy, diffuse, and at times mad autobiography is difficult to read without constantly breaking into laughter, but the graphic pictures of Eisner's Bavarian revolution and the unconsciously condemnatory sketches of the Socialist leaders of the period have their historical value. Those who are interested in a very minor Rousseau of our own time may find portions of "Prisoners All" revelatory.

The Life of Sir Martin Frobisher. By William McFee. The Golden Hind Series. Edited by Milton Waldman. Harper and Brothers. $4.

The gentlemen who are collaborating in the production of this series of biographies may not be rewarded by seeing any of their individual volumes heading the lists of best-sellers, but they are nevertheless performing a valuable work. As one turns the pages of these beautifully printed books, one feels on solid ground: here is no hasty shoddiness, no nitwit wisecracking, no flyblown pornographic peepings, no frothy fiction, but solid, foursquare biography which, like all good biography, is chiefly concerned with the person whose life is under discussion—a truism too frequently forgotten in these tempestuous days.

Shapes That Pass. By Julian Hawthorne. Houghton Mifflin Company. $4.

Two separate elements determine the worth or worthlessness of volumes of reminiscences: their authors' perspective or style, and the light they may throw upon persons or events of importance. Mr. Hawthorne, though a satisfactory enough Victorian, has not lost all the sap of youth, and amidst an abundance of commonplace prose a few passages fairly shine. He seems to have known or at least met almost everybody of importance and unimportance in England from about 1855 to 1870; his comments and reflections, though not profound, are always entertaining; and while most of his old wives' tales are more or less known, some are distinctly new. Witness this beam upon the character of George Henry Lewes: "George Eliot . . . sat a little apart, Lewes talking to her in an undertone. Abruptly he started to his feet, throwing up an arm. 'Silence, please—silence! Mrs. Lewes is going to speak!' This actually occurred. We hushed and gazed, and poor George Eliot said something . . . no matter what."

Tamerlane: The Earth Shaker. By Harold Lamb. Illustrated. Robert M. McBride and Company. $4.

The biographer of Genghis Khan has naturally—perhaps too naturally—devoted his efforts to a very similar subject. One admires his undoubted general competence, his scholarship, his adherence to a detached, chronicle narrative form, and his commendable lack of flippancy; but one cannot help asking oneself if, with all its virtues, Mr. Lamb's style is not just a little dull.

As They Seemed to Me. By Ugo Ojetti. Introduction by Gabriele D'Annunzio. Translated from the Italian by Henry Furst. E. P. Dutton and Company. $2.50.

Sketches, tender, mordant, and brilliantly condensed, of half a hundred dominating European personalities of the last half century. Ojetti's is a type of artistic journalism, well developed in Italy, less well in France, and practically unheard of here. Among those he has met and from whom he extracts the essence are Mussolini, D'Annunzio, Duse, Proust, Rodin, Voronoff, Pirandello, Gorki, Puccini, and Valéry. There is a grandiose and comical introduction by D'Annunzio, in nice contrast with Ojetti's own suave and restrained style.

Condemned to Devil's Island. By Blair Niles. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $3.

"The biography of an unknown convict" is the subtitle of this book, but the life-story of the man that serves to describe the penal settlement in French Guiana must be more fiction than fact. On the other hand, the expression of prison exile in the tropics—with its harrowing physical, mental, and moral degradation—reads like truth. Perhaps the penal settlement in French Guiana is no more horrible than any prison, but it offers an unusually dramatic setting for a revelation of the folly and cruelty of the convict system maintained by a supposedly enlightened humanity.

Drama

The Greatness of Chekhov

FOR the third new production of its season the Civic Repertory Theater has chosen "The Cherry Orchard" of Chekhov and has made of the play, familiar as it is, by far the most interesting of the three. It is true that here, as usual, Miss Le Gallienne's production leaves something to be desired—that the limitations, financial and other, of her enterprise preclude the possibility of perfect finish, and that her sorely tried company is called upon by the exigencies of the repertory to perform feats of versatility beyond their capacity. It is true, furthermore, that neither her own good performance in the role of the self-effacing Varya nor that of Alla Nazimova (guest for the occasion) as the charmingly incompetent mistress of the orchard is enough to dispel that somewhat impromptu air which often marks the production at this theater. And yet the intelligence of the direction, coupled with the intelligence of the play, is sufficient to make "The Cherry Orchard" delightful to all those capable of seeing below a surface not quite so smooth as that to which Broadway is accustomed, and of relishing the delicately humorous genius of the author.

Important novelists have often been seduced by promises of fame and money to try their hands at the stage, but they have very rarely enriched either themselves or the drama. Chekhov stands almost alone among the great writers of fiction who have, with results other than regrettable, allowed themselves to be persuaded by importunate managers; and his unusual success is probably due in a very considerable measure to the fact that instead of going to the theater he made the theater come to him—a highly unusual proceeding, since nothing is more pathetic than the respect generally paid by the layman to the infantile "mysteries" of conventional stagecraft. Grave professors are reduced to a state of awed wonder by the pronouncements of any fourth-rate hack who talks about the "laws of the theater," and first-rate novelists who would show the door to any one who told them how to write in any other form accept complacently the imbecile suggestions of the "practical man of the theater," producing, as a result, plays which have none of the virtues of the professional litterateur and all the defects of the amateur dramatist. Chekhov, on the other hand, had the good sense to conclude that the public wanted him to be, in the theater as elsewhere, not a lumbering imitation of another, but Chekhov himself; accordingly he wrote two plays which are like no others ever seen upon any stage but which are, nevertheless, replete with all the virtues which made his stories unique.

The very soul of his method had always been the avoidance of anything artificially "dramatic," and he was wise enough not to alter it when he came to write drama. In "The Cherry Orchard" as in his stories the plot is insignificant; instead of clothing a narrative skeleton with thought and feeling he generates his moods and delivers his reflections in a manner which appears to be in the last degree casual. Strokes of characterization, flashes of humor, and unexpected touches of nature seem introduced almost at random; and yet somehow an unforgettable picture is evoked. Doubtless there is art in every line of this seeming artlessness, and Chekhov, indeed, complained at one time that he was writing it at the rate of four lines a day; but the art is not of any familiar sort. Others build upon a solid foundation. They are architectural and they attain solidity by placing stone upon stone; but he merely throws out one thread after another. Each is so fragile that a wind would blow it away, but we are soon enmeshed in a thousand of them. Out of delicacy laid ceaselessly upon delicacy comes strength.

If Chekhov meant to say, as in "The Cherry Orchard" he apparently did, that the touching absurdity of the society he pictures was destined to be gradually and peacefully replaced by the cruder, though sturdier, race of peasants turned capitalists, then he was a very bad prophet indeed so far as Russia was concerned, but it is not for prophecy that we turn to him.

What we get instead is as delightful pictures as any contained in the whole realm of Russian literature of the charming childishness of those gentle people whose incompetence precipitated one of the bloodiest upheavals of history—pictures whose moods vary, as gracefully as the moods of the people who are their subjects, from bubbling gaiety to hopeless melancholy and back again. Never, moreover, was penetration more gentle than his. His insight spares no one and yet no one is really wounded. He is merciless in his exposure of every character and yet every one of them finds mercy. No one else ever stripped his characters barer than he, but no one else ever held helpless victims up to a kindlier ridicule. Good art is perpetually revealing how it can accomplish the impossible. Smiles and tears, satire and sentiment—what combination is generally more nauseous? But the combination is Chekhov's and Chekhov is great.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

The unmarried mother with offspring gathered to her breast and a shawl around her head has gone forth into the night through the rear exit amid the snuffles of so many audiences that she has stolen all sympathy and attention from the unmarried father. Floyd Dell and Thomas Mitchell in "Little Accident" (Morosco Theater) have revealed the latent heroism in this neglected creature in a delightful comedy which stars Mr. Mitchell. The stage baby, about to be farmed out for adoption by a career-bent mother, is kidnapped by the father after stormy scenes in which the customary remarks about duty, the home, and "my child" are hurled back at the modern mother with reverse English. A hospital lobby full of expectant fathers provides a scene for uproarious comedy. "Little Accident" is based upon Floyd Dell's novel "The Unmarried Father."

Stimson Shows His Hand

By RANDALL GOULD

Manila, August 15

GOVERNMENT ownership and operation of telegraph and cable lines in the Philippine Islands may prove the first victim of Governor-General Henry L. Stimson's new policy of "cooperation and economic development." Announcement has been made that the Radio Corporation of the Philippines, a Radio Corporation of America offshoot, has been granted a year's trial period for local radio transmission in competition with the Bureau of Posts' land lines and cables "in order," as a statement by the Governor-General puts it, "to demonstrate the efficiency of such private operation in comparison with the present government service."

Stations are to be established at Cebu, Iloilo, Cagayan de Misamis, Tacloban, Laoag, Aparri, Davao, and Zamboanga, in addition to the present Manila station operating with Honolulu, San Francisco, and Asiatic mainland points. It is probable that the alert Radio Corporation authorities will, as Mr. Stimson intimates, provide a striking demonstration of their efficiency in contrast to the inefficiency of the Bureau of Posts as at present operated.

This recently announced experiment has, despite ample warning in previous statements by the Governor-General, created virtually no stir among those who might be expected to take interest in keeping the government in control of vital communication systems in the Philippines. Political leaders, their appetites whetted by the sniff of political favors, seem willing to swallow without examination almost any scheme put forward at present under the guise of efficiency and development. This statement need not imply that Mr. Stimson's proposals on this and other matters are unsound. It is, however, a fact that after hungry years of battle with the late General Leonard Wood, Filipino political chiefs appear to be only too glad to wolf a little sugar-coated dollar diplomacy.

Governor-General Stimson has been frank in his attitude. From the day of his first message he has proclaimed the gospel of greater economic development of the islands and "the necessity of encouraging the entry of American capital for that purpose." Getting the government out of its various business enterprises—which include operation of mines, sugar centrals, a hotel, a bank, a railroad, and many other activities—is to Mr. Stimson a logical step in the development he envisions.

The telegraphs are considered by Mr. Stimson an artificial monopoly enjoyed by the government, exactly like the law-made monopoly which has admittedly created for private interests an impossible situation in inter-island shipping. He linked the two things in his message to the legislature, adding with reference to the telegraphs:

I believe that no economic fact is better established in the world today than the fact that, taken by and large, government operation of such electrical utilities is far less efficient than private operation thereof. Furthermore, nowhere in the world today does there exist a combined telegraph and telephone service of such surpassing efficiency as is furnished by private operation in the United States. I believe that this is the ideal for which we should strive, and that as rapidly as we can find efficient and responsible private companies to take it over, we should place our electrical communications in private hands.

Only a faint squeak or two has indicated the slightest opposition thus far. The Philippines Herald, Filipino owned and edited, suggests that action now is premature and that "private operation of a public service is not the only way to improvement," adding that "if we are to deny the government bureaus the opportunity for self-improvement, there will be neither growth nor progress in our government system"—but the big political guns remain silent.

On the side of Mr. Stimson in his private-control, American-capital ideas are certain undisputed facts. The Philippines have made no brilliant economic showing in any line as yet. For a variety of reasons the government has not given more than passable service in certain of its operations, including the telegraphs—though in others there seems to be improvement indicating that their future would be sound if they were let alone. It is true, moreover, that the Filipinos have not, with their own capital, developed their country rapidly, although there is little dire poverty and the living standard is generally high.

The factors weighing against the Stimson theories are not concrete, not readily grasped by politicians interested primarily in politics. Close harmony—that describes the present song in Manila. Still smarting from the smacks of a less friendly administration, the politicians are not disposed to listen to any of their number who contribute sour notes to the chorus. Isauro Gabaldon has been thrown into the Philippines equivalent of the snow. It would take a big man with brains and courage to fight Stimson, and that man doesn't seem to be in sight just now.

Caste in India

DO British officials in India help to perpetuate the caste system? Lajput Rai, editor of the Lahore People and for twenty-five years a political leader in the Punjab, declares that they do. He quotes a British superintendent of the census operations in the Punjab as saying that occupational castes "have been largely manufactured and almost entirely preserved as separate castes by the British Government." He says:

For a long time the feeling has been growing among the educated Hindus that they should relax, if not abolish altogether, the rigors of caste. There are large sections of Hindus who are not prepared to admit that they belong to any particular caste. Marriages outside caste are becoming pretty frequent and there are other indications that the number of those people who do not like the present caste classification and its divisions is growing enormously. . . . Under the circumstances is it too much to ask the Government to abolish all enumerations of castes in the next census? . . .

I will strongly advise all educated Hindus not to state their caste in the next census, and all untouchables not to give themselves away by calling themselves untouchables. Untouchability is nothing to be proud of. Yet encouraged by the British Government and by Imperialists of the type of Lord Birkenhead the depressed classes are making a fetish of their lower social position as if that was anything to be proud of. The caste system would die its natural death if the British Government would not support it by its policy and practice. . . .

You can, too,—sell your property!

One advertiser writes: "We ran this ad in The Nation once. As a result I sold our house on the terms described. In response to my ad. I got about seven other replies, one or two of which I could have probably sold the house to if the present buyers hadn't bought it."

Another advertiser writes: "—despite the error in the telephone number in the ad as it appeared in The Nation, two of your readers, traced the correct number through the telephone company, and one of them bought the house before the correction of the number appeared in print. I had advertised the house in two New York dailies with much less satisfactory results than came from one insertion in The Nation."

SITUATION WANTED by one of the Best Minds of America; highest ratings in intelligence tests; has wife and six starving children; will take anything. What have you? Address X, Box 342, N. Y. C.

An Open Letter to "The Best Minds"—

You are the mental upper crust of America — the top one per cent. The Associate Editor of the Encyclopedia Britannica, Professor Walter B. Pitkin of Columbia University, has written a book about you and your dilemmas. The Twilight of The American Mind is not only a bold excuse in social prophecy, but is positively exciting because Professor Pitkin demonstrates, with erudite research but racy style,

- a—That by 1975, America will approach a platonic aristocracy of talent.
- b—That very few high grade intellects can succeed in business.
- c—That American business is now organized. A man with a high grade mind has to use it a few minutes a month to hold his job.
- d—That our new mechanized civilization is precipitating a major crisis in American Education.

THE NATION is on file in most public and college libraries and is indexed in the Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature.

THE PROBABILITY that Sacco and Vanzetti were innocent of the crime for which they were put to death a year ago last summer is definitely increased by the material published in the Outlook and Independent for October 31, and the magazine is entitled to all praise for printing this contribution toward the establishment of truth in an unpopular cause. The material concerns not the robbery and murder at South Braintree, Massachusetts, for which the two Italians were sentenced to death, but a hold-up in the nearby town of Bridgewater of which Vanzetti alone was convicted before the trial for the other crime. It will be recalled that Sacco and Vanzetti were arrested in 1920 not because of supposed connection with any particular crime, but merely on account of suspicious actions—actions in regard to which they had good reason to be secretive because of the bitter persecution of radical aliens at that time. The local police—probably at the instance of the United States Department of Justice—decided that the two men ought to be put out of the way and, resorting to a common technique, proceeded to charge them with whatever unsolved crimes the public was still worked up over. The two best cases were those at Bridgewater, which had gone unsolved for four months, and the one at South Braintree, only three weeks in the background. Unfortunately for the police, Sacco proved conclusively that he was at work at the time of the Bridgewater hold-up, but Vanzetti was indicted, convicted, and sentenced to prison before he and Sacco were put on trial for the South Braintree murders in 1921. The presiding judge at Vanzetti's trial was the same Webster Thayer who later showed such obvious venom and prejudice in the proceedings against Sacco and Vanzetti.

IN A BROADSIDE on the Sacco-Vanzetti case in its issue of September 22, 1926, The Nation pointed out many farcical and sinister features in connection with this first trial of Vanzetti, and the way in which it was used to do injustice both to him and Sacco in the subsequent fight for their lives. We told how Vanzetti was induced to drop the attorney originally retained and substitute John H. Vahey of Boston, how the latter refused to accede to Vanzetti's wish to take the stand in his defense, and how no request for a new trial was made within the year's time prescribed by law, so that counsel for Sacco and Vanzetti were later unable to reopen this case. The jury paid no attention to Vanzetti's alibi witnesses, accepting instead several fantastic stories on the other side. The Outlook and Independent now demolishes these by a confession from Frank Silva, an ex-convict, that he and three others perpetrated the Bridgewater robbery. This is backed by a statement from James Mede, in whose store the crime is said to have been planned. All these data have been checked by Silas Bent, an experienced newspaperman, who is convinced of their truth. The material seems to destroy utterly the already incredible case against Vanzetti in regard to the Bridgewater robbery, and it obviously shakes anew the unconvincing testimony in the subsequent murder trial—testimony which in six long years the judicial system of the great State of Massachusetts never allowed to be reexamined. But in the present state of public opinion the revelations are not likely to change many minds. The response of Governor Fuller is characteristic. Through his secretary he wrote to the Outlook and Independent that he was "not any more impressed with this confession than he was with the confession of Madeiros." Future generations may not be any more impressed by the attitude of Governor Fuller than by the verdict of the jury at Dedham.

SENATOR NORRIS'S argument stating the reasons why he must leave his party and come out for Governor Smith, though he did not bolt in 1924 to La Follette, his warm and admired friend, is an unusual document. For as we have repeatedly pointed out, George W. Norris has a habit of standing four square to all political winds. Men have known ever since he declined to vote for the armed ship bill, as we were going into the war in 1917, that here was a man who could not be moved by fears of what might happen to him if he took the unpopular course, who could not be reached by any political consideration. Hence we feel that his declaration that the greatest issue before the country was the power trust, and his demonstration that Governor Smith was in principle against and Mr. Hoover for it must have had effect not only throughout the West, but in the East. Not in many years have the newspapers printed as many speeches of public men at full length as in this campaign. Mr. Norris's appeared in full, or in admirable abstract, in most of the great dailies of the Eastern seaboard, besides being featured in the West. More than that, he reached great multitudes through the radio. It is to this wonderful device, we believe, that the huge increase in registration was due. Together with the prejudices and passions aroused by the religious and prohibition issues in this campaign, the radio has done what all the societies formed to get out the vote have never been able to accomplish.

THE HAPPY WARRIOR, Al Smith, in the last week of October must have suggested to the startled and horrified Republicans that Sudanese of whom Kipling wrote:

An 'appy day with Fuzzy on the rush
Will last an 'ealthy Tommy for a year.

With extraordinary elan Governor Smith carried his fighting into Republican territory and achieved the greatest popular receptions on record in American political campaigns. Not Bryan, not Roosevelt equaled them, and the oldest reporters who accompanied the Governor to Boston were profoundly awed and impressed not only by the unprecedented magnitude of the crowds, but by the deep and almost religious fervor which seemed to move them. Something deep has been reached in many citizens' breasts; some well-springs that ordinarily are never found by political divining-rods. Crowds, of course, do not mean votes. But the Republicans were none the less frightened, the betting odds sank, and the American correspondents of British newspapers cabled that Mr. Hoover's election was not after all assured. Without regard to the outcome the Governor deserves a vote of thanks for having at last lifted political campaigning out of the dull, vapid banalities and stupidities to which it has been reduced by years of Harding, Coolidge, Hoover, et al. He has struck straight from the shoulder; he has gone right at his man. He has inaugurated a great public debate and, thanks to the radio, he has made millions listen to that debate. What a good time Al has had, and how much good he has done too!

AS FOR HERBERT HOOVER, he is, as we write, dangerously near to becoming laughable. At least the fiction that he is a great and farsighted statesman is well punctured. Take the case of the extra session which late in October he promised to call, if elected, to provide farm relief if not granted by Congress prior to his taking office. Mr. Hoover never dreamed of promising this in his speech of acceptance. When Governor McMullen of Nebraska came out and stated that he had had an interview with Mr. Hoover promising the extra session, this was denied by Mr. Hoover's political headquarters on his behalf. After the lie had thus been given to the Governor, Senator Borah declared that he would get the extra session, and get it from Mr. Hoover he did. Soon after the Senator had seen the great candidate the extra session was announced. It is needless to say that if it had not been for the reports brought by Senator Borah and others as to the swing to Smith among the farmers, and the bolt of Senator Norris, Mr. Hoover would never have mentioned the extra session. Similarly, all the additional stops that were put into Mr. Hoover's Western itinerary were the measure of Mr. Hoover's fright.

THE POVERTY OF ECONOMIC THOUGHT in the old parties was never better revealed than in the exchange of unpleasantries between Smith and Hoover concerning socialism. Hoover called Smith's stand for the government development of water-power "state socialism." Smith retorted that if he was a socialist, then ex-President Roosevelt, Hughes, and Nathan Miller were socialists. Neither in Hoover's attack nor in Smith's rejoinder was there any recognition of the fundamental fact that our economic life is so interdependent that it must be controlled by some kind of government, either the invisible government of great corporate wealth, which is supreme today, or a democratic organization representing the people. Have we gone backward since 1924 when this issue was forced into the foreground by La Follette? Certainly Norman Thomas was justified in declaring in his Buffalo speech:

Mr. Hoover calls his capitalism "rugged individualism" and professes to find some peculiar virtue in the wasteful and chaotic mismanagement of coal, in our frantic real-estate speculation, and in our gigantic corporations owned by irresponsible absentee stockholders. He ignores the waste, the poverty, the tyranny, the threat of war which arise out of our attempt to control the essentials of modern life for us all under the law of the jungle. Governor Smith's vindication of himself is more triumphant than he may think. If he is a socialist in the same sense as Hughes, Miller, and the other Republicans whom he cites, he is not even a progressive, let alone a socialist.

IS THE UNITED STATES by implication being committed to indorsement of the Japanese program in Manchuria? Certainly the Japanese are eager to have that indorsement; and the report that the National City Bank is floating a $20,000,000 loan in behalf of the Oriental Development Company, a semi-official Japanese enterprise for economic development of Manchuria and Korea, points in that direction. Unfortunately the State Department policy implicitly gives a government indorsement to projects which it does not disapprove. It asks bankers to show it their foreign-loan contracts before consummating them, in order that it may express objection if it is so inclined. Obviously, it cannot object to Japanese commercial enterprises in Manchuria, but equally obviously, American loans to Japanese enterprises in the northeastern provinces of China, at a time when Japan and China are in acute if disguised conflict over the status of Japan in those provinces, will be regarded in the Far East as approval of the Japanese program. A similar question arose a year ago when J. P. Morgan and Company had under consideration a loan to the South Manchurian Railway. It was in itself a reasonable loan, but the international implications were alarming. The protest in China was enormous, and eventually the project was withdrawn. The Nanking Government has just asked its minister in Washington to inquire about the reported National City Bank loan, and thus a storm seems to be brewing. If American bankers wish to lend money to the Japanese Government, they would do well to lend the money direct to the Government; for when American dollars go to support a semi-official Japanese enterprise in Manchuria the project assumes aspects which are diplomatic and political as well as financial.

BOTH CANDIDATES for the Presidency of Nicaragua have asked that the United States agree to supervise the Nicaraguan presidential election of 1932. This declaration was made a couple of weeks previous to this year's election and presumably indicated that neither candidate felt sure of victory and that both wanted to curry favor with the American army officers conducting the poll. It is only fair to General McCoy to say that he has been most scrupulous to maintain complete impartiality between Adolfo Benard, the Conservative Party candidate, and José Maria Moncada, the Liberal general who laid down his guns, at $10 per gun, when Henry L. Stimson ordered him to, and later became the Liberal Party candidate. But the Yankee officials tipped the scales when they refused to permit the new Nacionalista Party, which was frankly opposed to the American occupation, to enter a candidate. Under ordinary circumstances the Liberals are probably in a majority in Nicaragua, but Moncada has groveled so before the Yankees that he has lost favor with many even of his own party. It is said that each of the two candidates came out for marine rule until 1932 in order that, if his opponent were elected, the loser might be assured of a fair chance to regain power four years hence. There is something in this argument; there is also a great fat joker. It will take more than four years for Nicaragua to learn to operate the machinery of democratic self-government without flaw (it seems to be taking the Anglo-Saxons, Irish, Italians, and Slavs even longer); and if the United States starts in guaranteeing honest elections in the rest of the world it is undertaking a superhuman job.

GERMANY CONTINUES to give the world an excellent illustration of the efficiency of unified railroad control. The German railroads not only serve as the hub of the transportation system of Europe, but they provide for large payments to the Allies under the Dawes plan. The German Federal Railroads Company, which under the Dawes plan took over the railroads from state control, is the largest individual employer in the world, having 700,000 officials and laborers on its pay roll. Contrary to the popular American dogma, the lack of competition from large private railroads has not rendered the huge organization indifferent to the welfare of its workers and passengers. The corporation is vitally interested in a safety and health campaign among its workers. The German plan of national railway unification has served as a model for Central and Western Europe, and some day it may well serve as a model for the United States.

AFTER A LONG STRIKE against the firm of David Adler and Sons in Milwaukee the Amalgamated Clothing Workers delivered what was in effect an ultimatum. Settle the strike now, said the union, or your workers will never return to you. The Adler firm and the clothing manufacturers generally regarded the threat as a piece of strike strategy designed to bolster up declining morale. What was their amazement when the union presently opened up its own Milwaukee shop with a parade of 500 strikers to its new factory. The clothing industry was profoundly stirred when it was discovered that the new union factory was under contract to produce clothing for the world's largest clothiers, Hart Schaffner and Marx. This firm has been traditionally friendly to the union and its continued prosperity has been based in no small degree upon the hearty cooperation of the Amalgamated in maintaining productive efficiency. In fact, according to a writer in the Daily News Record, the trade journal of the men's clothing industry, "although the manufacturing department is in close touch with everything that goes on, it has for some years shared initiative and actual if not nominal authority with the workers' organization."

MAN NOT ONLY PRESUMES to measure the heavens but to talk about them in terms of millions of light-years' distance from the earth. The largest telescope in the world is to be erected at the California Institute of Technology at Pasadena, with a power five to ten times as great as any telescope now in existence. The great reflecting mirror is to be 200 inches in diameter and of fused quartz instead of glass; a mountain top will be found from which the new giant will sweep the sky. It will take years to cast and grind the mirror; and the funds for the enterprise, which are to be provided by the International Education Board of New York City, may easily be more than a million dollars. This is typical Americanese, of course; we have the "best" and the "biggest" and the "highest" and the "greatest." But not only in America are the figures used to describe astronomical calculations staggering and for the layman incomprehensible. It means little to read that the great new telescope will penetrate hundreds of millions—even billions—of light years into space; it is a little more definite to learn that whereas the largest existing telescope, that at Mount Wilson Observatory, now brings about a billion stars within range, the new marvel will add half a billion more to that number. Thus the average man will read about the telescope and marvel; and will marvel more at the sight of the moons of Jupiter some clear night, shown for a nickel through a little tuppenny telescope on the streets of any great city.

THE MANCHESTER BRANCH of the British Building Trade Workers' Union has demanded the resignation of George Hicks, secretary of the executive council, because he accepted Winston Churchill, Chancellor of the Exchequer, as a member of the union. Mr. Churchill applied for membership after he had done some amateur bricklaying on his estate. The branch suggested that the membership fee paid by Mr. Churchill be returned to him.

Winston Churchill laid some bricks,
And built himself a cottage
Somewhere down in Kent upon
His quite extensive lottage.

Thus, having proved himself a man
In fields not only vocal,
He paid his dues, threw out his chest,
And joined the Layers' Local.

But bricklayers are sturdy folk
Who stand for no such ruses;
They scratched his name from off the books
And sent back Winston's dueses.

(Softly)

Now Churchill lays a lonely brick
And mutters as he mortars:
"Ah, Labor, rue the day you scorned
Your best of all supporters."

Ten Years of Republican Germany

TEN years—since the armistice, since the overwhelming defeat and disaster; since the days when, overnight, Kaiser and kings, princes and grand-dukes fled, ancient governments came crashing down, a couple of millions of German soldiers came stumbling home. Beaten, betrayed, outraged, eager for revenge, they found only starvation, utter spiritual and physical misery, brother shooting down brother, murderous marines, monarchists and Spartacides, battles in the streets, enemy troops in the beloved Rhineland, utter chaos, utter despair. . . . Upon these foundations it was necessary to rear the German Republic!

That it has survived is one of the miracles of our age. Woodrow Wilson helped to call it into being and, on behalf of the Allies, solemnly promised that if it came to life it would be received with acclaim, with generous friendship, with sympathetic understanding even in a war-torn world. It came to life—and every Wilson promise was broken. While the American commissioners (except Mr. Wilson) protested and Herbert Hoover fought like a tiger to give the Germans food, hundreds of thousands of them, the youngest and the eldest, the poor and the weak, died for lack of nourishment—in the name of liberty, to make the world safe for democracy. Upon half the palm of one hand the writer of these lines held, in Dresden in February, 1919, the official food ration for an adult for one day—just one mouthful of incredible odds and ends that passed for nourishment. No parent knew how or where to feed his crying child; no child but witnessed the agonizing suffering of father and mother. No wonder that there were suicides by the thousand, that men and women courted death with indifference as shot and shell roared through the avenues of Munich, Berlin, Leipzig, Halle, and all the rest; that warring bands suddenly came out of nowhere to attack without warning, as if with no purpose save to kill and be killed.

These were the birth-pangs, this the bloody parturition. In this agony, literally under fire, the government was made over while kept waiting for six months to learn the crushing terms upon which the new-born Republic was to be allowed to struggle for existence; then to be faced with the most staggering financial penalties—not today fully defined and limited—ever fastened upon a conquered country. Next came a further invasion of German territory in flagrant violation of the Allies' own treaty, and, finally, a complete currency collapse and financial ruin. What other people could have passed through such an ordeal by fire and by torture and still survive? Not more than one or two others, especially if the new government were beset by Communists on the one flank, by monarchists on the other, with the center menaced by party strife, by factional bickerings and jealousies in which men utterly forgot the necessity of a solid patriotic front to the conquerors. To remake the Prussianized bureaucracy of the Reich would itself have been a challenge to all the statesmanship that remained after the debacle. To build anew while battling for life against the forces of reaction and despair, of hate and oppression—that called for Titans. Few of those who witnessed the struggle in 1919 believed that any democratic government could survive. Not in fifty or a hundred years, wrote the soberest and kindest of foreign journalists, could this country recover from the disaster the Kaiser and his government had brought upon it.

Ten years only have passed. What an incredible change! A country still torn by political strife, still somewhat unclear as to its political aims, still not quite sure of its destiny, stands out as further along the road to complete recovery than some of the conquering nations. More than that, it is safely republican. Monarchists there still are a plenty; and Communists as well, but the 14,889,000 Germans who voted in 1926 to deprive the princes and kings of their fortunes wrung from the toiling masses during long centuries attest the stability of the new order. No careful observer today fears the return of the Kaiser; that is unthinkable. Every year that passes decreases the number of those who are still devoted to the old regime and increases the number of full-fledged voters who were children when the monarchy fell. True, no great statesmen have come forward save Rathenau and Stresemann, but what other country can boast of more than one strong man? Certainly neither the United States nor Great Britain has the right to chide on this score. Yet the great fact remains that somehow, in some way, the German government has gone on and achieved gloriously. Not without traitors in the camp, not without dissension. But no one can deny that it has shouldered its burden with sincerity and determination. That it has to this day met every demand of the fulfilment program cheerfully, loyally, and fully, is the constant testimony of the American Commissioner of Reparations.

The right of the German government to the acclaim of the world on its tenth anniversary does not, however, rest either upon its refusal to yield to anarchy, or its restoration of domestic order, or even its fulfilment of what seemed utterly impossible demands. It has embarked upon a noble and wise policy toward Russia; it has humbled its pride and entered the League of Nations in the face of great domestic opposition. Far more than that, it has voluntarily performed an act of renunciation without parallel in modern history: it has forsworn revenge and has given the world its pledge never again to seek Alsace or Lorraine. No one not profoundly versed in European history can measure the significance or the greatness of this act. For the struggle over Alsace-Lorraine does not date back merely to 1870. From the days of Charlemagne this territory and the Rhineland have been fought over again and again, with first France and then Germany the aggressor. Had the Germans decided to cherish their desire for revenge; had they erected their statue of Strassburg at the Brandenburger Thor patterned after that in the Place de la Concorde, we should have had no guaranty of peace in Europe. Of their own accord the Germans have accepted the existing French boundaries as the definite delimitation of Germany's Western frontier, and thereby written finis under one of the bloodiest and most disgraceful chapters in European history. A foremost American statesman and diplomat has said to us that he knows no chapter in history to surpass this renunciation in wisdom, in courage, and in moral grandeur.

It was this that paved the way to Locarno, for this offer was made many months before Locarno, under the rule of Chancellor Cuno. As for Locarno itself, it still stands out as an extraordinary achievement of good-will, vision, and reconciliation. If its brilliance is somewhat tarnished now, the fault is not Germany's. It has been true to the pacts in deed and in spirit. Those who have dimmed their glory have been others in other lands. This joint outlawry of war along the Rhine for one hundred years paved the way for the Kellogg treaties. If the latter are perhaps merely a gesture, still they point the path for humanity to take unless it is to perish by gas and by bomb. It was Germany which was the first to sign the Kellogg Pact without the slightest hesitation or cavil, while England and France bargained and amended and weakened the document. The world may doubt the sincerity of some of the signers who are still wasting treasure in armaments precisely as before; it cannot question the honesty of the German signature. For Germany is pacific and disarmed. We are quite aware of the French charges that Germany is drilling and arming under cover, but that is nonsense; no country could conceal the huge fleets of trucks and tanks and cannon and airplanes a fresh contest would demand. Despite occasional revelations of secret hoards and secret military cliques, Germany is disarmed, and the bulk of her people thank God for it and stand for the Stresemann policies, however difficult the Allies make the retaining of confidence in those policies. Without fear of denial we say that if the German Republic had achieved nothing else than these advances toward peace on the Rhine, it would have justified its existence ten thousand times.

Nor must we forget here to pay our tribute to President von Hindenburg. We were among the disappointed and the skeptics when he took office; we feared a President who had borne arms and still treated the Kaiser much as a ruler. But this extraordinary old warrior has so clearly proved to be the right man at the right time that we must record our tribute to him, to his fidelity to his oath of office, to his trust. Incidents there have been to make one have regrets—but how few and how insignificant in view of his traditions, his old associations! He has never rattled the sword in its scabbard; he has never sought to interfere with the Reichstag or any ministry, and he has helped to compose more than one ministerial crisis. He has held the country together; his mere presence in the Wilhelmstrasse fetters militarists and monarchists alike.

That reconstruction has in many respects cost the Germans dear cannot be denied. If suffering and poverty have compelled heart-breaking work, and the loss by the workers of many hard-won privileges, at least they have brought with them the anodyne of engrossing labor that made multitudes unable to take part in party or social strife. Despite at times alarming unemployment, the Germans have toiled as never before; their old established industry and innate love of order have helped them over their hardest of times. Not that the individual has again reached the pre-war plane of safety and comfort. For millions upon millions all security for old age has disappeared—pensions, savings, insurance, all have gone by the board. Multitudes exist only by the generosity and self-sacrifice of others; multitudes can never live to regain their former state. For the widows, the single women, the orphans, and the impoverished generally, the crisis remains acute; little of the increasing prosperity of the nation as a whole has as yet filtered down to them, although the economic life in various phases is about the same as in pre-war time. But the road before the country remains difficult; the burden of the reparations must continue to rest squarely upon the backs of the producing classes, and must bend and bow them down.

Again, the financial control of the Reich by the Allies has played directly into the hands of the great capitalists. The trustification of Germany has gone on apace, and not only within its own borders. The trusts have crossed the national boundaries. They have made their peace with the Allies. Indeed, they have split those Allies. Certain German industries, by striking hands with those of Luxemburg, France, and Belgium, are presenting a united front to Great Britain and are seeking to rival the United States itself. It is probable that the passage of industry through this era of practical monopoly will prove to be more of a benefit and less of a danger in Germany than has been the case in America. As has been said before, the Germans have some sense of state. But the trade unions have been rendered almost powerless and the worker too often reduced to the lowest level upon which he can keep body and soul together. All in all, the juggernaut of capitalism has grown to greater and greater size, fostered by the Dawes Plan which may yet result in the wrenching of the German railroads out of the ownership of the state and of the people in order, among other things, that the capitalistic world shall not again have such an example of admirable and successful government operation of railroads. Under the shelter of foreign domination evils are arising which may yet challenge the existence of the German Republic, precisely as in America big business has taken over the control of our political life.

Let no one assume from what has here been written that the German Republic is ideal, or that the task of remodeling the governmental structure is complete. The bureaucracy is not yet reorganized; the dead hand of the dead regime still rests too heavily upon the state. The friction between the several states of the Reich remains serious, and the lack of a definite majority government as well. The great thing is that time fights for the Republic. Each year the monarchy goes further into the background; each year the Kaiser and all the trappings of his rule are more and more forgotten. Each year we believe the Republic will continue to progress, not because of any imitation of America, or any alliance with the great industrialists of other lands, but because of the innate characteristics of the German people themselves. Industry, thrift, respect for letters and learning and science and the academic life—these remain. Not the shifting of the wealth of the people, nor the rise to the surface of the war-profiters and of the get-rich-quick gamblers of the inflation period can dim this German respect for the captains of the spirit and of the mind.

There were always two Germanys, and the finer one must and will survive, despite too great sentimentality, too great self-esteem; in political life, perhaps, too great individualism. But whether this is correct or otherwise, the past is secure. For all the dark side of the past ten years, the German people have every right to consider the past decade the proudest in their national life. It is easy to be great when rich and powerful and on a tidal wave of material success; it is another thing in days of disaster and disorder and despair. Like the individual, that nation is greatest which in a time that tries its citizens to their inmost fiber remains captain of its soul and, accepting its fate, publicly reverses its policy and leads the world by the longest steps yet taken toward peace and human brotherhood.

The Nation's Presidential Poll

WITH this issue The Nation closes its Presidential poll, giving a tabulation of the results by States.

The poll was limited to our 25,000 subscriber-readers in the United States; there was no practical method, we regret, of reaching the 12,000 to 15,000 of our friends who buy their copies from newsstands. The response has been far higher than we anticipated, 53 per cent of the ballots sent out having been returned. We attribute this partly to unusual interest in the election and partly to the unusual devotion of Nation subscribers to their paper.

Our object in the poll was to bring out the political choice of the progressive-minded, intelligent voters in the United States whose influence largely transcends their numerical strength. We do not, we are sorry to say, reach all such persons, but we have been called the best barometer of liberal opinion in the nation. It is inevitable that a poll of our readers should show a much higher sentiment for Smith and Thomas than that prevailing in the country at large. The only surprise for us has been the strength of the Hoover vote, due in the main probably to the feeling of prohibitionists that a ballot for Smith would weaken, morally at least, our anti-liquor legislation. The total vote in The Nation's poll was 13,390, divided as follows: Smith (Democrat), 6,872; Thomas (Socialist), 2,830; Hoover (Republican), 2,784; Foster (Communist or Workers' Party), 431; Rogers (Anti-Bunk), 27; Reynolds (Socialist-Labor), 19; Varney (Prohibitionist), 13; Undecided, 414. The Smith vote outnumbers that for all the other candidates together.

In addition to the—to us—unexpectedly large Hoover sentiment, we are struck with the considerable number of persons who were at pains to return us a ballot saying that they were undecided. Probably a far larger number in the same boat refrained from sending back their ballots. Most of the difficulty of decision has been between Smith and Thomas, and we venture to believe that rarely in our political history have the progressively minded been so torn between a desire to express their principles or to administer an immediate rebuke to religious bigotry and social snobishness as typified by much of the opposition to Smith.

The Smith vote is ahead of that for Thomas in every State. Hoover has a large lead over Thomas everywhere in the South except in North Carolina, and a somewhat smaller advantage in the Middle West and on the Pacific Coast, except in four States: Wisconsin, California, and Washington give Thomas more votes than Hoover, and North Dakota returns a tie. In the East, New York and New Jersey are the only States to give Thomas more votes than Hoover, but in Rhode Island and Connecticut the two men are tied. The strength of the Thomas vote is in New York State, where 930 of our readers declared themselves for him. Of these about 750 were in New York City.

We thank our subscribers for their enthusiastic cooperation in making the poll so inclusive and successful.

Borah and Hoover

THE following letter, with certain emendations, was sent by the Editor of The Nation to a prominent citizen in the Midwest who took exception to The Nation's severe criticism of the part played in this campaign by Senator William E. Borah of Idaho in supporting Herbert Hoover:

I have your long letter of October 9, and thank you for your frankness. Believe me you are not the only one who is shocked and pained and hurt. Those of us who have had faith in Mr. Borah, and have hoped against hope that he would rise to the opportunity and become, as he so easily could, a great national leader of the Progressive forces of the country, have watched his present acts with a sinking of the heart.

You speak of a man's having a right to be "regular" if he chooses. Of course, that is Senator Borah's privilege. But remember that this is the man who a few years ago denounced both parties as unworthy of public trust. More than that, there is no man in public life who has so violently criticized Mr. Hoover in public and private as Senator Borah. For him to turn around now and go to the other extreme of adulating Mr. Hoover, and declaring that he is the one man above all others to lead the country, is just a trifle too nauseating. A man must have some convictions, some principles, some standards of consistency, or else there is no use whatsoever of anyone's applying measuring-sticks of character, of public honesty, yes, of plain intellectual decency. It is bad enough to have Governor Pinchot climbing aboard the Presidential bandwagon when he, too, has fought and denounced Herbert Hoover, presumably because he feels that there would be no political future left for him if he did not do it. But to have Senator Borah make a nominating speech for Charles Curtis and campaign for Hoover is more than my flesh and blood can stand.

Do you know what Mr. Borah has said about Hoover? He charged him with "under the cover of honesty" permitting "the gathering of unconscionable profits from a charity fund." He charged him with permitting the agents of the meat-packers within the Food Administration to administer the industry so as to cripple their competitors and enrich themselves. "War powers," he exclaimed, "war powers used to destroy competitors and build up private fortunes! No man who has such perverted views of decency ought to be intrusted with unlimited power to deal with $100,000,000."

On another occasion he said: "I will incorporate some figures later which will satisfy the Senator of the scandalous extortions of these companies from the people of this country. I do not want any man to operate a trust fund by my vote who thinks that those figures represent decency or honesty." Mr. Borah then charged Hoover with having made a secret agreement with the packers to dispose of their accumulated supplies of pork in Europe by the aid of this $100,000,000 appropriation. "Others may take what view they will," he said, "I cannot close my eyes to such a set of facts to my mind intolerable and indefensible." Finally, he charged Mr. Hoover with gross extravagance in the conduct of public business, and with permitting three food monopolies to run his office.

Now, it is idle to point out that in these speeches he dwelt upon the personal integrity of Mr. Hoover. He charged him at the same time with malfeasance in office, with permitting corruption, with assenting to the exploitation of the American people in war times. Good heavens! Are there any worse charges to be brought against an American? Stealing a few thousand dollars for oneself or accepting $100,000 in a black bag is not comparable to the malfeasance with which Mr. Borah charged Mr. Hoover. And now he turns round and declares that this is the one man we need to work out our national destiny! . . .

At least Mr. Borah before undertaking this change of face should have announced to the world that he grossly libeled and slandered Hoover when he made those charges, and that he wished to apologize for such monstrous wrongdoing. Then we could, perhaps, have respected him. As it is, everybody is suspecting that Senator Borah has been bought off by some agreement with Mr. Hoover in regard to his attitude toward the Kellogg treaties and the outlawry of war, if he is elected. I can assure you definitely of one thing, and that is that whatever influence Senator Borah had heretofore among the liberals of the country, there is none left today. Can you deny that if I, a private citizen, had made the charges against Mr. Hoover that Mr. Borah made under his privilege as a Senator, Mr. Hoover would have had me arrested for criminal libel, and would have sued me for civil libel?

You are right. The Nation has always stood for individual liberty, the right of every man to his own views and convictions. But it has also stood primarily for the right of independent and honest journalism to challenge any man who subordinates his convictions and beliefs to an emergency in which he thinks he or his cause may profit by compromise, by a glossing over of the truth, by embracing a man today whom one called a scoundrel yesterday.

Unregenerate Diplomacy

THE seeming innocence of the official text of the Anglo-French naval accord, which was published on October 22 in London and Paris, will deceive no one who goes behind the formal documents. Ostensibly Great Britain and France followed out the suggestion of the American Minister to Belgium, Hugh Gibson, and held a friendly little meeting of their own to facilitate agreement at the next disarmament conference. The official result of these conversations was an agreement to discuss the limitation of certain classes of cruisers and submarines at the next international gathering; the actual result was the creation of a new military alliance in which Great Britain wins a more secure control over European waters in exchange for France's right to dominate the Continent with a large conscript army. The American protest against the naval accord is doubly justified by the notes printed in the British "White Paper" and the French "Blue Book." One memorandum in particular shows that the accord was founded on a plain military bargain. It is the note given to the French Foreign Office by the British Ambassador to Paris:

Lord Crewe is instructed to add that this suggestion [acceptance of the British cruiser classification], recognized by His Majesty's Government as a concession to its view on naval limitation, permits it to give satisfaction to the French Government in withdrawing its opposition to the French point of view on trained reserves.

France emerges from the bargaining with the right to keep small submarines and a conscript reserve army while Britain wins French support for her small-cruiser program. But the British victory is of little value if the United States continues its opposition.

In spite of protestations to the contrary the Anglo-French naval accord is not dead. President Coolidge has said that the accord has been rejected by three of the five Powers, the United States, Italy, and Japan, and that therefore France and Great Britain are bound to revise it. As a matter of fact, Japan's statement on the accord is equivocal and meaningless, but this makes no difference because majority and minority votes are useless in reaching a final agreement. What matters is the sincere determination of every government involved to move as directly as possible toward genuine disarmament. The published record does not reveal such a determination either in Paris or London.

After many months of discussion the two chief European Powers abandoned faith in any thoroughgoing disarmament in Europe and agreed to support each other's favorite type of armament. That ugly fact drags the whole disarmament negotiations down to the level of petty military bargaining. The nature of the agreement was revealed with startling clarity in the French note of July 20 in which France proposes a permanent alliance if the accord is rejected by other Powers and the Preparatory Disarmament Commission is deadlocked:

Whatever the result, even should this hope [of the acceptance of the compact by the others Powers] prove illusory, the two governments would none the less be under the urgent obligation to act in concert, either to insure success by other means or to adopt a common policy so as to deal with the difficulties which would inevitably arise from a check to the work of the Preparatory Commission.

The Death Penalty

THE new evidence emerging in the case of Sacco and Vanzetti should make every person in the United States—from radical to reactionary—pause a moment and consider the death penalty as an instrument of justice.

Year after year men are hanged or burned to death in the electric chair, put beyond recall of judge or governor, and every year dead men are found to be innocent of the crime for which they died. It seems difficult to believe that any society—even one which clung to the pound-of-flesh theory of punishment—would continue to use a method of social reprisal which eliminates even the smallest chance of righting a wrong. Who is to claim the pound of flesh for the man who is executed and later found innocent?

Of course the chance of accidental injustice is the least of the reasons to abolish capital punishment. The social effects of this form of punishment are even more deplorable. One innocent man, killed by a fallible state, is of less moment than a whole community infected with a lust for revenge, with a heated, morbid curiosity, and a perverse excitement that leads decent people to become spectators of the horrors committed in the death chamber. The orgy of newspaper sensationalism and public hysteria reached a climax recently in the hanging of William Hickman—heralded in the San Francisco Call in four-inch headlines and three solid pages of pictures and lurid description.

Even more undesirable than either of these results is the continued spread of a belief in what some people like to call "retributive justice." "We'll get even with him" is the simple phrasing of the impulse that animates the state and the individuals that support capital punishment and all the harsher, more brutal, forms of punishment. Only by slow steps are science and the desire for social justice combining to create a new penology. The theory of crime as the expression of a disordered personality resulting, often enough, from intolerable conditions of life; the theory of "punishment" as a measure of cure and prevention—these take hold slowly in a society still dominated by a terror of "crime waves" and a passion for revenge. But it is by the gradual spread of this scientific attitude that we are emerging from the period of barbaric cruelty in our treatment of offenders.

Unfortunately some of the steps are backward. Italy has put to death the first person to be executed there in modern times, after restoring the death penalty several years ago. On the other hand, a commission of the Reichstag which is drafting a new penal code for Germany has been strongly urged by the German Minister of Justice to include in its proposals the abolition of capital punishment. In America, too, the movement to do away with this form of legal vengeance is gaining ground. The League to Abolish Capital Punishment reports that in several States this year bills will be introduced to wipe out the death penalty. An active campaign is planned in New York to push such a measure through the Legislature at Albany. To make the work nationally effective substantial funds are needed. Here, certainly, is a cause which calls for the support of every civilized person, without regard to race, color, or political creed. The address of the League is 104 Fifth Avenue, New York City.

It Seems to Heywood Broun

THIS piece must begin with the premise that somebody noted the fact that there was no contribution from Heywood Broun in last week's Nation. That, of course, is a dangerous assumption. All too clearly there lingers in my mind Bide Dudley's story of his return to Emporia. He had been absent for more than a year and as he strolled up Main Street with a suit case, after alighting from the fast express, it was his notion that some one of the natives would extend him a greeting of hearty welcome. He walked a block and no one noticed him, but at the drug-store corner there loitered one who had known him before he went to Kansas City. This young idler did greet him warmly. "Hello, Bide," he said, "going away someplace?"

Accordingly, let it be recorded here at the outset that there was no "It Seems" in the magazine last week. This omission appears to have been received quite calmly. Sirens did not shriek nor were any rewards posted in public places for the return of the fugitive. I had hoped for something quite different. Two weeks ago I ventured a somewhat mild attack upon The Nation in which I expressed the wish that the weekly had been more fiery in its support of Smith. On that account it seemed barely possible that after the Brounless number the rumor might get about, "The man's been fired once again." However, there seems to have been no commotion of that kind although a responsible editor informs me that there drifted into the office a fair-sized number of letters saying, "Congratulations on getting rid of Broun. The Nation gets better with every issue."

Although no public cause was involved in the period of recess it seems to me that a rather important personal principle was at stake. My inertia was not altogether without significant motivation. The problem goes like this: Should a regular contributor to a periodical continue to send in his article even when he has nothing whatever to say? In the past, as the readers of The Nation well know, I have always answered that question in the affirmative. Something of the old theatrical tradition—the curtain must go up—seemed to hold me within its spell. Hot or cold I laboriously set down one little word after another. And at the bottom of the fourth page of copy paper I stopped and called it an article.

By now I have begun to doubt whether this attitude is altogether noble and praiseworthy. My revolt against regularity was not conducted in any very dramatic manner. Instead of defying the managing editor by telephone or personal visit I merely sat at home in a big chair and let the minutes roll along until it was too late to get copy to the printer.

The laborer is worthy of his hire; the artist needs an occasional vacation. To be sure "artist" is used here in the looser sense. In fact I've always liked a definition of the word which is my own and runs, "Everybody on a vaudeville program except the trained seals." And possibly this very definition precludes my being called an artist by even the widest interpretation. Any columnist is spiritually a trained seal. Filling a column is work much like balancing an umbrella on the end of the nose or twirling a large rubber ball about. It is a stunt which must be performed over and over again. If the seal succeeds in balancing the umbrella with prettiness and precision he has his reward. It will be his privilege to balance the same umbrella at the matinee next day and so on through the season. And if the columnist does well there is every chance that he will be permitted to write more columns and after that more and more and more. And unlike the seals there is no closed season on columnists.

Nor need comparison be restricted wholly to seals. The columnist is also mighty like a Russian. I mean a Russian in his sled driving across the frozen steppes closely pursued by wolves the bite of which is even worse than their howling. He cracks the whip and beats his horse without avail. There is no shaking off these ravenous pursuers. Call them wolves or editors—it makes no difference. Under these circumstances each one, the Russian and the columnist, undertakes to solve his difficulties in somewhat similar fashion. Many a peasant has thrown his children to the pack in order to evade pursuit for a little while and I have often written pieces about my son and his amusing deeds and sayings. I've given my grandfather, too, and my religion and my taste in food and drink and dancing women. Indeed reticence itself I've thrown to the wolves and it never seemed either to satisfy or choke them.

But when a man has tossed over the side of the sled all his relatives, his anecdotes, and his enthusiasms then comes the pinch, the tug-of-war between peace of mind and a brutal conscience. It is at such times that the fugitive tries to fool the wolves with a bit of the dashboard or a little something that he wrote two years ago now happily forgotten. Subscribers to journals of opinion are little better than elephants. They do not fill their trunks with water and drench the offender but neither do they forget. Each revival is met, even though the first twenty words of the introduction have been carefully rewritten, with an indignant protest: "I've read that piece before."

To which objection I would like to make the blanket reply, "What of it?" Some of these old articles of mine I find very fascinating. In a deep drawer I keep several dozen yellowed clippings of columns which I wrote some years ago. Even to me, the author, the idea and the manner are often strangely unfamiliar. At times I've stopped while examining one of these all but forgotten masterpieces to ask "Did I write that?" I find my name upon the clipping and know it must be genuine and so I murmur to myself, "I must have been good then." Under the circumstances what is there to do but add a little polish and reprint it?

The labors of the writing man are always underestimated. It takes about an hour to write a page for The Nation. Do not express surprise; it does require all of that. Moreover, there is more to it than the mere business of typing. Occasionally one must pause to think, and to a man who has been a journalist for twenty years thinking becomes increasingly difficult. I wish the anti-Brounites among The Nation's subscribers would get together and make up a purse. If each contributed it would require very little from the individual. Given a reasonable endowment I will promise to write not a line for a year's time. I'll even promise not to think.

HEYWOOD BROUN

Stresemann

By EMIL LUDWIG

Have I changed my opinions? Of course. I do not think much of a man who is not wiser today than he was yesterday.—Abraham Lincoln.

“WHOEVER would play real-politik must also have daring dreams.” This bon mot of Stresemann’s is more characteristic of his education than of his way of life. It is a rare thing in post-war Germany for one of a literary turn of mind to take up politics. Before the war it was forbidden; one quickly became ridiculous in the Reichstag, and closed the doors of a Cabinet career upon oneself if one were accused of having written a book which was not merely political—a tragedy or even verse. Even the descendants of noble families, who occasionally displayed their decadence in verse, were very careful not to let their literary efforts go beyond the inner circle of their friends, much less to print them. One did not dream in Prussia; that was permitted only in Austria, where rigid discipline was much too wanting, as Viennese music indirectly proves.

It was also forbidden to study philosophy, even that of Hegel, which, after all, was royal Prussian. When Bethmann-Hollweg took charge of the government his enemies hugely enjoyed pointing out that this man had studied Kant. Only in a few isolated legations or consulates sat a couple of distinguished gentlemen who closed the chancellery doors tight when one of our kind appeared, and then enjoyed a real conversation. Only a few truly educated men ruled in the Wilhelmstrasse between the days of Humboldt and those of Bülow. Prince von Bülow was only able to conceal his unusual intellectual equipment through the charm of his conversation, which he so embellished with innumerable anecdotes in various languages that his education could not hurt him at Court. None the less, people laughed at him because he could freely quote from “Faust.”

The shadow which lies upon our young Republic comes first of all from the Social Democrats, who were earliest called to its government. Not only the nobility, but middle-class citizens and, finally, thousands of young Socialists realized with curiosity and astonishment the fact that the first popular representatives whom the nation picked to govern itself were for the most part even worse educated than were their aristocratic predecessors. Even if they had better manners than the public expected of them, they were still lacking in most of those things which at a turning-point in history a statesman ought to know if only for purposes of comparison and control. It was not sufficient merely to throw overboard Bismarck or merely to venerate the Republicans of 1848.

The first highly educated man to astonish the Germans and the world by his genius in statesmanship was Walther Rathenau; the second is Stresemann. Instead of the ministers who for thirty years had combined the education of corps students or of officers of the guard with the inherited and acquired routine of older, in some cases deserving, families of officials; instead of trade unionists and party secretaries, these astonishing men stepped forward and showed that they not only knew Goethe and Socrates intimately, but that they understood and could put their fingers upon the elements and the chief figures of Germany’s history. They made many a difficult question easier for the people to decide by analyzing its evolution and historic significance. Inborn oratorical ability, however different in the two men, enabled them to mobilize their education for the tasks of each day.

A comparison of this pair, the most important statesmen whom the Republic has produced in these ten years, illuminates many things, but their resemblance ends here. For, while Rathenau by education and character was driven to a more or less Tolstoian view of the world, which he unfortunately never translated into deeds and only partially expressed theoretically, Stresemann, the realist, the bourgeois opponent of socialism, is in sharp contrast to this reformer-nature. Stresemann has a surer political vision and much more precise political tactics. Rathenau was more a citizen of the world than a German; Stresemann is throughout and at heart German, and he undertook international politics only because he recognized their value for the Germany of today. Both believed themselves to be dreamers on occasions, wrote verse, and loved music, but Rathenau was in truth more of a philosopher than a statesman, and Stresemann organizes his dreams as if they were mathematical figures. The romantic undertone which both have heard in their hearts was more dangerous for Rathenau; for Stresemann it is an embellishment of life. The former belonged to an old and overripe race; the latter to a sober people determined to rise, whose strongest sons regard the collapse of their country, which is now almost a thing of the past, as merely an interlude. Metaphysically it was logical that Rathenau’s nature, made up of minor tones, should end in so senseless a way before the times were ripe for his ideals, while the active major strain of the other man is better fitted to rouse the country, and is therefore endured despite the fact that he does the right thing.

For six years Stresemann, despite his political past, has, in fact, done the right thing. And he does it at the risk of his life and the sacrifice of his health; he does it contrary to his former ideas; in a certain sense he does it in spite of himself. The son of a beer merchant in the east end of Berlin, he rapidly grew out of the atmosphere of the petty bourgeoisie by dint of his natural curiosity, his ambition, and his gifts. But when he, a young doctor of philosophy, wrote about the retail trade in bottled beer one saw at once how ready he was to tie up his economic studies with the things he had seen in his childhood, and he still pleases us by this same sort of realism. When he was secretary of the board of directors of the Saxon Industrialists, and later a sort of syndic for them, he was more concerned with the condition of the laborers than is usual in the position which he held, but less so than with the condition of the capitalists whom he served. It was surely natural that a young man who grew up in narrow circles should be more sympathetic toward the masters and directors of the international business world than was the son of the rich contractor Rathenau, who, according to the law of opposites and the trend of the times, was more interested in the lot of the workingmen than in the dividends of the manufacturers.

So Stresemann, who at twenty-six years of age fought in the Lower Chamber of the Saxon Parliament for the representation therein of big business, and who had been devoting his life to the expansion of German industry, found himself naturally drawn, in the Kaiser's Germany, to the political advocates of expansion. At thirty years of age he was one of the National Liberal members of the Reichstag, and he had to be at least as strongly national as he was liberal. But in 1912 he made a study of American industry and in a speech in Toronto, widely circulated by the Association of Canadian Manufacturers, he warned against a German-American war. At the same time he made the acquaintance of Woodrow Wilson, who impressed him profoundly. By 1914 he wanted to start with Albert Ballin, of the Hamburg-American Steamship Company, a German company for world trade—all of which showed that he was in truth an imperialist, but that he did not desire war as a means to economic power.

With the outbreak of the war, however, Stresemann's ideals changed. One cannot quarrel with him greatly because he assumed that the war had been plotted by England out of commercial jealousy, for that was a universal German formula at that time, and in his circles it became a sort of auto-suggestion. Much more unfortunate was his error in believing that England could be destroyed by submarines, that America was not to be feared, and that above all else Belgium should "never again become a glacis for England." (Glacis and prestige are two French words which did more damage among us Germans than all the French cannon.) He approved both of the violent treaties which Germany dictated in the East, opposed Bethmann, and as late as June, 1918, Kühlmann. But when one looks back with the perspective of ten years, though at least in the last case he was wrong, one cannot help admiring the brilliant speeches which Stresemann, energetic, optimistic, eager for action, blew into his trumpet, even if the trumpet had long been full of holes.

It is also in his favor that he did not on November 9, 1918, like so many of his associates, at once swear fealty to the new flag, but, on the contrary, warned against the dethronement of the Kaiser. Then he wavered, perforce, for a few months between the new and the old; he voted in the Weimar Parliament against the signing of the peace of Versailles, and spoke of the disgraceful days of the Revolution. At the same time he placed himself squarely upon "the platform of facts"—it is a wonder that this platform did not collapse with all the people who hastened to take their stand upon it! He even cautiously attempted to mediate at the time of the monarchist coup of Kapp and Ludendorff in March, 1920, and he denounced the general strike, although that was the only way to defeat those ill-prepared conspirators.

And then the irony of history called upon him to complete what he had damned for so many years. When Wirth and Rathenau, facing an outburst of anger from the nation, first recognized that Germany must begin to carry out the demands of her former enemies in order to convince them that complete fulfilment was impossible; when the great moral counter-offensive began which shattered the prejudices of the world against Germany (and was as clever at it was pathetic), Stresemann was in the front rank of those who fought against it. But he never did this with the comfortable rhetorical methods of the German Nationalists. He did not wish war, but negotiation, and he desired to carry out the duties imposed by the peace, not as duties, but only for compensation. He opposed unconditional fulfilment. For that reason he also supported Chancellor Cuno's fight in the Ruhr, and pleaded for passive resistance against the active invasion of the French. Meanwhile, through his founding and leadership of the new German People's Party, he had gained so much influence that the decision as to this policy in the Ruhr could not have been made, or at least not so rapidly, without his approval.

When, however, in the fall of 1923 he took over the government as Imperial Chancellor, it was Stresemann's first duty to abandon Cuno's fight in the Ruhr, and his second to carry on Rathenau's fulfilment policy. He used other methods, and it appears that his means were the more fitting. Above all, however, it was time—three years having passed—which justified the policy of fulfilment. In the hundred days of his chancellorship he prevented a threatened civil war by stabilizing the mark, and by this step made it possible that America, which meanwhile had become more neutral-minded than the countries most immediately concerned, should take up the problem of Germany's annual reparations payments. The Dawes Plan became possible only when the German currency which had entirely lost its value during the passive resistance in the Ruhr had again been stabilized. All of this could be achieved only by recognizing the treaty and repeating: "We shall pay." Because of those words Rathenau had been murdered. Rathenau's opponent, Stresemann, spoke them later and with much greater success.

At this later time, too, the policy was neither easy nor without danger. "Whoever opposes the Dawes Plan mobilizes one of the greatest world Powers against himself," said Stresemann, and when, in the Reichstag, a Nationalist cried out at him that he was making a splendid defense for the enemy, Stresemann, the composed and elegant debater, lost patience and judgment and shouted "Infamous!" at his interrupter. For the first time in seventeen years in the Reichstag he found himself called to order—an event of which he can, of course, be proud. But for a long time after that he was guarded by police whenever he went out.

When Stresemann had answered France's first threatening demand for reparations, his response to her next demand, for security, was almost foreordained. It had been recognized earlier that only a solvent Germany could pay, and that the economic interests of all the states concerned were interwoven. Now people began to understand that the states bordering on the Rhine were even politically much too closely associated to be able to live there peacefully without a definite agreement.

Here begins Stresemann's personal and historic service to Germany. Up to that time he had made clever moves which were instinctive. Now he began to force himself, for the sake of the fatherland, to play European politics. It was no pacifist and no philosopher who went forth to negotiate the Rhine pact; on the contrary, he was attacked by the pacifists, who at first could not follow his thoughts and were justified in questioning his motives. In the spring of 1925 he began to play for the future of Europe with a most clever note to France, a note supported, perhaps even instigated, by Lord d'Abernon, the English Ambassador in Berlin, and in the fall at Locarno he achieved far more than a mere treaty. "No country has been taken advantage of in Locarno, and none has triumphed," said Chamberlain. The leaders of the four nations met and came to know one another not merely as equals but as friends.

But the new Germany was so ill prepared for all this that Stresemann and his suite had to leave for Locarno from a railroad station which was barred to the public, and at an unexpected hour. On his return he read in a Nationalist paper that he was worse than a highway murderer. Stresemann accustomed the Germans to sit in the League of Nations, a step for which a few of us outsiders, despite the scorn of our countrymen, had been fighting from the beginning of 1918, a step which Rathenau had recommended in 1921. Only now, as a result of this fortunate chain of events, has Stresemann become European.

But it is merely interesting, and not very important, whether what is right is done because of an inner vision or whether understanding follows after the event. The important thing is that the right thing be done, and that is Stresemann's great service to Europe.

The Germany of Today

By IGNAZ WROBEL

EVERY nation sees foreign nations as types rendered coarse through ignorance and national pride, and with a chauvinism that is often dictated by commercial interests. Speech is not an unconquerable obstacle; a nationalist education is a much more serious one.

How does Germany look today seen from without? The American who wants to picture Germany to himself will disregard the average German-American publications, which are not entitled to, and are furthermore incapable of, giving any pertinent account of the new Germany since they know it only superficially, if at all. A people, like the American, who possess so strong a sense of reality, is not to be served up with outmoded ideology. Let us confine ourselves to the facts.

Two questions are constantly put to Germans by foreigners who want to post themselves on German conditions: Do you believe that there will be a new war? And is Germany really a republic, or will the monarchy come back? The answer to the first of these questions is that the fundamentally warlike character of the Germans has not been changed at all by a defeat which they do not like to admit. But Germany's physical position is opposed to this fundamental character; the country is overpopulated, and the present anarchy among the states is not calculated to make a government, law abiding in foreign affairs, out of a nation which has always worshiped force. But despite the wild efforts of the militarists, Germany is not preparing a new war, because its business men cannot profit by it at this time. Much more is the German ideal directed toward making as much as possible out of a new war which may be run off between other nations on another stage. Germany constitutes no greater war danger for Europe than any other state that even in this day and generation believes in its absolute sovereignty and is prepared to defend it with force of arms at all times. The secret preparations which Germany actually was making under the now overthrown War Minister Gessler have as good as ceased in this form. What is carried on today is a far-sighted military policy furthered by the very clever and very dangerous General von Seeckt, and furthered also by the industrial interests, above all by the dye industry, which has big stakes in the preparation of poison gas and other new war materials. Europe is not pacified but peace will not suffer today or even tomorrow.

As far as the other question—that of the possible duration of the German Republic—is concerned, it is not correctly put for Germany. It is much less important for modern European states whether they are organized as republics or monarchies than what economic forms they make use of. In Germany of late there has been a considerable readjustment of wealth, as Morus in his work (published by S. Fisher, Berlin) has pointed out, but the basic economic character of the country has changed only in one aspect; it is an approach to something which we might call state socialism, if by that we understand an administrative control of heavy industries by the state, a control whereby the thing controlled is many times more powerful than all its controlling organs put together.

Hence a return of the monarchy in Germany seems improbable to me, because the monarchists have no important candidates and, above all, no candidates on whom they can agree. Catholic Bavaria and Protestant Prussia will not unite so easily on this question. The Kaiser has not played for a long time in Germany the role ascribed to him abroad; he is in the process of being forgotten, and it is indicative of the eternally non-political thinking of the sentimental Germans that his shady dealings in money matters, his desertion of the army, and all his tactlessness have not injured him so much as the fact of his second marriage. This has estranged him from many of his closest followers.

The consequences of the Treaty of Versailles should not be overestimated in spite of all propaganda. It is not true that Germany is impoverished—the country did lose a great deal through the war, but if large sections of the population are badly off today, it is above all the fault of bad organization which frustrates consumption and pays attention only to production without troubling itself who is to make use of the produce or who can. The standard of living of the Germans compared with American ideas has never been very high and is not so even today; the standard of living of a middle-class employee who earns from $35 to $40 a week is not a high one, while his pleasure in life is less than his surprising and rather stupidly disciplined elasticity. Germany, especially in the North, is not a happy country.

It is not happy because the idea of "service" dominates life—"service" with an entirely different meaning from that of the word in America, which country Germany is trying to imitate, but in many fields merely succeeds in caricaturing. Instead of the management of industry in Germany, as in many other modern countries, being reconstituted on commercial principles, the industries here have been reformed with the political government as a model; the bank clerk in Germany is glad to call himself an "official," which lends him dignity in his eyes and a higher social standing. This results in a certain ceremoniousness in practical business which writes, catalogues, specifies, and organizes far too much, so that one can say that in Germany one man works for every thirty-three who organize his work. This is a burden on business which is not without its dangers.

What the German intellectuals, the liberal spirits, and a portion of the workers suffer under is a constantly increasing reaction in the courts, the government, and in domestic policies; in which connection, however, Prussia, in spite of its former reputation, seems freer today than the other federated states, for example, Bavaria with its scandalous government.

The personality of the President of the Reich has not so great an importance in this connection as is perhaps assumed by people on the outside. Of course, the great majority do not revere the President of the Republic as a man, but just as Germany in official reports continues to be referred to as the Reich, so the masses see in this sober and dutiful man the imperial general whose decisive defeats in the war have not injured his reputation in Germany in the slightest; the people's training on the drill ground has proved too effective for anything else. Hindenburg keeps his oath to the German Constitution and has greatly disappointed his monarchist and strongly reactionary followers; a coup d'état or anything else faithless is hardly to be expected from him.

It is strange how Germany is represented abroad. The German Ambassador in Washington belongs to the best people and there has appeared elsewhere in diplomatic circles a type of German who must even now give foreigners the impression that the whole country consists of correct but not very intelligent and altogether unintellectual caricatures of the imperial era. Even after that gentle German disturbance, to which we have given the name "revolution," we have refrained from disturbing the privileges of the old officialdom. The respect which was formerly paid to party functionaries who got into power, and who were sly, limited petty bourgeois, was by tradition far too great, so that, especially in the foreign service, a group of officials has remained at the helm which even today represents Germany in an unfortunate manner.

I know that the profoundest needs of the European states will not be so interesting across the ocean as they are to us; the American quite rightly wants to know merely how things are going in Germany, whether or not he can do business with the country, and what sort of people they are. Let him be told this much: The Germans are the same people that they always were: thorough, very industrious, good workers, intelligent, clean-cut, and energetic, with all the disadvantages accompanying these qualities, which can very easily be parodied. Added to this, there has existed since the war a somewhat noisy national feeling, which—like the sacrificial attitude of the ex-Kaiser—is surprised if you take it at its word. It blares away on its trumpet and is astonished if you interpret its signals as an alarm. If things go well, it stands by its lesson of force. If things go badly, it possesses, as the Viennese, Karl Kraus, has expressed it, "a vengeful innocence." The Germans are bad losers.

The American point of view which sees the Continent as one whole Continent is right and understands our times: instead of this patchwork of states we need the United States of Europe, for pacifying the world.

The German Social Democracy

By EMIL RABOLD

EVEN parties are subject to old age. If they do not understand how to stay young by infusions of new blood, they have as little chance of escaping the law of death as any other forms of life.

The German Social Democracy has become an antiquated party. Not only are its acts in open conflict with its original program, but they often conflict with a constantly rejuvenating social life. They no longer express the requirements of social conditions, and they collide more and more frequently with a realist policy which must be directed beyond the small or petty advantages of every day to the great goal of creating a new future for the world.

The road that lies behind the Social Democracy is a long one. Its founding took place in the period of the establishment of the German Reich under Bismarck, in the heyday of the creation of the new German Empire. With the revolutionary objectives it then had it seemed to the wielders of power like a dangerous creation, damaging and dishonoring the greatness of the Reich; and Bismarck made a bold attempt to annihilate it with his special laws, an attempt on which he himself foundered at the end of his rule. The years of the anti-socialist laws were the fire in which the Social Democracy forged its weapons for the struggle in the coming decades. They were shining and naked weapons with which that generation of leaders, tried and strengthened by the special laws, struck their blows against the political follies of Wilhelm II. They did it with so much address that the party's following continued to grow larger and larger, so that not only the workers flocked to the Social Democratic banner, but also the active elements among the intellectual bourgeoisie felt themselves, the nearer the World War came, more and more drawn to the Social Democracy.

The party lost much of its rallying power as the war went on. Called in the hour of need, by the leaders under Wilhelm II, to participate in the defense of the fatherland, the Social Democracy thought it saw a new era dawning. The party which until that hour had always been reviled and scorned was now suddenly utilized for positive accomplishments and it carried them out without even presenting counter-demands to those who were demanding help. As a result the attitude of the Social Democracy in the war was frequently distinguished from the policy of other parties more by nuance than by fact. It had become an almost involuntary tool of the imperial war policies. This drove away from its banner not only the toiling masses which had so long followed it, but even the bourgeois intelligentsia, who, in so far as they succeeded in drawing the veil from the war and seeing the naked interests behind it, turned from the Social Democracy and strove to realize their former ideals under braver party symbols.

The downfall of the imperial power in November, 1918, took the Social Democratic leaders as much by surprise as it did the most tried supporters of the Throne. The members of the Social Democratic Party had dreamed of a victorious war and a social empire that would give them opportunity for a series of far-reaching reforms, for which the Social Democracy after it had committed its original sin with the outbreak of the war (which was soon followed by others) strove, while holding the outbreak of a revolution impossible. Out of the fragments of the debacle arose the Republic, whose social form was no cause for joy to the masses who had formerly belonged to the Social Democracy and to whom the goal of a Socialist state was still worth striving for. Generations had fought for it. Now they saw that all that had happened was a change of rulers. The social conditions remained the same.

The Social Democracy believes that the social basis of the Republic permits only of a sharing of power. Now, there is almost no such thing as politics without compromise, but opportunism must have its limits somewhere. Compromises at all costs in the end weaken the party, rob it of its force, make it an accommodating football for its opponents, decimate its following who demand tangible political results or turn away disappointed and try their luck with its rivals, who seem to offer them better chances for fulfilment of their desires. In Germany the Social Democrats have found their most powerful rivals in the Communists, who have undertaken to carry on the Socialist policies from the point at which the Social Democracy stopped before the war. The leftward swing of the masses is going on unceasingly.

To the unfortunate organization of functionaries and paid officials which every large party produces in the course of its own growth the Social Democratic Party has added a wholly new group, a limitless sea of higher state and municipal officials, lifelong members of the party, whose worry about existence has been lifted from them and who, in accord with their altered economic circumstances, advise an altered party program, that is to say, one more and more deviating from the policies of socialism.

This altered sociological structure of the party corresponds with its changed political tactics and it is therefore not to be assumed that the party will rejuvenate itself from within. It will split on the rock of compromise and will be weakened by lack of new blood which can come only through the youth. But this youth does not happen to be in the Social Democracy any longer. It goes in for sports, or it is Nationalist, or—Communist!

The Revolt of German Women

By CARL VON OSSIETZKY

MUCH has changed in Germany in the last ten years, but still more, despite new trappings, remains the same at heart. The politicians are not much cleverer than they used to be. The tradespeople have a somewhat larger spirit and feel injured when one charges them, even in jest, with respectability. They adopt a pose of refined and lax business morals. They consider that international and, if you will excuse my saying so, American. But behind this frivolous attitude one occasionally catches a glimpse of a good old-fashioned German donkey's ear. All this is not new. Even the high military officers are just the same as they used to be, and if they were not so weak they would repeat the old stupidities. The only thing in Germany which has fundamentally changed is the German woman.

I am aware that there is a certain exaggeration in so summary a judgment. I know that there is a great working-class stratum, a sort of sub-humanity, whose conditions of life have not changed since Pharaoh's day. There woman is the traditional beast of burden for men and children; femininity dies in the endless march from stove to washtub. And I do not deny that in the bourgeoisie there is a type which preserves its morals, prejudices, and clothes unchanged from a vanished age, which wears its hair as the Crown Princess did in 1905, as a sort of shibboleth against the madness of today, or twists it into a thin knot at the back of the neck as an expression of the protest of the German spirit against those forces which have taken away from us not only the Kaiser but the holiness of matrimony and the sacred shimmer of virginity. I am thinking, however, of the vast army of women who have been forced by modern progress into industrial life, who are working in every conceivable profession, and have even created new professions for themselves. They make the picture of the great cities. They determine the forces of our outer life wherever industry, business activity, and production are at hand. The independent working woman is the representative of her sex in Germany today, not the woman whose activity is confined to the domestic circle.

Berlin reporters are always happy when distinguished foreigners inform them that Berlin women are the chicest and most elegant whom they have seen upon their travels. I do not take that very seriously and I am convinced that the gentlemen would make the same comment in San Luis Potosi or in Vladivostok. But I should like to emphasize the fact that the Berlin streets are never more charming than in the afternoon between five o'clock and eight when the women are coming home from business. There is a breath of serenity, of freedom in these armies of women, some of whom are going home, not for the rest or pleasure, but to more work and domestic duties, and almost all of whom are overburdened with financial worries. In the old days the streets were at their brightest in the promenade hours, at shopping time, when the ladies of the virtuous middle class took their clothes out on display, when their daughters promenaded with their intendeds, and the daring married woman with her cicisbeo. But that is all gone.

The type of the German woman today is precisely the same as everywhere else in the world—short hair, short skirts, flesh-colored stockings. The current lines of fashion are strictly adhered to; gymnastics determine the figure, Coty the perfume and color. The articles of clothing which are not usually visible are the empire of the new silk industry in Germany. It is the same as everywhere else—equalization, standardization. Class distinctions are being erased. Caste characteristics are disappearing.

Perhaps the change was sharper and more violent in Germany than elsewhere. The war took the women out of their protected homes and heaped upon them a burden of responsibilities. The revolution bestowed upon them civil rights for which they had never fought a mass battle. The high priestesses of women's rights never had much volume in their voices. The struggle of the individual woman who had become conscious of the narrowness of her bourgeois existence was always directed rather to social and human than to political emancipation. She was fighting for self-determination against the dominance of her family, for the right to win or lose a living; fighting, in sum, to make her own choice of a husband or to share her life with the man of her choice without a wedding certificate. This is the classical theme of emancipation literature from George Sand on. In 1914 the case of women's freedom in Germany was still desperately bad. The women and girls who espoused such ideas were considered either outlawed or insane. Ten years later the battle had been won along the entire front, and today anyone bothering to discuss the right of a woman to her own social and erotic existence would make himself absurd. Freedom has conquered.

As often occurs, the battle was won quite accidentally without a conscious struggle or a program. None of the old apostles of women's rights dreamed of such a dizzy victory for their ideals. The great magician who accomplished the change was inflation. Inflation disappropriated the old bourgeoisie which had lived upon its income more radically than any German Lenin could have done. The war destroyed the conventional sex morality, and love emerged, stripped of imported romance, as an imperative physical necessity. The public liquidation occurred in the winter of 1919 when the men came back from the war; it arrived in Berlin, and later in all the big cities, in the form of costume balls at which all the avidity of a long-suppressed vitality broke out with orgiastic vehemence. That winter the old morality was strangled by confetti streamers to an accompaniment of fiddles and clarinets. The new principles were simple enough: we want to live, and life is short. . . . Then came the three years of depreciation when money lost its value. Poverty, instead of skirmishing about the upper and lower borders of society, struck straight at its heart and dispossessed the strata which for a century had been the bearers of German civilization and had crystallized their ethical standards into law. Fortunes exploded between morning and evening. Property which had been nursed and increased through generations turned into mere handfuls of bank notes which at a telephone call from the Stock Exchange degenerated into a matter of pennies. Then a new and shameful army of parvenus marched upon this ruin as into a conquered city and dragged the women of the conquered houses with them like camp-followers. There was an unprecedented clearance sale of the moral accumulations of a century. Good solid married women who had had to carry the burden of keeping the family going sold themselves for hard cash, and their husbands looked in the other direction when they did not themselves take over the management of the business. Sheltered girls in whose presence no improper word had ever been spoken sold themselves; their parents kept silence when they did not act as intermediaries. Sexual morality does not drop upon us out of the ether, but is very primitively related to the general economic circumstances. The year 1923 was an impressive demonstration for those who would derive morality from an inborn instinct for the noble and beautiful.

We are back in a period of calm today. The bacchanal reached its end, and the maenads looked about for work, and when they found it, it seemed as if they had always had it. The matter-of-course manner in which they went into purgatory and came out of it is perhaps the most important characteristic of these years. No emotion, no pathos. Many sank into the lost army of street prostitution, which in Germany as elsewhere recruits its members from the unemployed in times of crisis. Today the new status has established itself. Women are an intimate part of industrial life and even those who do not need it seek a profession. The good, do-nothing, home girl who was led about by a holy alliance of aunts and relatives and had to wait for a husband chosen by her parents has entirely disappeared. The number of wives who are so dependent upon their husbands that they have to put up with their ill humors has markedly decreased. There has been a vast increase in the number of free unions which can be dissolved without great external difficulty. The trend to erotic self-determination has won the day with the women; and thus a new element has come into society, which cannot be described in traditional terms. The forms of the new feminine society are still uncertain. This at least is sure: the women are constantly evolving toward a new class predestined by the possibilities of their sex. They have one common trait: they have broken the solidarity of the old classes. The ex-aristocrat is attracted by bourgeois life, and the daughter of a common laborer, as salesgirl or stenographer, is striving toward the same goal. The middle-class girl throws herself into art and literature, enlarges the population of Bohemia, and popularizes the ideas of her friends.

It would take too long to go into the tragedies and comedies of this still undeveloped movement. But I may add a few words about the men, who, after all, are not quite indifferent. They have shown a certain talent in adaptation, but certain types formerly common have suffered a pretty complete defeat: the Philistine and the Don Juan. The first has lost his market value. His virtues no longer seem impressive, and his domestic constancy contradicts the desire for breadth and tempo. And what is there left for Don Juan? His melting eyes seem ludicrous, for they are no longer turned upon women who never look up without blushing. The lady killer can find no subjects to work upon. When women talk freely upon intimate subjects, openly stress the amusingness of love, and no longer load it down with the bad conscience and dark problematics of Ibsen's day—what is there left for the seducer? Poor Don Juan! Self-determination, and self-control; freedom, but renunciation of distant and cloudy Utopias—that is the unwritten but deeply felt program of our women of today. I should like to add as a postscript a document which once landed upon my editorial table and which shows how a clever woman who has much esprit and little money faces reality:

The trouble with modern men is their neuroses. Learn to understand their worries and juggle before their eyes a paradise of possible methods of escape. If you are yourself weak, for heaven's sake do not turn to your lover but go to a clever nerve specialist; he will advise you how to get along with neurotic men. Have nothing to do with men who dominate you. Sex docility may create a short and stormy joy, but you will buy it at the expense of your own personality. Never delude yourself with the dream of 100 per cent happiness. That is a criminal speculation. Content yourself meanwhile with 20 to 70 per cent cases; in the end they will add up into a stately total, and the time is short. And always remember that it is more blessed to give than to receive! Amen.

Amen.

Young Germany

By H. D. HILL

DURING the years 1922-1923 we read a great deal about the German Youth Movement. During the years 1925-1926 we read a great deal less about it, and the general impression was that it had divided, dissented, and died. Consequently, it was a little surprising, in the first week of 1928, to find a sky-sign across the front of the Leipzig station reading, "Visit the Young Germany Exposition," and to discover that in less than a month over 45,000 people had obeyed that injunction. The great majority of visitors were school-children who came in their class groups, but aside from the unemployed, who were admitted free, 12,000 tickets were used by adults, so that the spontaneity of a large part of the attendance seemed unquestionable. When one looked about at the people who were in the exhibition at any given time one saw, too, how widely the interest was distributed. Bourgeois with circumferential watch-chains, workers in rough clothes and shabby overcoats, deaconesses in starched white caps, scores of young men and women from twenty-five to thirty, all these were there in addition to hordes of small boys. It was obvious that the youth of Germany is still a matter of public interest.

Yet the present Youth Movement is not, indeed, the Youth Movement of the years just after the war. It is quite true that that movement is in a sense dead. The first years after the Revolution seemed to hold a promise of a new world built by an unshackled youth. The emotion of the nation's crisis, and the institutional confusion which accompanied it, temporarily unified within the movement a wide range of elements. But the old world proved to be made of stubborn stuff; little by little it became obvious that concrete programs, not mass idealism, were required to alter it; for many the exuberance of a new freedom was damped by the stark necessities of earning a living. The splitting up which followed was wholly natural. In the first place, the Youth Movement was approached by a whole series of older organizations eager to capture it. The drive which would accrue to whatever group could control its energy was not lost upon the political parties, upon the churches, upon various cultural groups such as those eager to preserve the traditions of the separate states, upon the government itself. All of these have made vigorous and in the main successful efforts to relate at least a part of the Youth Movement to themselves. The fact that there are almost 100 recognized youth organizations in Germany today bears witness to the extent to which division has gone. It has not been wholly due to outside causes, however: the problem of the different interests of succeeding generations has been felt—even in the Youth Movement. The pre-war youth movement of bourgeois origin, which was a revolt against middle-class formalities, is today without a base. The conventions against which it revolted have today the same somewhat stale flavor as the macaroon scene in "The Doll's House." The youth who sang around the bonfires of 1920 now find that they are slightly older; and that feeling is increased by the fact that the changes which were to make the better world in which they believed are coming at a rate less exhilarating than they had supposed. On the other hand, the youngsters who can only just remember the war, and who, since the stabilization of 1924, have been growing up in an improving world, treat life as a very normal affair. It is easy to understand their response to the call of the sport associations, groups organized solely for physical training and games, which were founded with an eye to filling the gap left by the discontinuance of military training.

There are 9,100,000 youngsters between fourteen and twenty-one in Germany; the youth associations number 5,516,200 among their members. While a few persons between twenty-one and twenty-five are included in the latter figure it gives a fair idea of the great proportion of German youth definitely organized. There is a considerable degree of liaison between the different groups. Their work is integrated on its administrative side by the Reichsausschuss der Deutschen Jugendverbände in Berlin, which arranges Tagungen, festivals and celebrations and speakers, and also assists in pooling the experiences of its members. The various states of the Reich are also in close local contact with the various youth organizations through their unemployment, health, and relief agencies. Further, through the Verband für Deutsche Jugendherbergen, they have facilitated the arrangement of summer tramping trips by requiring inn-keepers to take in wanderers and by either erecting new buildings or permitting the use of old castles for vacation homes and halting places for trampers; from 1920 to 1926 the number of rest-houses for the youth movement in Saxony alone grew from 72 to 155, and the number of persons accommodated from 13,000 to 245,000 per year. Still another relation of the states to working youth is through the development of the Volkshochschulen, for though the People's Colleges make no discrimination on the basis of age, at least half of their students are less than twenty-five years old. Likewise with regard to the libraries: 38 per cent of the readers in the Berlin city libraries are not yet eighteen. The contact of these government agencies with the youth groups makes the conditions under which the youth of Germany is growing up a definite interest of the state, and since 88 per cent of the youngsters between fourteen and twenty are earning their own living this means informed public attention to industrial problems of hours of work, wages, apprenticeships, housing conditions, health, as well as to spare-time activities.

There is a point, however, at which the desirability of these government connections may be questioned. One of the outstanding characteristics of the youth movement of the immediately post-war years was its spontaneity. To-day as well, if one chances, for instance, to talk with members of the Socialist youth movement, one finds a certain number of young men and women who speak with passion of their will to maintain a standard of life, and, beyond, to save that intangible which is known as personality. One is inclined to wonder how difficult it is going to be for them to maintain this attitude along with increasing administrative regulations; whether the aim of the members toward creating persons is going to clash with the preference of the organizers for dealing with types.

The Youth Movement has played, and is playing, a vivid part in cultivating a feeling for individual personal value in Germany. The gay costumes, the wood-carving and painting, the revival of folk songs to the tune of wayside guitars—the whole picturesque side about which so much has been published—are only the trappings of an inner idea. In so far as this idea is captured, the youth organizations will be turned into the agencies of an administrative paternalism; they will still be useful, but in a social-service sense of reparation for bad conditions left over from the past. In so far as the idea can keep its spontaneity it will be a dynamic in the growing republic.

Germany, an Economic Colony

By ROBERT R. KUCZYNSKI

ECONOMIC and financial recovery in Germany has made such enormous progress in the last four years that one might almost speak of a return to "normalcy"—if this recovery were not largely due to the influx of foreign funds, that is, to an artificial stimulus. Those foreign funds enabled the German borrowers to expand their business. With increasing economic activity, receipts from customs duties and taxes increased. The internal raising of reparation payments thereby became comparatively easy. Foreign exchange became so abundant as to provide both for the transfer of the reparation payments and for the payment of the ever-increasing imports.

A casual observer may indeed be perfectly satisfied with the present monetary, fiscal, and economic situation in Germany. He may point to the fact that production, real wages, stock dividends, railway earnings, and the foreign trade balance are pretty much the same as in pre-war times. Does this, however, mean that conditions are once more normal? The national income, to be sure, is steadily increasing. But how about the national wealth? If we understand by national wealth the assets of German citizens and public bodies minus their debts, we cannot escape the fact that the German national wealth is steadily decreasing. The Dawes Plan was to establish a foreign financial control of the Reich. It has, in addition, accelerated the foreign economic penetration of Germany. No one can tell exactly how large the German assets of foreigners are at this time. But we can make a rough estimate.

The railway bonds issued according to the Dawes Plan amount to 2.6 billion dollars. If we capitalize the reparation obligations to be paid out of the transportation tax (yearly 69 million dollars) and if we include the stock and bonds of German shipping companies, elevated railways, etc., bought by foreigners, the total foreign burden of the German transportation companies aggregates about 4 billion dollars. The industrial debentures issued according to the Dawes Plan amount to 1.2 billion dollars. If we add the foreign loans granted to German industrial companies and the industrial stock, factories, etc., owned by foreigners we arrive at a total of about 2.5 or 3 billion dollars. The nominal value of the German loans publicly issued abroad since 1924—excluding the loans to German industrial and transportation companies—is 1.1 billion dollars. If we add the other long-term credits and the stock, domestic bonds, mortgages, etc., purchased by foreigners (excluding, of course, industry and transportation), we arrive at another total of about 2.5 or 3 billion dollars. The pre-war value of the Berlin real estate owned by foreigners is 1 or 1½ billion dollars. The pre-war value of the total German real estate owned by foreigners in all probability is about 4 or 5 billion dollars. If we disregard the foreign short-term credits granted to German firms—because they may possibly be offset by Germany's foreign assets—and if we likewise disregard the other reparation obligations of Germany (yearly 229 million dollars to be paid out of the Reich's budget)—although they represent a capitalized value of at least 3 billion dollars—we arrive at a grand total of 13 or 15 billion dollars for the net assets of foreigners in Germany. Since the aggregate value of German property (excluding the necessary household goods, but including the property owned by foreigners) is probably 50 or 60 billion dollars, we come to the conclusion that at least one-fourth of the German property already belongs to foreigners. And this percentage is bound to increase since Germany's yearly foreign obligations, including reparation payments, amount to about one billion dollars, which, in part or wholly, will have to be borrowed abroad.

The similarity with pre-war conditions which Germany seems to present if one merely studies production, real wages, stock dividends, railway earnings, or the foreign trade balance is certainly most conspicuous, but it would be a big mistake to overlook the fundamental difference. Before the war, Germany was economically independent; today she is economically a colony. This, of course, does not mean that each individual German must be badly off. History, on the contrary, shows again and again that when a country is colonized, part of the natives succumb (like the German middle class), while another part is even better off than before the foreign conquerors came. But in comparing the economic condition of the natives before and after, one should keep in mind that conditions are not at all comparable, since the situation has fundamentally changed. We must in the future distinguish between the economic situation in Germany, which—thanks to the influx of foreign funds—is altogether progressing, and the economic situation of Germany, which—as a consequence of the foreign economic penetration—is altogether retrogressing.

There is, moreover, another most important factor which must be kept in mind in judging the economic future of Germany. The German nation has the reputation of increasing rapidly in numbers. As late as 1927 Germany indeed recorded 1,160,000 births and 757,000 deaths.

It may seem at first sight that an excess of 403,000 births is a proof of considerable vitality and it may even be assumed that by further improvements in public health the number of deaths might still be reduced. Yet, incredible as it may sound, those 1,160,000 births of 1927 mean that on the average each German woman during her lifetime gives birth to but two children, and that if the population is to hold its own not one of the children thus born may die before attaining parenthood. In case, then, that natality does not again increase, the population of Germany is bound to die out. This process, of course, will be slow. With the present age composition of the German population, which counts comparatively few old people, it will take decades until there actually will be an excess of deaths over births and it is quite possible that the gaps then appearing will be filled by emigrants from Poland or Russia. But there still remains the most noteworthy fact that Germany with her apparently strong vitality will in a not too distant future depend for her population balance on the influx of foreign people just as she now depends for her economic balance on the influx of foreign funds.

German Pacifism Since the War

By PAUL FREIHERR VON SCHOENAICH

SOON the tenth anniversary of the end of the World War will be here. Ten million men were killed, twenty million more have been crippled, and untold millions damaged in mind and body by military life. Billions of dollars have been senselessly squandered and the whole delicately ramified system of world economy thrown into confusion. And to top all this the victors are not in any way satisfied with the result. One might suppose that all thinking men would be trying to prevent the repetition of a like catastrophe. But what do we find instead?

Fire is everywhere smoldering under the ashes. Science and industry are concentrating on the invention and preparation of new and still more deadly death-dealing machines, while the nations themselves are many times more strange and hostile to one another than before the war. And yet it would be absurd to speak of the failure of pacifism. The notion that the war was a God-given necessity, not to be prevented by human will, is still deeply rooted in many minds, and the sufferings of the war have further bewildered such persons. To clear away this undergrowth requires long, hard labor. But when, ten years after the war's end, America, the strongest nation economically and politically on earth, lays before the world a pact condemning war, that is not to be counted as the least success of the labors of international pacifism. Of course, the Kellogg Pact is not yet a fulfilment, but it is a first step on the road.

Germany has taken first place in the development of pacifism since 1918. Germany's peculiar attitude toward pacifism is based on its geographical position. In a certain sense it is Europe's national thoroughfare. That profound impulse, deeply rooted in human nature, which drives the nations from cold to warmer climates and from inland to the seacoast, has often found its outlet across German territory. A nation living on such a thoroughfare must choose between being a bond between its neighbors or an arena for their neighborly disputes.

The German Empire in the Middle Ages attempted to be such a European bond. In the fundamental law of the empire, the so-called Golden Bull, it was expressly stated that, besides German, the Crown Prince must also be able to speak one Slavic and one Romance language. Unfortunately the emperors of the house of Hapsburg gradually neglected their European duties. Their dynastic stronghold, Austria, was more important to them than the empire. In this way gradually arose that rivalry between Prussia and Austria on which the old empire eventually went to pieces. The empire was later recreated by Prussia, though no longer in the sense of a bond between the European nations but as a German national state. In 1848 the democrats again demanded a greater Germany but Bismarck chose the smaller, under Prussian leadership. This solution was bound up with three successful wars. It also happened that the country's tremendous upward economic swing fell in the period following the restoration of the empire. Small wonder that the belief became rooted in the minds of the Germans under Prussian leadership that economic welfare and a warlike spirit are inseparable. This was also the period of the influence of the well-known historian, Treitschke, who advanced the fatal doctrine that the essence of the state is power, and all these points of view gradually produced a situation which culminated in the World War.

The task of European pacifism in general, and of German pacifism in particular, is now to create an entirely new spirit. But this will be possible only if Prussian Germany, which has heretofore been the cradle of the war spirit, again becomes the cradle of the peace spirit in the sense of the Golden Bull.

As I was myself brought up in the old Prussian way, and as I am one of the very few old officers who came to understand after the war what a fatally false road Germany had traveled, I should like to trace the development of post-war German pacifism through my own development. I hope that this will not be attributed to any presumptuousness on my part. I do it because, to a certain extent, I am an example, and because I have for ten years stood in the van of the struggle for peace. For thirty-seven years I was an enthusiastic soldier, and I hoped down to the very end of the war that some miracle might save Germany. My eyes first began to be opened when the press became free after the armistice. Then I first discovered that while the war went on the whole truth had never been told to us in Germany. To be sure, our highest military leaders did not deceive the nation simply out of evil purpose, but because they believed that it was necessary in order to keep up the war spirit. And in this lies one of the most dangerous errors of Prussian militarism, for it underestimated the moral value of truth even when it hurts, and overestimated the value of brute force. When I recognized this, my whole conception of life fell to pieces. I strove to orient myself anew and, as I hold self-deception fatal in such times, I never disguised my new attitude. There was soon a complete rupture between my old comrades and me. Whether my new concept is correct or not, history alone can tell. But I can certify one thing—that it was born of honest wrestling with my conscience.

As I had previously been greatly interested in political economy, it was the economic chaos resulting from the war which first compelled my attention. It became clearer and clearer to me that the economic interests of the nations are so tightly bound up with one another, as a result of modern industry, that no one nation can injure another without at the same time injuring itself. Besides, as a former soldier, I watched very earnestly the development of military technique. Not a trace was left of the once valued chivalry, spontaneity, and joyousness of war. The effects of the new death-dealing machines had become so frightful that the greatest possible gains can no longer compensate for the risks involved, and any further development must lead inevitably merely to a pitting of machines against machines.

As I did not believe in collectivism, basing my stand on my observations on compulsory monopoly during the war, and as I consider private initiative indispensable, I joined the bourgeois Democratic Party after the debacle. I described myself within the party as a pacifist for rational economic reasons. That there was an organized pacifist movement I did not discover until the year 1922. In the autumn of that year I came to know the chairman of the West German pacifists, Fritz Küster, who opened my eyes to pacifism. I was soon chosen a director of the German Peace Society and the German League for Human Rights, through which I made valuable connections with foreign pacifists. Since then I have spoken in public for pacifism eighty or ninety times yearly. I had to learn the art of popular and effective speaking as a young lieutenant studying in service. It is probably the only useful thing that I learned while a soldier. That I could employ this old remnant of my militarism in the service of peace, helped me over much embitterment that resulted from the rupture with my former comrades.

I dedicated the entire year 1924 to work for the betterment of Franco-German understanding. A speaking tour which I made, together with my friend, the French General Verraux, earned us, side by side with great successes in the field of pacifism, the foulest attacks of the German Nationalists. But in this respect I have finally learned to have a tough hide. I was never for a moment in doubt that there can be no agreement between pacifism and militaristic nationalism. Our struggle cannot be carried on by mildness alone. The sharpness of my tone may have repelled many friends who were sympathetic for purely ethical reasons, but the great success which I had in gaining recruits for the Peace Society showed me that I was on the right track. The German Peace Society is today a firmly knit organization, not too strong in numbers, but a tried and tested warrior.

The militarists and Nationalists do not consider their cause by any means lost, and it would be fatal for us to hide from ourselves the fact that they are today much stronger in Germany because the majority of the possessing class and the intellectuals who have passed through the Treitschke school, unfortunately including large sections of the Social Democrats, have at heart more and more espoused militarist ideas of power. We German pacifists see quite clearly that the profits in the armament industry have been one of the prime motives in every war.

In the last three years our struggle has been chiefly directed against illegal armament in Germany. This struggle has often led us into severe conflicts with nationalist justice. The national treason trials against the pacifists have become a public scandal which, in our opinion, has tremendously damaged Germany's standing in the eyes of the world. Our most recent work has been in the field of refusal to serve in the army. The stimulus to it came originally from the breakdown of the League of Nations on the disarmament question and also from the well-known action of the English parliamentarian, Arthur Ponsonby. In England, during the war, the movement was largely limited to the Quakers. Six thousand conscientious objectors were at that time languishing in prison. But today the War Resisters' International is a world organization of the most far-reaching political significance. We are going ahead on the assumption that if governments show no sense, the people themselves will have to help a little.

In the course of the last winter I said sixty times at public meetings in Germany, and twice in England, that the nations which have recognized that a new war will mean the death of human culture and civilization, have a duty to cry out loudly and emphatically: "If you statesmen and field marshals, you cannon and poison-gas manufacturers really want war then you are welcome to beat one another's brains out, but we won't have anything to do with it!" And I have heard these words greeted with a storm of applause everywhere. There are some pacifists in Germany who reproach us for being too radical. They should not forget that the war interests are in no way averse to sending the masses to the slaughter if it will increase the profits of the few. We cannot defend ourselves without a certain radicalism. It is possible to find today in the speeches and writings of German politicians words which eight years ago only a few courageous pacifists would have dared to utter. If these new unconscious pacifists are even now struggling against the word "pacifism" it is largely out of fear of the Nationalists and the militarists who are still very strong. One of my friends once coined the epigram that a pacifist is a man who, despite the wild outcry of his opponent, does voluntarily what his opponent will do too late from necessity.

On the whole, we German pacifists can be proud of the success of our work since the end of the war. With courage high, and full of hope, we enter on the second decade of peace.

Germany's Rehabilitation

By ARTHUR FEILER

TEN years after the collapse of the old German Empire German industry gives every sign of growing strength. It is still far from normal; it is still in a transition stage, in which a large part of the effort has to be directed toward repairing the ravages of the war and post-war days, making good lost opportunities, and laying new foundations. But since 1924—with occasional upsets—these efforts have been successful. In 1927, for instance, Germany produced an average of 15.59 million tons of coal (including brown coal) per month, as compared with 13.34 in 1913 in the same territory, or 17.46 in the full territory of the old empire. Analogous figures for iron give us 1.55 million tons in 1927 as compared with 1.20 and 1.83 in 1913. Since 1924 German industry has again had the sense of solid ground underfoot, just as the political state has shown itself stronger and healthier in the same period, and it has been fighting its way up the mountain. But behind this five-year period of growth lies the first post-war period, the years 1919-1923 with their burden of grim misery, when the new German state seemed to be doomed.

The German people is crowded into a territory which produces neither adequate foodstuffs for its population nor sufficient raw materials for its industry. The wealth of Germany is the willingness and capacity of her people to work. We must constantly import vast quantities of food and raw materials—and we pay for them in the work of our heads and hands, and in the manufactured goods which we export. That was the pattern of German commerce even before the war; and since the peace it has only been accentuated. For the territories cut off from Germany were in the old days lands producing agricultural and industrial surplus. What they produced for the rest of Germany has to be bought abroad by the smaller Germany. But everything which helped old Germany to maintain this balance of trade was taken from the little post-war Germany: our merchant marine was seized by the Allies, securities held abroad were confiscated, and German industries in foreign countries were ruined. All European countries had to struggle with terrific hardships to find their way back from a war system to peace-time economics, but for Germany the difficulties were vaster still. Even the blockade was maintained intact for months after the end of the war, and we received our commercial freedom only five years after ratification of the peace treaty; until then we had to give the victors complete most-favored-nation treatment, without compensation, while they could guard against German imports by all sorts of differential tariffs. And all these handicaps were imposed upon a half-starved people, completely without reserve stocks, with an exhausted agriculture, with factories out of repair, without raw materials for resuming production, without commercial facilities, without credit. And, upon such a people also fell the task, all the old centers of authority having collapsed, of reorganizing its state from the ground up—while in the East Russian bolshevism beckoned with its messianic hopes of a new communist society which, had the German workers succumbed to its enticements, would have meant for Germany even worse misery than for Russia.

All this must be recalled to understand the situation of those first post-war days. Many people abroad suspected that Germany consciously brought on inflation, and deliberately ruined her currency, in order to make payment impossible and to sabotage the reparations account. Such was not the case. The first governments of the republic repeatedly sought, by increasing taxes, to stabilize the government finances and the currency. But they were always too weak. And, again and again, when their efforts seemed to be at the point of success, violent attacks of the victors, or sudden new demands of the reparations creditors, interrupted and destroyed their hopes. The French invasion of the Ruhr in 1923 sealed the issue. The Cuno Government, weak at home, and without a clear understanding of the impending result, regarded the paper-money presses as the only means with which to finance the struggle in the Ruhr.

The complete collapse of German currency in the fall of 1923 was the end. But in this last collapse the German people found the will and force for its own salvation. A new government undertook to end the Ruhr struggle, to stop the printing of paper money, and to reorganize finance by ruthless increases of taxation and rigid limitation of expenses. It made a last effort to settle the reparations question, inviting the reparations creditor Powers to send experts to study Germany's capacity to pay and to draw up a comprehensive plan of payments—going back to a proposal made in his New Haven speech by Secretary Hughes as early as 1922. When the experts of the Dawes Committee met in Berlin they discovered that the most important things had already been done: the finances were on the path of reformation, the currency was stable, every head and hand in Germany was concentrated upon the single goal of working in order to live.

The Dawes Committee then did that without which all the German effort would have been in vain: its program guaranteed Germany a moratorium, during which it could grow back into a normal productivity, and it assured Germany the first-aid measure of a loan, which was automatically followed further by private credits. If these two measures—moratorium and credits—had been adopted immediately after the conclusion of the peace Germany would have been spared frightful suffering and the world and its industry violent shocks and crises. An important measure of internal reconciliation followed. It was an event of great symbolic as well as practical importance when the Reichsverband der deutschen Industrie, the national association of German manufacturers, publicly and emphatically came out for acceptance of the Dawes Plan.

The wisdom with which the experts of the Dawes Committee worked for the peace of Europe cannot be sufficiently praised. They took the reparations question out of politics and made it a matter of economics. And, however heavy the burdens which they imposed upon Germany, they nevertheless assured peace and security for a period of years. Time has proved, however, that in two decisive matters they misunderstood Germany's position. First, they underrated the effect of inflation upon Germany. They saw only that the inflation had virtually wiped out Germany's internal debt. But quite apart from the fact that a certain revaluation was necessary for the demands of subscribers to her internal loans, they overlooked the decisive fact that the dissolution of Germany's internal debt was counterbalanced by a sweeping decrease in Germany's capacity to pay taxes. Certain groups or individuals had profited by the inflation, by borrowing money and paying it back in deflated paper, thus acquiring possession of "real" values. But far larger sections of the German people had been robbed by the inflation not only of a considerable part of their income but of a large part of their capital. More, even those who profited by the inflation often reinvested their gains mistakenly and the result was bankruptcy.

Then the second gross error of the Dawes experts revealed itself. They believed that Germany's factories and mines were in sound and adequate condition, requiring only working capital in order to come quickly into competitive condition. This optimistic view of German industry at the beginning of 1924 has not been confirmed by the facts. For when the illusory prosperity of the inflation period had passed it was soon evident how seriously her isolation from the progress of the rest of the world during the decade 1914-1924 had affected Germany. She had a great industrial plant. But important parts of it were, in fact, antiquated, incapable of competitive production. The prices which German industry faced in the world market were crushing evidence of this fact. And when German manufacturers traveled abroad, particularly to the United States, they soon saw why: the industrial production of the world had made vast progress in that decade, while Germany had remained aloof. Lost ground had to be regained. And, so German industry set to work upon the vast task of modernization which has occupied the entire period since 1924 and is not yet completed. Antiquated factories stopped working; some were sold as junk and others were modernized; production was reorganized and standardized; a huge task of cleaning up had to be undertaken. The consequence was a tremendous need for capital. Not only working capital, as the Dawes experts had believed, but also vast sums of investment capital were required.

Other things which had been neglected for ten years had to be made up—particularly new houses had to be built to abate the crowded housing conditions. Germany's own strength was not adequate to the task. The people, after 1924, began to save once more and to build up their own capital—deposits in the German savings banks, which in 1913 amounted to about 20,000,000,000 marks, which in 1923 (when postage stamps cost billions of marks) had been reduced by the inflation to nothing, had by April, 1928, mounted again to 6,943,000,000 marks—109 marks per capita as compared with 291 marks before the war. Life insurance premiums, which also had been wiped out during the inflation, had by 1926 reached half the pre-war figure. And the total of new capital in 1927 had nominally reached the total of the pre-war period, although the world devaluation of gold gave it a real value of only two-thirds the previous figure. But even that was not equal to the need. For, even today, despite the lowered birth-rate, Germany's population increases by 300,000 every year; and, furthermore, the need caused a considerable change in the working habits of the population. Today many more women, old people, and people of the class which formerly lived on its income are engaged in productive industry—perhaps 3,000,000 more than before the war—and require raw materials for their labor. The capital which she could not obtain from her own savings Germany sought to make up by foreign credits, particularly in the United States. To find this help, to build up the necessary capital by foreign credits—these were conditions precedent to the rapid restoration of the last four and a half years. The amount of this new foreign debt—assumed by the towns and states for building and extending their electric plants, gas works, water systems, street-car lines, and other public utilities, as well as by private industries and by banks desiring to extend credit to their clients—is not less than nine billion marks. The interest and amortization upon this debt naturally constitute a further burden upon German industry. But one is justified in the hope that its strength is more than equal to the burden.

Thus Germany, far from fulfilling the prophecy of the Dawes experts that she would be able from her export surplus out of her own production to meet her own needs and to pay reparations, has passed through an investment period with the apparent paradox of an unfavorable balance of trade and great reparations payments simultaneously—a paradox easily explained by the inflow of large foreign credits. This is what we call the transition period, from which Germany has not yet emerged. Meanwhile, she works at her own development. The real test of her capacity will come when, with her war and post-war damages more or less repaired, she works for the world market with an enlarged productive plant, in order, without further foreign credits, to meet her own inner needs and also to pay such reparations as may be demanded of her.

Only then can it be said that Germany is back at normal—if in the ever-changing state of industrial technique it is possible to use that word at all. Germany will then be faced with the same task as the other industrial states—that of completing political democracy, and giving it inner reality, by industrial democracy. The young German republic has in its first decade taken important experimental steps in this direction—by recognition of the trade unions, by developing wage agreements, by introducing an arbitration system in wage disputes, by establishing works councils, by organizations for the supervision and common regulation of the great monopolistic industries. These are attempts to solve a problem which is common to all the great industrial nations and upon which in reality they must all work together. The fight against unduly high protective tariffs, which the World Economic Conference assembled by the League of Nations in 1926 properly described as the chief cause of Europe's troubles, lies in the same field. Germany has another particular task in her agrarian problem. The condition of her peasantry must be bettered, and Germany must look forward to inner colonization, developing small peasant properties in the regions of the great landed estates. These are tasks for the future. But the political prerequisite for them exists in political democracy, supplanting the former privileged status of certain groups by equal right for all citizens of the state. And that this political democracy, despite all its troubles and perils, has been able to survive ten years, and constantly to consolidate its strength, is the decisive contribution of the young German Republic.

German Foreign Policy

By LOUIS FISCHER

"OH to lose the next war," the patriot might sigh. For Germany is today as prosperous as most of the victors and more prosperous than some—for example, England.

I flew recently from the Lithuanian border to Berlin reading, very inappropriately, the "Fall of the Russian Empire," but receiving, from rich fields, clean, well-appointed cities, roads, and railway stations, impressions of the rise of the German Republic. In the capital, the evidence of German economic resurgence was everywhere: new buildings, better clothes, fewer bookshops, more autos (four times as many as in 1924, say the statisticians), obvious "Americanization" on the Kurfürstendamm and elsewhere. During my fourteen-month absence Germany had made easily noticeable strides forward, despite reparations, Rhineland occupation, a mounting foreign debt, etc. This is far from a paradise; there are unemployed who starve, war invalids who suffer; there are strikes and causes for strikes; there is a serious adverse foreign trade balance; there are many, many unsolved problems. Yet Germany has attained more than the "relative stabilization" which the Communists niggardly concede her.

This change is partly responsible for the Anglo-French alliance. Needless to say, the "naval compromise" between London and Paris involves more than fleets, and even if the cruiser agreement is dropped, the alliance will remain because one of the chief reasons for its existence remains: the resumption by Germany of her pre-war role as Britain's commercial rival. The revival of pre-war competition has revived the pre-war entente.

England can befriend one of the two great continental Powers, Germany or France. At Versailles the first signs of Lloyd George's pro-Germanism appeared, not unnoticed by Clemenceau. The succeeding years witnessed a diminution of Anglo-French cordiality and a crescendo of Anglo-German cooperation. Locarno meant that settlements between Germany and France would be effected through the mediation and on the terms of Great Britain. The subsequent Stresemann-Briand negotiations at Thoiry represented an attempt to cast off these "good offices" of the English. It failed because Wall Street and Downing Street objected, yet it marked the serious beginning of a Franco-German rapprochement which, though as distant today as ever, is a political and economic possibility.

German diplomats, in private conversation, make no secret of the fact that the British Foreign Office has put obstacles in the way of the Franco-German rapprochement. For its consummation would have excluded Britain from the Continent and isolated her in international affairs. With the United States and the USSR not her friends, she would have been left with Italy, a questionable reed and a potential liability, and with volcanic Japan. The rapprochement, moreover, promised further economic strength to Germany and further economic distress to England. These considerations reinforced the pro-French wing of the British Foreign Office. It had always been powerful. Sir William Tyrrell, formerly "permanent" head of the Foreign Office and now His Majesty's ambassador in Paris, was its patron.

Lord Northcliffe had stood for it and after his death the Times continued the tradition.

A strong faction in London, however, still yearned toward an alliance with Germany, partly in the hope that Berlin could eventually be weaned from her relatively friendly policy toward Russia. But when Lord Birkenhead's anti-Bolshevik ("golf") mission in the spring of 1928 failed to convince German diplomacy of the wisdom of turning a cold shoulder toward the commissariat, where Chicherin worked night and day, England was ready for an alliance with Poincaré. The renewal of the Entente, Chamberlain and Tyrrell reckoned, would keep France out of the Franco-German rapprochement, away from an agreement with the Bolsheviks, and away from the influence of America.

This alliance has a post-bellum history. At Versailles Lloyd George and Woodrow Wilson agreed to guarantee France against a German attack. The Senate's refusal to ratify the peace treaty made the pledge a dead letter. It was revived at Cannes, however, in January, 1922, when the British Premier offered Briand security against an unprovoked offensive from across the Rhine. Briand seemed inclined to accept, but Poincaré demanded more—an alliance, for which London was not yet prepared. And, above all, he wanted to be free to occupy the Ruhr. Both Poincaré and Lloyd George realized that close coordination of Anglo-French efforts would result in more moderate treatment for Germany. Hence the former rejected such coordination, while the latter urged it. If that was true in 1922 it applies with greater force in 1928 when it is as much to France's advantage to settle the Rhineland and the problem of reparations as it is to Germany's. The Anglo-French bloc, in other words, is directed against Germany yet it may help Germany in attaining the immediate goals of her foreign policy, especially since the Dawes system, according to British opinion, only provokes and facilitates additional German competition against England's trade. London desires reparations revision, and a final settlement answers French interests as well.

It has become a truism to say that time is on Germany's side. The longer Rhineland occupation continues the less Germany is willing to pay for evacuation. If the Allies do not temporarily ignore the Versailles Treaty—as they did in the case of the Cologne zone—the second zone will be relieved of foreign soldiery in 1930, and sixteen or seventeen months more of the occupation, after it has lasted for ten years, is no intolerable burden, particularly since it probably entails no serious economic loss.

The German government insists that Rhineland negotiations may be conducted parallel with reparations pourparlers but that the two must remain separate and distinct. By this stand the Germans wish to make it plain that after Locarno and the Kellogg Pact, and after their loyal fulfillment of the Dawes Plan and disarmament requirements, they have a moral right to evacuation free of charge. Such a position may be ethically sound, but Berlin knows too well that Rhineland and reparations are not to be divorced. Discussions in the past have coupled both and future conferences will likewise treat them as mutually dependent subjects. In the end Rhineland evacuation hinges on a reparations settlement.

Since this is so, since the Rhineland pawn check steadily loses value, since, moreover, France needs money for probable debt payments to the United States, Poincaré is in a hurry to reach a reparations agreement. The Germans, therefore, think it sound tactics to create the impression of not being in a hurry. They claim, with some justice, that the longer the Dawes Plan works the better its workings will convince neutral observers (Americans, mostly) of the necessity of reform. Yet in the absence of a fixed reparations total which Germany must pay as a punishment for losing the war, she may be pouring money into an empty barrel every time she deposits to Parker Gilbert's account with the Reichsbank. The Wilhelmstrasse's immediate aim, accordingly, is the determination of the size of the indemnity. French opinion seems to put it at forty to forty-five billion gold marks. German unofficial intimations hover around the thirty billion limit. In this connection, a suggestion that Germany take over all inter-Allied debts, assuming further scaling-down of reparations, might find an attentive ear.

For Washington to maintain stubbornly that reparations and inter-Allied debts are unrelated may be good election strategy and perhaps even fair foreign policy, but extremely poor economics. French, British, and German experts know that no settlement is possible without the United States or without consideration of war debts. The Allies and Germany will tinker with the problem. Only America can solve it. Because Washington temporarily rejects intervention in these matters, Germany cannot afford to antagonize either England or France. She will try not to. The Berlin Foreign Office says, in effect, "We must maintain friendly relations with Paris." Only rare voices assert the same with respect to England. For Germany and England cannot well cooperate economically, while Germany and France could. A Rhineland-reparations solution, furthermore, depends to a greater extent on Poincaré than on Baldwin and Sir Austen Chamberlain.

Some German parties, many newspapers, and not a few diplomats are apprehensive lest the need of putting pressure on Washington to help modify the Dawes Plan by revising the debt conventions draw Germany into a joint European front against the United States. The Social Democrats, most Francophile of German parties, could do the Vaterland no greater harm than by using their pivotal position in the Müller Cabinet to win concessions from France at the risk of reaping disapproval from America. Germany's best policy would be to let France and England fight their own battles with Washington on the question of inter-Allied debts. For America is Germany's firmest support. Germany does not underestimate the value of United States sympathy. She seeks to cultivate it. She demonstratively refrained from reservations to the Kellogg Pact unlike England and France. She follows the State Department's lead in China. She attempts to identify herself with American foreign policy, or, as in the case of Russia, to adapt American policy to her own.

For her immediate objectives Germany needs French agreement. To accept the advice of one or two well-meaning but somewhat unpolitically minded editors and court the hand of Italy—which would be like showing a red rag to France—might spell disaster. Nor is concentration only upon Russia feasible. Moscow's help is very indirect in reparations and Rhineland questions. The Anglo-French alliance was a rude shock for Germany and created the necessity for realignments and new friends. Party organs warn Germany that she must no longer play second fiddle to either England or France at Geneva. Germany should instead rally the smaller nations of Europe about her. Other observers point out, in particular, the possibilities of closer relations with the Balkans and South America. Still others direct their eyes to South America.

Matters remain in a state of flux, but that the new entente makes a great difference to Germany was extraordinarily clear in the case of Russia. In early August every German diplomat one approached poured fire and brimstone on the heads of the Bolsheviks. Purposeful misrepresentation by the daily newspapers of the proceedings of the Don trial in Moscow had created disaffection toward the Soviet Union which dovetailed well with a rather lowered temperature in German-Russian relations and which showed how difficult it was for Germany to pursue an isolated pro-Russian policy when both France and particularly England disapproved. (The mercury began to fall noticeably after the break between London and Moscow.)

But no sooner had the Anglo-French pact been announced than Berlin began to talk of resuming trade negotiations with Moscow, of granting credits, etc. Stresemann's last act before leaving for Paris to sign the Kellogg Peace consisted of pushing through with incredible speed a note which he knew would be welcome in the Kremlin. Briand's rude speech at Geneva confirmed Germany's worst fears. A policy of Western orientation only, the policy the Socialists would like to adopt, is obviously impractical. Germany needs Russia in case the necessity arises for retreat. The moment the Entente exerts too uncomfortable a pressure, Wilhelmstrasse, consciously or unconsciously, resurrects the bogey of the "Russian-German alliance." But it is more than that. Germany must lean on Russia politically, economically, and must look to her for military assistance. Russia, fortified by the red army, by merely passive behavior paralyzes Polish efforts against Germany. The army had its effect at the time of the Ruhr occupation and could again. Stories about secret war agreements between Germany and the Soviets may or may not have been true, yet the fact cannot be denied that the Bolsheviks want to see a strong capitalist Germany if they cannot see a communist Germany. England is Russia's diehard enemy. France, as the patron of Poland and Rumania and the partner of Britain, cannot befriend Russia. Germany remains, and the Soviet leaders are today facilitating the Russo-German rapprochement.

Germany, however, has too little international influence and too few long-term credits to bear the burden of an isolated pro-Russian policy. She is therefore now seeking American support. It need no longer be a secret that Germany mediated between the State Department and Litvinov with a view to the Soviet Union's adherence to the Kellogg Pact. Men who are responsible for German economic stability—and not without influence in the United States—would like to see American-German cooperation in Russian business. They say, however, that Mr. Hoover is opposed to such cooperation. And the Germans fear that direct relations between Russia and America may be achieved at their expense since the Bolsheviks undoubtedly prefer the better quality and cheaper prices of United States firms. This remains the problem: Germany's wish, on the one hand, to bring the United States and the USSR together, and the hope that she may not lose trade thereby. Recent economic developments in the Soviet republic may, nevertheless, offer a solution by forcing the Bolsheviks to buy goods abroad in quantities that would please both Germans and Americans—always, of course, assuming sufficient short-term and fewer long-term credits.

Before the Dawes era Germany's answer to the Anglo-French bloc would have been Eastern orientation, or Soviet Russia. Today the United States is a far better guaranty against excessive Entente pressure. The Easterners are moreover weakened by the hostility of Social Democrats in the Cabinet. America, however, is not enough. Because America is not a part of Europe Germany needs the counter-balance of Russia against the West. And as long as America refuses to entangle herself in European affairs, which means, concretely, to mingle inter-Allied debts with reparations, Germany will strive for a modus vivendi with France, even with England. At the same time, Germany must find new fields to conquer. She seems destined to become a banker of the Balkans, the engineer and railway constructor of Turkey, Persia, and Afghanistan (a development England will watch), and a big merchant in China. Germany is too rich, industrious, and cultured to remain permanently within the limits sketched by the Treaty of Versailles.

Post-war German Drama

By ERNST TOLLER

I HAVE been asked by the editor of The Nation to write a few words on post-war German drama. We are in the habit of using the term "post-war drama" without stopping to ask ourselves if there really is such a type, distinct in presentation, treatment, kind, and form from that of the pre-war period.

Did the war really cause this decisive change in German drama? Not at all. It is strikingly confirmed today, after ten years, that the present tendencies in the drama began their development years before the war, and that since then they have simply been in more rapid eruption.

The younger dramatists felt that an unbridgeable gulf divided them from the older generation. The struggle between the generations, the father-and-son problem, the fight between compromise and directness, between bourgeois and anti-bourgeois, had stirred young intellects before the war made a reality of what they had prophetically seen coming. To be sure, the war destroyed many moral and social, many spiritual and artistic values. But the foundations of these values had become rotten. In place of the idea, there had come to the fore a realpolitik which was leading to the abrogation of all reality. Freedom had become hypocrisy—freedom for the few, spiritual and economic bondage for the many. In the first dramas of Sorge, Hasenclever, and Werfel this hatred toward our elders was already smoldering. And these were the same elders who did nothing to prevent the war but, tricking it out in romanticism, pitilessly and unfeelingly sent battalion after battalion of young German manhood out to die.

During the war very little got to the public through the strict censorship. But after the collapse, every day brought new works from the newly liberated minds. The form which this art took was called expressionism. It was just as much reaction as it was synthetic and creative action. It turned against that tendency in art which was satisfied merely to set down impressions, one after the other, without troubling to question their essential nature, justification, or the idea involved. The expressionists were not satisfied simply to photograph. They knew that environment permeates the artist and is reflected in his psychic mirror in such a way as utterly to transfigure this environment. Expressionism wanted to influence environment, to change it in giving it a brighter, more righteous appearance, to make it impossible, for example, for a catastrophe like the war ever to threaten mankind again. Reality was to be comprehended anew in the light of the ideal, was to be born again.

All activity resolves itself into outer and inner activity, both of equal importance and strength as motivating forces. In style expressionism was pregnant, almost telegraphic, always shunning the peripheral, and always probing to the center of things. In expressionistic drama man is no accidental private person. He is a type posited for many, and ignoring the limits of superficial characterization. Man was skinned in the expectation that somewhere under his skin was his soul. The dramatic exponents of expressionism were Sorge, Göring, Balach, and Toller. Of their works may be mentioned Sorge's "Der Bettler," Kaiser's

"Von Morgen bis Mitternacht," Hasenclever's "Der Sohn," Unruh's "Ein Geschlecht," "Der arme Vetter" by Balach, and Toller's "Die Wandlung" and "Masse Mensch."

During the epoch of expressionism a significant development took place. A new character appeared on the stage—proletarian man. Of course, there had already been plays whose action took place in a proletarian milieu. But something fundamental divided expressionistic proletarian drama from such a play as Hauptman's "Die Weber" or Bucher's "Wozzek." In the old dramas the proletarian was a dull creature who rebelled against his fate with strong but rash impulse. The artist who pictured him wanted to awaken sympathy. In the new drama, the proletarian is active, conscious, rebelling against his fate, and struggling for a new reality. He is driven on by feeling, by knowledge, and by the idea of a brighter future.

It is useless to talk of the fiasco of expressionism, or to ask whether expressionism produced works which will still be remembered in fifty years. Expressionism wanted to be a product of the time and to react to it. And that much it certainly succeeded in doing. Never since Schiller's "Die Räuber," since "Kabale und Liebe," has the theater been so much a rostrum for current happenings or so much upset by the strife and counter-strife of public opinion; passionate partisanship on one side, and violent one-sided reproaches on the other.

Ernst Toller

Let us examine for a moment the reproach of "tendency" leveled against expressionism. When a piece of writing portrays spiritual behavior, feelings, reactions to the phenomena of life and knowledge it does not seem tendential to the bourgeois, because these things have become traditional and because they express his conception of the world, his philosophy, his naked economic interest. He overlooks the fact that such writing also has a tendency, namely his own.

But when new observations are made in a drama, in opposition to those ideas to which the bourgeois has been accustomed, he calls such a work tendential. The atmosphere in any work of art, in so far as it transects a given social milieu, always has a definite impress that one is safe in calling partisan. There is, however, one type of partisanship which the artist must avoid, namely that partisanship of the black and white kind which depicts all persons on one side as devils of the blackest sort, and all those on the other as angels.

But since the spirit, the idea did not succeed in changing the character of the times; since the old reality with the old abominations, with the old greed, the old rapacious striving, the old danger zones, simply reappeared; since the peace which all were yearning for turned out to be a grin behind which the next war is looming; since the spiritual had again become a veneer and a mockery, younger dramatists appeared who thought that as the ideal was lacking there was no reason for it, especially in art. They set out to portray life and nothing but life. But the decisive thing in life for them was the uninhibited accord or antagonism of the sexual impulse. The chaotic, the sexual, became the focus of the new drama which tended to the epic in form. Side by side with this the struggle between the generations played a definite role. Speech became naturalistic again, but it was distinguished from the old naturalism by a dynamic impetus that gave it a distinctive rhythm. As dramatists of this type one may mention Brecht, Bronnen, and Kuckmaier.

The later German dramatists were unquestionably influenced by America, but the German brand of Americanism did not represent the great minds of America. What was taken over was the tempo, the banal optimism, the superficiality, in short that new matter-of-factness which has very little meaning and no connection whatever with the major arts.

German drama exists, as does all German art, between two worlds. The bourgeois world is spiritually and ethically convulsed and the world of the workers is visible as yet only among small or petty groups. The generation now thirty years old, the war generation, appears to be living in an interval of rest—a creative interval, let us hope. Those who knew the war as children barely bestir themselves. What work of theirs we see is classic, amazingly senile, and very seldom original. The last few years have given us several important novels (the novel seems to be developing in Germany for the first time and German novelists are now worthy rivals of French and English masters of fiction) but few dramas that one can call important or significant documents of the time.

In the Driftway

FOR some weeks the Drifter has been neglecting his correspondence. It isn't that he is lacking in appreciation of such favors. Failure to make use of letters from readers does not imply lack of merit, as the editors say in returning manuscript. It means simply—oh, well, decide for yourself what it means. The Drifter doesn't know, and he hasn't the time or money to be psychoanalyzed, which seems to be the only accepted way to discover anything about motives in these days. But as the Drifter opens his correspondence file his eye chances on a number of communications which deserve to be rescued from obscurity. For instance, Wilma M. Straus sends this note from Richmond, Virginia:

While I was at a summer camp for boys this summer in Pennsylvania something occurred so beautifully unusual that I thought I would share it with you.

The boys had been introduced by a very remarkable person to the joys of nature study, particularly butterflies. One day, in the midst of an exciting game of baseball, a rare butterfly flew across the diamond. And these young Americans left their bases and chased it.

So you see there is great hope in American youth, though we try to drown it all in sports.

* * * * *

U M-M-M, yes; probably so. But the Drifter finds his feelings a little mixed over the incident. Ardent devotee of nature that he is, he fears there is something abnormal in any group of American boys which allows a baseball game to be interrupted even by the Day of Judgment. More in keeping with the American scene is the information from J. B. Day of Alexandria, Virginia, that the doctrine of service has been extended to include "readiness to serve" and that a charge is made for said "readiness." To prove his point the Drifter's correspondent incloses a bill sent to him by the Alexandria Water Company in which that philanthropic enterprise lists as one of the items: "Readiness to serve and meter rental." Translated into plain English this means simply: "We are ready to take your money." But who isn't? And usually without charge.

FINALLY the Drifter turns up a letter from Celia Baldwin, writing from Denver, Colorado. She recalls a screed of some weeks ago in which the Drifter lamented that pasteurization had taken the flavor out of cream. The letter goes on to say:

For many, many years, as a housekeeper, I have mourned for some good old-fashioned sour milk, "such as mother used to make." Time was in which we could take left-over milk, let it stand till it became bonnyclabber, and then make a delicious, cool dessert by adding sugar and nutmeg; or heat it into a toothsome cottage cheese. No more, alas, no more. Keep pasteurized milk to the clabber stage and you have a loathsome, putrid mass which you hurry out of the house as you would any other dead body. And that is what it is. All the life has been taken out of it by pasteurization. I did not understand this until Lida B. Russell, M.D., somewhat of a medical heretic, explained that pasteurization destroyed the lactic acid. She said furthermore that this deadened milk was unfit for the human stomach even before it became putrid.

A Final Word

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Not as a personal favor do I claim your space for a last-minute statement to those prospective Smith voters who are afraid of throwing away their votes by voting Socialist. I wish I might claim space to cite reasons, born out of experience, for my high hopes of my party as the pioneer and teacher of that great political movement that is coming into being. We have been sadly impeded by the failure of many progressives to come to our aid at this psychological moment and by the failure of liberal papers adequately to understand or report our campaign. But that is water over the dam. In spite of it we are in good shape to push that intensive building in localities for which under American conditions a national campaign and a national movement are essential. We shall go forward whatever our vote, but of course every vote for us will count not only for its immediate effect on the victors but for its help in the essential task of building a party which does not belong to big business, a party of ideas and ideals. In other words, you do not throw away your vote when you vote our ticket.

But if you vote Democratic! First, you'll almost certainly be on the losing side and if your candidate should win you will lose. You will have to hire some theologian or liberal editor to explain why your Democratic vote doesn't mean what Raskob's or Frank Hague's does. Not since some of you started out to liberalize the World War have you undertaken anything so hopeless as the liberalization by your feeble influence of the party of Hague and Tammany, of the Southern racial bigots and mill-owners, of Raskob and his associated millionaires and open-shoppers. It is to these men that Governor Smith will be indebted if he wins and to them he will pay his debts.

You won't get beer legally, for the overwhelming mass of Democratic Congressional candidates are politically—not otherwise—dry. You won't kill bigotry, for the Catholic church is more solidly behind Smith than the Protestant is behind Hoover, and the Democratic appeal in the South is mostly to an appalling racial bigotry which Governor Smith has never rebuked.

You won't even be indorsing a man with a genuine progressive record or progressive intentions. Whatever Governor Smith's virtues there stands the other side: his part in the impeachment of Sulzer, his veto of laws to prevent election frauds, his evasion of his pledges to support the child labor amendment, his choice of Walker, his utter failure to choose proper public-service or transit commissioners, his shocking use of Commissioner Van Namee as campaign manager. In this campaign he has gone clear over to protection, he has outlined no comprehensive foreign policy, no complete program for unemployment, no concrete plan for dealing with the injunction evil, no plan for coal, no taxation program, no real or comprehensive program on public utilities. Did ever candidate seek progressive support at so cheap a price?

Yet The Nation which most of the year takes a position adequately covered by the Socialist platform not only does not support the Socialist ticket openly but, in spite of some good articles and editorials, has failed to discuss adequately the very issues it has made its own. Nothing is more certain than that those of your readers who ignore these issues on election day will throw away their votes.

New York, October 22

NORMAN THOMAS,
Socialist Candidate for President

Religion Important

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: From time to time your paper has deplored the injection of the religious issue into the present political campaign. Is it bigotry and religious intolerance if I oppose a candidate's eligibility because of his religion?

Religion usually deals with two distinct subjects: the supernatural and the ordinary, every-day affairs of man. I have no quarrel with a candidate's beliefs regarding the supernatural purely, but a candidate's religious beliefs as they influence the mundane are of vital importance to us all. For instance, would I be guilty of religious intolerance if I objected strenuously to a Roman Catholic on the grounds of his religion's stand on birth control, education, the liquor question, its historic and doctrinal stand for the inseparability of church and state, heresy, its undemocratic system of ecclesiastical aristocracy, and its dogmatic position on what is moral and what constitutes morality? I hold that as religion exists today—strongly organized, dogmatic, dealing in the main with purely social affairs—every man's religion is my business.

An Oversight

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: May I ask through your columns what is the reason that, in the preliminary report of your Presidential straw vote in the issue of October 17, you make no mention of the fact that the name of Verne L. Reynolds, the Presidential candidate of the Socialist Labor Party, had been omitted on your straw-vote ballot, even after that omission had been called to your attention?

Rebuke

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: You love to discover inconsistencies between the creed and the deeds of the clergy, yet you, a liberal, are allowing yourself to be fooled by the old shell-game, Hoover or Smith, while I, only a humble and naive cleric, have never been deceived and I shall vote, of course, for Norman Thomas.

Lincoln, Nebraska, October 9

JOHN H. LEVER

For Foster

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I am a liberal, interested in a labor party for the United States. I am not a member of the Communist Party, and yet, at this crisis in American politics, I will cast my vote, the first vote I have ever cast, for William Z. Foster and Benjamin Gitlow. It may be but a vote cast in a negative direction, but at any rate it will be an honest vote.

I am too close to the labor movement to have faith in Smith as a champion of the proletariat. His present record in New York proves that the proletarian bringing his dinner-bucket of age-old wrongs to the Autocrat of the Fishmarket will get but short shrift. Hoover indorses Coolidge's record. That is enough. Thomas? A slightly cleaner and saintlier Al Smith.

I want to know why The Nation so completely ignores William Z. Foster and the platform of the Workers Party.

New Votes for Thomas

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: From now until election day we are going to lend every effort to aid in the election of Norman Thomas and the Socialist ticket. It would be useless indeed to espouse the liberal and labor cause and then attempt even mildly to register a protest against the present political and economic order by voting for a Democratic candidate. Only in the last eight years has Al Smith shown the slightest evidence of having a mind that understands existing problems.

As young men, perhaps, we are apt to be more impatient with a rotten status quo than are our parents and our older friends. The following are some of our reasons for voting for the Socialist ticket from top to bottom:

1. We believe that the political alignment existing today between Republicans and Democrats represents no genuine distinction in our political or economic life. The recent migrations and counter-migrations of industrial capitalists between the parties, and the great emphasis placed on these movements prove quite conclusively that both the old parties are equally safe for Big Business.

2. Instead of the present political line-up there is needed a party that will understand the economic and social movements of our time, rather than parties that grow eager in behalf of the people one month before election.

3. The Socialist Party emphasizes its platform and not personalities even though in Norman Thomas it has an outstanding leader of courage and principle who has not been afraid to discuss frankly the Negro problem in the South.

4. The Socialist Party alone undertakes to teach the workmen and women of the country exactly how their condition can be bettered; namely, through an understanding of first economic principles and the formation of a strong, militant organization.

To carry out the program indicated above the undersigned are organizing the Young Voters League for Norman Thomas.

A Question for Quakers

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: May I express my thanks, as an individual Quaker, for your editorial on Hoover as a Quaker in your current issue? During the war you said brave words in appreciation of conscientious objectors, the boys who because of high moral principles would not become part of the war machine. Many who were not then pacifists now are. Hoover stands for increase in our navy and preparedness. Who votes for Hoover votes for these. How are such people going to face the young conscientious objectors if another war comes, backed by Hoover's policies?

From a Life Prisoner

(Censored by R. Reinhardt)

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I know that you want your straw vote to be most nearly correct. Being in prison, and doing life, I'm hardly eligible to cast this ballot. But my indignation moves me. Although by all the laws of phylogeny I ought to be with the Republicans, this is a year when thieves fall out. So I register my mute protest for Al's cause, fervently hoping Gott mit uns.

Mr. Marshall's Spleen

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In your issue of today, lauding Mr. Franklin D. Roosevelt, you, though a pretended liberal, evince a spirit of bigotry universally denounced by all lovers of justice. You say:

His chief rival, Attorney-General Ottinger, has shown himself unworthy of public trust in that he is absolutely wrong on the water-power question. His nomination is merely a sop to the Jewish voters of the cities of the State in order to draw them away from Governor Smith. It is a political subterfuge which deserves rebuke.

Attorney-General Ottinger probably entertains views concerning water-power as to which decided differences of opinion exist. Mr. Roosevelt certainly holds views on many subjects which are likewise opposed by many good citizens; so does Governor Smith, and, for that matter, there is scarcely a single public question as to which men do not honestly differ. For you to set up the editorial chair as a court of last resort and with innate modesty to announce that the Attorney-General is "absolutely" wrong on this subject, and from that premise to deduce the conclusion that he has shown himself unworthy of public trust, would appear to the ordinary man as presumptuous. His integrity and uprightness are not and cannot be impugned. His loyalty and fidelity to the public as State Senator, as Assistant Attorney-General of the United States, and as Attorney-General of this State have been generally conceded. He is a man of unimpeachable character, and yet, speaking in an utterly irresponsible manner, you do not hesitate to blacken his name merely because he does not see eye to eye with you and has dared to accept a unanimous nomination for Governor at a time when your candidate had publicly refused to run.

But you have gone further, and at a time when men with whom you have associated yourself are prating of religious bigotry as a campaign issue you, supposedly overflowing with the milk of human kindness (though frequently curdled), range yourself on the lowest plane of fanaticism by adverting to Mr. Ottinger's religion and characterizing his nomination as a sop to the Jewish voters in order to draw them away from Governor Smith, apparently intimating that the Governor or anybody else has a proprietary interest in those whom I know to be the most independent of the American electorate. In other words, you turn your back on all that you have said concerning bigotry and your suppressed emotions bursting all bonds lead you to resent the nomination of a Jew as Governor and to insult your Jewish fellow-citizens by intimating that when they vote they are swayed by unworthy motives.

I have observed for many years that men of your ilk, though parading as broad-minded, never hesitate by word and act to belittle the Jew when it suits your purpose. It is regarded as meritorious to resent what you look upon as his intrusion into public office, however qualified for it he may be. With all your culture you are unable to get away from the atavistic urge which unconsciously causes your mental processes to culminate in the cry of Jew! Jew!

LOUIS MARSHALL

[To this letter we must add the following words from an equally prominent and equally public-spirited Jew—Samuel Untermyer. Speaking of the nomination of Mr. Ottinger, he says in the New York World of October 24: "He was nominated solely because he is a Jew and as a foil or cover to the campaign of bigotry that the Republican Party is waging throughout the nation. He is a Jew only as a stalking-horse to attract the Jewish votes. . . . He has been very active in the publicity end of exposing petty frauds. He is a 'devil of a fellow' after small offenders, but I have yet to know of an instance in which he has taken any action against big offenders." —EDITOR THE NATION.]

Housewarming

By HAL SAUNDERS WHITE

Now the last dark closet is opened;
Curious corners flatten into empty angles.
Once the whole tall house was haunted.
You came with a lantern by night—
And the hall was cleared.
The spiders work there
But no presence moves now the boards of the stair.
Room by room
Lamplight and moonlight ran
Quicksilver along the floors;
Washed upwards over wall-boards
And the walls.
We who searched there without breathing
Found nothing to fear us—
Only a broken bottle, an old man's shoe;
Felt only the strong substance of beams
And the glint on the window panes.
Now the last dark closet is opened.
One can live in a good house.

This Week Portrait of Himself

WAS ever a man so outrageously contradictory as Art Young: so simple and so wise, so grave and so funny, so tolerant and so didactic, so naive and so knowing, so banal and so impish—the opposites could be extended indefinitely. In "On My Way"* he has written and drawn a record of his thoughts, feelings, and recollections during six months of the past year. He is determined to omit nothing because it is trivial, nor does he. He includes much that is dull and flat, but next to an uninspired bit of reporting will be set down an anecdote or an observation buttered thick with native wit. And here and there is revealed a nice little streak of penetrating pessimism. He even emerges as a gentle satirist when the case demands it, and he can be as solemn as the Supreme Court in session.

With cause, he is enormously proud of his talent; yet he is the humblest man that ever became autobiographical. He is not a bit sure that his book is growing into a good one, and as he goes along he worries about this. But he goes along none the less—at the same gait and in the same manner. "After all," he seems to say, "this is Art Young—the bad as much as the good. If I left out a word or put in another that seemed more telling, the book would be Art Young plus or minus one word; it would be Art Young adulterated. If it is not as good as it might be, then neither, I suppose, am I. Besides, I suspect it is pretty good." Under the influence of some such modest metaphysic was the book written. The one thing that never occurs to the author is that he betrays himself in every line and every drawing as one of the most delightful human beings alive. He attempts to explain that, though popular, he has really rather a dour personality; though he would like to be decent, the capitalist system has made him close-fisted and fearful. He admits that his talent for anger is not great, but once he "stayed mad" for ten years at a tailor who refused to cash a check.

At the Masses trial

Along with the events of the days and with extensive comments on life, the author unrolls a pleasant if rather fragmentary news-reel of America in his time. Presidents, Senators, newspapermen, artists, rebels, almost every one you ever heard of, flicker through his book. He tells some impressive tales about La Follette and other, lesser statesmen; he talks of staff meetings on the old Masses, of varieties of cranks, of Eugene V. Debs sitting on a bench in Union Square with a group of down-and-outs. He describes an occasion during the Cleveland Convention in 1924 when he and the Editor of The Nation, walking along the street, were confronted by a banner "held high above a bursting brass band. 'The truth is out at last,' said Villard. On the banner I read 'The Nation Wants Coolidge.'"

Some important bits of Artiana are included in the book: a fragment of the famous speech of the Southern Congressman; his sketch of himself falling asleep at the Masses trial; the epic of the victoria. The fact is, of course, as the sketches on this page serve to indicate, only Art Young can convey Art Young.

THE German post-war literature on America is a literature of many moods. There is first of all the mood of the small boy who has been permitted to go inside a Christmas window-display of toys. He has already heard about how wonderful it is going to be (he knows Mr. Ford's "My Life and Work" and "The Great Today, the Greater Tomorrow" practically by heart, and the heroic tales of other industrial magnates have formed much of his recent reading), and here he is watching the shiny engines run along the bright new tracks and the people moving about just exactly as though they were alive. With so much to do and so many gaily painted ways of doing it he is convinced the amerikanische Wirtschaftswunder has produced the best of all possible worlds.

There is also the mood of the other boy who does not care for games. He feels that little boys who spend their whole lives dashing from one game to another are spiritually non-existent, and he is further embittered because he finds that they are not content with managing their own games but reach out and seize control of the things which he likes to do, such as going to school, writing newspapers and books, giving plays. He feels that his kind of boy has been forced aside in the Land Gottes by a pushing youngster who has no understanding of aesthetics and is, upon occasion, unpleasantly moral.

Most of the books fall between these extreme moods. Adolf Halfeld's "Amerika und der Amerikanismus" fits in the class of social criticism through enumeration. The truth of the separate instances cited is undoubted; the truth of their sum is another matter. As a corrective of the enthusiasm for all things American which certain groups in Germany have based upon an admiration of technical progress, such a book has value; but it is worth questioning whether some of the weaknesses he mentions are as exclusively American as he suggests. In a number of cases he quotes American expressions as untranslatable into German; for example:

Erziehung, die in Europa eben Erziehung und in Amerika "die Massenproduktion von uniformierten und standardisierten Goose-Steppern" (unübersetzbar: Leute, die ihr Leben im Gänseschritt leben) . . .

[Education, which in Europe is education and in America "the mass-production of uniform and standardized goose-steppers" (the word cannot be translated: it means people who live their lives walking like geese) . . .]

One is inclined to inquire if at least those Germans who have had anything to do with the army would not understand him if he translated "goose-step" quite literally as Gänsemarsch, from which the American phrase directly derives.

In "Geld und Geist," barring the fulsome epilogue, M. J. Bonn has provided an introduction to American life of considerable discrimination. He reviews the factual basis of American politics, prosperity, and puritanism (the section on politics is particularly acute), and then proceeds to a keen analysis of the problems which result from America's combination of the three.

The philosophical significance of the new world, the pattern and meaning of the American way of life, are the subjects of the three chapters on America in Leopold Ziegler's "Zwischen Mensch und Wirtschaft," and of Erich Voegeln's "Ueber die Form des Amerikanischen Geistes." Ziegler concerns himself chiefly with the contrast between America and Europe. Europe bears the imprint of successive periods of history, none of which entirely superseded that which preceded it; they coexist, overlapping each other like strata on a bare mountain side. This characteristic of being a "time" people makes for specialization, differentiation, for individual personality. In America time in the sense of history did not begin until Europe had already lived through many ages. Here, space is the determining factor. An absence of limits, alike of time and of frontiers, has resulted in an unlimited abundance of possibilities, which causes America to question the very axioms on which European life has been built. The American feels himself in the Garden before the fall: he asks why sickness, why poverty?; the Christian Scientist even asks, why death? In doing so he risks losing in a facile optimism the tragic sense of life which has contributed much toward the European concept of personality.

The basis of Voegeln's interest in the form of the American spirit is neither factual nor philosophical; it is aesthetic. Fact and philosophy are plentifully present in his work, for the discussion ranges over both the personal implications of pragmatism as affecting the American concept of self and its institutional expressions in the American social structure. But his method is not that of the usual study. He has a general definition of the American spiritual form; it is the form of an "open" self, resulting from confidence, sociability, and a desire to escape from the burden of being alone, as contrasted to a "closed" self, developed through logic rather than fact, skeptical rather than optimistic, intensive rather than expansive. But he is not content to treat the American form thus platonically; his critique is done over the shoulders of two of its outstanding men, George Santayana and John R. Commons. The resulting concrete statement dramatizes his philosophy.

Among special phases of American life, the labor movement has recently received important treatment by German authors. The report on their trip to the United States made by the German Trade Union Delegation in 1926 presents, especially in the section on the Trade Union Movement in the United States by F. Tarnow, a concise presentation of current conditions. These have also been more fully discussed in Heinrich Pollak's "Die Gewerkschaftsbewegung in den Vereinigten Staaten." It is interesting that this study should appear at almost exactly the same time as the equally thorough French treatment of "Le Problème Ouvrier aux États-Unis" by André Philip.

A Balanced Study

America Seen Through German Eyes. By Dr. Arthur Feiler, editor of the Frankfurter Zeitung. Translated by Margaret L. Goldsmith. New Republic. $1.

THIS able and valuable little book presents an interpretation of American life as seen by a distinguished German journalist. There is nothing in the book itself to prove that his nationality has in any way colored Dr. Feiler's observations. Besides being a writer with a delightful and straightforward style, Dr. Feiler is the most accurate and understanding of reporters, and his analysis of America is both penetrating and illuminating. He has a profound sympathy for a democracy trying to find itself in a machine and automobile age, and an age of great prosperity, yet, being a liberal, he sees clearly the dangers and evils of our present conditions, notably those of standardization and especially the standardization of individuals. On one page he has made a perfect statement of the child-labor situation. His characterization of the attitude of labor is to be found in this nutshell:

To state the case schematically: some of the workers are too badly off to think of organization; others are too well off to see any advantage of organization; while a large majority only consider their problems as questions of the moment, and this is the decisive factor.

Again, his analysis of the Negro problem is amazing in its shrewdness and accuracy. It is impossible to think of another book that tells the story of the American industry so concisely. We agree with Mr. Eduard C. Lindeman, who in his preface to this volume declares that no other post-war European interpretation of American life has "reached an equal level of authenticity, insight, and discrimination." Well aware of current European criticisms of America, Dr. Feiler has judged independently of them, and he is another to acquit us of the charge of being entirely engrossed in our materialism.

This book should be in the hands of every intelligent foreigner who comes to America. It should be as standard in its field as is Baedeker among guide-books.

Modern Art in Germany

Bauhaus Bücher. Volumes 1-11. München: Albert Langen Verlag.

THE Bauhaus of Dessau is one of the unique institutions of Europe. Related somewhat to the Higher Art and Technical Workshops of Moscow and the Cizek School of Vienna, it is one of the rare art academies in which theory and practice are uncompromisingly modernist in every aspect. Under the guidance of such noted contemporary artists and architects as Kandinsky, Klee, Gropius, Feininger, Moholy-Nagy, G. Muche, and others the Bauhaus offers long and thorough training to men and women in pure and applied art; not, however, in the medieval spirit of the guild or domestic labor but with full regard to recent industrial development. A synthesis of beauty and utility is sought and the unity of all the arts on a social basis and application is postulated about architecture as the central and dominant art. Together with the training in technique and practice of some special trade or profession, which every pupil can resort to for a livelihood, great stress is laid on character building, on self-reliance and independence. The pupil is given a certain amount of information necessary to every intelligent person and is constantly taught to assert himself and to find orientation in any given circumstances.

In an effort to state in permanent form the basic doctrines underlying the practice of modern art in every field that might serve as a sort of post-graduate extension course to wide circles of interested students everywhere, the Bauhaus is publishing a series of booklets edited by W. Gropius and L. Moholy-Nagy, in their way as remarkable as the institution itself. Written by men who are expert in the subjects dealt with, their aim is to treat in clear language questions of art, architecture, and the crafts from the standpoint of the practitioner. Thus Gropius and Oud, both architects of eminence, write about their own field. Gropius (Volume 1) summarizes the development of functional architecture and the effect of machinery on it in America, France, Germany, Holland, and other lands. J. J. P. Oud (Volume 10) traces in detail the aims and achievements of Dutch architecture and thereby records some of the most successful experiments of modern European architecture. L. Moholy-Nagy (Volume 8) discusses photography in its relation to the cinema, advertising, painting, etc., delimits the functions of each, and effectively destroys the fallacy of "artistic" photography and photographic art. Kandinsky (Volume 9) analyzes artistic creation as it proceeds from point and line to complete composition. Malevitch (Volume 11) investigates the essential "superadded" element of art not found in nature. Mondrian (Volume 5) seeks to establish the theoretic basis of "Neo-plasticism." Doesburg (Volume 6) reexamines the formative factors of all the arts in their interrelation. Other volumes treat of theatrical experiments, of crafts in metal, wood, glass, etc.

It is curious and instructive to find Kandinsky, Klee, Malevitch, artists so thoroughly subjective, intuitive, so dependent on the "inscrutable," proceed with as much of purely logical ratiocination as the proponents of the rigidly objective method, Moholy-Nagy and Doesburg. But the fact that the artists disagree with and among themselves does not make the books less interesting. The books abound in provocative and challenging ideas that tend constantly to disturb the readers' equilibrium and might lead some to reexamine and perhaps even revise their opinions. The volumes are profusely and beautifully illustrated with clear and large cuts; their make-up is exemplary: clear type, ample margins, effective layouts. Whoever holds that modernism is no accident or whim but roots in the social factors of our time and is a logical phase in the evolution of art—and the ubiquitousness of modernism makes any other view scarcely tenable—will find these booklets a source of first-rate importance both as key to the work of certain interesting individualities and as a general index to a state of mind of which they form a part.

Petroleum Politics

Oelpolitik und angelsächsischer Imperialismus. Von Karl Hoffmann. Berlin: Ring Verlag.

THIS is a familiar kind of German book. It consists of 430 large-size pages and hardly a sentence without its facts and thoughts. Beginning with the appearance of oil on the international stage, it takes the reader to every country of the world, to the directoral offices of every oil company in the world, and to almost every major and minor political event in the last decade in order to show the connection between these and oil imperialism. Though the result is a mixture of very germane points with considerable more or less irrelevant data, this is undoubtedly the best book on petroleum politics ever published and might well be translated into English—after expert pruning.

The title reveals the author's chief concern. Herr Hoffmann does not maintain, any more than other petrol politicians, that oil is today the only cause of international conflicts. But dig down through the debris of words, and petroleum will be discovered as the basic fuel of many a situation and the final spark which sets many a diplomatic motor into motion. In the relations between the United States and Great Britain oil undoubtedly plays a leading role. It is a decisive factor in the present and future of Anglo-Saxon cooperation or friction.

The known petroleum resources of the world are divided, more or less evenly, among British and American companies and the Soviet Union. Oil imperialism is thus a three-cornered fight among Great Britain, the United States, and Russia in which the last is more passive than positive.

The question of Anglo-Saxon unity has been much debated. As between the United States and the United Kingdom there are few serious sources of friction. Their banking systems supplement one another and our high tariff is not aimed at English goods. But as between the American and British commercial and geographical empires there are numerous seeds of friction. Mr.

The Devil's Shadow

by FRANK THIESS

"Those of us who read the first novel of Frank Thiess to be translated into English—The Gateway to Life—will open the second with a thrill of expectancy. In it Herr Thiess, of the younger generation of German novelists, continues a great undertaking in a great way. The Devil's Shadow is an epic of adolescence. Caspar Muller, whom some of us must remember as one of the lively group of students in the first novel, represents the type of pseudo-intellectual, talented, attractive and unstable, who follow every light that flashes in an ecstasy of ego-worship. His gradual disintegration is the more ironic in that it seems, to himself, success . . . Women, some charming, some disreputable, come into his life, but his passions of the flesh are always secondary to his great passion for himself. With mental facility, but no strength, he justifies his weaknesses by materialistic philosophy, and dabbles successively in gambling, politics and blackmail. We leave him on the way to America, outlawed and expatriated, but complacent in his new position as agent for a sort of high-finance Venusburg, a colossal organization for elegant debauchery."—The Philadelphia Inquirer

Hoover would mention coffee and rubber. London is not happy at seeing Canada become an economic colony of her southern neighbor, nor is it pleasant to watch Australia turn to New York for loans and investment capital. Our business with India is increasing and Wall Street has put direct pressure on the City to convert India—the world's greatest silver market—to a gold standard and thus tie her financially to the Federal Reserve chain. Americans meet and compete with British in South America, Mexico, China, Persia, and elsewhere. The latest development is United States penetration into Abyssinia. Everywhere it is the urge for raw materials and for markets for goods and greenbacks.

Oil is one of the most important of raw materials. It is an element in naval as well as commercial rivalry. Hoffmann emphasizes the military value of the liquid at the expense of the commercial. On this score some Communist authorities have taken him to task. They would stress the dollar-and-cents factor. Personally I believe that oil imperialism is a combination of both, that now the one influence and now the other determines policy in a given situation, and that governments bear at least as much of the responsibility as private companies—especially in Great Britain and the United States.

The British-American oil war has a history, but it is no continuous affair. It is more an intermittent combination of battles and armistices. Indeed, the battle may rage in one part of the world and peace reign in another. The fundamental tendency, however, is struggle. That is the moral of Herr Hoffmann's fine volume.

LOUIS FISCHER

Poet of German Unpreparedness

Des grossen Kampfliegers, Landfahrers, Gauklers und Magiers Till Eulenspiegel Abenteuer, Streiche, Gaukeleien, Gesichte und Träume. Von Gerhart Hauptmann. Berlin: S. Fischer Verlag.

GERMANY is not only producing books more rapidly than any other country has ever produced them; she is also producing more handsome books than any other country has to offer. One of the most distinguished of her recent publications is Gerhart Hauptmann's "Till Eulenspiegel," a puzzling mystical epic, in hexameters worthy of the elegant quarto format, the solid binding, and the clean, stately type. "Till Eulenspiegel" is as cosmic, as baffling, as unfinished as the more ambitious of its predecessors have always been—a manner that fits the matter. "Gerhart Hauptmann," said Eugen Kühnemann in 1922, "ist und war nicht anders als der Dichter der deutschen Unfertigkeit."

The "unpreparedness" in this instance may be taken as literally as one pleases. The theme of the book is the foolish Titan, Germany, who rushed into a totally unwise and wicked war, and whose later sufferings are still the fruit of selfishness and blindness. The twentieth-century Till whose fantastic doings and generous, futile dreams are the framework of the poem is—as far as he is anybody or anything more tangible than the broken flights of the poet's wounded fancy—a Silesian war ace who has brought down French and British fliers by the dozen, and who knows now that every such homicide was the blackest murder. Cain in his own person, and sensitive scapegoat, moreover, for the sins and follies of his race and kind, his reason totters—what is insanity, after all, but a clarity of vision which cannot endure the glaring evidence of the world's murderous and suicidal folly?—and he wanders about Germany, like his whimsical name-cousin of half a millennium ago, with an owl, a mirror, and other grotesque plunder in a broken-down cart dragged by two repulsive nags christened Gall and Poison, studying the samples of human imbecility which are to be found at every crossroad and every street corner, drawing a perverse solace from grotesqueries seen and perpetrated, and a more lingering delight from dreaming

Hauptmann's Till would scarcely have been possible without the "Eulenspiegel Reimenweise" of the sixteenth century satirist Johannes Fischart. The owl and mirror of the mad wag who delighted simple and gentle in the full-blooded fourteenth century, and whose reputed tomb is yet to be seen just out of Lübeck, are still conspicuous enough in this desolate epic of the twentieth, and the aviator's leather helmet is tailored without much difficulty into the fool's cap with its bell-pendants; but it was Fischart who first made the wag's exploits a vehicle for political, religious, and social satire. Hauptmann has brought Fischart down to date, in a vastly different spirit, it is true. He is capable of realism just as frank and stark—at intervals—but he has forgotten the old guffaw. This contemporary Till is no big-bellied buffoon, he is a sick-brained gentleman whose awkward antics are as painful as the sad scenes in some madhouse. But when he forgets his buffoonery we have mouth-filling music, in this strong, much-consonanted hexameter whose scansion is now and then a problem but which for the most part moves forward like a well-disciplined, muscular army.

The twentieth-century Till goes out of the world very quietly, without any of the boisterous tomfoolery that accompanied the demise of his immortal forebear. He wanders up into the Swiss Alps and, noticing an airplane fall, conceives the idea of imitating it and drops smiling over a precipice. After? As to that, reports vary. There are rumors that he does not rest quiet in his grave, but still indulges at times in laughing and bell-tinkling. It is hinted that angels of light and spirits of darkness have been overheard quarreling over possession of his soul. But there can scarcely be two opinions as to his ultimate fate ("Doch heisst's, dass der Tote ein gutes Gespenst ist"); for if Till-Hauptmann has no medicine for the world's malady, the suffering it visibly causes him is sufficient warrant for the goodness of his heart.

Walther Rathenau

Walther Rathenau: Sein Leben und sein Werk. Von Harry Graf Kessler. Berlin-Grunewald: Verlag Hermann Klemm A. G. Mark 8.

NO greater loss has come to the German Republic during the first ten years of its existence than that inflicted upon the whole nation through the murder in 1922 of the Minister of Foreign Affairs Walther Rathenau. That this assassination of Germany's foremost statesman immediately after he had won, at Genoa and Rapallo, the first success for German after-war diplomacy should have been the result of an ultra-German Nationalist conspiracy, seems a fitting external symbol of the deep inner tragedy. His life, from beginning to end, was one long struggle to overcome the conflict of Jewish and German character, of intellect and soul, of democracy and absolutism, of socialism and capitalism, of humanity and race. Count Harry Kessler, the well-known pacifist, has in a masterly fashion depicted this tragedy, making us realize that in the strivings, discords, failures, and achievements of this extraordinary man the deepest problems of our civilization are reflected.

Rathenau has never been a renegade to his Jewish blood. But throughout his life he has passionately striven to be more than a Jew. He felt the curse of the consciousness of inferiority forced upon his race by two thousand years of humiliation and persecution. He despised the religion of fear embodied in the Old Testament and perpetuated in the Talmud. He feverishly clung to a religion of courage as preached by Jesus, Socrates, Spinoza, Goethe, Fichte. He admired the "blond beast" of the Nordic type. And he proclaimed not only for himself but for all his kin the duty of adaptation to the noblest and highest in German character and culture.

To the German people he gave unreservedly his own abundant power of thought and action. Twice his action saved Germany from immediate collapse. First, in 1914, when he, the civilian, the democrat, the outsider, forced upon the General Staff his conviction of the absolute necessity of commandeering the conservation, production, and distribution of all raw materials for war purposes. Without his assumption of the administration of this fundamental part of the military organization, the German army within a few months would have been without the necessary supplies for carrying on the war, and the battle of Tannenberg as well as the successes in Belgium and northern France would speedily have been followed by an Allied thrust toward Berlin. After the downfall of the imperial regime, anti-Semitic propaganda prevented Rathenau's candidacy for the Weimar National Assembly. But when it came to reviving national resources from the crushing defeat, when the vital question of how to fulfil the staggering conditions of Versailles without complete disaster had to be faced, the Jew Rathenau once more assumed leadership, in directing German foreign policies. He fully realized the danger of further French aggression, he clearly saw the annexation of Rhineland and Ruhr as Poincaré's goal, he bent all his energies upon thwarting such attempts at the start, by creating an atmosphere of trust in Germany's willingness and ability to live up to her financial treaty obligations, by summoning the former enemies of Germany to cooperation with her in the restoration of Europe. Neither he nor those who followed him in office have achieved full success in this work. But the worst at least has been averted thereby.

But this man of amazing practical sagacity was at the same time a profound theorist, a visionary mystic. His whole nature rebelled against the mechanization of life which is an inevitable part of this industrial age. The artist in him recognized the barrenness of what is merely intellectual. He, the captain of industry, the financial magnate, whose banks, smelting furnaces, electric plants, mines covered the whole continent, longed constantly for the freeing of the soul from the shackles of material pursuits, craved for an activity unfettered by selfish motives, and dreamed of the liberation of the masses from inherited class slavery. In the darkest years of the war, 1917 and 1918, he wrote two books—"Of Coming Things" and "The New Industrialism"—in which from the inevitable breakdown of the old monarchist and capitalist order he prophesied a new socialized order where the solidarity of feeling produced by the war would lead to the abolition of proletarian conditions. And, immediately after Versailles, he demanded in his "New Society" a radical reconstruction of the whole national production by introducing a year of obligatory industrial service for all Germans, in place of the former military service.

Such was the cosmopolitan patriot whose noble career was prematurely ended by Nationalist fanaticism.

Streaked with Promise

Storming Heaven. By Ralph Fox. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.50.

WHEN "Storming Heaven" made its first appearance in England a critic said: "Mr. Fox's book makes the world more interesting." That is a fine, simple, and true statement, for here is a surprisingly vital novel, frontier-enlarging and streaked gloriously with promise. A story about a youth, it is itself youthful, in the older, decaying meaning of the word; that is, it is fresh, energetic, grave, and romantic. It is possible to read "Storming Heaven" quickly, for its merely entertaining qualities. From this point of view it becomes an adventure story of Soviet Russia with a wild, untutored American lad as the unconvincing, if pleasant, protagonist. Read it more carefully and a sense of excited bewilderment arises, for at a dozen points the book rises sharply above the adventure-story level and makes us demand from the author more, perhaps, than his tale, as he planned it, required him to give.

Mr. Fox seems to have started out with a clear intention of making use of two of his many gifts: a splendid feeling for rapid and picturesque narrative and a deep, meaty knowledge of the length and breadth of present-day Russia. First he lifts his young vagabond, John, from the bluffs of Puget Sound and deposits him in that mad Vladivostok of the early 1920's whose farcical aspects William Gerhardt caught so amusingly in "The Polyglots." Then, to give his talent for panorama a chance, Mr. Fox shifts to the picaresque. John throws in his lot with a starveling Russian duo who pick up their infrequent kopeks by acting out "The Altogether Astonishing Tragedy of the Love and Death of Napoleon, Emperor of the World" for the benefit of gaping peasants. After this opera-bouffe interval, the story makes a characteristic turn. John takes up with a group of nomadic Kirghiz horsemen. The panorama quickens and broadens: an amazing sense is given of life awakening wholesale over the steppes of southern Russia. The mighty conflict between the tractor and the atavistic Asian spirit is dramatized in a hundred ways. But panorama is not all: the book lifts like a wave as the souls of the Kirghiz, melancholy, black, romantic with an intensity far beyond Western conception, are lit up with a strong, sure illumination. The tragedy of Andrei Sergeivich, for example, is worthy of Conrad; and it is merely one of the magnificent interpolations that impel the reader to ask again and again: Is this book, with its Jack London hero and its clever glamor, merely the high-class adventure story that its publishers term it—or is the author teasing us with glimpses of a talent ludicrously superior to the actual intrigue?

What is one to do when Mr. Fox, after elevating us to the tragic heights of the Andrei Sergeivich episode, coolly introduces us to his two cinema ladies, as if in self-conscious obedience to the laws of melodrama? On the one hand we have Nadya, the strong, good woman, the serious and deep-breasted female Bolshevik who tries to influence the Villonesque John in the direction of the Better Life; on the other hand is Neura, the fatal and vampirine beauty who shakes out cruel gipsy dances on the hearts of men until John's strangling hands administer fifth-reel justice. The cue is simple: one is just about to settle down to a lazy enjoyment of a vivid, fervent melodrama cast skilfully in a familiar mold when another disturbing scene is introduced. Under the Chinese Wall in Moscow Mr. Fox collects a group of crippled beggars, diseased peasants, mad monks, the dregs of all the Russias, the leprous outcasts who are being so ruthlessly cut off from the body politic by the great surgeon's knife of the Bolsheviks. Without the slightest strain, Mr. Fox reproduces the talk of these miserable creatures—and with such power and pity and understanding that we are suddenly confronted with an adult artist dealing with moving material.

It is almost incredible that an Englishman should reveal so much emotional sympathy for the Soviet experiment, that he should transcend at once the usual political preoccupations and view the Russian metamorphosis as a deeply religious change. With what nonchalance he rises above stereotyped judgments, entering into the strange, intense life of Soviet Moscow as if there were no slightest barrier of race or tradition between him and a people which is still almost a literary curiosity to the Westerner.

The conviction returns: "Storming Heaven" is the uneven work of a young creative talent, luxuriantly gifted and, perhaps with a slight ironic arrogance, trying its hand on a plot and a trio of main characters obviously beneath its best efforts. Here is a book trying its hardest to be a thrilling tale of adventure and every fifty pages or so blowing up into something splendid and deeply felt. There are few living English novelists whose next work will be awaited by the writer with more eager expectancy than the author of "Storming Heaven."

dant power of thought and action. Twice his action saved Germany from immediate collapse. First, in 1914, when he, the civilian, the democrat, the outsider, forced upon the General Staff his conviction of the absolute necessity of commandeering the conservation, production, and distribution of all raw materials for war purposes. Without his assumption of the administration of this fundamental part of the military organization, the German army within a few months would have been without the necessary supplies for carrying on the war, and the battle of Tannenberg as well as the successes in Belgium and northern France would speedily have been followed by an Allied thrust toward Berlin. After the downfall of the imperial regime, anti-Semitic propaganda prevented Rathenau's candidacy for the Weimar National Assembly. But when it came to reviving national resources from the crushing defeat, when the vital question of how to fulfil the staggering conditions of Versailles without complete disaster had to be faced, the Jew Rathenau once more assumed leadership, in directing German foreign policies. He fully realized the danger of further French aggression, he clearly saw the annexation of Rhineland and Ruhr as Poincaré's goal, he bent all his energies upon thwarting such attempts at the start, by creating an atmosphere of trust in Germany's willingness and ability to live up to her financial treaty obligations, by summoning the former enemies of Germany to cooperation with her in the restoration of Europe. Neither he nor those who followed him in office have achieved full success in this work. But the worst at least has been averted thereby.

But this man of amazing practical sagacity was at the same time a profound theorist, a visionary mystic. His whole nature rebelled against the mechanization of life which is an inevitable part of this industrial age. The artist in him recognized the barrenness of what is merely intellectual. He, the captain of industry, the financial magnate, whose banks, smelting furnaces, electric plants, mines covered the whole continent, longed constantly for the freeing of the soul from the shackles of material pursuits, craved for an activity unfettered by selfish motives, and dreamed of the liberation of the masses from inherited class slavery. In the darkest years of the war 1917 and 1918, he wrote two books—"Of Coming Things" and "The New Industrialism"—in which from the inevitable falling down of the old monarchist and capitalist order he propounded a new socialized order where the solidarity of feeling produced by the war would lead to the abolition of proletarian conditions. And, immediately after Versailles, he demanded in his "New Society" a radical reconstruction of the whole national production by introducing a year of obligatory industrial service for all Germans, in place of the former military service.

Such was the cosmopolitan patriot whose noble career was prematurely ended by Nationalist fanaticism.

Streaked with Promise

Storming Heaven. By Ralph Fox. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.50.

WHEN "Storming Heaven" made its first appearance in England a critic said: "Mr. Fox's book makes the world more interesting." That is a fine, simple, and true statement, for here is a surprisingly vital novel, frontier-enlarging and streaked gloriously with promise. A story about a youth, it is itself youthful, in the older, decaying meaning of the word; that is, it is fresh, energetic, grave, and romantic. It is possible to read "Storming Heaven" quickly, for its merely entertaining qualities. From this point of view it becomes an adventure story of Soviet Russia with a wild, untutored American lad as the unconvincing, if pleasant, protagonist. Read it more carefully and a sense of excited bewilderment arises, for is interesting to note that the authors, after teaching the subject for seven years before putting their material into a book, are not disposed to give too much credit to what they call the "current formulas and practices of democracy," and that the tone of "reform" is lacking in what they write. The chart illustrating the organization of the executive branch of the government of Indiana is a striking visualization of the complexity which State government in this country has attained.

Hogarth Essays. Doubleday, Doran. $3.

It was an excellent idea to select from the two series of Hogarth Essays published in England by Leonard and Virginia Woolf these eleven pieces which represent roughly the point of view of the Bloomsbury School. Virginia Woolf's "Mr. Bennett and Mrs. Brown" still remains, upon rereading, the best statement yet rendered of the case against Wells, Bennett, and Galsworthy. Mr. Eliot's three essays on John Dryden, The Metaphysical Poets, and Andrew Marvell make one wish once more that his pen were more fertile than it is. The other contributions are less interesting, with the exception of Roger Fry's remarks on The Artist and Psycho-Analysis. Gertrude Stein continues to furnish her usual excellent variety performance with her Composition as Explanation. There is also an intimate sketch of Henry James by Theodora Bosanquet, who was once his secretary. Like most eulogies of him it does its best to present a fascinating personality and succeeds in presenting a dull and disagreeable being.

Drama Gallant Defeat

CERTAIN societies—notably that of the late eighteenth century—have amazed succeeding ages by the readiness of their tears. "Sensibility" was admired more than any other spiritual trait and weeping was so obviously a modish occupation that the feeblest author might be sure he could touch the heart even though he could not do anything else. But the eighteenth century is a long way behind us and it is not easy to get under the skin of a contemporary audience, for the intellectual and the man-about-town are alike in priding themselves upon a certain emotional inaccessibility. They may be moved to laughter, of course; they may be moved to indignation, and even, upon rare occasions, to thought; but all the defenses go up when any attempt is made to strike through their armor and appeal directly to that organ—the heart—of whose existence we have become, for very complicated reasons, ashamed. Tragedy, with its compensating grandeur, is a lost art, and mere pity embarrasses us unless, perchance, it can be fortified with the tonic bitterness of irony or at least transmuted into indignation against some remediable wrong.

Under the circumstances it is doubtful if any producer has felt no obligation to stage a play merely because it happened to be an honest and effective bit of writing would risk money upon "Exceeding Small" (Comedy Theater) which betweens as the first of the season's offerings to be sponsored by the Actors Theater. Here, in spite of a perfectly realism and a careful avoidance of anything merely sentimental, is nothing which could possibly be called "hard boiled," happens to be, on the contrary, an appeal to a pity which cannot plot to become anything except its own hopeless self. The effort of the play is not unlike that of Mr. Maxwell Anderson's "Saturday's Children," and the writing is marked by some thingable touches of nature which give it a quality reminiscent of that piece; but whereas Mr. Anderson allowed his characters to temporize with their destiny, Caroline Frank, author of the present tragedy, permits hers no escape.

To the little shipping clerk who loves a telephone operator she gives a certain gallantry of spirit and a certain elementary clarity of vision, but these avail them little. He knows and the girl knows that time, aided by poverty, will wear out their ecstasy even more quickly than it does that of more fortunate people; and they are willing to embark upon their adventure knowing that they must ultimately lose, as all their older acquaintances have lost, when the drabness of two rooms and a kitchenette gradually conquers the buoyancy of youth. But though they are willing to take their two or three years in the full knowledge that they can get no more, calamity, mocking this fortitude, descends suddenly upon them to deprive them of that little with which they had resigned themselves to be content. Nothing fantastic, nothing which might not happen to any one of thousands, befalls them, but they end with the unlighted gas-jet open and their action is not in the least degree incredible. Neither one was a great or important person, but asking little they got nothing, and there is no answer to their charge that whatever just gods may be are singularly unmindful of details like these in the management of their universe.

When the contemporary writer does occupy himself with the unrelievedly tragic aspects of life it is usually to some drab scene like this that he turns, and the artistic problem involved is always the problem of finding some means by which his play or his book can be made to yield that something more than mere pain which every work of art, however somber, must give. When faith in justice has gone, some faith in man, however elementary it may be, must remain if the story is to be still worth the telling, for if life is no more than the struggle of wholly insignificant people against unbeatable odds then it would be better to turn one's eyes from the shameful spectacle instead of endeavoring to reenact it in a theater. This irreducible minimum of alleviation Miss Frank provides by her gentle emphasis upon that certain gallantry of spirit which characterizes her hero and her heroine. They go down with their poor little flags still flying and the sight of them makes just bearable what would otherwise be intolerable.

In "Olympia" (Empire Theater) plot and characterization are spread pretty thin even for Molnar, but I find his impudent wit and unflagging dexterity still amusing. Two new musical entertainments demand mention. "Three Cheers" (Globe Theater) was given profitable heart interest by the noble sacrifice of Will Rogers who came to the aid of his injured friend, Fred Stone. Rogers was dutifully applauded and some of the more patriotic Broadwayites had tears in their eyes, but Rogers needs, of course, no such ballyhooing and he is at his very best in the current entertainment. "Animal Crackers" (Forty-fourth Street Theater) is an insane vehicle designed for the Marx Brothers. I can only say that it seems to me the most hilarious entertainment of its kind I have ever seen.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

In "Mr. Money Penny" (Liberty Theater) Channing Pollock has put into practice a standard rule for successful preaching: Talk loudly and clearly about something which everyone knows. Mr. Pollock's text is "Money is Not Everything," and his method is homiletic impressionism reminiscent of "The Beggar on Horseback," the Daily Worker, and Eddie Guest. The acting, particularly that of Donald Meek and Hale Hamilton, is excellent.

Two players hold the stage for two hours in Eugene Walter's English version of Louis Verneuil's French drama, "Jealousy" (Maxine Elliott Theater), and not until the middle of the last act does the shortage of characters appear to be a drawback. Then a poignant and authentic study of a jealous husband and a frightened wife breaks down for a few moments into jejune melodrama. But, on the whole, the evening is a triumph for the workmanship of the authors and the art of Fay Bainter and John Halliday.

Japan Dams "Dangerous Thoughts"

By WALKER G. MATHESON

JAPAN which fears radicalism as a threat to the Mikado far more than imperial Russia trembled before nihilism and anarchism will spend at least $1,500,000 (3,083,000 yen) during the next fiscal year to "improve the national thought" and wipe out trends toward socialism.

Extreme socialistic sermons and communistic cries all are regarded in Japan as "dangerous thoughts." Especially since the culmination of the World War and the bolshevization of Russia, thousands of students and labor leaders have been arrested for expressing menacing opinions toward the government. The idea of socialism is repugnant to most Japanese. This is due primarily to the fact that, since radical ideas are thrusts at the Throne, they constitute lese-majesty of the worst sort. Such ideas, too, are regarded as sacrilegious because they are aimed at the status of the emperor, himself regarded as a sort of god and descendant of the gods. Lastly, any new idea directed against the government or any office-holder, from cabinet members to mere police officers, can be regarded as a form of conspiracy against the Throne because all public officers are deemed to represent the Mikado personally in performance of their duties.

The manner in which Japan proposes to dam the growing wave of communism and socialism is unique. The principal work will be carried on in the universities and middle schools, always hotbeds of new ideas the world over. The Government will appropriate nearly $75,000 to extend the present unofficial system of the Ministry of Education to supervise students. The step has been taken by the Government on its own responsibility with the understanding that the ministry will cooperate in wiping out "dangerous thoughts" among the students.

The Ministry of Education will create a special research board of six members to watch over the general trend of student thought. All educational institutions will be required to submit periodic reports to this board giving in detail what the general student body is thinking. It is expected that by this system any new tendency toward "forbidden thinking" which is considered so menacing to the empire can be spotted easily.

Each institution will have a supervisor of students whose business it will be to sound out their thoughts and locate mental maladjustments. Students are not to be kept under control or constant watch, however. The "thought supervisors" are to act as advisers whom the students might take into fullest confidence if dangerous thoughts do arise to disturb them. It is pointed out that, with the supervisors acting as fathers to the students, they will go a long way toward helping them from falling permanent victims to dangerous thoughts.

Besides the $75,000 appropriated by the Government for detective work in the schools, the Ministry of Education will receive an additional $750,000 to establish the "thought watchers." The monitors also will be required to be on the watch for secret societies organized for social-study research, for it is well known that when students are forbidden to take up radical doctrines they are the more eager to do that very thing. The ministry also is to ask for $85,000 for the development of spiritual culture and $427,500 for the extension of the curriculum to include adequate social education.

"Dangerous thoughts" in other branches also will be fought tooth and nail by the Government. The War and Navy ministries will ask for large sums for extensive lectures and pamphlets to direct the thoughts of soldiers and sailors, among whom the Japanese Communists have been working with some success. Courses in "better thoughts" in schools conducted by the army and navy also are to be created.

Policemen, it is announced, will be required to attend special schools for the exact purpose of studying "dangerous thoughts." They will be instructed by lecturers who are known to have studied "dangerous thoughts" but who at the same time are considered by the authorities as immune to the workings of the thoughts themselves. The police instruction is being arranged so that the officers will be better able to detect perilous tendencies toward radicalism.

The Communications Ministry, it is announced, will receive nearly $300,000 during the next fiscal year for the stated purpose of improving thoughts of the thousands of postal and telegraph office employees throughout the nation.

The Japanese version of communism is an exotic. As such, new Japan, ever ready to adapt itself to foreignisms, is eager over it, the same as it is over cowboy hats, the cinema, and other strange importations. The Government, anxious as it is to occidentalize Japan in many ways, is zealous, however, in maintaining the morale and morals of the nation. Western dancing is curbed as much as possible, the films are censored rigidly, and "dangerous thoughts" are absolutely tabooed. In the latter respect it is interesting to note that fascism causes little alarm and attracts no attention because the government idea of fascism is that it is a natural growth. It bears no threat to the state because it is cloaked as super-patriotism, with a self-imposed, professed mission of defending the existing order. When the activities of the so-called Japanese fascism culminates in political assassination, it causes less excitement among Japanese than a mildly communistic soap-box speech in Hibiya Park. The Japanese form of fascism, in the government mind, is more a nuisance than a menace. There are more than thirty Japanese fascist societies, composed of super-patriots engaged in zealous reform, blackmail, and murder of politicians. They are, as a rule, unmolested.

Student clubs, labor meetings, and farmer rallies, on the other hand, always are under the scrutinizing eye of the police in the belief that they produce alien, "dangerous thoughts." Raids on such gatherings result in hundreds of arrests. Less than half of those taken in custody are released on grounds that they show positive signs of giving up "dangerous thoughts" and returning to more orthodox tenets. It has only been within the past month that police bans on preliminary hearings of alleged Communists in Japan have been lifted. The ban on seven Osaka hearings has been removed, with no indication of how many more there are to come. Tokio never has lifted the bans on radical hearings since 1925.

Although Tokio is a hotbed of radicals, most of whom are students, Osaka, the manufacturing city of the empire, is regarded as the center of the Japan Communist Party. Its leaders as a rule receive their training in the Oriental Communist University in Moscow, and, besides spreading propaganda among the factory workers and farmers, they are known to have planted a large quantity of communist pamphlets in the army and navy.

Japanese communist leaders are young men in their twenties. The Osaka Mainichi has this to say of them:

They are becoming independent of their parents and imbued with zeal and courage for the practice of their principles and ideals. They are not fully experienced in social life and apt to be misled by novel and extraordinary doctrines. They are prone to be captured by radicalism and are ready to make themselves martyrs to it. We pity thoughtless victims as we hate radical leaders endeavoring to mislead young, innocent men with premature judgment and views of life.

That the Orient is afraid of communism more than any other Western influence is seen plainly in Japan's desperate attempt to curb radicalism and in China's wholesale "red raids." Revolution in Japan often has been prophesied since the World War. The present efforts of the Government to curb communism, a movement generally believed to be financed from Moscow, may be taken to portend that the Government itself is not so sure that a revolt is not far off. It was in 1868 that Japan threw off the tyrannical yoke of the Shoguns, placing the Mikado on the throne as the real rather than nominal ruler. Japan is now the only remaining absolute empire. Perhaps it is Young Japan's dream to make it an obsolete empire. At any rate there is something on the horizon, and to the Mikado it may look red.

The Spoils System at Geneva

WILL the Secretariat of the League of Nations become a dumping-ground for nationalist politicians?

The danger of such a calamity has been recognized by the Assembly of the League in a resolution passed at the last session, and a warning has been sounded by the Foreign Policy Association in its News Bulletin, from which we quote the following excerpts:

Within the last few months much concern has been felt over developments within the Secretariat at Geneva. This body, which consists of 465 members representing thirty-four nationalities, day by day does the spade-work for the meetings of the Council, the Assembly, and the various commissions. . . . The success of the League depends upon the intellectual capacity, but primarily upon the international-mindedness of its permanent officials. . . . When Signor Anzilotti resigned from the Secretariat to become a judge on the World Court in 1921, the fourth committee of the Assembly voted to suppress as unnecessary the post of Under-Secretary-General which he occupied; but this action was finally reversed and another Italian appointed to the position—obviously for political reasons. When Germany entered the League in 1926, a new and, what has been widely regarded as unnecessary, position of Under-Secretary-General, to be occupied by a German, was created. And when Spain returned to the League this September, it was on the understanding that a Spaniard should be head of the minorities section.

Originally, members of the League Secretariat consisted of former professors, publicists, or government officials who, upon entering the League service, willingly cut themselves off from a national point of view and embarked upon an international career. But later appointments, made to satisfy political considerations, have usually been of professional diplomats. Originally not a single Under-Secretary-General was a diplomatic official, but at present three out of the four fall into that category. The increase of the diplomatic element in other positions of the Secretariat seems equally marked. It is the practice of most foreign offices to include service upon the League Secretariat within the period which determines the retiring age and pension of the diplomat concerned. In April, 1927, Mussolini proclaimed the rule that no Italian could take service with an international public institution without the previous consent of the Italian Government. . . .

From the standpoint of the morale of the Secretariat, the situation is grave. Promotions to the high posts are not made from within the ranks; the plums are reserved for diplomats of the great Powers who temporarily leave their respective services for a turn at Geneva. It is not now possible for a young man to look upon the Secretariat as offering a permanent international career. The advancement of high officials for the moment at Geneva would seem to depend upon how well they serve national, rather than international, interests.

This situation will inevitably affect the willingness of states to bring their troubles to Geneva. If states A and B become involved in a dispute and if a diplomat from state B happens to be in charge of political questions in the Secretariat, state A will inevitably distrust the League machinery. . . .

The appointment of a representative of a smaller Power as one of the Under-Secretaries-General and the adoption of the rule that no professional diplomat should hold the position of assistant Secretary-General would do much to remove any such suspicion.

FOR HERBERT HOOVER we have no warmer wish than that his administration may be worthy of the unprecedented and epochal landslide which has put him into office. No doubt here as to what the American people wanted and no room for anything else than a cheerful, good-natured acceptance of the result in the familiar American spirit of clearing the decks for the victor. Anybody who received such a popular vote ought to feel humble and deeply stirred to give the country the very best that is in him. If Mr. Hoover does that, if we are to have in the White House the Hoover of those earlier days before he entered the political arena and threw overboard all his Wilsonian ideals, he may win for himself the regard, the affection, and the gratitude of the great mass of the American people who were thrilled by the personality of his Democratic rival even when they could not vote for him. There are friends of Mr. Hoover in large number who believe that he will confound the liberal opposition to him by giving us a noble-spirited, progressive administration. If that should prove to be the case no one would rejoice more than the editors of The Nation, who have been among his severest critics. To have broken the solid South at last is in itself a wonderful achievement; to have carried, as at this writing (the morning after the election) seems probable, no fewer than four of the Southern States, is epoch-making, even though it is not a personal victory for Mr. Hoover.

For it opens the way to that needed political realignment for which we have so long called, and it ends the absurd bugaboo of Negro domination if a single State in Dixie should go Republican. No man has entered the White House freer than Herbert Hoover. Disliked by most of the politicians, he has been chosen largely by the anti-Catholics and the Drys, but to no one does he apparently owe any personal debts. He is, therefore, in the best possible position to show the country what manner of man the real Hoover is and how great the things an enlightened engineer can achieve in the White House. While we cannot abate one jot of our opposition to the principles for which he and his party stand, we naturally and earnestly hope for the prosperity, peace, and progress of the country under Mr. Hoover's guidance.

THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY is smashed—of that there is no doubt. It chose to run a Wet and Catholic and it has paid the price. As things look today, no living man above thirty years need expect to see a Catholic nominated again for the highest office in the land. Moreover, the completeness of Governor Smith's defeat makes impossible his renomination four years hence, as might have been the case had the election been close. If, as now appears, to our great satisfaction, Franklin D. Roosevelt has been chosen Governor of New York, there has risen another star upon the political horizon in Governor Smith's own State to play a great part in the complete party reorganization which must come unless it is simply to fade out. Of that we shall have much to say in the future. Today we would only add our tribute to the extraordinary campaign made by Governor Smith. Single-handed he waged his fight against the forces most hostile to our American democracy. Privilege and bigotry and religious intolerance he assailed with frankness and superb courage. On the merits of the debate he should have won. But the American people decided not on arguments, but largely upon feelings, passions, and prejudices. No man who had to carry the triple burden of his religion, his "wetness," and his affiliation with Tammany Hall could have waged a better campaign than the Governor of New York. He ends the battle having impressed his personality upon the whole country and having won the lasting affection of multitudes. Let no one deny to him, or to Norman Thomas, the praise they deserve.

THERE IS CONSOLATION in the results of the voting for United States Senators. Throughout the campaign The Nation has emphasized the importance of sending back to Washington the members of the progressive bloc who in recent years have done so much to hold in check the powers that are seeking to overwhelm popular rights in this country. We rejoice, therefore, in the reelection of La Follette from Wisconsin, Shipstead from Minnesota, Frazier from North Dakota, and Howell from Nebraska. It is gratifying, too, that California has returned Johnson, Massachusetts has reelected Walsh, and Tennessee has rewarded McKellar with another term. On the morning after election the fate of Wheeler in Montana, Dill in Washington, and Neely in West Virginia was still in doubt.

TEN YEARS SINCE THE ARMISTICE! Ten years of disillusionment since the wild jubilation of that November day in 1918 when the world faced the future with a deep resolve that such a war should not come again. Looking back upon those years it seems incredible that people could settle into the old ruts, reabsorb the old prejudices, and forget the lessons of that worst conflict in history. But that is precisely what they have done. The Allied Powers are spending more money for "defense" than they did before the war, and their weapons of destruction are infinitely more deadly than they were in 1918. The governments of the older Powers are using military forces to capture economic empires as persistently as they ever did. Only in the defeated and outcast nations have the lessons of the war been taken seriously. What a sardonic fate for the ideals of Woodrow Wilson that they should find root only in the nations which he denounced! Germany, ten years after the armistice, is working valiantly for peace against the militarism of the Allies, and Russia has become the foremost champion of subject peoples. In our own country the most hopeful sign of a movement toward peace is the great increase of interest in foreign affairs. While most of our people are still drunk with the old patriotism, organizations like the Foreign Policy Association—now celebrating its tenth anniversary—have greatly increased their scope and influence. An informed public opinion favorable to open diplomacy may in time realize the hope of the first Armistice Day.

IN THE ANCIENT CITY of Kyoto during the week ending on November 16 Japan's twenty-seven-year-old Emperor, Hirohito, will complete the elaborate six-day ceremonial which marks his ascension to the throne. He is the first modern emperor of the island kingdom, the first to emerge from the impenetrable seclusion which has surrounded every Japanese emperor for many centuries. Japan has considered seclusion so sacred that, although the new Emperor's father, Yoshihito, was insane for many years, not a newspaper dared to mention the fact. The new Emperor plays tennis, rides horseback, and experiments in his own biological laboratory. In 1921 he broke all Japanese precedents by traveling for two months in Europe, where he was much impressed by the relative democracy of Western princes and by the parliamentary system. He comes to the throne of Japan at a time of grave economic depression and widespread discontent. His Government's policy on the Asiatic continent has evoked the bitter opposition of China and Russia; his prestige is being used by the Japanese upper classes to suppress honest revolutionary thinking. The overthrow of hereditary monarchies in China and Russia has had its inevitable effect upon the younger generation in Japan. Unless Hirohito's advisers show great astuteness in adapting the powers of the Emperor to the demand for democratic government, it may well be that Japan's first modern Emperor will also be her last.

THE FRENCH PARLIAMENT reassembled on November 6 without a Cabinet. After Edouard Herriot had once prevented the congress of the Radical Socialists from demanding that he and the three other representatives of the party withdraw from Premier Poincaré's Government, a last-minute resolution was put through calling for such action. Upon receipt of the four resignations Premier Poincaré at once sent his resignation to President Doumergue. The defection of the Radical Socialists from the coalition Government has long been brewing. Their primary objection to Poincaré's policy was based on the proposal to restore in part the opportunities of Roman Catholic missionaries in the French colonies. Religious bitterness has been acute lately in France as well as in this country. Rumania was also without a cabinet as this issue of The Nation went to press. The Bratiano Government had resigned, but the leader of the National Peasant Party had refused to form a cabinet unless he could have full liberty of action. The old guard was unwilling to concede so much.

UNDER OUR GUNS, with a score of airplanes circling overhead, Nicaragua held its "free" election on November 4 and has chosen General José Maria Montcada, Liberal candidate, as its President. The result was not unexpected. There was little to choose between, both candidates having committed themselves to intervention by our marines in return for the opportunity to run for office under protection of our bayonets. The question that interests us is not which one of the obsequious candidates gets into office but whether the marines, having accomplished their professed purpose, will remove themselves from the country. Will they come home, or do they intend to stand guard over Nicaragua's new President to protect him from the Sandinistas—who are not reported as having turned up at the polls on November 4.

WITH BANDS PLAYING and crowds cheering, twenty-six knitters who have been on strike against the Allen A Hosiery Company of Kenosha, Wisconsin, marched to jail to begin indeterminate sentences for contempt of court because they refused to pay a fine levied by Federal Judge F. A. Geiger for defying an injunction. This injunction was a sweeping order against picketing which the Allen A Company secured by evading the spirit of Wisconsin's liberal labor laws and going to the federal courts on a technicality. The imprisonment of the strikers without trial by jury in a progressive State like Wisconsin emphasizes the need of a new law limiting the power of federal courts to issue injunctions in labor disputes. The menace of irresponsible power in the hands of federal judges has also been demonstrated recently by the dismissal of the case against Judge William H. Atwell of Texas, whose attack upon the Brooklyn lawyer, F. R. Serri, was described in The Nation of August 29. After Mr. Serri had attacked the credibility of a prohibition officer Judge Atwell said: "In my country had you made such an accusation against an officer of the law the officer would have smashed you before you got out of the courtroom. Would you like to go to jail with your client?" When Mr. Serri sued Judge Atwell for $50,000 damages for slander the suit was dismissed by Federal Judge Campbell with these words: "The law is settled that judges of courts of record of superior or general jurisdiction are not liable to civil actions for their judicial acts even when such acts are in excess of their jurisdiction and are alleged to have been done maliciously and corruptly."

THE FINAL CONDEMNATION of Brookwood Labor College by the Executive Council of the American Federation of Labor was one of the most inexcusable pieces of bureaucratic tyranny that our labor movement has ever known. When the original position was taken against Brook-wood last July by the American Federation of Labor only vague charges of "radicalism" were mentioned and there was no opportunity for an open hearing. This star-chamber procedure aroused such a storm of opposition from various labor unions that President Green hastily promised to consider protests before final action. Despite this promise he did not invite the Brookwood authorities to appear for a hearing, and the final order urging all affiliated unions to withdraw support from the institution was quite as peremptory as the first. President Green then had the audacity to declare that "So far as I am advised the college authorities did not ask to present their side of the case either at our July meeting in Atlantic City or the one . . . on October 18." This after scores of letters and telegrams had poured into the offices of the American Federation of Labor asking for a hearing for Brookwood, and after the college authorities had telegraphed and written for such a hearing. What are we to think now of President Green? Meanwhile we appeal to all friends of workers' education to rally to the defense of Brookwood.

IN ROBERT LANSING there was profound knowledge of international law and far greater wisdom as counselor to the President than has generally been admitted. Deeply convinced of the guilt of the Germans—being entirely ignorant of the French and Russian pre-war conspiracies—and profoundly affected by the lies of the period, he was for unrelenting war, but only while it lasted. Before we entered the war he demanded that we treat Great Britain precisely as severely as we did Germany in the Lusitania notes. It was Lansing indeed who framed the stiff note to England in connection with her seizure of American ships and her violation, as he privately said, "of every canon of international law," which lay upon Wilson's desk from May of 1915 until November, to go forward then entirely emasculated. When Secretary Lansing reached Paris for the Peace Conference he was outraged, as were his associates, Henry White and General Bliss, at the way in which they were shelved. Sorely tempted to resign, Mr. Lansing held on lest Berlin derive encouragement from his retirement. When he returned to this country he made the fatal mistake of defending a treaty which he had bitterly opposed and knew to be wrong. In Paris he fought—unlike Wilson—for the immediate cessation of the hunger blockade of the Central Powers; had his wise plans been followed Europe would have been rehabilitated much sooner. As for his dismissal from office by his raging and ungrateful chief, nothing was more to Mr. Lansing's credit than the acts which roused Mr. Wilson's ire. Beyond that, he was a sensitive, fine-minded American, who, whatever his faults of judgment, set a very high standard for public servants to live up to.

A MASTER-BUILDER, perhaps the master-builder of the United States, died in New York on October 30. Otto M. Eidlitz was a man extraordinarily beloved both by the labor unions and the capitalists who rear the great structures in New York City and elsewhere, by the latter to such an extent that he was constantly refusing work that was offered to him—a $3,000,000 contract just before his death. This was not only because of his attractive personality and his sterling honesty, but because his heart was set on producing a fine quality of work. For that, like every real artist, he cared far more than for any financial return. He was an admirable employer of labor, just and sympathetic, with a clear understanding of the working man's side. The business of building in New York has been particularly subject to graft and has often been gravely harassed by labor-union blackmail and extortion. Against that Mr. Eidlitz set his face like flint, but, best of all, he was likewise equally outspoken about the many wrongs committed by capital. So clear was his impartiality that he was asked to become the author of an arbitration agreement which after twenty years is still largely in force. In war time the government called upon him for aid, which he gave without pay. Then, too, he proved himself a leader and a great force for conciliation. To the day of his death he was able to make stubborn, unjust, and less honest employers than himself come to his point of view. Were there many men like Mr. Eidlitz, the problems of labor and capital would profit enormously.

TWENTY-SEVEN YEARS AGO Martha Berry took two children from the back-country districts of Georgia into her own home and began to teach them the rudiments of book knowledge and manual work. After a time she was able to build a tiny school-building and a dormitory for ten pupils. Today the Berry Schools of Georgia, housed in modern dormitories and school-buildings, have 1,000 pupils from the poorer families of the South, with 3,000 children on the waiting list and 7,000 alumni. The Pictorial Review made a wise and popular choice when, through its committee of judges, it gave its annual $5,000 award for the best achievement by an American woman to Martha Berry. The South should also be proud of another educational experiment, which had its modest beginnings in Virginia last year and which continued in North Carolina this year. We refer to the Southern Summer School for Women Workers in Industry, which held its second session in Burnsville, North Carolina. In this school twenty-five girls from cotton mills, laundries, telephone exchanges, and cigarette factories of the South studied for several weeks the principles of social science as applied to their life tasks. They were told about the labor movement by some of its ablest exponents. They went back into the factories of the South with a determination to make their new learning count for the improvement of the conditions of their class. We hope for a continuation of this work.

FIRST FROSTS HAVE COME, Atlantic liners are charging off-season rates, and from Maine to California the American fireside is settling down to an exciting winter. For Mary and John and Aunt Jane have been abroad this year. Mary had a "wonderful time"; John spent the summer, after the Olympic Games, at the Dome in Paris; Aunt Jane is working feverishly on her first "talk" to the woman's club. The house is full of souvenirs, and reminiscences hover in the air like the smokes of Indian summer. Almost 320,000 American citizens have traveled abroad since January 1, and 35 foreign countries are richer by $877,000,000, a figure which will "probably exceed even our net export of capital during the year," according to Dr. Ray Hall of the Department of Commerce, who has made a study of travel statistics for the first eight months of 1928. American tourists in 1927—285,000 strong—spent $770,000,000 abroad. The increase during 1928, Dr. Hall estimates, will be $107,000,000, making the largest total for any year since 1919-1920, when European travel was resumed after the World War.

Hoover Wins

AS was foreordained, Herbert Hoover has won the Presidency, and by an amazing margin. The country has again voted to continue in office a selfish and reactionary government which should, for its sins, long ago have been reduced to impotence. For this victory Mr. Hoover can personally claim little credit. Millions of honest, unprejudiced Americans who believe in him as a man and as a humanitarian, including many readers of The Nation, have voted for him, sometimes as a lesser evil, but often because of genuine admiration for him, his achievements, and his point of view. Aside from these voters, however, from the beginning of the campaign there has been a group to whom he emphatically owes his success: Prejudice, Bigotry, Superstition, Intolerance, Hate, Selfishness, Snobbery, and Passion. Had he uttered no word and made not a single gesture these, his bond-servants, would still have placed him in the White House. It is idle to say that he did not wish their aid. At his right hand and at his left stood these furies of our political life to the very end of the campaign, without adequate rebuke, without the scorning and the scourging which should have been theirs. To them Herbert Hoover is in lasting debt, as well as to the forces of privilege, of economic power, of concentrated wealth.

Upon great masses of our fellow-citizens his victory serves notice that no one of their number may aspire to the highest office of the land; to multitudes it tells the tale that the aspirations of their fellow-men may be vetoed where passion holds sway. From it may be deduced a triumph for those who would upon certain moral issues impose their will upon their fellow-men whatever the costs. Let no man dare the sacred order hereafter unless his be the right clothes, the right accent, the right education, the right association, and above all the right faith. Let him be sure that his habits shall be those of Baptists and Methodists alike; let him never seek to face again the intolerance of the Protestant. We chronicle a victory for know-nothingism, for the narrowest of nationalistic ideals, for those who would surround this country with Chinese walls, with barriers against trade, barriers against peace, reinforced by encircling steel.

Each of these groups will henceforth claim the victory as its own and seek to grow fat upon it. Each will demand its toll and each read into the verdict the interpretation it desires. More than ever our American plutocracy sits deep in the saddle; more than ever the power of Big Business remains unshaken; more than ever the god of Prosperity is enthroned in Washington. At his feet new and sacrilegious offerings have been made. It is he who is to dominate the nation's communal life, since Mr. Hoover dedicated himself to this idol throughout his campaign. In addition to the full dinner-pail Mr. Hoover offered the full garage. Upon the homes with telephones, radios, electricity he dwelt unceasingly and in detail; only as if through an afterthought he added that he sought to abolish poverty in order that the plain citizen might have leisure for things of the spirit. Things of the spirit! Two words for them; ten thousand for the things that make for physical comfort. Ten thousand words to prove that all these material gains were the direct gift not of nature or of industry, but of the Republican Party itself. Not with bread and circuses this time, but with garages and motor cars and radios and the electric current and the profits of the Stock Exchange!

What will Hoover do with his opportunity; what will he make of himself? The passions that fought for him may claim him as their own. Or it may be that he will free himself to do those things for which his warmest friends and admirers hope—to make over the unbalanced, absurdly ill-grown structure of government, to stress economic issues, to bring into his administration the spirit of science, of the engineer, and to inspire it with his desire to abolish poverty for the neediest. Let us hope that this will prove to be the case; that his acts in office may belie the melancholy content of his words upon campaign platforms; that something of the warm, human passion for the under dog which runs deep in the veins of his adversary may yet move Mr. Hoover to see that the masses advance best when progress and prosperity come from underneath. For the benevolent autocrat remains an anachronism in the body politic, and the teaching that prosperity has its fons et origo in Washington will return again and again to plague him who at the same time, with amazing inconsistency, denounces those who would bind together government and business.

As for the rest, progressives and liberals will see, we are sure, in this decisive triumph only a call to an intenser opposition, to a bolder challenge of those who once more have taken the government for their own. These men who declare that they alone are fit to rule, that in their high hands the destinies of the land must be placed—whether they sit in the seats of the political mighty or of their masters the overlords of trade—are the very men who may be counted on to blunder and to fall. It is they who give us our Dohenys, our Sinclairs, our Falls, our Denbys, and our Daughertys. It is they who compel such housecleanings as those that have periodically rocked the business world in insurance, in oil, in the railroads, and, soon to be, in the power industry. Give them the reins and they cure no fundamental ills; indeed they dare not prescribe for a trade so ill as coal-mining. For they see only symptoms and not causes, and have no real remedies as cures.

Perhaps it is just as well that Herbert Hoover has his chance to show what the engineer in the White House can do; whether or not he has it in him to work and to give and take with other men in order to achieve as President. Perhaps his abode in the White House may have been ordained to hasten the coming of a better day and a new order of society by demonstrating that not even an engineer may succeed by empiricism alone. Reason for discouragement and despair? Not the least. It merely means a longer struggle, a deferring of the day when the American people will realize that they must rouse themselves lest they lose forever the opportunity to do so. How many times did not the Slave Power achieve its victory at the polls, only to crumble from within and by pressure from without? Another day, another battle! A true reformer finds in defeat the stimulus to more determined advocacy of the principles which animate him. Now is the time to plan for a union of forces to create a truly liberal party which shall take for its own the best of the issues discarded by the Democrats during their gradual moral disintegration.

Fritz Kreisler

FORTY years of virtuosity before American audiences! That is what Fritz Kreisler can today look back upon with complete satisfaction, or could if it were ever possible for an artist of his stature to be satisfied with his achievements. A prodigy at ten when he won the eagerly coveted first prize and gold medal of the Vienna Conservatory of Music, he next carried off the Premier Prix de Rome at the Paris Conservatory at the mature age of twelve. He first toured the United States at thirteen, in 1888-1889, with Moritz Rosenthal, only to return to Vienna to complete his non-musical education before making his second debut in Berlin as a youth of twenty-four. Since that time he has been a precious possession of the whole world, with the United States, in part because of his American wife, a second fatherland. But a man like this is, of course, an international possession. He is at home in a world which, Heaven be praised, knows no nationalistic boundaries and was less affected by the hates and prejudices of the World War than almost any other sphere of intellectual activity, though not unaffected as Kreisler himself learned.

That he stands in the front rank of living violinists is, we believe, undisputed, and, unlike some of his contemporaries, he has genius unmated with eccentricity and quite unspoiled by success. Like Paderewski and a few other musicians, Fritz Kreisler would have been a great man in other walks of life—he could, by the way, have been a great pianist had he not preferred the violin. The little volume of his war experiences reveals an ability in the literary field to make one long for a day to come when he may be inspired to set forth the world as he sees it from the highest rung of the musical ladder, to put into words his hopes and aspirations for music and musicians.

No one can hear him play without sensing the depths of the nature that is his. That superb presence on the concert stage, that toss of the head when he stops playing, that intensity of his spirit and breadth of artistry—those speak for themselves. Bowing, technique, tone, understanding, intellectual interpretation are all there in fullest degree. It is no wonder that the critics have long since exhausted their superlatives—when they are fair—and have been often restricted to recording the fact of his playing to jammed houses and the nature of his performances; the vocabulary of praise is too readily exhausted.

Today we had rather dwell upon the man himself, his fineness and his greatness. Not only has he been blessed with complete modesty, but also with complete kindness, qualities too rarely met with among those who hold commanding positions. Something of the woe of the world is stamped upon his features, especially since the World War. Into that horror a stupid militarism ordered him and he went, to be saved for all music-lovers by an injury which brought his government to its senses. Released, he came back to the United States only to suffer, as the passions rose and the hatred grew, at the hands of our superpatriots, our 100 per cent Americans. So far as we are aware no word of pain, or complaint, or criticism has ever crossed his lips. Perhaps he, too, felt that his persecutors knew not what they did. He had seen the mad passions of his countrymen abroad. He must have realized to what baseness patriotism in war time descends. His very greatness made him beyond hurt. It is related of Guizot that once his adversaries after violently assailing him roared: "Now what have you got to say?" He replied: "That you have not yet climbed up to the level of my contempt." So sharp a retort could never have come from Fritz Kreisler; but his assailants surely never climbed to the lowest level of anything but his pity. Fortunately time has brought sense to this land. No man, we are sure, is more welcome in America and none is more at home. To an unprecedented degree Fritz Kreisler is assured of the homage of the music-lovers here and under every other flag.

Literature and Drama

DAVID BELASCO occupies a peculiar position in the contemporary American theater. Even his warmest admirers would not maintain that he enjoys today any obvious preeminence like that which was his some years ago and yet, though he has ceased to be regarded as a leader and an authority, he continues to be one of the most successful of Broadway producers. Time was when an announcement of his plays was, as a matter of course, given the most prominent place in any forecast of the season and when his name was more often mentioned than that of any one else in any discussion of the American theater. His aims, his theories, and his hopes dominated all discussions of the stage, and his productions were not only the most successful but the most esteemed as well.

Today few think of him as in any sense a leader, and even his most popular offerings seem somehow old-fashioned. And yet, going his own way, he holds his own audience in his own way. Younger men have mocked his stubborn loyalty to his conception of theatrical realism, and many critics have berated him for his persistent avoidance of any play which could possibly be considered to possess any literary merit. Yet loss of prestige has not involved loss of business success. The theater which bears his name is no longer considered as once it was a Temple of Art, but there are few other playhouses in New York as often filled, and the Belasco audience still thinks of itself as a thing apart from both hoi polloi on the one hand and the high-brow on the other.

The most successful part of his career as a dramatist lay within that comparatively brief period when acted plays were not generally printed. Today the successful drama is quite as likely to be published as it was in the time of Shakespeare or Congreve, but of Mr. Belasco's innumerable pieces a relatively insignificant number have been seen in type and the appearance of six of them (only three of which have previously been printed) in a single volume* has a particular sort of interest. Their author has always been one of those who insist that the drama is a thing apart, that no sort of judgment passed upon it outside of the theater is of any significance whatever, and it is not irrelevant to inquire, now that the text of these selected plays is available, whether or not there is some relation between this contention and that loss of prestige which Mr. Belasco has certainly suffered. In a preface he states the heart of his creed:

The standards by which true literature is judged cannot properly be applied in judging drama. Ability to write well in other fields (in poetry or narrative, fiction or biography) does not necessarily imply ability to write well, or even tolerably, for the stage. Indeed, the one talent seems generally to exclude the other. . . . A play—a genuine play—is a very distinct and special form of writing. There are many compositions extant, in the form of colloquies and dialogues, containing elements of literature such as poetry, rhetoric, and eloquence, which are nevertheless damnable as drama. And, per contra, there are many most excellent plays which are insignificant as literature. My plays are all written to be acted, not read.

Now part of this is so obviously true that it is very easy to accept the rest without thinking. Many great writers have undoubtedly written very bad plays. Dramatic composition is certainly a form of writing quite different from any other. But does the fact that much good literature is not good drama mean that all good drama is not good literature, or has Mr. Belasco been proceeding all his life upon a conclusion deduced from what the pedantic would call a "fallacy of the illegitimate converse"? Ability to write well in other fields does not necessarily imply ability to write well or even tolerably for the stage. Perhaps, even, the one talent does usually exclude the other. But does that suggest that good drama is necessarily marked by an absence of sincerity, depth, and veracity which only the glamor of the footlights can hide? It may be that the answer is No and that Mr. Belasco's career in the theater wrecked itself upon something as seemingly remote from practical playwriting as the fallacy of an illegitimate converse. Through the careful avoidance of literature in all the plays which he has either written or chosen for production, he has succeeded in remaining a commercially successful manager, but he has surrendered to others the leadership which he once had.

"Look Upon the Jury!"

"PRISONER, look upon the jury!" the judge directs at the beginning of every criminal trial. It would be well if not only the accused but all of us looked upon the jury a good deal more carefully and thoughtfully than we are given to doing, for the jury is the source of justice in the judicial system under which we live. The judge, the prosecuting attorney, the police, the witnesses expert and inexpert are all tributaries to the stream whose head is the twelve ordinary citizens who pass on the facts establishing guilt or innocence.

This is a day when democratic institutions are under attack from two sides. The more radically minded are out of sorts with them because of a feeling that they have failed to produce government in the interest of the people. The more conservative are condemning democratic institutions in the hope of getting rid of such popular control as they confer. But the attack on the jury system draws its support chiefly from the ranks of the conservatives. With all its defects the jury system seems to be the best method to date, either tried or suggested, for dealing with crime. It is quite possible, as a good many students of the law advocate, that in certain cases accused persons should be allowed to choose trial by a judge in preference to that by a jury (such technique is already considerably in use), but the right to a decision by a jury should remain unabridged whenever it is the preference of a prisoner.

At the same time believers in the jury system should recognize that many of the criticisms made in connection with it are sound. A large proportion of the men who are most needed on such bodies manage to evade service and are quite callous in their indifference to their obligations under our judicial methods. The same men who assail the police for failing to protect them against crime will use any right or subterfuge to avoid serving on a jury. The same men who take pains to vote on Election Day consider it a matter of course to seek exemption from the usually more important duty of serving on a jury. The Nation is already on record as against exemption from jury service by occupation. Professional men, a highly necessary element if juries are to be what they ought to be, have so arranged it that they are practically all excused from service. We see no reason why there should be exemption for any occupation as such. Excuses should all be personal, granted only for the best of reasons by the presiding judge. Blanket occupational exemptions have been obtained in nearly all cases, we surmise, not for valid reasons but because the men concerned have unusual influence and have not scrupled to use it. There is no reason either why women should be exempt from jury service, as they are generally in this country. Now that they have the vote, jury service should be recognized as a logical civic right and obligation.

But the fault is not all with those who serve on our juries—or refuse to. Official regulations and methods in connection with jury service seem to be contrived so as to make such work as expensive, inconvenient, and obnoxious as possible. In the first place the prevailing pay of $2 or $3 a day is absurdly antiquated. There was a time in this country when that represented at least the pay of a day laborer, but that day is long past. Judges and prosecutors have been busy in getting their pay raised, but they have had no word to say in behalf of the jurymen. The jurymen's pay ought to be at least doubled, and it should be available to every man who is called to court for any purpose in connection with jury service. The prevailing practice is to pay only such men as actually act on a jury, while numerous others are called to court as possible jurymen, losing half a day or more from their work only to be sent away unused and unpaid.

Equally or more important is some method by which a prospective jurymen may be allowed to choose the time when it is most convenient for him to serve. The busy season varies in different occupations, just as personal plans do. Of course everybody could not be exactly accommodated, but an approximation might be reached. Some such arrangement is already in effect in certain places, as for instance in Essex County, New Jersey. There the court calendar is divided into three terms, and when drawn for jury duty one has the privilege of picking the term most convenient.

Finally a great deal of time is wasted in connection with jury service through absurd rules and practices which are generally one-sided. A man called for jury duty is liable to a fine if he is late, but a tardy judge will keep a whole courtroom of men waiting for half an hour and then take his seat without a word of apology. Exemption from jury service would not be sought so persistently if it were not for the fact that busy men resent the way in which their time is squandered and their personal rights ignored.

It Seems to Heywood Broun

A YOUNG Latin American complained to me the other day that there was in all these United States not one statue erected in honor of Francisco Miranda. I shrugged polite sympathy but confessed that I had never heard of the gentleman. He was not in my school-books. The young man from Central America undertook to rub the rougher edges from my ignorance and related to me briefly the life of Miranda of Venezuela. I cannot understand why his name is not mentioned with Lafayette, Rochambeau, and the rest, for he brought over a regiment to aid us in the War of Independence and served with the French forces here with great distinction.

My Latin-American friend said that he thought he could furnish an explanation for this land's neglect of the fame of Miranda. The Daughters of the American Revolution, he told me, had once contemplated some public honor for Miranda, but, upon examining his career, they found that he had lived in sin with a titled English woman and had also been one of the many lovers of Catherine of Russia.

This, to be sure, is merely hearsay. I do not care to libel the gallant Venezuelan or the lady of Russia. The Encyclopaedia Britannica is reticent in the matter and merely states that he went to Russia, "where he was warmly received." However, it appears as if the reception must have been too warm to conform with American standards.

And yet even the sparse life in the Encyclopaedia presents him as the most fascinating of all revolutionists. No one war was enough for Francisco Miranda. The liberty of the world lay on his conscience and after the last shot had been fired against the British he went to England and, with charming assurance, endeavored to drum up interest in an expedition to free Latin America. When the French Revolution broke out Miranda was in it. In Austria and in Turkey he agitated against existing tyrannies. Later he landed in Colombia, where he proclaimed freedom, and again in Venezuela. And it was here that he was captured and sent to Spain to die in a Cadiz dungeon.

Men of far less fire live icily in marble monuments. Even a Puritan community should be willing at this late date to forgive the sins which Miranda committed against the marriage code. And in the case of Catherine, for instance, how can anybody tell after all these years which one should shoulder the blame. If blame there was. The empress was a woman of great executive ability and few scruples. Miranda was far from home.

But, no matter what the facts, I'm for the statue. Monuments are peculiarly fitting anchorages for uneasy spirits. Those of the dead who were very good in life have no need of granite blocks to hold them down. In their conscience there is no disorder to make them dream and toss about. They even sleep too deeply to be at all concerned with the friendship of posterity. The consolations of sculpture should be reserved for men in whom purpose was half itch and half high principle. For in life the throb which lies in any such person sets him to wandering about the world. He cannot ever reach his goal, for he does not know precisely what it is. And so eagerness does not die with him. The world he left should give him rest by whispering down to him through the earth, "There, there." And if posterity is kind it will make a monument, for that is practically the only way in which the living can pat a dead man on the back.

As a matter of fact, public monuments have a power for reformation which is largely neglected. Cast a man in bronze and set him at the intersection of two busy streets and he can hardly resist the urge to conform. If his private life was open to reproach this simple expedient lifts him out of error, for he no longer has a private life.

When I see Washington peering down above the tree-tops of a little city park I know that this was not the man who swore prodigiously. Under the hand of the reverent artist all the damns have disappeared. And each and every one of the many Lincolns in public places is a man about to speak nobly and in cadenced prose. You can look at any sculptor's Lincoln you please and I defy you ever to get the least suggestion that the gaunt man will grin and say, "It seems there was . . ."

And so it would be with Miranda if we made him into a statue. Into the bronze there might come an ardor and a yearning. It would be the ardor which sent Miranda to fight for American freedom and not at all the ardor which sent him to Catherine. Little children and Daughters of the American Revolution could pass by safely. A Miranda of metal would be without sin.

Perhaps it is rather a pity that we seldom set up statues of men who still live. It would have a most pronounced effect upon their conduct. If any community will agree to have me molded thin, austere, and earnest I will hereby agree to become precisely like that. I shouldn't like to make a fool of the sculptor. Nor of the public either. Marvels are possible in marble and the sculptor could make me alert and eager. If for instance he posed me on one toe sloth might well be shamed out of me.

I hate to wait for posthumous recognition. If the project is delayed until after my death the figure will serve only as a good example to generations yet unborn. I want the aid of example and inspiration myself. As a bicycle rider can go ever so much faster if only a motor sets him pace just so could I follow to glorious achievement a bronze Heywood Broun with sword held high and the light of consecration in my eye.

Just what this statue might be expected to inspire me with I am not so sure. The existence of such a monument would cut confoundedly into my working time. Always you might hope to find me lolling about the pedestal eavesdropping to hear the remarks of the passers-by. Perhaps I would be disappointed in that. Statues do not inflame the imagination of the public much. The first ten years of my life were spent in close proximity to Bolivar in bronze. I never knew his name. To me he was merely "that funny man riding a horse."

When I am unveiled I rather prefer to be set down while still afoot. I should be pedestrian in marble as in life. Also I suggest to the nameless sculptor that he do me fully clothed and with my trousers neatly creased. There is no point in sticking out for naturalism.

Wall Street's Speculative Optimism

By MERRYLE STANLEY RUKEYSER

[This is the first of a series of articles covering the more significant aspects of business and finance. The Federal Reserve Bank, super-power, the bunco game of hidden earnings and assets will be considered. The next article, Chain Stores, the Revolution in Retailing, will appear shortly.]

OF late, the building of financial castles in the air has resulted in the fulfilment of dreams. The tipsters, the windbags, and the unqualified optimists have for once been vindicated by the event. In speculative quarters, the unprecedented phenomena have been described as characteristic of a new era in finance and trade. Since 1922 representative industrial stocks have actually exceeded in their spectacular upturn the meteoric rises which charlatans predicted for their own shoddy financial wares. In the last seven years, seventy representative industrial stocks have trebled in value. Meantime, thirty representative railroad stocks have doubled in value. The experience of this post-war period has challenged the cynical old Wall Street aphorism that "stocks were made to be sold."

Is the American economic society better off as a result of the marking up of stock prices? Usually, there is an undeniable psychological exhilaration in periods of rising prices. The stock market has become a scoreboard for registering managerial success or failure. The big board gives the financially minded public an opportunity to applaud business achievements and to hiss at commercial blunders. The executives of companies whose stocks have been speculative favorites, such as General Motors, Chrysler, Radio Corporation of America, Montgomery Ward & Company, Sears Roebuck & Company, General Electric Company, International Harvester Company, American Smelting and Refining, and R. H. Macy & Company, have sensed tangible evidence that the crowd was with them. High prices for common shares constitute an evidence of public favor, and accordingly open the way to raising new capital on advantageous terms. The present period constitutes a golden opportunity for prosperous companies to raise additional funds through stock issues, which entail no definite promises to investors. Inasmuch as shares constitute a claim only to residual earnings after all prior obligations have been met, companies do not obligate themselves legally to show any earnings on their common shares. Accordingly, whatever inflation may have taken place in common stock values technically imposes no necessary hardships.

However, as a practical matter, executives feel called upon to justify market valuations of their securities through building up business profits. This pressure from the stock market, which is partly only psychological, intensifies the mad race for heightened volume. Moreover, the goad of speculators may tend to make corporate managers less open to socially wise innovations which cut down net profit available for dividends. There is a danger that it may discourage new adventures in profit-sharing, such as the plan of the Endicott Johnson Corporation which, after paying the regular dividend, credits one-half of the excess earnings to the account of a fund for employees, and that of Sears Roebuck & Company which makes substantial deductions from profits for the account of the fund which holds stock in the company for employees. Such a liberal policy causes the ratio of net to gross earnings of the mail-order house to make a superficially unfavorable comparison with that of the F. W. Woolworth Company, which indulges in no similar deductions, although it remunerates store managers in accordance with the success of their particular units.

The social dangers of stock-market inflation, however, concern the consumer of merchandise less than the investor in securities. A long-term rise means that the investor must pay a higher price to buy a given amount of earning power, past, present, or prospective. It also entails a consistent reduction in the current dividend return obtainable on stocks. Such movements end at least temporarily when stock prices exceed a level at which new investors are attracted. Those who buy even the best stocks near the end of the cycle may have to wait patiently for years to get their principal back intact. Furthermore, no candid observer can deny that there is much lost motion in excessive and uninformed trading by amateurs, whose highly emotional operations tend to exaggerate price movements in both directions.

Until turning-points are reached, speculators, who are like participants in a game of pushball, enter the speculative arena, hoping to be able to pass the ball to some one else. Speculators, less concerned with intrinsic value than with the expectation that they can resell at a profit, hope that irrespective of the fantastic price they pay they will be able to find a still more optimistic buyer who will relieve them to their advantage. In the present set-up, the highest remuneration is paid to those who can accurately foresee changing security values. The rewards for canny judgment at the great whirlpool of speculation are prodigious, and, though drastic punishment for blunders is far more general, the hope for success flares up eternally. Accordingly, statistical demonstrations of disappointments sustained by amateur traders are powerless to check the nationwide impulse to participate in prosperity without working.

The psychosis of the amateur financial mind is such that it rejects evidence of a thousand speculative failures and focuses attention on a few exceptional outstanding successes. The Italian-marble palaces along the north shore of Long Island, in Westchester, in California, and in Florida constitute the indigenous means of paying tribute to the extraordinary speculative intelligence of the small minority of successful financiers. In this fast-maturing country the crop of millionaires is large and growing. But the records show that for every palace built to glorify those who bought stocks near the bottom and sold near the top there are tens of thousands of average homes rendered a little sadder and more barren because of faulty speculative calculations.

Whether on Main Street or on Wall Street human beings only occasionally are able to think clearly and eschew feelings, emotions, passions. The prize for keeping one's head and acting promptly and independently during recurrent periods of popular delusions is great riches. That lure—and the thrill of the quickened chase for dollars—has thus far in 1928 drawn a record-breaking horde of men and women with little capital and experience, but with a vast amount of hope, to the great nerve center of speculation.

Some marginal traders succeed for a time, but ultimately most of the lay plungers fail. They constitute the suckers who create opportunities for more analytical financiers.

Speculation dates back to the first attempt of a mortal to tie the present to the future. Never before, however, have so many persons directly participated in security speculation as this year. The wider public, which was apathetic a few years ago when stocks were really on the bargain counter, began to clamor for stocks after they had already soared to unprecedented heights. Accordingly, the more recent advance cannot be explained exclusively in terms of cold logic. Proponents of the advance insist that the stock market has been discounting the arrival of a new era in American business. Unquestionably this post-war period has been marked by America's economic coming of age. Formerly many of the country's foremost projects, such as the railroads, were built in anticipation of future growth. Now American business is in a state of realization; it is cashing in on the foresight of the pioneers. Moreover, the post-war period has witnessed the emergence of America as the foremost creditor nation in the world. In pre-war times, America was debtor on balance, and the dividends and interest paid by American companies were formerly partly garnered by alien owners residing abroad. Such émigré securities have subsequently been repatriated, and the funds paid out to security owners flow back into the domestic stream of investable capital. For the first time in American history, capital has been generated at so rapid a rate that the supply has exceeded the demand. Security prices in recent years have been adjusting themselves to this new condition.

In pre-war times the investor still retained mental reservations toward even the largest American industrial corporations, which he considered unseasoned. Such companies were still an experiment in the competitive world, and timid investors used to capitalize corporate earnings with great moderation. Politically, trusts were on the defensive. But the new post-war period has been plainly the era of big business. Mass production and mass distribution constituted formulas for increasing the dominance of great corporations. Small and inefficient enterprises, confronted by intensified competition, began to suffer heavy mortalities. The better-managed corporations, with war profits behind them, built up huge corporate surpluses, squeezed the original water from their shares, and primed themselves for the new competition of the future. Gradually, even the less discerning perceived the consequences of the flowering of great corporate enterprises, and investors and speculators began to show a new faith in the future of securities of such favored corporations.

Stock prices represent an attempt to capitalize corporate earnings and dividends, present, past, and future, with due regard to prevailing interest rates. Most observers were inclined to regard the long-term decline in interest rates as the principal cause of the advance of security prices between 1922 and 1927. But in the last four to eight months interest rates have reversed their course, without checking the advance in stock prices. If there is merely a lag between interest rates and stock prices, it is a longer one than commonly experienced in past markets.

The old rule-of-thumb notion was that good stocks were worth ten times their earnings. At present, according to the compilations of the Standard Statistics Company, 429 representative industrial stocks are selling at 15.6 times earnings, 48 utilities are selling at 15.6 times earnings, and 37 railroads are selling at 13.6 times earnings. The changed basis cannot be explained solely on grounds of fluctuations in interest rates. It represents in part a new optimism concerning the future. The income tax on present income and the tax exemption of future possibilities have stimulated the wealthy classes to lay increasing emphasis on prospects, rather than on present realities. The price of stock represents an attempt to capitalize future dividends, and in their present mood investors and speculators are taking an extremely sanguine view of what future dividends through the years will be. Accordingly, buyers are willing to share a large part of the anticipated gains with sellers. The essence of the riddle concerning the financial aspects of the so-called new era is whether the public is ready as a permanent policy to capitalize corporate earnings more generously in stock prices than in the past.

Of course, in future periods of public pessimism the rate for capitalizing earnings will decline, but, in my opinion, will remain higher than the pre-war rate in comparable periods of depression. To support such an assumption, there is evidence that a relatively small number of business institutions will get an increasingly large share of the nation's and the world's trade, and there has been a growing public effort to buy a stake in such selected enterprises. Companies have been favored which seem to be the chief instruments through which America is expressing its new world leadership in finance and trade. The new set-up in business enhances the opportunities for large net profit by leaders. Moreover, an epidemic of mergers and consolidations has reduced unprofitable competition. Furthermore, important strides have been made in the last decade in the technique of management. Standardization and simplification have helped to reduce drains on profits, and further opportunities for cutting down primitive industrial waste are still open. Such advances enable well-managed companies to increase net profits without raising prices to consumers or cutting wages.

The cultivation of important new industries such as the automobile, the radio, and the airplane has heightened the productive facilities of this country and has increased the aggregate purchasing power. The fruits of mass production have been made available to an ever-widening circle of consumers through the magic of the instalment plan, which enabled the average man to spend far in excess of his current means. A rising standard of living, which was financed by the payment of higher real wages, constituted the basis for the wave of prosperity which rested on larger per capita consumption. The already insatiable demands of the ordinary person were whipped into a buying frenzy by high-powered advertising and selling, which increased volume without necessarily heightening the prudence with which consumers exercised their buying options. A phase of the improved living standard has been the electrification of the country in this push-button age. With power consumption increasing at the rate of 15 per cent a year, and with new economies in using fuel and through mergers and interconnections, the public-utility holding companies have waxed wealthy, and their securities have in many instances proved bonanzas to their holders.

Moreover, the railroads, under more friendly conditions of regulation under the terms of the Transportation Act of 1920, have regained at least a moderate amount of prosperity, reflecting marked improvement in operating efficiency.

By giving swifter freight service, the railroads have cut down the need for large merchandise inventories on the part of retailers. The carriers accordingly have fostered the new custom of hand-to-mouth buying, which tends to stabilize business. Dividends have risen more rapidly than earnings. On account of accumulated surpluses and better managerial methods, executives have felt it safe currently to pay out a larger share of net earnings than in the past. Fluctuating styles in the realm of investments have also changed the basis for pricing common stocks. Not only has there been a tremendous increase in the number of American security buyers with the rise of the small investor during the last decade, but there has also been a radical shift in investment taste. There has been a new appreciation of the value of common stocks, instead of bonds, as long-term investments for individuals who are more concerned with providing purchasing power for the future than a stipulated number of dollars of uncertain purchasing power. Related to this development has been the vogue for investment trusts in the United States in the last four years, trusts which transfer to experts, real and alleged, the problem of selecting suitable securities for the portfolios of laymen. Such cooperative funds automatically assure wide diversification and presumably expert selection. Investment trusts as a class have been large buyers of common stocks and the well-managed trusts come into the market as buyers when the more emotional public has become temporarily frightened.

The absence of pre-war panics, as a result of better administration of the banking machinery of the country, has extended the period of unbroken high industrial activity. And finally, in recent years, the reservoir of investable capital in the United States, which reflects a period of high productivity, has been artificially swollen by the reduction of the federal government debt at the rate of a billion dollars a year.

The foregoing citation of factors which contributed to the long-term advance of stock prices constitutes to a marked extent water that has already gone over the dam. The investor must always decide to what extent stock prices have discounted new developments. Appraisers of speculative trends are already beginning to focus attention on the reaction which may be the sequel to the advance. John J. Raskob, Colonel Leonard P. Ayres, and a wide variety of delegates to the recent convention of the American Bankers Association publicly confided their belief that the present level of stock prices is too high. But for weeks the public tended to ignore such warnings, just as it defied the cautionary leadership of the Federal Reserve System, whose attempt to put the brakes on speculation in the first third of the year only succeeded in causing two short periods of drastic liquidation. Subsequently, stock prices and brokers' loans soared to unprecedented summits.

Pseudo-scientific forecasters have made a lamentable failure for several years in calling the turns on this remarkable stock market. Financial high priests have been repeatedly wrong in articulating the oracular judgment that prices were too high. Meantime, out-and-out bulls, of the type of William C. Durant, have been more reliable prognosticators, although on occasions Mr. Durant's expressions of optimism have come only shortly before a drastic intermediate reaction. If such men continue indefinitely to view the market as roofless, they will doubtless at length prove spectacularly wrong—at least, from the criterion of short-term results.

The Real Situation in Russia*

By ALBERT RHYS WILLIAMS

FUNDAMENTAL to any understanding of the real situation in Russia is the fact that Communist Party policies are not determined by a few score leaders, but by the hundreds of thousands of the members; that the course of the revolution is controlled by the rank and file, long and intensely trained in political thought and action. In them resides a vast revolutionary intelligence that is not to be fooled by the resounding phrases of journalists and orators: a revolutionary will that is not to be thwarted by the intrigues of politicians or intimidated by bureaucrats. In every struggle they manage to get to the root of the issues, to make their voice articulate and their will effective.

But in "The Real Situation in Russia," not only do the author, Trotsky, and the translator, Max Eastman, ignore these facts but the publishers are moved to announce that "all the documents in this book were suppressed and outlawed by the Stalin regime and came out of Russia underground."

Very luring to the reader, only it doesn't happen to be true. Long ago various sections of the book were published in the Russian press, particularly in the Pravda, official organ of the Communist Party with a circulation of over 600,000 penetrating into the farthest steppes and forests of the Soviet lands. The first part of the book was printed in the Pravda of November 2, 1927. The substance of some of the second part in the issue of November 17. The Joffe letter, in its original form, appears in the magazine Bolshevik. If the reader wants it in English, let him ask at the public library for Inprecor, and in Inprecor of December 12, 1927, he will find the Counter-Theses on Work in the Village and other Opposition documents to the extent of 30,000 words. In them the Central Committee of the party is accused of "cheap sneers," "revenge," "knoting to the kulak" (rich peasant), "bourgeois lying." And all this, translated into three languages, is printed by the Central Committee and distributed throughout the world. Surely an original method of suppressing and outlawing documents!

The controversy with the Opposition is presented by Mr. Eastman in his preface and in the copious notes which accompany the text as a contest between two sets of leaders: "the clear-headed honest revolutionists" against the "reactionary bureaucrats, politicians, and heelers." As in the Zoroastrian religion a duel between the forces of good and evil, the God of Light, Trotsky, pitted against the God of Darkness, Stalin. This version of the Russian Revolution quite accords with the conception of the hero-worshipping Westerner; the giants and geniuses at the top determining the policies and the rank and file acquiescently carrying out the program handed down to them. But it is not, it has never been so. The leaders propose, but the party masses dispose. Again and again they have not hesitated to reject the proposals of Stalin, Bukharin, Trotzky—even of Lenin. But in "The Real Situation in Russia" this fact is never touched upon. In the present controversy, then, it is essential to know the feelings of the party masses about the program and tactics of the Opposition and their verdict.

Let us take a typical group, a "cell" of the party, not in Moscow but in the country. Let us go to Kvalinsk on the Volga where I lived for fourteen months. Of the seventy Communists in the town, twenty became well known to me by frequent visits to my house, journeyings together into the villages, and subsequent correspondence. Here are a few:

Stephanov, the quiet bullet-scarred Red armyist, now on the ring post that brings Moscow a month nearer to the snowbound villages beyond the Volga. Into the village his sledge sweeps with jangling bells calling everybody to the Soviet. Shaking the snow from his coat, he plunges into the crowd, shouting greetings, distributing mail, taking subscriptions for the peasant papers, answering complaints in Chuvash, Mordvin, and Tartar. Blizzards rage, he is pursued by hungry wolf-packs, kulaks conspire against him, his child dies, but he never misses a trip, never loses patience and good humor.

The students Rodenov and Kobilov, standing with clenched fists before a portrait of Marx, dedicating their lives to communism and to good roads in Russia; dragging sleds from hut to hut gathering gifts of grain and cabbages for a Lenin-corner, entering the village clubs to drive out drinking and hooliganism with games and books and revolutionary songs.

Khonin, the rural judge, discoursing to the peasants on the moot questions of the day: why boys steal grain, why families break up, why wives suddenly become unmanageable. All day holding official court in the village school, then, round the samovar, private court till midnight, adjusting land disputes, reconciling hot-tempered sons with despotic fathers, getting peasant opinion on proposed changes in the law, expounding the Soviet theory of law, not as codes superimposed by autocratic rulers but as rules of life drawn up by the people themselves, calling up visions of the society to be, without judges or courts or jails. A few hours sleep in the strawshed, wrapped in his shuba, then at it again.

If one must have a hero of the Revolution, why not find it in groups like this, working away in the 300,000 villages of Russia with all the diplomacy of Chicherin, the eloquence of Trotzky, the energy of Stalin, the single-heartedness of Lenin. With no plaudits or drums to cheer them on, fighting against age-old ignorance and traditions on these lone far-off fronts, as valorously as in 1917 they fought on the barricades and against the armies of the imperialists.

Now came the Opposition, telling how to deal with the peasants. In the papers columns of speeches explaining the new program, in person two Opposition leaders from Moscow. Stripped of glittering phraseology the gist of the new proposal was: "Curb the kulak (rich peasant)! Organize the poor!" But this was precisely what the Kvalinsk Communists were doing with all their might. They were organizing the farm hands into unions; exempting the poor peasants from taxes; advancing them loans for horses, seeds, implements; uniting them in tractor artels and cooperatives; defending their interests in court; at every turn, with every strategy, raising barriers against kulaks and nepmen.

What new concrete measure did the Opposition propose? It was this: A forced loan of 150 million poods from the kulak. Or in the fervid words of one of the Oppositionists: "Let the poor peasants rise up, grab the kulak by the throat, and shake out a billion rubles!" A seductive and exhilarating proposition. No longer the patient, nerve-wearing, laborious methods of circumventing the kulak. But falling on him with a bludgeon, in one fell swoop smashing and ruining him altogether.

Glorious but not revolution, was the verdict of the Kvalinsk Communists. Despite the dazzling revolutionary phrases in which it was couched and the apparently revolutionary action to which it summoned, they branded it as anti-revolutionary. They condemned it as the device of men who might be brilliant internationalists and Marxian scholars, but who were abysmally ignorant of Russian realities in rural life; the fantastic scheme of urbanites isolated from the villages. They rejected it as adventuristic, visionary, and impossible. It was impossible because there was no way of defining the kulak. Only five of the 34,000 peasants in the Kvalinsk district had four horses—these might be kulaks. But how select the kulaks among the 10,000 two and three-horse peasants? A sheer impossibility. For this reason the forced grain levy would fall not only on the kulak but on the middle peasant with disastrous consequences. For if Moscow could arbitrarily commandeer his surplus, what inducement to produce? Why toil and sweat only to see the fruits thereof taken away from him? Far better to sow just enough for his own needs. The result would be little grain on the market, no grain for export, the complete disorganization of agriculture. Thus the blow aimed by the Opposition at the kulak and striking the middle peasant would shatter the economic basis of the Soviet state.

At the same time the attempt to enforce the grain loan by rousing the enmity of the village would be a shattering blow at the moral basis of the Soviet state. For the peasant no longer, as of old, meekly submits to ukases from Moscow. As these Kvalinsk Communists knew so well, a decade of revolution has created a new peasant: independent, conscious of his power, jealous of his rights. Resentful of anything superimposed on him, he respects only those laws which he has had a part in formulating. Even in 1918-1920 the grain requisitions roused him to rebellion and a wave of revolt swept through the villages. In 1928 a forced grain loan would be rank insult to his sense of justice, an affront to his new-born pride of citizenship. He would resist it by every means at his command. That would mean once more the army in the villages, sabotage and hatred of the Communist regime. It would mean the dissipation of the loyalty and confidence so carefully built up by seven years of tireless labor. At one stroke the destruction of the object which Lenin urged the party at all costs to achieve: the union (smichka) between peasants and workers. At one stroke the alienation of the peasants, the mainstay of the Red army—a blow at the national defense.

(It may seem that the disasters flowing from the Opposition measure are a bit exaggerated. But all these fears have been confirmed by the experiences of the past winter and spring, when even the mild measures adopted for forcing grain from the richer peasants brought a contraction of the sown area, the hostility of the villages, the active and passive resistance of the peasants resulting in thousands of arrests.)

As the Soviet press continued to print the speeches of the Opposition, the Kvalinsk Communists became bored or annoyed. As the Opposition in their headstrong insistence on the prolongation of the debate went beyond all bounds of party discipline and Soviet legality, they became exasperated, embittered, enraged. First, this rage was directed against the Opposition leaders, then against the Central Committee of the party: "Had we done one-tenth as much, long ago we would have been expelled!" They sent demands to Moscow to cease conciliating and temporizing with the Opposition, to take drastic measures against the offenders. Thousands of other groups like Kvalinsk did the same. No Central Committee ever had such a clear, definite mandate to act. Only however after the practically unanimous condemnation of the Opposition by the party in the Fifteenth Congress and by all the Communist parties of the world in the Comintern was it expelled in a body. The intransigent and irreconcilable, refusing to bow to the will of the party, were ordered into exile.

This exiling is depicted in a highly sensational manner, and according to Mr. Eastman not only Trotzky but "his friends were violently dragged out of their homes, shipped into desert. . . ." Very lurid, but that is not the way it happened to Trotzky's friend, Feodorov (page 204) in whose home I lived in Moscow. As an active Oppositionist he was slated for exile and the G.P.U. proposed that he join Trotzky at Alma Ata. Feodorov protested that he didn't like the climate. A few days later, and over the telephone, the G.P.U. asked: "How about going to America? We can fix up a job for you in the Amtorg there!" Feodorov's wife was in raptures. But not Feodorov. His was a most exacting taste in places of exile. Courteously but firmly he objected. So while the G.P.U. racked its brains in an effort to please their fastidious client, Feodorov went on a visit to Leningrad, then to Zinoviev and Kamenev in exile, some sixty miles from Moscow, carrying rugs and curtains for their barely furnished quarters. Finally after a month of pourparlers a satisfactory place was found for Feodorov—the city of Kharkov with a position as manager of a chemical factory. His departure was celebrated by some fifty Oppositionists in his home, in an evening of fun and fellowship. They joked about the "vacation" the party was now giving them, the first in twenty years; they held mock trials, jocularly ordering this cold-hating comrade to exile in frozen Siberia, that heat-hating comrade to blazing Turk-estan. There were Russian dishes and steaming samovars, rollicking stories, folk-songs, and village dances till morning. A real old-time Russian vecherenka.

There is nothing of this sort in the book. For Mr. Eastman has set out by all means to convince the reader that the Oppositionists were the victims of unrelieved brutality and trickery and into his elaborate introductions and footnotes he admits only such material as would buttress his arguments. Many of the incidents related seem to me a bit distorted, if not apocryphal. However, granting their authenticity, against them can be placed others that would lead the reader to quite a different impression.

For instance, why has Mr. Eastman not included the authentic incident of November 7, at the textile factory where Trotzky was a great favorite? Suddenly without warning he appeared before the workers forming in line for the Tenth Anniversary parade. Cheers greeted his first sentences glorifying the October Revolution. But as he passed to an attack on the party there were murmurs of dissent, then protests, then shouts: "Stop it!" Trotzky lashed out ferociously, calling them "bureaucrats! bourgeois!" "No, Comrade Trotzky," they cried holding up their hands, "we've been spinners and weavers here for twenty years. We're Communists and you're splitting the party." Trotzky persisted, rousing the workers to rage, and from their hands he escaped only by fleeing in his car. Everywhere the Opposition met a like rebuff. A spontaneous rejection by the very workers who were at first allured by the seductive promises of the higher wages and more privileges, held out in the Opposition program.

About this side of the conflict Mr. Eastman is eloquently silent. While dwelling on the "intrigues" and "ruthless strategy" of the party against the Opposition, he sedulously omits the ruthlessness and violence and provocative tactics employed by the Opposition against the party. One might think that the Oppositionists were all sweetness and light, harmless as a brood of doves. No hint to the reader that the faction they organized was put on a war footing, with secret pass-words, and a Red Cross captained by Joffe; that the Oppositionists forcibly seized halls, violently ejecting the regular party workers; that they repeatedly violated explicit promises given to the party; that they supplied the bourgeois press with party documents, and even waged their propaganda among correspondents of the foreign capitalist press.

It was by this defiance of all party discipline and loyalty that the Oppositionists alienated such sympathy as they first enjoyed among the workers. In their eyes the course pursued by the Opposition was leading to the disruption of the party, and—despite all disclaimers to the contrary—to the formation of a second party, a threat to the very existence of the proletarian state. Alarmed at this prospect the masses rallied to the defense of the party and to the support of the Central Committee. If in the provinces it was the agrarian program of the Oppositionists that defeated them, in the cities it was primarily their tactics, stirring deep and widespread indignation. They were condemned by the party masses as dangerous, if not destructive, to the revolution.

Nothing of this in the book. The feelings, ideas, and judgment of the party masses are ignored. They are completely left out of the picture, or dragged in now and then to appear shouting hosannas to the Opposition. The whole controversy is presented as a duel between contending leaders, with Mr. Eastman striving by all means to glorify the Trotzkyists and to blacken the Stalinists, but in his bitter partisanship he overreaches himself. He leaves the party acquiescent in perpetration of a monstrous crime.

If this were true, how pitifully abject and contemptible the character of the million revolutionists comprising the Russian Party, how utterly lacking either in will or in intelligence. For either they have been hoodwinked and tricked by the "demagogism, lying, and jesuitry" of Stalin and his henchmen, and were ignorant of the situation; or craven, cowering, and browbeaten, they lack ordinary backbone and courage to rise up in protest against it. The party that wrought the greatest revolution in history, the party that fought through a decade of war, famine, blockade, now become a crowd of dupes or cowards!

Is it possible that anyone believes that this is the real situation in Russia?

Notes from Washington

By DUFF GILFOND

Washington, D. C., October 29

THE United States Tariff Commission has just completed a $20,000 investigation on corn and sent its report to the President. The three Republican commissioners, although two of them knew better, in their timely solicitude for the farmer recommended an increase in the duty. Commissioner Lowell, nice old fellow, might be exempted from blame on the ground of ignorance.

Raising the duty on corn cannot help the farmer any more than changing the style in lamp-posts. Considering that only one-twenty-fifth of 1 per cent of the total production of corn and less than 2 per cent of the marketable surplus is imported, foreign competition can hardly be the cause of the farmer's troubles. Whether the duty on corn be fifteen or fifty cents he will still have difficulty in meeting his bills.

This condition, however, did not deter the President from ordering the investigation. It was, as explained to him, perfectly innocuous; the unsuspecting farmer could be persuaded it was a relief measure; and it could be completed just before the election. Mr. Coolidge was impressed, and although Secretary Jardine pooh-poohed it and the Democratic Tariff Commissioners Dennis and Dixon snickered, the farce began. It has been whispered that the President's letter to the Tariff Commission was not even tactful. Instead of requesting it to furnish the data on corn about which a question had risen, he forgot the commission was purely a fact-finding body and bluntly asked what it could do about raising the duty.

Chairman Marvin and Dr. Brossard, the high priests of protection, and their acolyte, Mr. Lowell, readily found a way to do Mr. Coolidge's bidding. Since the Attorney-General has ruled that the transportation rate may be included in determining the cost of production, the commissioners figure on the longest haul, regardless of whether the commodity will ever make it. In this instance they reckoned the freightage from the Middle West, the center of corn production, to San Francisco, the point of contact between American and Argentine corn. They could have selected the Eastern route, as imported corn is also used on the Eastern coast, but it is cheaper. To be sure, it is preposterous to think of trundling corn over the precipitous Rockies to protect American farmers and a pity to provoke the Argentine government when they send us so little, but politics are a grave consideration. Last year the commissioners gave American cherries a buggy ride all across the country with the hope of wresting the Eastern market from the Italian cherry grower. But the disadvantage of moving the Western cherries is so great that in the East Italian cherries are still eaten, without fatalities, and at a higher price.

The Tariff Commission has frequently been charged with a hyper-protective spirit. Commissioner Dennis once said the tariff, like the elbow, "flexes" one way: up, not down. This is not true, exactly. A survey of the pending investigations of the commission indicates that one is actually being made with the purport of reducing a duty. The commodity is matzoths, the sacramental bread of the Jews, all of $10,000 of which was imported in 1927. Matzoths could neatly be added to the list of important commodities on which the duty was reduced in the last three years: bob-white quail, paint-brush handles, cresylic acid, and phenol.

Matzoths came into the limelight when the yearning of a sentimental New York rabbi for the Palestinian brand became known to Senator Curtis. That good Indian, with an eye on Jewish votes, especially from the Empire State, quickly took the matter up with the Tariff Commission. Between them they decided Jews would never go to heaven if they continued to eat American matzoths and, in spite of the fact that wool and aluminum have been badly in need of an investigation, this question of the matzoths could not be neglected. Besides, it will undoubtedly be easier for the Republican Party to hurt the feelings of the manufacturers of matzoths than those of wool and aluminum.

While futile investigations like the one on corn are rushed and completed, really important studies are still dragging on. Linseed oil is the prize example, although its mistreatment is not the fault of the Tariff Commission. Uniquely enough, this whole board, including the reactionary chairman, recommended a reduction of the duty more than five years ago. The President avoided the performance of a disagreeable task by pronouncing the data insufficient. Subsequent excursions by the commission's experts and the repeated raking up of more statistics have not changed the President's mind. The linseed oil report will never be fat enough to burst out of the White House pigeon-hole.

Mr. Hoover at length discontinued Negro segregation in the Department of Commerce—after refusing for two weeks to see the Negro delegation who, through political vantage, forced the move on him. "He is too busy with great national issues," his secretaries repeatedly explained. Dr. Work, after seven conferences with the colored leaders, generously agreed to wipe out segregation in the Pension Office of the Department of the Interior, where, incidentally, he had instituted it. But when he was asked to be equally fair about the General Land Office, he indignantly replied that he hadn't put it there. To Neval H. Thomas, president of the Washington branch of the N. A. A. C. P., he snarled: "Why are you kicking about Negro segregation in the government? Aren't you teaching in a Jim Crow school?"

The exigency of the election, nevertheless, provoked some humanitarian gestures. A wall was torn down in the General Land Office, actually leaving white and colored adjudicators in the same room. As it is a long room, however, with the desks at either end, and since the Mason and Dixon's line, left by the wall, has not been removed from the floor, over-dainty persons may still find some consolation. The colored adjudicators are deprived of the service of the twenty-four fair white girl stenographers, any of whom may take the dictation of the white adjudicators across the boundary line. But an attempt to placate them was made by substituting for their personal colored stenographer a white man. (Oh, it would have to be a man; white womanhood must be protected!) The Negroes are still not grateful. When, hour after hour, they are obliged to wait because their sole stenographer is not available, they have been known to sulk.

In the Department of the Treasury, where Secretary Mellon denied the existence of such a shameful thing as segregation, thirty colored girls are banded together in one office under a colored chief. They don't sulk here. So vehement was Uncle Andy in his protestations that he succeeded in convincing even the victims. "There's no segregation here," the chief told me. "You couldn't expect them to put everybody in one room, could you?" Yet, in this group, known as the "colored division," one young woman submissively checks up figures, although she was accepted as a stenographer in the Bureau of Internal Revenue. Unfortunately, that was by telegraph after she had creditably passed the examination but before the authorities had seen the color of her skin.

Unlike his superior, Mr. Ogden Mills, the highbrow assistant, admits there is segregation, but offers a noble justification. "Be reasonable," he said to one reformer. "Would you have me put those segregated men out on the street?"

In the Driftway

FASHION is no respecter of business. It makes and unmakes industries with a nod. The cotton and woolen trades have had to face reduced business because of short skirts, while manufacturers of silk and rayon have basked in prosperity. Prohibition, the Drifter had supposed, must have benefited greatly the makers of candies and other sweets, since those who take their sugar in the form of alcohol do not normally use much of it in other ways, and those who have drubbed out of their lives the Demon Rum develop a taste for sugar in its original state. But it appears that the habit of cigarette smoking among women has offset whatever prohibition may have done to the advantage of the candy-makers, and the great British cocoa pool, confronted with lessened consumption and falling prices, has collapsed, pouring down maledictions upon the Wicked Weed which quite put to rout the phrases of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union. But the Drifter surmises that the passion for slenderness has hit the candy-makers harder than the feminine taste for tobacco. The desire for a willowy body, in accordance with fashion, has been strong enough to triumph over the love of chocolates. And where can our reformers find a basis for a moral crusade against those whose only sin is to seek the figure of a Psyche in preference to that of a Juno?

* * * * *

THE Drifter has never seen a ghost, yet he knows where they ought to be, for every day, from a certain window, he looks into a churchyard. Behind the tilting gravestones and the little spire tower the buildings of lower Manhattan. Perhaps nearness to the dead intensifies the Drifter's liking for this little church. Probably the Drifter is a thing belonging to a race of things fundamentally afraid of dying—people who long ago, to appease that fear, called on their dead ancestors to help them, and arranged sticks and rocks in patterns, which grew into shrines and temples and churches.

WHAT began to happen to the churches of the world, the Drifter wonders, when wise city fathers, in the name of public health, began to forbid churchyard burial? What began to happen when the church was divorced from the bats and ghosts, and when that dark symbol, the sexton's spade, was driven beyond the city limits? What happened to the old ghosts of Egypt, and Greece, and Palestine, and Valhalla that are fused into something the Drifter still feels when he looks into the shadowy churchyard under his window? Who, after all, was the central figure in the church—the man who preached in the pulpit on Sunday or that grim priest who lived there seven days a week, the sexton who pulled the same bell-rope for services, for weddings, for alarms, for funerals, the man of the bell and the spade?

* * * * *

NOW, the Drifter is not superstitious. Sometimes he thinks he has transferred all his old religious impulses to a new creed built on love and hate, fear, wonder, and hope for all that America symbolizes by those tall buildings on lower Manhattan. Yet deep in his heart he feels that Westminster Abbey or little Trinity in Wall Street, churches associated with the physical dead, must always seem holier than ever will be Harry Emerson Fosdick's sanitary temple built for the Rockefellers on Riverside Drive. The Drifter is rather certain he would feel holier standing in the portal of the church and looking across the street at the tomb of that hardy man-killer, Grant, than gazing from the tomb toward that costly pile dedicated to God, through his servant John the Baptist—but free from any suggestion of the dead.

Correspondence Reimbursing Bondsmen

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Among your readers there are some who have put up bonds on aliens ordered deported to Soviet Russia. We are looking for those readers to advise them that we can get their money back through the Department of Labor at Washington.

The impossibility of deporting to Soviet Russia in the absence of diplomatic relations has led the Department at last to see the wisdom of canceling the bonds and letting these aliens go. They are old cases dating back to the federal drive against Russian Communists.

Will your readers who know of any such bondsmen get in touch with the American Civil Liberties Union, 100 Fifth Avenue, New York City?

Miss Mayo and the Rockefeller Foundation

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I brought to the notice of the president of the Rockefeller Foundation the statements made by Professor W. Norman Brown in his review of the two books in reply to "Mother India." I asked him whether the foundation had anything at all to do with the publication of the book. The president of the foundation, Dr. George E. Vincent, made the following reply:

First, the Rockefeller Foundation has had nothing whatever to do with Miss Mayo as an investigator or a writer, has had no request of her, has offered no suggestion, has paid no money to her, and has had no connection of any kind with her books.

Second, two men connected with the Rockefeller Foundation are friends of Miss Mayo's. Independently of each other, in Miss Mayo's own house, in the course of conversation, they were asked by Miss Mayo for suggestions about some movement which she might promote by first-hand study and the writing of a book. The initiative was hers.

Both men suggested that international health offered an important and promising field. Both suggested the health section of the League of Nations as the chief source of information on this subject.

As to India, one of them has never been in India, knows nothing about conditions there, and never even mentioned the subject in his talk with Miss Mayo. The other, having visited India, described it as an example of a country in which problems of modern preventive medicine have to overcome unusual difficulties. He spoke in general terms and made no specific suggestions.

Police Cruelty

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: You frequently bewail the fact that policemen torture prisoners. In commenting on this evil you generally assume that it can be wiped out by abolishing the signed confession as evidence in a criminal trial. Such a step might affect the batting averages of prosecutors but I do not believe it would cause any far-reaching reforms in our police forces. Policemen are not particularly anxious to get signatures on dotted lines. They care a great deal, however, about securing material evidence, and if they can force a prisoner into furnishing them with valuable clues they will go about their task in a true, businesslike way.

As long as the police have access to prisoners the third degree will exist. This is inevitable wherever promotion in a police force is dependent upon "successful" arrests. To attempt to reform the character of the individual policeman is quixotic; the very nature of his work hardens him to human suffering. A few men may retain their sympathies while serving on our city forces, but the bulk of our policemen are too callous to feel any qualms about inflicting physical pain.

If this evil is to be abolished, the police must be denied access to prisoners. In other words, the control and operation of patrol wagons and police-station jails must be under some jurisdiction independent of the police. This jurisdiction would, in essence, be identical to that of the warden of a State penitentiary. It would be concerned only with the detention and transportation of prisoners and not with making arrests and securing evidence. It would, therefore, have no interest in the innocence or guilt of anyone.

To Certain Bostonians

By WITTER BYNNER

Secure on your seats you sit, the little while
Yet left you of your session among men;
But oh, the insecureness of the smile
With which you prate your carefulness again!
Again, again, and still again, till death
Shall relieve you of the tombstone in your minds,
You use the measured syllables of breath;
But naught of all that you are saying blinds
To unmercy a merciful world, O righteous five,
Though you be judge or governor or president.
You could not bear that men should stay alive
Who would not mean to life the things you meant—
But in the human heart, consider how Secure they sit and sit, forever now.

Eleventh Anniversary

By MAX EASTMAN

Trotsky is banished; Lenin lies in state.
The sword, flung off, still flickers in the sod;
The god-destroyer, dead, becomes a god.
A fog of worshipers, where shone the great,
Worms in to darken and to desecrate.
A troupe of crude farce actors tread the boards
Where trod the chiefs of the real battle hordes
Of the exploited, storming the forts of fate.
Thousands that in that day spoke boldly, find
Rash the straight word, imprudent the clear mind,
Undisciplined the will that states: We can.
Oh, what a quickly shifting ear is man!
Speak, if you have no deed; the truth is great.
They rot to earth who only stand and wait.

Nature Lovers Will Be Mystics

“THE Outermost House”* by Henry Beston went out of its way to attract me. It describes minutely and pleasantly the observations of a sensitive person who possessed the imagination and fortitude to spend a full, round year on the Great Beach of Cape Cod living by himself in a small house built on the high dunes south of the Nauset Coast Guard Station. Twice I have walked that beach on the way from Provincetown around the Cape. I have come down reluctantly from the springy coast-guard path on the turf-covered cliffs above Nauset to drag through the sandy stretches to the south. I have bathed and basked and cooked on the beach. My nostrils still hold the acrid, solid smell of heavy quilts in a damp well-closed bedroom in the keeper’s house at Nauset Light. The first chapters of Mr. Beston’s book sent me off in search of charts and maps and diaries and photographs, and these sent me back to the book to compare notes and try to identify wrecks and reestablish in my mind the geography of that stretch of the Cape Cod shore.

This was almost as much fun as a cross-word puzzle and created a friendly feeling toward Mr. Beston; for all I know I may have emptied the sand from my shoes on his front step. But as I read further in his book a disconcerting thing happened. I found myself disliking “The Outermost House.” Perhaps this sort of feeling is bound to arise when someone tries to tell you all about something you have experienced intimately and intensely yourself. Whatever the reason, I began to rewrite Mr. Beston’s book for him. Mentally I heckled him in a way he would properly resent if he knew about it. Must nature lovers, or amateur naturalists, always turn mystic? I inquired. Try as they will to achieve an air of bright objectivity, they seem inevitably to collapse into generalities about Nature. They look around them and report—nicely and accurately; and then they wander off into a hopeful, inventive discussion of the deeper meanings of things. The impulse that directs a flock of birds to fly in unison and symmetry, the desire that drives them to migrate over great stretches of sea to distant shores, the rhythm of waves that “beats in the sea like a pulse in living flesh,” the passion that drives the alewives up into the ponds—such phenomena induce in our more verbal nature lovers a mood of reverential awe or hazardous speculation. A good naturalist occasionally emerges as a good mystic as well, but too few of the breed are willing to consider the primrose by the river’s brim as even primarily a yellow primrose. This sort of tender-minded susceptibility is not a help to good reporting. If Mr. Beston had held himself to a straight story of life on the beach—as full as he wants to make it of human, ornithological, conchological, or botanical interest—my pleasure and interest would have lasted through the book. But he editorializes as he goes along. Evidently he never was a newspaper reporter, or perhaps he was a foreign correspondent. He editorializes, for instance, on the way of Nature with a man:

Dwelling thus upon the dunes, I lived in the midst of an abundance of natural life which manifested itself every hour of the day, and from being thus surrounded, thus inclosed within a great whirl of what one may call the life force, I felt that I drew a secret and sustaining energy. There were times, on the threshold of spring, when the force seemed as real as heat from the sun. A skeptic may smile and ask me to come to his laboratory and demonstrate; he may talk as he will of the secret workings of my own isolated and uninfluenced flesh and blood, but I think that those who have lived in nature, and tried to open their doors rather than close them on her energies, will understand well enough what I mean. Life is as much a force in the universe as electricity or gravitational pull, and the presence of life sustains life. Individuals may destroy individuals, but the life force may mingle with the individual life as a billow of fire may mingle for a moment with a candle flame.

Skeptic that I am, I would believe even more deeply in Mr. Beston’s emotions if he left me to guess them from the quality of his writing and the intensity of his observation. He saves the day by continuing in the next line:

But now I must begin to tell of the birds who are wintering on the coast, of the exchange of species which takes place here, and of how all manage to live.

* Doubleday, Doran. $3.

As a matter of fact, Mr. Beston sees his birds and his waves and even his human companions with an eye for significant detail. He knows the shore birds really well and his descriptions of their habits are clear and full of life. But even here he fails somehow to convey the delightful and comic mannerisms of the sandpiper tribes as they run and teeter and cock an inquiring eye; or to transmit the high-pitched conversational clatter that descends from a flock of wheeling terns. He should read, as no doubt he has read, the lively descriptions in Thoreau's "Cape Cod." There was a man who could walk a beach and tell his experiences without ever once being lured off the track by metaphysical whimsies. I finished "The Outermost House" with a final question lurking in my mind: Did its author ever act and feel or did he only look and wonder?

The Battle for Food

Hunger Fighters. By Paul De Kruif. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $3.

DR. DE KRUIF'S chief virtue is that he knows how to give the quest of the scientist all the thrills and gaudiness of a fight with broadswords. In his chronicle there is no sign of the conventional man of learning, sober, somber, and a shade ridiculous. Instead there emerges a gallant and even a somewhat rakish fellow, warring magnificently against the recalcitrance of nature and no less against the hunkerousness of man. It was so in "Microbe Hunters," and it is so in the present book. Turn, for example, to the chapter on apthous fever, the dreadful foot-and-mouth disease. The hero here is Friedrich Loeffler, and he leaps out of the laboratory like some medieval swashbuckler, his eyes dancing, his armor flashing, and his mustaches "a pair of curved whiskbrooms." What was a mere name becomes a man. What was a solemn inquiry becomes a struggle to the death, and as exciting as any other.

De Kruif achieves this business with great skill. He enjoys fighting for its own sake, and he enjoys it especially when it is carried on against the churlish reticences of God. In his eye a Loeffler is far more than a shrewd fellow, wrestling with a hard problem; he is a rebel of the first caliber, a Davidsbündler pitted against the worst Philistine of them all. The tale is told nervously, uproariously, with immense gusto. It bulges through the ordinary decorums, and has recourse to phrases more vivid than suave. De Kruif, as they say, knows his onions, but he is surely no professor. He writes, when his blood is up, like a house afire, and what he writes makes gorgeous reading.

I have a feeling that, in "Hunger Fighters," his heroes interest him a shade less than they did in "Microbe Hunters." After all, bacteriology is his trade, and as a sworn adept he naturally rates its problems and exploits above those of the agronomist and the agricultural chemist. No doubt he is right. It is one thing to perfect a wheat that will stand frost, and quite another and more spectacular thing to do battle with microbes that slay whole populations. Thus Loeffler comes out rather better than the other heroes of this book. They have good lines, to be sure, but Loeffler is the star of the show, though he alone comes to complete defeat in the end. The organism that causes foot-and-mouth disease is still elusive; it creeps through the finest filters and baffles the most searching microscopes. But soon or late it will be tracked down, and when that time comes De Kruif will have another famous story to tell.

In "Hunger Fighters" he covers a wide range. He tells of Mark Alfred Carleton, who found the Kubanka wheat in Siberia and brought it to America; of Marion Dorset, who solved the mystery of hog cholera; of Angus Mackay, who developed the Marquis wheat; of Henry Wallace, the corn wizard, and of many another like them. The names are mainly unfamiliar.

These great enrichers of the nation are unknown, even to their direct beneficiaries. For one American farmer who has heard of Carleton or Dorset there are thousands who know and venerate Lydia Pinkham and Billy Sunday. The irony of it does not escape De Kruif. It tickles him to set forth the harsh obstacles and meager rewards of these incalculably useful and honorable men. He has made a good job of his book. Now let him do one on the surgeons.

The Nonentity as Hero

Theresa. By Arthur Schnitzler. Simon and Schuster. $2.50.

SCHNITZLER'S "Theresa," described on the jacket as its author's "first full-length novel in twenty years," is so competently written and yet withal so thoroughly undistinguished that its chief effect is to raise in the mind of the reader a question which would have been treason not so very many years ago. Accurately subtitled "The Chronicle of a Woman's Life," it recounts all the events in the existence of a singularly characterless female, and the question which it provokes is simply whether or not the modern novel has not already done somewhat more than justice to this particular subject. Flaubert seems to have discovered it in "Un Cœur Simple" and Maupassant helped to make it popular with "Une Vie," but every beginning realist since their day has felt constrained to prove that he could make an uninteresting person interesting, and by the time one has finished "The Old Wives' Tale" of Bennett one has begun to suspect that there is, after all, no reason why dull lives should be the only ones worth the attention of the serious artist.

There was, to be sure, a time when all of us read these chronicles with delight. Sensationally unsensational, they helped us to feel that we were getting into touch with "reality" and that we might trust their authors not to betray us with any false glamor. We championed them hotly as brave protests against a too facile romanticism, and we noted with pride our ability to become interested in tales so unvarnished. But their importance was too much the importance of a protest not to be, in part at least, temporary. Their unconventionality became gradually conventional and their dullness, ceasing to be in any way surprising, became merely dull. Other novelists—Somerset Maugham for instance—who were strictly within the same tradition of realism showed us how the same methods could be employed in the treatment of material intrinsically more interesting and, whatever we might think of the classic examples of the nonentity as hero, we felt no particular desire to follow his unadventurous adventures over again.

In "Theresa" the realistic form is pleasantly simplified. The story is told in a graceful narrative which adopts the straightforward directness of the conte rather than the elaborately dramatic method of the conventional realistic novel; but the story, though artfully recounted, remains essentially banal. We meet Theresa on the eve of her first amorous adventure, and we follow in detail her career as a governess, but her career does not seem to reveal anything except a certain listless incompetence in her own character. She is not particularly good or particularly bad. From the beginning to the end, her chief desire was to marry someone who would look after her, and yet, though she was never moved by any very intense passions, she persisted in sharing the bed with pretty nearly everyone who asked her. Since the affairs were quite casual with her there is nothing particularly surprising in the fact that they were always quite casual with her lovers also, and that she was left at the end of each one of them exactly where she was before. There was nothing except the desire for her favors likely to make any man willing to marry her, and it does not seem that any very remarkable shrewdness would have been necessary to make her realize that she could not reasonably expect to sell what she was so generous in giving away.

If it was Schnitzler's purpose to show that the repetitious history of an almost completely negative person could be made readable he has succeeded, but the tour de force has been accomplished before and there is nothing except novelty which can make a tour de force interesting.

French Art

Modern French Painters. By Maurice Raynal. Translated by Ralph Roeder. Brentano. $7.50.

M. RAYNAL'S book, "Modern French Painters," is one which automatically will have both an immediate and permanent interest, for it gives something of the lives, the beliefs, and usually the author's opinion, of fifty contemporary painters. To be sure its title is misleading, for it leaves out some of the best-known Frenchmen: Bonnard, Denis, Bernard, André, and even Matisse, and includes numbers of Italians, Spaniards, Poles, and Russians. He is said to have omitted Matisse because of the dislike he bears him or his work. This is a pity, for we should welcome a dissection of his painting which did not, as Coquiott's, concentrate on the painter's spectacles. We should be willing, too, to back Bonnard against Suzanne Roger or R. T. Bosshard. However, taking what we have, one cannot but admire the conscientious criticisms of most of the major names of the present day. The author writes, he says, "to inform and not to flatter." In weighing the candidates he has "added their aesthetic intentions to their technical qualities, preferring a groping and blundering art to that of imitators and diluters." Bravo!—except that, if one is to believe the author, here also good intentions tend to lead toward hell.

There is the case of Modigliani. "Attractive as he was himself," his art was "the result of direct emotion and a waste of sensory impulses due to an indolence too charming to be harshly censured." It "is characterized primarily by an appearance of childish mawkishness due no doubt to his morbid sensibility. . . ." "In point of execution his art was mannered, a little artificial, a little Botticelliesque, but charming." The key to the situation seems to be that his interest in plastic meditations could only be gathered from his conversation. For, while M. Raynal succeeds in admiring those artists, such as Soutine, Kisling, Marie Laurencin, who respond incorrigibly to their feelings, his marked favorites are aestheticians such as Picasso, Juan Gris, Metzinger, and Gleizes: even those who, like Derain and Utrillo, are so unconsciously. He enjoys Derain's spontaneity, his sensuous color, his romantic conception of human forms, but the secret is that Derain leaps from the second to the fourth dimension, that is to say, his sensibility refuses to be caged in any but the simplest formulas; it claims the right to exist in a space uncircumscribed as yet by mathematics, in a space which Euclid has not yet darkened by undemonstrable postulates.

Similarly the admirable thing about Juan Gris is his use of a metaphor that is purely plastic, so that "since in the figure of rhetoric the arms of a man become those of a windmill, in the picture the lines of a music staff may equally well become the strings of a guitar." Of course, figures of speech vary in quality, and M. Raynal recognizes this, not being persuaded by an artist's excellent theory to like his poor work, and not, as far as is human, disliking good work because of what he considers poor philosophy.

It is difficult, though, to admire either the philosophy or the achievement shown in the arrangement of the book. It commences with a pea-green binding of linen, continues with binding papers of flat mourning black, is interrupted by an elaborate, though not unsuccessful, title-page in the modern manner, and continues through 164 pages of styleless printing enlivened with piquant misprints. The translation reads excellently, and the illustrations are good.

WALTER GUTMAN

Santo Domingo and the American Empire

Naboth's Vineyard: The Dominican Republic, 1844-1924. By Sumner Welles. Payson and Clarke. Two volumes. $7.50.

THE figure of Naboth, murdered for his vineyard, was applied to Santo Domingo by Charles Sumner, in a speech before the United States Senate in December, 1870. Sumner Welles, "Sometime Chief of the Latin-American Division of the Department of State of the United States and American Commissioner to the Dominican Republic from 1922 to 1925," now borrows the title of that speech for a narrative history in two large volumes. To Sumner, military intervention was a "dance of blood." To Welles it is a "costly mistake." There is a difference.

Except for the fine chapter on the Grant annexation project, the first volume might have remained in the inkpot without intolerable loss to anybody. Senator Sumner cannot be vindicated too often. Time, patriotism, and the military prestige of General Grant tend to erase from memory the fact that he was the dupe of concession-hunters like "General" Cazneau and "Colonel" Fabens in a flagrant violation of international law, accompanied, as Sumner pointed out at the time, by usurpation of war powers in peace time by the President of the United States. Judge Schoenrich's excellent history of Santo Domingo is weak at this one point, showing too much reliance on the 1871 report of Grant's "roving band of commissioners," as a contemporary critic dubbed them. Any lack of emphasis on American-Dominican relations in the early part of Judge Schoenrich's account has already been extremely well covered by Dr. Mary Treudley's study, "The United States and Santo Domingo—1789-1866," of the existence of which Mr. Welles does not seem to be aware. The period from 1871 to the first American customs receivership in 1905 is amply treated by Schoenrich, who knew the literature intimately as one of the attorneys in the San Domingo Improvement Company arbitration. Contrary to Mr. Welles's confident belief, his bibliography is quite incomplete, as may be ascertained by a glance at Miss Treudley's. By letting well enough alone, he could have cut the bulk of his work in half and greatly improved its chances of being read.

For the period 1905-1916, Mr. Welles adds to the detail of Judge Schoenrich's narrative with materials from "the archives of the Department of State." Absence of specific references would make an itemized check difficult, but the reviewer has not been able to note anything of importance not already published in the printed volumes of Foreign Relations. It is curious that an ex-diplomat who has lived in the country should not have made use of the Official Gazette (Gaceta Oficial) of the Dominican Republic, or of the annual reports of the Customs Receivership since 1905. The obvious explanation is that he is mainly interested in political, diplomatic, and military history. Aside from some secondary works in Spanish (among which Max Henriquez Ureña's "Los Estados Unidos y la República Dominicana" is only one of those conspicuously absent) he has, by his own admission, relied mainly on statements from Dominicans who took part in the controversial events for the Dominican side of the question. This is certainly not the most accurate or least prejudiced type of source.

With 743 pages of his space gone, the author gets at last to the period of the American intervention of 1916-1924, concerning which he has first-hand knowledge. After all, it is in Mr. Welles as candid ex-diplomat that our interest centers, not in Mr. Welles as amateur historian. With only 155 pages for his real story, he is cramped for space. Military "justice" for civilians is barely referred to, the name of Fabio Fiallo, the jailed poet, not even appearing in the index. There were, it is admitted, "scattered cases of injustice or maltreatment of civilians in the northern, central, and southern provinces," and "many

A New Kind of Editorial Board

In assembling the Board of Editors of The Book League, on whose judgment in selecting books depends the whole success of this new Plan, we have branched out along somewhat new lines. Each member, we decided, should be a commanding figure in his own chosen field—biography, history, fiction, poetry, drama, science, criticism.

It is, therefore, with a sense of deep satisfaction that we are able to announce the appointment of these members of the Board of Editors. Others of equal distinction will be added in the near future.

As a unique feature of our Board, we have been fortunate in securing, as a special Advisory Editor, Mr. Frank L. Polk, Acting Secretary of State in President Wilson's Cabinet. It is our feeling that an outstanding individual, not himself engaged in the profession of literature, will be able to reflect the likes and dislikes of thousands of cultivated American readers, and will be an asset to our organization in guiding our general editorial policy.

THE Book League plan is extremely simple—so simple, in fact, it is a wonder no one ever thought of it before. Many of the first to join have even said that in their opinion it is "the final perfection of the whole book club idea."

Each year membership in The Book League of America entitles you to twenty-four books, a complete year's reading.

Twelve of these will be the best books of the year, including fiction, biography, history, and drama, selected for you from the maze of new titles by a distinguished Board of Editors, and sent to your door even before they are in the bookshops.

12 new books like these

To give you an idea of the type of current books which will be selected, books such as The Bridge of San Luis Rey by Thornton Wilder, The Life of Christ by Papini, Death Comes for the Archbishop by Willa Cather, and Napoleon by Emil Ludwig might have been chosen in the past if The Book League had then been in existence. Books like these are sent to members each month in a special paper-covered volume, similar to the Continental type of edition so popular abroad. It is called The Book League Monthly and is printed on high-grade book paper from large readable type, sewed like a regular book, containing, in addition to the complete book itself, a number of vital literary departments that would in themselves constitute a magazine of high value.

And equally as important

In addition, your membership in the Book League entitles you to select twelve books from a list of twenty-four titles of accepted merit. This is one of the unique features of the whole Book League idea, differentiating it completely from every other so-called book club. For new books alone can never constitute in themselves a well-balanced reading program. There must be included those worth while books of the past—history, biography, fiction, philosophy, science—which have retained, and probably always will retain, their vitality, power and influence. Not only such classics as Vanity Fair, Huckleberry Finn, Don Quixote, Tom Jones and Moby Dick! But also such more recent works as Robinson's Mind in the Making, Wells' Outline of History, The Way of All Flesh and Green Mansions.

These standard books are published exclusively for members, in beautiful private editions, with specially designed type pages, the best board bindings.

An unique opportunity

You have always realized the vital importance of reading good books. Not only is it a matter of culture—deeply enjoyable, satisfying and worth while in itself—but it is also perhaps the most stimulating of all pursuits.

But what happens? The days rush along; you are busy with your workaday affairs. A book you may occasionally want is not conveniently available to you, and you never get around to making that "special effort" required to obtain it.

The Book League of America solves this whole problem for you. As a member, you receive twenty-four books delivered post free to your door for $18.00, an average of 75c per book—a price made possible only through the whole unique plan that The Book League represents.

atrocities were undoubtedly committed" in the eastern provinces. Were it not for this single admission, the general effect of judicial remarks about the unreliability of witnesses might be mistaken for praising with faint damnation. Even one case of wanton killing is none the less murder. Something might be added to the oft-repeated statement that the one officer against whom "many of the most revolting acts of barbarism" were charged "committed suicide before his trial." This officer happened to hold the rank of captain, and was not one of the minor figures out in the brush of the back country. Exactly what were his orders, oral and otherwise, we have no means of knowing. His arrest and death have been shrouded in vague generalities, and the suicide welcomed as an admission of personal guilt which somehow cleansed the others of sin.

"Naboth's Vineyard" is a conventional political, military, and diplomatic history, faulty in technique but strewn with important facts. Its viewpoint is liberal on the whole. It is lucidly written, by a man of intelligence, one who apparently puts down his actual views, pro or con, with perfect candor. He condemns the military government as a costly mistake. We need not share his enthusiasm for the utterances of Charles Evans Hughes as a new and faultless decalogue of Latin-American policy or his optimism about commercial cooperation as a road to real good feeling in order to credit his sincerity. It remains a fact that Americans exploit many thousands of acres more land in the Dominican Republic than they did in 1916. America has the lion's share of the import trade of Santo Domingo, without taking her export sugar, as was formerly the case. What that country needs from us is the removal of some rather subtle economic inequalities. She is not economically self-sustaining, and cannot even retaliate against the injuries inflicted by our tariff wall without hurting herself more than she does us. That these small nations cannot protect themselves against a dangerous amount of alien landholding, or against the ill effects upon the working classes of the importation of cheap labor by foreign concerns, is a fact which no candid observer can fail to recognize.

Books in Brief

When It's Cocktail Time in Cuba. By Basil Woon. Horace Liveright. $2.50.

A lively and informed Baedeker to Cuba written to please readers of the New Yorker.

Quaker Adventures. By Edward Thomas. Fleming H. Revell Company. $2.

Peace is not dull for the Quakers. In war or in peace their young men and women have solved William James's puzzle of the moral equivalent of war. Wherever life is harsh and exciting and bitter, young Quakers find their way. In France they built houses just behind the guns; in Germany they fed children between revolutions; in Russia they served tea to bandits and bought horses in Samarkand and removed cataracts from Moslem eyes; in Ireland they faced both British and Sinn Fein guns; in Serbia a young Quaker, unarmed, drove his supplies through bandit country with such good cheer that the bandits gave him an escort; in America they teach Indians and set up soup kitchens in the strike counties of Pennsylvania. Edward Thomas believes that "scientific security," individual and international, requires that men go unarmed, and that one reason the world does not agree with him is that such stories as these Quakers can tell are not retold as adventure stories and because "editors fail to publish them, doubting if they will interest people." So he piloted a score of Quaker adventurers to a radio station to tell their tales; this book is a collection of their stories. They are uneven; some of them would naturally find their way to editorial scrap-baskets; others belong on the front page of history.

A PANORAMA of MODERN CIVILIZATION

Edited by
CHARLES A. BEARD

"D R. BEARD'S aim in this most modern symposium has been to set up a balance sheet of our machine civilization. He has summoned to the task a group of eminent men each of whom casts up an audit of his own special field of interest in contemporary life; and most of whom write vividly and well. Dr. Beard and his colleagues have the courage to face the modern world as it is, and at the same time have intellectual power enough to maintain their balance in the welter of emotions which the prospect produces. In the bombardment of impressions they take observations of meaning and value and attempt to calculate the implications of what they see for the future of man. Every one throws out a challenge that cannot be ignored."—New York Times.

Hafiz, the Tongue of the Hidden. By Clarence K. Streit. The Viking Press. $2.

Hafiz has often been attempted in English, most of the time without pleasing result. Either the translator has undertaken the impossible task of rendering the ghazals literally, in which case they become unreadable, or he has taken such liberties with the great Persian as to leave him no longer Persian. Mr. Streit follows Cranmer-Byng in the use of quatrains, and achieves a considerable success. But the ampler versions of Gertrude Bell and Richard Le Gallienne are still the most interesting we have.

Politicians and Moralists of the Nineteenth Century. By Emile Faguet. Translated from the French by Dorothy Galton. Little, Brown and Company. $4.50.

A real service to letters has been rendered by the translator in making available to English readers the third volume of Faguet's brilliant series, first published in France some thirty years ago. The word "politicians" is not to be understood in its derogatory American sense; the politicians and moralists studied in this volume are Stendhal, Tocqueville, Proudhon, Sainte-Beuve, Taine, and Renan. Faguet is chiefly occupied with an exposition of these men's leading ideas, which reflect the hopes and fears of the nineteenth century. Here is a commentator more lucid than his originals. He meets the test of the great critic: when he has done, he has made it almost superfluous to read the works of his subjects. The writing constantly sparkles with epigram. Suspicious of strongly marked general ideas for himself, Faguet displayed an almost infinite receptivity for the ideas of others, and this was the secret of his success as a critic. As far as he chose to go, he overlooked little. But his interest in ideas was so intense that he does not give us portraits of personalities which exist vividly in the flesh. He adhered to the principles of a facultative psychology which made him see very clearly a subject's leading characteristics without tempting him to consider their causes, or combine them into a dynamic whole.

Chinese-Japanese Mythology. By John C. Ferguson and Masaharu Anesaki. Boston: Marshall Jones Company. $10.

East and West are meeting as never before, and a century hence Chinese folk-lore may become almost as intimate a part of American tradition as the Greek stories which, geographically and emotionally remote as they are, yet form part of every schoolboy's cultural heritage. Mr. Ferguson and Mr. Anesaki attempt to supply the need for a summary of the myths and folk-stories without an understanding of which Oriental painting is mere lines and Oriental stories mere words. The rich illustrations double the value of the text.

From Serfdom to Bolshevism. The Memoirs of Baron N. Wrangel. J. B. Lippincott and Company. $4.

The author of these reminiscences of seventy-three years of Russian history (1847 to 1920) was the father of the better-known Baron Wrangel who led an army against the Bolsheviks in 1919-1920 and who still heads a band of mercenaries in the Balkans. Except when he writes of the Kerensky and Communist revolutions the old noble has a sense of humor, an urbanity, a cynicism which are winning even when you hate his views. A reactionary of the first water, he can nevertheless mock the Czars whom he meets in society and scoff at the weakness of the ruling class of "we's." He despises the rising "bourgeoisie" of the second half of the nineteenth century, and sneers at the "intelligentsia" which to him includes everybody from Miliukov to Lenin. His sidelights on the life of the landed nobles, the serfs, the civil service, the army, the corruption of the Romanoff regime, Count Witte, the Jewish banker Rothstein, and a few other prominent Russians are interesting though fragmentary. Written by a rheumatic man past seventy, these memoirs are a real performance; but they are of little real value to the general reader.

Voltaire has been sick in bed for three weeks he has written two operas!

IN and out of prison—through sickness and health, in France, Germany and England, Voltaire wrote steadily from early boyhood to the age of eighty-four. From his pen came the greatest sarcasm, the most scathing wit, the most biting irony ever written by man. He was the father of the French Revolution, the cause of drastic church reform. He freed mankind from despotism with a smile and a stinging phrase.

Today his works are as readable, as entertaining and enlightening as they were when he wrote them. They are a major part of our literary heritage from France. It is impossible to list the great writers of the world such as Shakespeare, Goethe, Dante without including Voltaire. And he remains the most readable of them all.

Melpomene on a Soap-Box

"GODS OF THE LIGHTNING," the long-promised drama based upon the Sacco-Vanzetti case, has arrived at the Little Theater. Maxwell Anderson and Harold Hickerson, authors of the piece, have wisely chosen an imaginary analogue rather than the case itself and, thanks, in part, to the freedom which is thus permitted them, they have written one of the most effective dramas of social protest which it has ever been my privilege to see.

In one sense, "Gods of the Lightning" is straight propaganda. Written out of an intense conviction, it never for a moment forgets that it has a purpose, and it hammers unceasingly at the point which it wishes to enforce; but it is too vigorous and too vivid to suffer from this fact as other propaganda plays seem almost inevitably to do. Rapid, relentless, and flaming, it takes hold upon the audience from the moment the curtain rises, and it carries the spectator up a long crescendo of excited indignation which leaves him, not purged by the catharsis of art, but still raging with that as yet undischarged anger which it is the business of the propagandist to create. Doubtless there have been before this plays upon controversial subjects which were more judicial and more mellow—certainly "Gods of the Lightning" makes no effort to suggest either of these qualities—but I can think of none more likely to accomplish what this one sets out to achieve, which is, I take it, to work upon the passions of the audience and to transform placid citizens into active radicals.

Much of the effectiveness of the play must be due, of course, to the practiced skill of Mr. Anderson and to his gift for writing dialogue at once forceful and convincing. But this effectiveness was made possible by the choice of a fundamental design which reveals on the part of one or both of the authors a surer sense of just what the propaganda play can accomplish than is usual with those who attempt to make a forum out of the stage. Mere argument, reasoned and logical, is never effective in any fictional form; since nothing can be really proved by events which the author is at liberty to invent or by the analysis of motives which he is at liberty to attribute exactly as he sees fit. Hence the play with a purpose is analogous, not to the debate, but to the oration, and it is according to the principles of oratory rather than the principles of argument that it must be constructed. Any coolly reasoned conclusions which it attempts to draw are invalidated by the fact that the data upon which they are based were invented for the very purpose, and any pretense of disinterested logic is obviously a fraud; but none of these facts is of any importance where polemic, whose purpose is not to convince by argument but to transform conviction into passionate protest, is concerned. Though Melpomene is a sorry advocate when she chooses mere argument as her weapon, she can become on occasion a magnificent agitator, and it is that which Messrs. Anderson and Hickerson have made of her. Assuming that their two analogues of Sacco and Vanzetti were innocent victims of a conservative conspiracy and assuming that this conspiracy was coldly aware of itself, they have set forward these dreadful facts with a passionate eloquence which never falters. Fiery invective alternates with bitter irony and melodramatic excitement with scathing satire.

The district attorney does his ugly job. A savagely caricatured judge pronounces his sentence. And from the dock the prisoners utter their defiance. Nothing has been omitted which could prepare the audience to receive with pleasure the most violent expression of the most subversive opinions, and these expressions are not minced. The manacled victims, speaking in character, say things which few, speaking in propria persona, would dare to say publicly, and the effect of their daring is like that achieved by an orator who has brought his audience to the point where they are crying for vengeance. In the seat beside me two highly respectable ladies who had come armed with notebooks trembled visibly and not without reason; for it is doubtful if the American theater has ever seen an attack upon respectable American institutions more dynamically effective than this, and certainly most attempts to do similar things must seem, when put beside it, academically anemic. "Gods of the Lightning" does not belong to the "theater of ideas"; it is not, like the plays of Ibsen or of Shaw, addressed primarily to the professional intellectual; but it might, on the other hand, find a place alongside of certain great speeches in the library of the revolutionist. As it is now, well acted and well produced at the Little Theater, it gives the theatergoer a kind of thrill that he has not often experienced and is not likely to find elsewhere.

"Girl Trouble" (Belmont Theater) is a mild comedy about a young man who (pardon the mixed metaphor) kicked over his mother's apron-strings. It did not impress me greatly. "Americana" (Lew Field's Theater) is the new edition of Mr. McEvoy's revue. It makes commendable efforts to be different and, as a result no doubt of those efforts, it is very spotty. Rosamond Johnson and Taylor Gordon, accompanied by a double quartet of Negro singers, contribute some good singing.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

The Machiavelli of legend is pure skunk—if skunk may ever be regarded as pure; the Machiavelli which Lemist Esler dramatizes in "The Grey Fox" (Playhouse) is rather a noble scoundrel. He begins as an idealist, but on his first diplomatic mission the Countess of Forli exploits his love for her to his humiliation and defeat. After that he emerges as villain, though a villain redeemed by one unswerving loyalty—to the republic of Florence. The dialogue and action of the play hold one's interest throughout, though rising to few intense moments. Henry Hull and Chrystal Herne carry the leading roles. Among the lesser parts that of Cesare Borgia is done with gusto and spirit by Edward Arnold.

JOSEF DIETZGEN'S

The Positive Outcome of Philosophy

Josef Dietzgen, born December 9, 1828, approached the problems of philosophy from the view-point of the revolutionary working class. This book, his greatest work, deals with the nature and substance of thinking. It discards mysticism, and shows brain work as a natural process.

In the twenty years since Dietzgen's works first appeared in English, the name and fame of the "workingman philosopher" have become familiar to an ever-widening circle of proletarian students, who find Dietzgen's logic a sharp and invincible theoretical weapon. This new translation will be welcomed for its added clearness and strength. Cloth, 430 pages, $2.00 postpaid.

The Color Line in South Africa

By RUTH ALEXANDER

Cape Town, September 1

THE group of bills which in the near future will determine the political future of the non-European elements of the population of South Africa are at present awaiting the further taking of evidence by the committee appointed last year for the purpose. The more or less tentative drafts of these measures, which were laid on the table of the House of Assembly during the last session, have been somewhat nervously discussed in public by members or prospective members of Parliament who find it difficult to forget that there will be a general election next year.

Meanwhile, a reading of the bills in their present form is sufficiently depressing to those who do not think of the population of South Africa solely in terms of the million and a half of whites who at present control and exploit the five and a half million Indians, natives, and colored people [the term "colored" is used here in the South African sense, i.e., natives with some more or less remote admixture of white blood]. A policy at its best aggressively paternal, at its worst severely repressive, is outlined in the measures dealing specifically with the native peoples. The Asiatics, or Indians and Chinese, are apparently to look for no alleviation of their existing disabilities, since they are not mentioned at all in these bills. But the half a million colored people, who in the Cape Province actually form the deciding factor in certain constituencies, and who include by far the greater part of the educated and literate element among the non-European population, are to be accorded certain new franchise privileges which, illusory in so far as any real addition to their political power is concerned, will yet, if actually carried into effect, have far-reaching results.

The measure has indeed been framed with great astuteness, to crystallize into legislation the deliberate policy of the Nationalists, a policy which, characteristically, suits both their sense of what is godly and their sense of what is shrewd. They feel that they cannot evade a moral responsibility for these people, who, if all white men had been both wise and continent, would never have come into being. They are doing their best, by legislation which makes it a punishable offense for a white person to have irregular sexual relations with a native, to insure that there shall be no large fresh additions to the race from without since marriages of white and native persons in South Africa are naturally very rare. The rapid increase from within would be a matter of greater concern to them if it were not kept in check by a very high infant mortality rate and the heavy incidence of tuberculosis and venereal disease. But they feel that a policy of political if not of social absorption would at once satisfy their own consciences and give the colored people a gratifying assurance of special treatment.

The anti-native feeling among the colored people is as strong, above that lowest level of poverty at which all prejudices are swamped in a helpless common misery, as is the anti-color feeling among the white people, the "Europeans."

Colored servants will not work in the same kitchen or eat at the same table as a native servant, though the native may be the cleaner and healthier of the two. A colored girl who allowed a native to make love to her would lose caste among her friends. But their common disabilities have hitherto drawn the better educated among them together for mutual support and mutual improvement. Thus the teachers of both stocks have met and conferred, and at Lovedale, which is primarily a college for natives, most of the few colored youths who have managed, by heroic efforts, to pass the boundaries of primary education, have obtained their secondary education. And since in the Cape both natives and colored people enjoyed the same franchise privileges as the whites but were barred on precisely the same terms from entering Parliament, while in the other three provinces the same blank negation held both from even exercising a vote, it was natural for them at election times, or at any moment of political crisis, to make each other's cause their own. Further, in the Cape natives and colored people were not debarred from becoming members of the Town Council or the Provincial Council, so that at these elections also they were accustomed to uphold each other.

The Nationalists are rapidly changing all this. Despite the uncompromising dictum of the old republican constitution that there shall be "no equality between black and white in church or state," branches of "the African Bond," that is to say the colored section of the Nationalist Party—the Northern Nationalists would never tolerate colored branches of the same name as their own—are being opened and financed in the big towns of the Cape Province, where alone of the four provinces colored and natives vote on the same basis as the whites. The qualifications are the ability to write their names, addresses, and occupations on the registration form, and either the owning or occupying of property worth £75 a year, or the earning of at least £50 annually. Of these requirements the natives and colored people, for whom there is no compulsory schooling, as there is for the whites, and a great dearth of schools of any sort, find the first the hardest to comply with, so that a few weeks before election time little classes are wont to spring up mysteriously all over certain constituencies to help out the free and independent electors in this respect. At the meetings of the Bond branches the listeners are exhorted by white speakers to support the Government, which intends to raise their status and treat them on a political footing similar to that of the whites, with whom they must accordingly combine to drive the natives back to the regions whence they came, and to which they really belong. This appeal both to interest and to the vanity of the half-caste has proved extremely popular.

If this propaganda succeeds, how will it affect the evolution and even the survival of the colored people as a separate race? Is it likely or possible that they will so survive? Outside of the Cape Province their numbers are small as compared with the white population, negligible as compared with the natives. The poorer and larger part of the colored people, like the poor everywhere, are of inferior physique and have little stamina. They are riddled with tuberculosis and venereal disease. Their mode of life and such culture as they do possess are not native to themselves, but imitative of Dutch or English or American life and culture, according to their locality and to the tradition of their own particular mission school to which most of them are still indebted almost entirely for education and for recreation. They attend the mission school, and find in the mission prayer-meetings, bazaars, concerts, and tea-meetings comforting substitutes for the concerts they may not go to, the plays they may only scan from the gallery, the cafes into which they dare not, even though the management allowed them, walk and sit down to their meal, for fear of the insults of Nordic tea-drinkers. The government schools for the colored people bear no relations to their numbers. The mission schools are unhealthily overcrowded and thousands of colored children grow up with no schooling at all. The bulk of those who do attend school receive a primary education only.

Hence it comes about that the few American Negroes who have found their way here become naturally, by virtue of their superior knowledge and by an aura about them of freedom and of the initiative born of freedom, the natural leaders of the colored people, wherever they have in any measure emancipated themselves from the direct tutelage of church or mission school. They have as yet neither songs nor legends of their own; the language they speak is that spoken by the Europeans to whom they are kin by blood, but among whom they live as in a glass-walled prison, seeing, hearing, but never coming into contact. The colored people of South Africa, if they do survive as a separate section, will, so far as present indications serve to show, only do so as a sort of overseas province, culturally speaking, of Harlem, New York, and a province of which that enormous and varied community would have no reason to feel particularly proud. For what independent and self-respecting development can there be for a people who are teaching themselves to deny the blood of one of the two races from which they are sprung, while the other has long since cast them off?

And what is to be their reward for this humiliating and suicidal betrayal? The Nationalists have, to do them justice, never pretended that any measure of social or economic equality was intended as part of their scheme for the raising of the status of the colored people. What they do propose, when it comes to facts, is an electoral amelioration, marking off the colored man once for all from the native. They propose to take away from the native of the Cape Colony the vote which he has hitherto enjoyed on the same terms as both colored and white, and to substitute for it Native Councils with severely restricted powers and a comprehensive supervision by the Native Affairs Department for local government, and a quota of seven European members in Parliament. The vote of the Cape colored people, on the other hand, is to be left untouched. In addition to this, it is proposed to bestow on a male population which in 1926 totalled over 31,000 for the three remaining provinces of the Union, all of whom now possess no vote, one European member of ordinary powers in the House of Assembly. (It is laid down in the Act of Union that all members of Parliament must be of European descent.) It is true that the bill as drafted provides that at any time after seven years from the passing of the Colored Persons' Rights Bill both Houses of Parliament may, if they choose, place these thirty thousand and more voters on the ordinary voters' rolls of their districts, in which case their one member will of course disappear, and their political status seem altogether equal to that of the whites. But this would imply, for the Transvaal and the Free State, which retain their original franchise basis, adult male suffrage for colored men as well as white, a state of things utterly unacceptable to the whites of the North. It need only be pointed out at the moment that as the average constituency of the country is about three thousand, the provision of one member for the whole of the colored population outside the Cape Province can hardly be said to err on the side of generosity.

But even to be placed on the register that will entitle him to this fairly slender amount of representation, the colored man will have to prove to the satisfaction of a special board to be appointed for the purpose that he is really a colored man and not a native. Any person born prior to the gazettement of the Colored Persons' Rights Bill who has one native and one colored or European parent may be classed as a colored person provided that the Board decides after inquiry "That such person is, from his language, associates, and standard or habits of living more closely akin to a colored person than a native." But if he be born subsequent to the passing of this act he can only by a special resolution of both Houses of Parliament be declared a colored person. The native, at present, may not purchase intoxicating liquor, and may not buy land outside certain areas. Since, for purposes of the revised franchise, a complete register is to be made and kept of both colored and native men, it seems reasonable to suppose that the same register will be used for all general purposes. Who the incorruptible and learned folk are who are to make the decisions that will be so momentous to thousands of their fellow-men and how they are to be selected is not announced.

The division, already deep and tragic, in many colored families where cross-strains have produced children of the same parents who are yet widely different in appearance, will under the proposed Colored Persons' Rights Bill, be most cruelly emphasized. It is impossible that such drastic differentiation, with its far-reaching consequences, should not further increase the disharmony among the colored people, while in its administration cruel injustices will be inevitable, and creeping corruption all but inevitable. The mere passing of such a measure will effectively alienate the colored people from the natives, and split them up into mutually hostile groups among themselves. From a people so weakened there can be for many a long day little to fear. Is it impossible that some idea of this sort has occurred to the gentlemen responsible for the framing of the Colored Persons' Rights Bill?

MR. HOOVER'S DECISION to go to South America was a splendid piece of personal and international strategy for which the President-elect deserves the warmest praise. The months between election and inauguration with their empty personal publicity and their tedious political intrigue have always been embarrassing to our Presidents-elect. Mr. Hoover escapes from besieging office-seekers and goes where his presence will do most for international goodwill. He will sail down the West Coast, cross the Andes, and come back to the United States after visiting Panama, Colombia, Ecuador, Peru, Bolivia, Chile, Argentina, Uruguay, Brazil, and Venezuela. Since no President or President-elect of the United States has ever visited these countries, Mr. Hoover's visit will be interpreted as an unusual gesture of recognition and friendship. He will doubtless spend most of his energy in preparing the ground for improved international trade, but he can scarcely escape the critical comments of the South American press concerning our military policy in the Caribbean. The understanding developed by such a visit may prove of lasting value in checking the grosser expressions of our imperialism.

IT WAS A BITTER CAMPAIGN, but in all the whispering and whimpering there was nothing, for downright face-to-face insult, to equal Calvin Coolidge's telegram congratulating Senator Curtis on his election. William Allen White once called Curtis a "nitwit"; Mr. Coolidge was sub-tlar and meaner. "It is a special satisfaction," the man who had known the idle obscurity of the Vice-Presidency wired to the Vice-President-elect, "to congratulate you on your election to the office of Vice-President, because I know your peculiar fitness for that position."

THE MONKEYS WIN in Arkansas. By solemn popular verdict, duly recorded on November 6, it is forbidden in that State to teach that man "ascended or descended from a lower order of animals." Arkansawyers are to be permitted no relationship with the apes, and who is to say that the apes, in consequence, are not celebrating the event? Indeed, the ape has been all too seldom consulted in the matter of kinship with man. Observation of a group of monkeys leads one to deduce that they do not engage in extensive and expensive warfare, that they do not compel young children to work long hours, that in short they are less anti-social than their cousin—except in Arkansas and a few other States—man. The recent argument in Arkansas, which resulted in the passage of the anti-evolution bill, was enlivened by the antics of the Reverend Ben M. Bogard, president of the American Anti-Evolution Association. Mr. Bogard challenged Charles Smith, professed atheist, to debate the question of evolution with him, on the theory that the hair of a dog will cure its bite and the luke-warm opponents of evolution would be strengthened in the faith by meeting with one of the awful consequences of non-belief. In the course of the fracas Mr. Smith spent several days in jail, Mr. Bogard suffered considerable adverse criticism for having invited him to come to Little Rock, and as a consequence has brought suit for libel against the El Dorado Daily News for an editorial alleged to be "malicious, defamatory, and libelous," and an attempt to "hold this plaintiff up before the public as a fanatic."

THE DRY LEADERS have hailed with great enthusiasm the election of Herbert Hoover, declaring it to be proof that the American people are overwhelmingly in favor of the retention of prohibition. Two of them are quoted as asserting that this was the true meaning of the election and that its outcome could not be construed as a "referendum on religious faiths." Naturally enough the Anti-Saloon League finds that the election is "a thorough vindication of the Anti-Saloon League." Curiously enough, the various societies opposed to prohibition are equally certain that the outcome is a tremendous step forward toward the repeal of the Eighteenth Amendment. Why else did so many people vote for Governor Smith, many more than ever voted for a Democratic candidate before? To them Governor Smith's huge vote is entirely attributable to the Republicans who want the repeal of prohibition. They point to the vote in the referendum in Massachusetts in which thirty-three out of thirty-six counties voted to instruct the Massachusetts Representatives in Congress to work for the doing away of prohibition. Both sides can claim what they please. The fact is that the election advanced us not even one inch toward the solution of the prohibition problem. Nobody will ever know how many people voted against Smith because of his Wetness, or voted for him for the same reason; for at least twenty-five different motives actuated people in this campaign. That is the difficulty with our system. In almost no Presidential election (in only one since 1888) has the electorate been in a position to give a clear-cut mandate to Congress on a single distinct issue. Which is all the more reason to press for the nation-wide referendum on the Eighteenth Amendment which The Nation has been urging these several years.

THIS YEAR'S ELECTION emphasized to an unusual degree the disparity that may exist between the electoral and popular vote of a candidate under our curious method of choosing a President. Hoover received 444 electoral votes to Smith's 87, but as this issue of The Nation went to press Hoover's popular vote had reached almost 21,000,000 and Smith's not far from 15,000,000. Thus Smith received only 16 per cent of the electoral vote but about 40 per cent of the popular vote. In a cabinet system of government, such as prevails in Europe, Smith would be a power as the leader of the opposition in the national legislature—here he is retired to political obscurity. Mark Sullivan writes that if Hoover had received 275,000 more votes "geographically distributed in the right way," he would have carried every State. To which the New York World retorts that if Smith had received 354,000 more votes geographically distributed in the right way, he would have won the election. Smith had a lead of 55,000 over Hoover in the combined vote of the largest fourteen cities. New York, Newark, Boston, Cleveland, St. Louis, and San Francisco went for Smith; Baltimore, Buffalo, Philadelphia, Pittsburgh, Cincinnati, Detroit, Chicago, and Los Angeles preferred Hoover. In spite of the Republican landslide, Senator Wheeler was reelected in Montana and Dill in Washington, but Neely lost in West Virginia. Governor George W. P. Hunt, another progressive Democrat, failed of reelection in Arizona, while Milwaukee did not return Victor L. Berger, the one Socialist in the House of Representatives. Representative Fiorello H. La Guardia, independent Republican, was fortunately reelected from New York City.

THREE INTERESTING ADDITIONS to Congress are the new women members, Ruth Bryan Owen, Ruth Hanna McCormick, and Ruth Baker Pratt. The first named is a Democrat and a daughter of William Jennings Bryan; the others are Republicans. All three are striking and forceful persons. In a legislative assembly apparently designed for the suppression of individual merit, these women may, none the less, make themselves felt—and heard. Mrs. Owen is said by her friends to be liberal and tolerant as well as able. We hope that she comes to Congress free from commitments to the Democratic Party in Florida; if her hands are not tied she will doubtless be counted among the small progressive group in the House. Ruth Hanna McCormick—daughter of the late Mark Hanna and widow of Senator Medill McCormick—can also be counted upon to stand on her own political feet as far as her dubious political associations in Illinois allow. She has her father's drive and tenacity, with a manifestly greater interest in the welfare of her fellow-men and women. Readers who are interested in her personality and record will find them vividly set forth in an article by Mildred Adams in The Nation for October 26, 1927. Mrs. Pratt has been a conscientious and useful member of New York City's Board of Aldermen. She has worked hard and has hurled carefully documented criticisms of the budget and other Tammany measures at the heads of a heedless majority.

IT IS HARD to take President Coolidge's Armistice Day address seriously; it is such a mass of absurdities and contradictions. We hope that the first thing Mr. Hoover will do will be to hire a good editor and give him a large blue pencil and full authority to put the Presidential public utterances into consistent and intelligible English. That this speech of President Coolidge's should be held to be statesmanship, and that it should be solemnly received beyond the seas as laying down the foreign policy of the United States for decades to come, is enough to make ordinarily decent American citizens resolve to make Thanksgiving Day a special period of thanksgiving that Mr. Coolidge will so soon retire to private life. At the same time it will be necessary to add prayers that Mr. Hoover will do better on these subjects than he promised during the campaign. Meanwhile, the fact remains that President Coolidge made use of Armistice Day to announce that we are immediately going to increase the number of our cruisers to the ratio which he thinks is right for us to maintain, while uttering such solemn twaddle as that we have no intention of entering into any competition of armaments, that while arming more we must lead the way toward disarmament, that armaments cannot protect the nation from war but that none the less we must continue to be armed and well armed, and that we are so sacredly and peculiarly constituted that we may inculcate militaristic doctrines and arm to the teeth and yet never be militaristic! Immediately on top of this comes the new naval program of the militarists in the Navy Department demanding 15 new cruisers and a navy second to none. Was there ever greater hypocrisy and absurdity? Fortunately, there are already many protests against the downright wickedness of this policy.

FRANCE'S NEW CABINET means that France has returned to normalcy. It was no more natural for M. Poincaré to sit at the head of a Cabinet which included Louis Marin, the wild jingo of the manufacturers' association; Aristide Briand, who is usually the apostle of reconciliation with Germany, and Edouard Herriot, leader of the anti-clerical Radical Socialists, than it would be in this country if Mr. Hoover invited Mabel Walker Willebrandt, "Jim" Reed of Missouri, Dr. Straton, Frank P. Walsh, and Senator Norris to sit in his Cabinet. When the franc threatened to chase the paper mark toward zero, France, for a moment, dropped her normal political animosities, and gentlemen who had been cursing each other in public joined in a Cabinet of national union, just as in war time all the European countries had recourse to coalition cabinets. This unnatural Poincaré Ministry lasted more than two years; but recently the Radicals returned to a peacetime fighting basis. Partly, their change was a result of provocation from the Right; coalition cabinets always seem to fall under conservative domination. At any rate, the Radicals announced that they would not stay in the Cabinet if it continued to plan for a return of the Catholic teaching orders and for an increase in the military budget, while refusing to permit civil servants to form a union. Poincaré refused their demands and formed a new Cabinet with the Radicals left out. Instead of commanding two-thirds of the Chamber, the new Ministry has a slim majority; and the short-lived ministries and bitter dog-fighting of normal days seem destined to return.

"PEACE, FREEDOM, AND WORK," according to the new premier, Julius Maniu, is to be the slogan for Rumania. Not for nothing did 60,000 peasants, with their rations tied up in their handkerchiefs, march quietly to Bucharest a year ago in protest against the rule of the Bratianus and the rich landowners. The National Peasant Party has triumphed, and its leader is to form a cabinet, to call for the election of a new parliament, to negotiate a loan under the auspices of the League of Nations, and—under the slogan mentioned above—to reform the Rumanian Government with the Government of the United States as a model. It would be easy to be cynical about that last; in many ways, of late years, the United States Government would fall short of a desideratum for small and aspiring countries. But there is something touching and heartening about this new Government in Rumania. A member of the troubled Balkans, rent by war and exploited by a group of unscrupulous capitalist citizens, with a musical comedy prince and a queen who has spent most of her life in effective self-advertisement, Rumania deserves a regime of "peace, freedom, and work." It is not unlikely that the new Government will be the prelude to a complete overthrow of the monarchy and to the establishment of a republic.

TANGIBLE AND SALUTARY RESULTS continue to come from the Federal Trade Commission's exposé of power propaganda. The Federal Radio Commission has stopped a public-utility company from setting up its own radio station for the dissemination of propaganda, and the National Education Association has started on its proposed investigation of the use of the schools for propaganda purposes. In denying the Richmond Development Corporation a permit to construct a radio station, the Radio Commission pointed out that the corporation is closely allied with the Roanoke Water Works Company, and that the original application for the permit proposed to "promote a better understanding between the public and public utilities generally." Chairman Ira Robinson stated that this indicated "an intention to engage in a type of propaganda which is now being extensively condemned after revelations uncovered by the Federal Trade Commission." The National Education Association has announced the appointment of Dr. Edwin C. Broome, superintendent of schools at Philadelphia, as chairman of the committee of ten authorized by the Minneapolis convention to investigate propaganda in the schools and to report on the principles which should guide teachers in handling such material, and on any necessary machinery to protect the school officers and teachers from being used by private interests. Furthermore, there is good evidence that newspapers are being increasingly cautious against being exploited by propagandists.

WINTER IS COMING and almost nothing has been done to protect the several million of our unemployed from destitution, but 283 persons in the United States will not worry. They are the individuals who received in 1927 an income of more than $1,000,000. Our nation has now attained the proud distinction of possessing more million-dollar incomes than any nation in the history of the world, and more by fifty-two than the United States in 1926. While the average wages of factory workers are approximately $25 a week, and while only a handful of farmers can boast of a substantial income, practically all the higher classes of income-tax payers from the $10,000-a-year group to the million dollar group increased last year. The earnings of corporations declined while the great personal fortunes made by speculation increased—and most of the profits from the greatest gambling year in the history of finance will not be reported until next year. While the Internal Revenue Bureau was announcing its figures, another bureau of the Government, the Women's Bureau of the Department of Labor, was issuing a statement of the average wages of certain women workers in our factories. The median weekly earnings of Mississippi white women are $8.60, of Negro women $5.75, of South Carolina white women $9.50, of New York white women $14.95.

HARVARD UNIVERSITY announces a gift of $3,000,000 which it has accepted for the purpose of splitting Harvard up into small colleges of three hundred men each, somewhat after the manner of the colleges at Oxford and Cambridge, with proper adaptation to American conditions. This is an extension of recent developments under which freshmen live by themselves and upper classmen are more and more put on their own, freed from lectures and brought into closer touch with individual instructors appointed to supervise their reading. Decades ago President Eliot hoped for something of this kind. When the effort was made to tie the Institute of Technology to Harvard through the McKay bequest, it was his hope that Tufts College and other nearby institutions would move to Cambridge to be under the wing of the university without losing their identities as separate colleges. It is impossible to comment at length upon this radical departure until an official statement lies before us; we shall refer to it again in an early issue. Meanwhile, it is an interesting example of the way one rich man by a huge gift, made at the instigation, doubtless, of university officials, can alter the whole structure of an historic institution; at first glance we feel that the experiment ought to be of enormous benefit to the entire university world.

WE REGRET TO RECORD the death of Warren Worth Bailey, editor of the Johnstown (Pennsylvania) Democrat. A devoted and uncompromising single-taxer, a Democrat by party affiliation, and a true democrat as well, Mr. Bailey rendered conspicuous service to the liberal cause in America. He was a member of Congress for three terms and was elected a fourth time only to be robbed of his seat by fraud and the interminable delays which made it impossible for the House of Representatives to take cognizance of the facts prior to the expiration of the term during which he should have sat. He was a journalist by profession who upheld its best ideals—he had been publisher of his paper since 1893, but he was probably prouder of the fact that he was the publisher of the first single-tax newspaper, the Vincennes (Indiana) News, than of the success of his Democrat, in which, by the way, he bravely opposed our going into the World War. The esteem in which he was held in his community is apparent from the fact that he, a Democrat, represented a Pennsylvania constituency containing many beneficiaries of the protected industries of that State. Mr. Bailey was a splendid citizen and will be missed.

What of the Democracy?

WHAT future for the Democracy? It has sustained its greatest disaster at the polls while at the same time recording a greater vote than ever before in its history, indeed a larger vote than the total of all the ballots cast in 1924 for Wilson, Roosevelt, and Taft. It has discovered, moreover, a new leader in Franklin D. Roosevelt. Mr. Roosevelt himself sniffs at the idea that the party is smashed. On the contrary, he declares that it is "rejuvenated"; that it has a "bright outlook for the future"; that "a vote nearly twice as large as that cast for any other Democratic candidate for President is another evidence of the comeback of the party." Per contra, others who are not flushed with the excitement of an extraordinary personal success are clear that what has happened foretells the end of the Democracy. Among these is Norman Thomas who reads in the election sure signs that the process of Democratic disintegration is at hand.

The truth probably lies between the two extremes. But of this we are sure: With all respect to Mr. Roosevelt, it is hopeless to expect that the Democracy can ever be molded into the party of sound opposition, based on principle, which this country so sorely needs. The campaign has brought out again that the party is composed of utterly discordant elements which at bottom can never be reconciled. The Southern wing has now proved that it will never support a Catholic Wet, although the bulk of the party's urban vote in the North is largely Catholic or Wet. On the other hand, the South's bitter anti-Negro attitude makes it clear that no Northern candidate, not Franklin D. Roosevelt or any other, will ever be free to demand justice for the disfranchised colored population as long as the Solid South constitutes the basis for the hope of Democratic victory. As for the masses of the Democratic voters in the North who are not Catholic or Wet, the party has done its very best to alienate the thoughtful among them by throwing overboard most of its principles and, apparently with deliberation, has set about to wipe out as many of the distinctions between it and the Republican Party as it possibly can.

Thus, lest it be regarded as the party of the non-possessing, it has thrown itself into the arms of Big Business. All through the campaign it heralded the fact that it was not dangerous to Big Business when it should have been highly dangerous to the forms and tendencies of Big Business which it so bitterly opposed in 1912 under the leadership of Woodrow Wilson. It has again sought to make terms with Big Business by declaring that as to the tariff it was no longer a bad boy, and never, never would be one again. Indeed, it was so good that its candidate actually promised that there would never again be a general tariff revision. As for our foreign policy, as if to emphasize again that the Democratic Donkey is really only a lesser Elephant, it threw overboard the entire Wilsonian post-war program, including the League of Nations, and piped only in minor tones as to our wrong-doing in Nicaragua and elsewhere in the Caribbean. In this way it achieved its purpose: The campaign was waged on personalities and not on issues, except in so far as Governor Smith in his person called up prohibition and the issue of intolerance. Otherwise principles were forgotten, or deliberately abandoned. The radical social and economic program once urged by Mr. Wilson was sunk without trace. The Democracy revealed itself as being without fixed principles, as purely an opportunist organization.

It is this which Franklin D. Roosevelt overlooked in his natural astonishment at the vote polled. Numbers are, of course, a chief party aim, but principles ought to mean far more. When numbers are achieved, first, by the abandonment of historic party policies, and, second, by the purely accidental appearance of a vibrant and vote-winning personality, they count for very little in the future orientation of a party. If Mr. Roosevelt, and whoever else may turn out to be the heirs and assigns of the party machinery, desire the Democracy to continue the policy of pretending to be just like the Republican Party, it is not difficult to prophesy for it many years of exclusion from office. The Republican Party can always win at that game. The result will be that the United States, instead of having a two-party government, will be reduced to a one-party system, unless a new grouping comes to pass.

For ourselves, we see no reason whatever to alter our belief that as long as the Democratic Party represents the reaction and intolerance of the Protestant, Dry South and the Catholics and the Wets of the North, its possibilities of usefulness as a strongly welded and united opposition are nil. Therefore we repeat what we have said many times before, that it ought to die and the sooner it dies the better; the sooner there will be a new birth of a really progressive, honest, and liberal party. The country needs nothing so much as a new line-up between liberals and reactionaries—a division into those who believe that the Government exists primarily to make money for those who already have it, whose gospel is the smug doctrine of creature comfort above all else which Mr. Hoover preached from the beginning to the end of his campaign, and those who believe that it must be the servant of the people. Yes, the servant of the people—even to the extent of owning and operating for them the public utilities and water-powers and basic industries which are fast being monopolized. Radicals and conservatives—these are the two camps we need, the realignment we ought to have.

We are happy to read, therefore, that the progressive Senators in Washington are to meet soon to decide whether to come out for a new party or not. We regret that we cannot join Mr. Thomas in believing that we should build up the Socialist Party, but we cannot forget that for most Americans socialism connotes only bolshevism or anarchy. Hence a new designation and a revised program upon which all liberals may unite are the demand of the hour. We wonder if within the Democratic Party itself there are not a lot of able and clean men, like Frank Polk and Brand Whitlock, who are ready to strike out for a new deal, who realize that a rebirth of the Democracy into a great fighting instrument for liberalism at home and abroad is an impossibility. If there are such, we appeal most earnestly to their patriotism to set about the task of discovering with those like-minded of all faiths the basis upon which a new alignment can be made.

Smith Breaks the South

IT is an extraordinary political event, Governor Smith's breaking of the Solid South. For generations students of American politics have been hoping for this; the best friends of the South have prayed for it. Anything that would free that section from its post-bellum hatred of the Republican Party and its fear of Negro domination—often artificially stimulated by politicians without any other issue to parade—and permit it to split normally on economic or political issues has seemed the most desirable of political happenings. For the dead hand of one-party government and race-prejudice combined has thwarted or delayed unconscionably the intellectual, social, moral, and industrial development of the South. That the smashing of this solidarity should now have come about through a narrow passion for prohibition, through an outburst of sectarianism and of bigotry is the irony of fate. None the less the great fact is there: the Solid South is broken at last. A precedent is established of enormous importance to the whole country. What has been done once can be done again, especially when it appears eventually that the revolt of Texas, Florida, Virginia, and North Carolina will not mean the coming of Negro domination, or any of the other bugaboos by using which the average Southern politician has talked himself into office.

Plainly Governor Smith brought about this historical happening and not Herbert Hoover. The South voted against the Governor of New York and not for Mr. Hoover. Beyond question the motives were mixed, and it is equally clear that it will never be possible to assign to each one of those motives its exact percentage of responsibility. One Democratic county committee in Florida which voted not to support Governor Smith did so solely because he had disavowed the dry plank in the party platform; it solemnly recorded its belief that the Governor had abandoned the Democratic Party and that therefore loyal Democrats were justified in voting for somebody else. The appeal of the bishops, headed by James Cannon, for votes against Smith because he was a Wet was effective in large degree. But dread of the Pope, the bigotry of the fundamentalists, and the generally narrow religious views of that section were even more effective in breaking the Solid South. That there were other contributory causes is obvious. There are now whole communities in Florida and elsewhere made up of Northern people. In Georgia, in North Carolina, in Alabama, in fact all through the South, the industrial development has been enormous. The manufacturers and the managers of mills and factories and many of their employees have become Republicans because they felt it was to their financial interest to do so, just as it was undoubtedly in considerable part their influence which induced the Democratic Party to abandon at Houston its historic tariff policy. The South is changing and it will continue to change as it increases in wealth, as its tremendous natural resources are further developed, as more and more foreign and Northern capital pours into that section. Finally, it is beyond question that more Negroes voted in this election than have been allowed to vote for sometime past, and they generally voted for the Republicans. It is a significant fact, also, that the States in the South which remained true to Democracy were those in which the Negroes are in numerical superiority.

Now it is of course possible that the break-up of the South may help to fasten upon us the one-party rule of the Republicans. That chance we must run—just as we have to face the one-party allegiance of Maine, New Hampshire, and Vermont, a solid block of Republicanism that should also be broken up. If a new party does not divide the South and New England on genuine political or economic issues, the Republican Party is more and more likely to profit. Not that we believe that the four revolting States have left the Democratic fold for good. Not in the least. But the break will come again; we shall again have States leaving the Democrats because people vote as they think and not because of tradition or an absurd fear that intermarriage and social equality with the Negroes will follow the day after a State enters the Republican column. As for the Negro, we are sure that he will profit by the change. Given genuine battles between two parties over real issues, and more and more Negroes will be asked to vote. Even should this prove not to be the case, it will be of enormous benefit to them if the habit of the Tillmans and Heflins of riding into office solely on the backs of the Negroes is ended. Already the dispatches report that Mr. Hoover contemplates entirely reorganizing the Republican Party in the South. That is an admirable objective. It is as full of crooks, black and white, and of mere job-seekers, as any party could possibly be. Usually it is a scandal and a disgrace. If he can bring it about that the fine men and women in the South who are at heart Republicans vote and act as such, he will confer a great benefit upon the whole country.

Blood from a Stone

FRANCE, England, Belgium, Italy, Japan, and Germany have agreed to appoint representatives to a commission which is to reexamine the whole subject of the European war debts. It is an old subject. The war ended ten years ago, but with the exception of the work of the Dawes Commission there has not been any attempt to date to approach the financial wreckage of the conflict with honesty or realism. So far it has been a magnificent game of bluff on all sides, but there is a fair degree of hope that the coming examination of the war debts may be more of a business and less of a political session than most previous discussions. The United States is to be asked to take part, and Washington has intimated a willingness to do so, although reiterating the old cry that our claims against Europe shall not be allowed to hinge in any way upon the arrangements of European nations among themselves.

It is the Dawes Plan which has led to the new commission on war debts. That agreement was concluded early in 1924, and next year reaches the full scale of payments, a sum from Germany to the Allies of 2,500,000,000 marks ($625,000,000) in goods and money. The amount is an increase of 40 per cent over present payments, and there is much question outside as well as within Germany of whether that country can raise the tribute or—if so—transfer it. What chance is there that the new European commission will scale the tribute down? None, one would say, if he took at face value the declarations of the various governments concerned. England asks an annual amount equal to her yearly debt payments to the United States when they reach the maximum; Italy asks the same in respect to her debt payments to Great Britain and the United States; Belgium makes a similar demand in regard to her debt payments to the United States and wants a sum sufficient to cover the cost of the Germany currency floated in Belgium during the occupation; France is out for her annual debt payments to Great Britain and the United States at their maximum, and also for the cost of restoring the devastated regions. The total foots up to about the maximum annual charge under the Dawes Plan, but would be far less desirable for Germany because yearly payments for the liquidation of the Allied debts would stretch out over a much longer period than those called for in the Dawes arrangement.

But in these demands there is a lot of the old bluff, which the Allies can hardly be expecting to maintain if they are serious in calling a new conference. The largest item by far is the amount demanded for settling the various debts to the United States. This is computed in each case at the maximum yearly payment called for, a sum not due for many years and one which, in fact, no intelligent student of the problem expects ever to be paid at all. Take Italy as an instance. A Paris dispatch to the New York Times says that Italy wants $22,000,000 annually to cover her debt service to Great Britain and $26,000,000 for similar payments to the United States. But Italy is not paying us $26,000,000 annually; she is giving us only $5,000,000 at the present time and it is highly doubtful if we ever get more—certainly never $26,000,000. France is reported to be asking for $62,000,000 a year to pay to England and $125,000,000 to the United States. Stuff and nonsense! France actually has no debt agreement with us whatever. In 1925 that brilliant financier, Andrew W. Mellon, refused Caillaux's offer beginning with an initial payment of $40,000,000 annually. A few months later Mr. Mellon accepted preliminary payments from Italy which were only 25 per cent as good compared with the total debt involved, and in 1926 he agreed to the Bérenger offer beginning at $30,000,000—or $10,000,000 less than Caillaux proposed! Even so the French Parliament has so far refused to ratify the arrangement, so that technically France has agreed to pay us nothing. Actually she has been sending $30,000,000 a year, although $20,000,000 of this is credited by our Treasury as against war supplies bought after the armistice and only $10,000,000 toward liquidation of the war debt.

At the same time the Allies are less culpable in this huge bluff than we are, because we have insistently refused to reduce the debts due us in return for similar concessions from the Allies toward Germany. The Allies are therefore obliged to carry on their books their full obligations toward us up to the end of the sixty-two-year periods for which they were contracted on a progressively increasing scale. What a pious humbug! We shall never get those fat and distant payments, and we owe it to world peace and stability to renounce them and so permit the Allies to ease the now probably impossible burden imposed on Germany by the full Dawes payments.

The Allies are unfortunately not able to expect this from us in the coming negotiations. Possibly they have in mind something more hazardous for us but more likely to come to pass—a big American loan to Germany. This would leave the Allies sitting pretty and the United States holding the bag. It would be a beautiful case of taking money from one pocket to put in another—more dangerous though not more stupid than our present policy.

Mexico's Great Trial

NOT since the days of Juarez and Maximilian has Mexico seen so dramatic a grapple of church and state as that which culminated in the trial of José de Leon Toral, the young cartoonist who murdered Obregon. Calles precipitated the conflict, as if to determine once for all, cost whose life it might, the terrible duel that dates back to the Conquest and the Inquisition. His sudden militant evocation in 1926 of the Juarez laws and the Constitution of 1917 was a definite challenge. The church, overconfident of traditionally Catholic Mexico, took up the challenge. There was national propaganda for the reign of Cristo Rey as against the presidentship of Calles; and at the same time a cessation of services, a period of mourning, and a boycott which was intended to bring to a crisis the economic life of the nation. The boycott failed; the mourning was gradually sloughed off; and cessation of services gave visible evidence of what Toral despairingly said determined his crime: "Mexico was forgetting Christ and losing its religion." The only people who stood by the church were the only people in Mexico to whom the church and religion were synonyms: the remnants of the aristocracy and part of the city middle classes.

In 1926 a group of women plotted to kill Calles. They were tried and released, after much publicity, on the ground that they had taken no measures to carry out the plot. Calles said they were fanatical females, not worth bothering with. Some time after, there was an attempt on the life of Obregon, for alleged complicity in which several priests were shot without trial. Then came the bombing of Obregon's campaign headquarters by members of the Madre Concepcion group, and the bombing of the National Chamber of Deputies by other members of this same circle, "not to kill anybody," they declared, "but simply to frighten the Deputies into changing the Constitution." By his own veiled confession, Toral killed Obregon because the unforeseen death of the President-elect might throw Mexico into a scramble.

Into the trial of Toral went the packed forces of church and state. It was deliberately a show-down. The church, three days before the trial began, celebrated the Day of Cristo Rey, a national holiday decreed by the Pope. Two hundred thousand pilgrims were massed at the shrine of Guadalupe, a suburb of the capital. Elaborate services were held in all the churches, dedicating Mexico formally to Cristo Rey. Except for a few boos and hisses in the course of the trial, and possibly planned anti-Toral manifestos in the streets, nothing happened.

It was an ostentatiously fair trial, dispiriting to martyrdom. Toral was even allowed to describe the third degree employed to obtain the confessions which involved Madre Concepcion and her sixteen followers. The jury was picked from the lower, city, middle class, which might be expected to sympathize with Toral and be swayed by the fact that one of the defendants was a nun. The nun was sentenced, as intellectual author of the murder, to twenty years' imprisonment, Toral to death. He goes down, with Obregon, the executed priests, Juarez, and hundreds of anonymous guerrillas, soldiers, and women, on the long list of human sacrifices begun in Mexico in the name of Christ four centuries ago.

It Seems to Heywood Broun

THE most useful service within the power of any publication would be to use the fires of bigotry for the purposes of illumination. We ought to chart the domain of prejudice in order to guide the footsteps of the coming generation. Naturally it will not be enough to concern ourselves wholly with such disabilities as may lie across the path of Catholics. Indeed it might be fair to say that membership in this particular church need not always be a handicap. It never yet stopped anyone from being mayor in Boston nor yet in New York. Obviously there are districts where Catholics run better than their Protestant competitors. But even in Boston or New York there has been no set ban against the Protestant.

However, the survey which I have in mind should concern itself with other things than politics. Prejudice is not restricted to religion. There is, for instance, an anti-Negro feeling which rests on race alone. In the case of prejudice against Jews I suppose the bigotry is partly racial and partly religious. There is also the somewhat recent drive against the citizen of foreign birth and sometimes against his children. The melting-pot has come to be a place in which he is supposed to surrender bones and buttons and hop out looking like William Allen White.

Many said it was a pity that the religious issue should have been dragged into the campaign. I can't see that. Since it exists there is no reason why we should not know of it. Indeed we want more light upon the matter rather than less. For the most part the people who complained against the religious issue being brought to the fore were those who wished to knife a Catholic and have their action construed as patriotism or a defense of prohibition. But there are many exceptions to this rule. For a long time I have been urging that some American newspaper take up the question of concrete discriminations in this country against the Jew. In conversation with several Jewish friends I have found much opposition to any such inquiry. They say that it would stir up prejudice.

But bad enough should never be left alone. In common honesty the public has a right to know the facts. When enough information is available we shall be able to add the necessary footnotes to the Declaration of Independence. When a child is taught in school that all men are created free and equal he should be allowed to look at the foot of the page and learn the necessary exceptions which are noted.

It has been suggested to me that any such inquiry ought to include a survey of the Negro's status. Unfortunately this would have little appeal to any journalist. If a white community discriminates against a Negro that can hardly be said to be news. In this respect we have at least gone a short step past hypocrisy. Many States make no bones at all about their determination to keep the Negro in political, social, and economic bondage. The Negro himself must shoulder part of the responsibility. Too often he has been willing to accept injustice tamely. Moreover, he has certainly made indifferent use of his vote. It was possible for Herbert Hoover to go "lily white" in the last campaign and still sacrifice no tangible number of votes in States and cities where the Negro holds the balance of power. The colored men of America ought to get over the habit of voting Republican willy-nilly.

It is perfectly true that Governor Smith made no particular gesture of friendliness toward the Negro in the last campaign. In fact it was not possible to get any sort of statement from him when there seemed a possibility of gathering into his support a large percentage of this Republican vote. I still think it would have been a useful gesture upon the part of Negroes to rebuke the party in power. And even if they could not bring themselves to vote for Smith and Robinson there was the chance to back Norman Thomas.

Jewish prejudice is quite a different matter. It is my guess that no major party would care to nominate a Jew for President because of the hill-billy vote which is so large in all the rural States. But the problem is much wider than this and it is dangerous because insidious. For instance, no man knows just how many schools and colleges are working on a quota basis or barring Jews entirely from enrollment. A. Lawrence Lowell was somewhat unfairly dealt with when he publicly announced that Harvard was considering the matter of making some restriction as to the number of Jews to be admitted. The criticism directed against Mr. Lowell was unfair because the very thing which he publicly announced as being under discussion was already done by stealth in scores of educational institutions.

And surely it is no secret in New York that there are hospitals in which the young Jewish doctor must be at least twice as able as his Gentile competitor in order to get an appointment. We know that there are apartment houses which require "social" references and any number of summer hotels proudly proclaim the fact that Hebrews are not wanted. Again the slogan "Christians only" is overly familiar in the advertisements of some of our largest concerns in the "help wanted" columns. Mr. Hoover was fond of saying during the campaign that this was the land of equal opportunity. No one took him up on this, for a fair question might have been framed for him to answer. It would run: "Equal for whom?"

Incidentally and somewhat irrelevantly I have learned from a letter the solution of the great farm mystery. Before every election we are told that the honest agriculturists are angry and purpose to make their revolt felt at the polls. After this announcement our rural friends invariably go and vote Republican as usual. This curious behavior has been explained on the ground of prosperity and on habit but Mr. Gustav Heden informs me that the true explanation is applejack. He writes:

You have said, "There seems every reason to believe that the majority of the people of the United States favor prohibition in its present form." That statement is true on the face of it, but it does not mean anything, for we all know that if the possession of applejack had not made the farmer independent of prohibition he would have voted for Smith, and that applejack more than anything else determined this election. The voting proved nothing much except that the city dwellers are Wet and that the applejack-drinking farmers are "dry."

To even up things the city dwellers should get genuine applejack at least. Lead us to it, Mr. Broun!

HEYWOOD BROUN

What Next in Washington?

By PAUL Y. ANDERSON

THE Presidential election of November 6 resulted in a landslide—in fact, in several landslides. It resulted in a real landslide of popular votes for both candidates, a landslide of electoral votes for Herbert Hoover, a landslide of loose and excited talk about Governor Smith's "crushing" and "unprecedented" defeat, and a landslide of obituaries on the Democratic Party. The first two of these resulted directly from the election; the last two from unintelligent scrutiny of the election returns, coupled with a very slight acquaintance with political history.

It is true that Hoover's victory was decisive from all angles, although much less decisive, from the popular standpoint, than that of Harding in 1920. It is true that he carried forty of the forty-eight States, including four of the hitherto Undigestible South, and that he will have 444 votes in the Electoral College to Smith's 87. It is equally true that Smith received at least 6,000,000 more votes than any man ever nominated by his party for President, and, moreover, that he received a decidedly larger percentage of the total vote than either of the last two Democratic candidates before him.

In the light of the figures, talk about "the overwhelming disaster to which the party was led by Governor Smith" is sheer nonsense, or pure malice, or both. Not only did he lead it to the highest peak of numerical strength in its history, but under his leadership it attained greater comparative and competitive strength against its opponent than it had enjoyed since 1916. The writer is not a Democrat. He would cheerfully see that party securely buried, and its place taken by an organization with a genuine program of reasoned, constructive opposition to the predatory plunderbund which has just been returned to power. But why be silly? A party that survived 1920, when its candidates received 34 per cent of the vote; and 1924, when its candidate received only 30 per cent of the total—obviously that party has not been annihilated by the results of 1928, when its candidate not only got more than 40 per cent of the popular vote, but actually added 6,000,000 voters to the party roll.

That the party as now constituted contains within itself the germ of decay and death, I surely believe and fervently hope, but that germ is not to be discovered either in the nomination or in the defeat of Governor Smith. On the contrary, the very fact that he could be nominated on the first ballot, and that he could obtain the support of such a large proportion of the party organization, offers the only basis on which it may hope to survive. If it dies it will die because Bourbon leadership, typified in such men as Simmons, Heflin, Blease, Ferguson, and Bilbo, prevails over the progressive leadership exemplified in Smith, Franklin D. Roosevelt, and Senators Walsh and Wheeler. It may so prevail, and the next four years may witness its triumph. The public will see that issue joined when Southern leaders begin to conspire at ways and means to check the growth in party and popular strength of Franklin Roosevelt. If they succeed in shelving him—or his progressive counterpart—the ultimate doom of the party probably will be sealed, although its actual demise may be lamentably slow.

There is something of which a great many voters both north and south of the Mason and Dixon line are not aware, although few elements in the party alignment exercise more force. It is the fact that continued Republican success in national elections inspires no such poignant grief in the breasts of Southern Democratic leaders as might be supposed—so long as their State and local tickets remain intact. Uninterrupted and practically uncontested occupation of the Senatorships, Governorships, and seats in the House, and complete control and distribution of the smaller prizes, was a wonderful consolation for seeing a Republican in the White House, and it has enabled many a Southern statesman to endure the spectacle with complacency. Not until their own nests were disturbed would they really worry. Now, that is precisely what happened November 6. Democratic State tickets in the South almost uniformly ran far below their normal strength. Worse, seats in the House, held by Democrats since the Civil War, actually were lost in North Carolina and Virginia, and others were retained by narrow margins. Now we can understand the dismay which was apparent in high Democratic quarters! Now we can understand the stern and vociferous demands to "purge the party of Tammany and the body of death!" And now, moreover, we can understand the character of the fight, and the motives behind it, that will be made to return the party to Bourbon leadership and control. If that effort succeeds, the aim of future Democratic national conventions will not be difficult to forecast. It will be to nominate national candidates to be beaten, but beaten on such platforms and under such circumstances as will offer the minimum of danger to the success of the local tickets. First, and above all, this would mean no more Catholic candidates! It would mean cautious and meaningless declarations of national policy. It would mean opposition of a purely critical nature, and that largely perfunctory and for home consumption. It would, in short, mean turning the country over to the Republican Party—in other words, to the Power Trust, the Aluminum Trust, the high-income-tax bracketeers, and all the other pets of governmental favoritism and protection.

Of course it may be said—in fact, it was said on the floor of the Senate two years ago by Senator Reed of Missouri—that this is just about the course which the Democratic Party in Congress has been pursuing for several years. And the reply is that the nomination of Governor Smith at Houston was the event which put at end, temporarily at least, to that course, and set the party on the road of genuine progressive and constructive opposition. The present question is whether it will remain on that road and evolve into the party of liberal and popular causes, or whether it will get back into the old rut.

"No more Catholics," I have written. Well, I will say now that I do not believe Governor Smith would have been elected if he had been a Protestant. The Republican candidate, no matter who, was bound to win. Dawes, Curtis, or even Jim Watson would have won. It is impossible to convince a majority of the American people that they are not as prosperous as they should be, or that they would not be less prosperous under a Democratic administration. I fully agree with Will Rogers that Hoover's election and Smith's defeat were due to the simple fact that one was a Republican and the other a Democrat, and that "Hoover would have beat Coolidge if Coolidge had been running on the Democrat ticket."

Nevertheless, the gallant Governor struggled under many and terrific campaign handicaps, of which his religion was by all odds the heaviest. Even Christ staggered under the burden of the cross, and Al Smith was only a man, and running on the Democratic ticket, at that. Without this burden he would still have lost, but with what a difference in the Electoral College! Thus, he would not have lost Virginia, Florida, North Carolina, Texas, or Tennessee. In addition he probably would have carried most, if not all, of the following: Missouri, Minnesota, Nebraska, Oklahoma, Maryland, Wisconsin, North Dakota, Arizona, and Nevada, and if he had carried all of them the vote in the Electoral College, instead of 444 to 87, would be 302 to 229, and Governor Smith would have been defeated by the defection of one State—New York!

The effect of the religious issue in the Southern States was obvious; the evidence of its potency in the West is almost as convincing. "Herbert Hoover ought to lay a wreath on the statue of Martin Luther!" exclaimed the Washington correspondent of a Western newspaper the morning after election. Minnesota, populated largely by German and Scandinavian Lutherans, is a conspicuous example of the point. Running for reelection was Senator Shipstead, on the ticket of the defunct Farmer-Labor Party. In other words, he was practically an independent candidate, without money or party organization. Opposed to him was the Republican candidate, supported by a powerful and smoothly functioning party organization, supplied with plenty of funds. On every single important issue, except prohibition, Shipstead's record and position was identical with the record and the position of Governor Smith. They were together on farm relief, power, Republican corruption, and foreign policy. What happened? Shipstead carried the State by 300,000 and Smith lost it by 100,000. Exactly the same state of affairs existed in North Dakota, where the Progressive Senator Frazier was reelected; in Washington, where Senator Dill won, and in Arizona, where Ashurst was reelected. Even more startling is the case of Wisconsin, which although wet and progressive like Smith, went for Hoover, while reelecting La Follette by the gigantic majority of 400,000—and that of Nebraska, which reelected the Progressive Howell, but despite Senator Norris's indorsement, turned Smith down decisively! The advantage which should have accrued from his stand on farm relief was completely nullified by the circumstance of his religion.

The accident of having been born a Catholic was but one of the Governor's "bad breaks" (I speak, of course, from the practical standpoint of getting votes). There was his radio manner. Undoubtedly an army of voters was influenced by the radio appearances of the candidates. As between Smith and Hoover, there is no doubt about which is the best platform speaker. Smith is very effective before an audience, and Hoover is simply terrible. Yet there is no doubt that over the radio Smith sounded terrible and Hoover sounded fine. The very emphasis and accentuation which adds to Smith's platform effectiveness, made him, over the radio, seem truculent and grating. The drollery which convulsed his personal audiences reached the radio listeners merely in the form of awkward and bewildering pauses. On the other hand, Hoover's deadly, even monotone, devoid of emphasis and almost of inflection, was perfectly adapted to clear radio transmission. Above all, it had "that dignified sound." And thus, incidentally, arises another consideration for convention managers of the future. "What sort of radio voice has he got?" will certainly be added to the list of vital tests.

Post-mortems are useful only in so far as they furnish a basis for future action. But every person who believes in genuinely democratic government, every person who sickens at the sham, smugness, and snobbery which pervade official life in Washington, and every person who loves candor, simplicity, and courage, will hope that Governor Smith's decision not to run for office again does not mean that he will refuse to take an active and vigorous part in the future discussion and settlement of public questions. He is only fifty-five, and only those who followed him through the exhausting, nerve-racking, back-breaking itinerary of the campaign can appreciate his amazing strength and vitality. In many ways, he is just coming into his full powers. During the campaign his stature increased almost from day to day. That is possible only with humble men, men like Smith, who are willing to learn.

As for President-elect Hoover—one may hope, one may pray, one may listen to his liberal defenders, but can one really believe? It is significant that the Washington correspondents, who have had eight years and endless opportunity to get acquainted with the Secretary of Commerce, were fanatically for Al Smith, almost to a man. Reporters who attended Candidate Hoover's press conferences, reporters who accompanied Candidate Hoover on his few campaign trips, reporters who were assigned to cover Hoover headquarters, came away burning to give their last drop of blood for the Smith cause. Most of them had never seen Governor Smith. But they had seen plenty of Candidate Hoover. One of their number, older and more reflective than the majority and speaking without passion, put it this way: "He's just as he always has been since I've known him—he hasn't a damned bit of respect for anybody's intellect except his own."

However, I think it is generally agreed that a subtle change became apparent in the President-elect about four years ago. He was no longer the brisk and hearty engineer of 1918-1919. It was about four years ago, or perhaps a little earlier, that he began to suspect Destiny of having an eye on him, and that the words, "My Place in History," seriously entered his thoughts. These two things clouded a clearer mind and warped a sharper intellect than Hoover's—those of Woodrow Wilson. Their effect on Mr. Hoover was depressing to those who once knew him as a man of blunt and forceful speech and a decidedly scientific cast of mind. His speech became distressingly like that of the late President Harding's heavier utterances, his actions became devious and unpredictable, and the scientific mind became wreathed in the gaudy clouds of Purpose, Service, and Destiny. This was just the sort of thing that never could happen to Al Smith—and you loved him for it.

I look for a White House Spokesman in the next four years who will be more oracular and diffuse than he of the last four, and withal, testier and more intolerant of criticisms of "my policies." Already the boys on the job at Palo Alto have been told that it is "undesirable" for them to speculate on the membership of the next Cabinet! It looks as if we are in for it. There's one consolation—you're all in the same boat.

What's Wrong with The Nation?

By H. L. MENCKEN

THE main thing wrong with it, I believe, is that in its laudable progress from liberalism to libertarianism it occasionally hangs back and moos sadly, like a cow torn from its calf. I do not apologize for the simile: a cow is quite as good a man as a liberal. What ails liberalism, as a practical scheme of reform, is its naive and irrational belief in law, a superstition that has cursed the human race long enough. It is time, God knows, to get rid of it, that civilization may have a chance, and I naturally look to such enlightened and disreputable journals as The Nation to help along the process. But every time I begin to glow with hope The Nation comes out with kind words for some preposterous prohibitionist or other wowser, or with an editorial demanding insanely that Congress put down crime by forbidding the interstate shipment of pistols. What could be more disconcerting, more irritating, more muddy-headed, more absurd? To forbid the sale and shipment of pistols would be simply to take them away from honest men and arm all gunmen to the teeth, just as forbidding the sale of alcohol has closed all the honest, decent, sanitary saloons and given a monopoly to filthy speakeasies. Such aberrations, I confess, annoy me excessively. I react to them as I react to jazz, or to the soapy, voluptuous gurgle of Monsignor Manning. They impede my respiration and make me pitch and toss. When I encounter them in a paper I respect it is a sad day for me.

This belief in law, as I say, is one of the grand curses of the world. But liberals retain it with a horrible tenacity. Their politics is a game of discovering abuses and passing laws to put them down. They are forever advocating that someone be jailed. The perfect pattern of a liberal, sub-species Anglo-Saxon, was the late Woodrow Wilson, who was also the perfect pattern of a witch-burner: has it escaped notice that he sat for Rollin Kirby's eloquent portrait of Pastor Killjoy of the Anti-Saloon League? Fortunately for the human race, the science and art of Law Enforcement has broken down—in the United States, most spectacularly. It has been run into the ground by fanatics, and made magnificently ridiculous. So most liberals of any sense begin to wobble, and many of them turn to libertarianism. Libertarianism is the theory that men are happiest, not when they are rigorously policed, but when they are free—happiest, and safest. It is grounded upon the assumption that the normal man is actually normal, which is to say, decent and well-disposed, even though he may be stupid. It proceeds to the corollary that if this is not true, then nothing whatever can be done about it.

The Ku Klux Klan was a great liberal organization—perhaps the archetype of militant liberalism. It flung itself alike against the toryism of Rome and the radicalism of the emerging Aframerican. It was violently in favor of law enforcement, and devoted itself in particular to enforcing such laws as were inherently unenforceable. Every prowling Methodist parson in the land regards himself as a liberal, and with sound reason. Liberalism arose in England among the non-conformists, and they have been its chief supporters everywhere. Even the jihad against Al Smith that has just convulsed the republic was based upon liberal principles.

It was, at least in theory, an attack upon the corruption and intransigence of the big cities. It was eminently pious, righteous, forward-looking, right-thinking. It was as pure in its ideology as the war against war. Nevertheless, it was vile.

But I have no commission to argue for libertarianism. It continues to be somewhat immoral, like nullification; moreover, it is rapidly making its way, and illustrious liberals are converted to it every day. My job is to suggest improvements in The Nation. I suggest only one, but it covers a great deal of ground. I propose that before The Nation give its approval and confidence to any American public man hereafter, it put him on ice for a year, remaining silent the while. Let him rest there quietly, proving his case. If, at the expiration of the test, it is not clearly demonstrated that he is a mountebank, then let him have his anointment. But if the evidence against him is plain, then let him be heaved into hell with the rest of them. My scheme would save embarrassments and repinings: I mention only the name of Borah. My prediction is that the ointment bill would be inconsiderable.

By public man, of course, I do not mean only politicians. The term takes in bishops; it takes in labor leaders; it takes in all the vast rabble of frauds that now preys upon the American people, cadging their money and promising them magical sticks of candy. The frauds ecclesiastical, indeed, seem to me to be far worse than the frauds political. They are bolder and more impudent; their takings are heavier; they last much longer. It has been one of my vices, for years, to read the denominational papers; at the present moment I am a subscriber to fifty of them. What is in them? For one thing, an endless bawling for money. For another thing, a raucous and malignant denunciation of everything that enlightened men hold to be honest and true. What the charlatans behind them screw out of the booboisie annually I don't know, but it must run to billions. Yet there is a convention that they must be treated politely in the press. Even The Nation treats most of them politely. I propose that it examine them more realistically—and more frequently.

The labor leaders, running from the fat heirs of old Sam Gompers at the top to the Socialists and Communists at the bottom, are quite as bad. I have been in active journalism for twenty-nine years, and during that time have known many hundreds of newspaper reporters, some of them intelligent. All newspaper reporters come into contact with labor leaders; the majority know scores. Well, I have never known or heard of a reporter who had any confidence in any of them. To the journalistic eye they are almost unanimously mountebanks. In every city room in the land they are pigeon-holed with the vice-crusaders, the prohibition agents, and the Methodist clergy. A few more or less honest fanatics, true enough, leaven the mass, but they are surely not many. I propose that The Nation scrutinize these prehensible fellows a bit more carefully—and a bit more frequently.

And so on, and so on. In sum, my belief is that The Nation, misled by its lingering liberal hallucinations, only too often yells up the wrong rain-spout. It labors under the delusion that the worst rogues are those who break laws. Why was the Ku Klux a public nuisance? Because it broke a few good laws? Hardly. It was a nuisance because it tried to enforce a multitude of bad laws. And behind it, both in the South and the Middle West, stood the body of evangelical clergy—law enforcers to a man, and public nuisances to a man. I think it might be very plausibly maintained that the crimes of the late Secretary Fall, as grave as they seemed, were vastly less dangerous to the common weal than any one of a dozen decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, upholding law enforcement and mauling the Bill of Rights. Fall and his friends got very little, and what they missed will be wasted anyhow. But the single decision in the wiretapping case will be a burden and an affront to every decent American citizen for half a century.

So I propose a moratorium on acknowledged rascals for a while, and a more scientific examination of the virtuous. The United States is not materially damaged by its Falls and Sinclairs; they are mainly comic characters, with touches of pathos. But what is to be said of a Senator who pauses in his denunciation of their banal rogueries to swallow the infinitely worse corruptions of the Anti-Saloon League, with its pious condonings of blackmail, burglary, assault, and murder, and its frenzied war upon every right that men have fought for for a thousand years?

Have We Recognized Soviet Russia?

By MAURICE FONTAINE

RECOGNITION of the Soviet Government was not discussed by either of the major parties in the recent campaign. It was ignored in the party platforms and by the party orators. Even Senator Borah, in his forensic enthusiasm for Mr. Hoover, forgot to revive a question to which he had previously attached great importance. Governor Smith, by silence at least, lent consent to the policy of non-recognition. Both candidates remained uncommitted up to election day. Presumably, therefore, the President-elect is free to continue or to reverse this refusal to recognize a government which has existed in Moscow for eleven years. At least, this would be the presumption were it not for certain events which recently transpired, unnoticed by the American press, preoccupied with the excitements of World's Series and the Presidential campaign. At this calmer moment these events deserve belated consideration.

On August 31 the Soviet Government handed to the French Ambassador in Moscow, M. Herbette, a document signifying its adherence to the Pact of Paris, known in America as the Kellogg Treaty. In due course this document was delivered by the French Embassy in Washington to the Department of State. Acknowledgment of its receipt was made by Secretary of State Kellogg in a statement to the press on October 3.

On October 15 M. Herbette called at the Foreign Office in Moscow and delivered to the Acting Commissar of Foreign Affairs, Litvinov, two official copies of the Pact of Paris, in English and French, bearing the signature of Secretary of State Kellogg. In discharging this mission, according to the official Isvestia of October 16, "M. Herbette declared that the delivery of these copies signifies the acceptance of the Soviet act of adherence. The obligation of the Government of the United States, provided in Article III of the pact, has been fulfilled."

What obligation had the Government of the United States undertaken which had to be fulfilled by the visit of M. Herbette to the Soviet Foreign Office? M. Herbette refers us to Article III of the pact. This article establishes Washington as the depository of the treaty and of subsequent instruments of ratification and adherence. It is as the guardian of the treaty that certain obligations devolve upon the Government of the United States. One of these is set forth in the following clause of Article III:

It shall be the duty of the Government of the United States to furnish each government named in the preamble and every government subsequently adhering to this treaty with a certified copy of the treaty and of every instrument of ratification or adherence.

For some time to come, it appears, M. Herbette will be busy running to the Foreign Office in Moscow as messenger boy for Mr. Kellogg; because the United States must likewise furnish the Soviet Government with certified copies of every instrument of ratification or adherence—and Mr. Kellogg expects all the world to ratify and adhere.

What is the significance of this transmission of official documents from Moscow to Washington through French diplomatic pouches? Simply this: The Government of the United States, having received the adherence of the Soviet Government, found itself constrained, under the terms of the treaty, to call in the French Government and say:

"We have received an instrument of adherence from a government at Moscow. According to Article III of the treaty, it is our duty to furnish certified copies of the treaty to every adhering government. We have no embassy in Moscow. Will you be so good, therefore, as to deliver on our behalf to the government in Moscow these copies of the treaty, duly signed and certified by the Secretary of State."

This is an imaginary colloquy. But some such request must have been made by the State Department; otherwise the actions and remarks of M. Herbette are unaccountable. Paraphrased in any imaginable terms, the State Department must have requested the French Government to deliver a document to a government at Moscow. This is the irreducible essence of the matter. Perhaps the State Department could not bring its lips to form the unaccustomed syllables of the complete official designation of the Government of the Union of Socialist Soviet Republics; but at least it must have referred to a government, a government existing in Moscow, whence it had received an instrument of adherence and to which it must deliver a copy of the treaty, an actual government coming within the definition of that word as it appears in Article III of the treaty. This is the significance of M. Herbette's explanatory remark on October 15. The American Government had incurred an obligation toward the Soviet Government, and had fulfilled that obligation. If that be recognition—make the most of it.

Perhaps it was not recognition—either de facto or de jure. But at least it was unprecedented for the State Department, even in its most secret thoughts, to envisage the existence of a government at Moscow. And how much more significant for it to send messages to that government through M. Herbette. Secretary Kellogg, no doubt, would contend that this does not constitute recognition, which, as we understand Mr. Kellogg's theory, is a matter of intent. By this theory, you cannot stumble into recognition of a government merely by thinking of its existence; not even by the accident that you and it become parties to the same treaty. It all depends upon intent. And certainly no one will say that the State Department intended to recognize the Soviet Government when it sent M. Herbette, bearing treaties, to the Moscow Foreign Office. That was a pure formality, a technicality involved in Article III of the Pact of Paris, a duty which the United States has to perform with respect to "every government subsequently adhering"—any and every government whether recognized or not.

It is rumored that certain American Senators, fearing lest the ratification of a treaty between the United States and the Soviet Union might be construed as recognition, will urge a reservation expressly disclaiming that intent. But the Senators' fears arise from another section of Article III, which says:

Every instrument evidencing the adherence of a power shall be deposited at Washington and the treaty shall immediately upon such deposit become effective as between the power thus adhering and the other parties hereto.

From which it appears that the Senate, by ratifying the treaty, approves the establishment of treaty relations between the U. S. A. and the USSR. The Soviet Government has already completed its part in these formalities. The instrument of adherence transmitted from Moscow to Washington was ratified on August 29 by a resolution of the Presidium of the Central Executive Committee of the Union, fulfilling the requirements of the Soviet Constitution with respect to treaty-making. In this the Soviet Government was the first Power to give constitutional ratification to the treaty, a necessary formality which has not yet been completed by any of the original contracting parties.

It is the anomaly of seeming to ratify a treaty with an unrecognized government which may compel some Senators to demand a reservation announcing that the treaty does not mean what it says it means with respect to the Soviet Government. This may ease the conscience of the Senate, but it will not affect the events of the past few months—the deposit of Soviet documents in Washington and the errand of M. Herbette to the Moscow Foreign Office. The Senate may ratify the treaty with its fingers crossed in the direction of Moscow. But the act of recognition, unlike treaty-making, is not a prerogative of the Senate, and does not require Senate approval. The State Department bestows recognition as it pleases, and in its own fashion, without benefit of Senate. If there is any significance in the visit of M. Herbette to the Soviet Foreign Office on October 15, and in his remarks on that occasion, it will not be affected by Senate reservations. This thing actually happened, albeit obscured by the smoke and noise of a Presidential campaign which did not consider the question of Soviet recognition worth discussing.

The incident might be ignored as unimportant were it not for what happened in the recognition of the Chinese Nationalist Government. On July 25, 1928, the American Minister in Peking signed a tariff treaty with representatives of the Nationalist Government. Up to that date the United States had not recognized the Government at Nanking; nor was it understood that signature of the tariff treaty constituted full recognition. De facto recognition had been accorded, but nothing more. Complete de jure recognition, Mr. Kellogg explained, was a matter of intent. On September 27, however, two months later, the State Department announced that its legal experts, after mature deliberation, had decided that the signature of the tariff treaty on July 25 had in fact constituted complete de jure recognition as of that date, and that no further formal declaration would be necessary. The United States had been fully recognizing the new Chinese Government for two months and no one knew it. According to the State Department, the recognition of the Chinese Government was discovered by the legal experts to have occurred on July 25, although Mr. Kellogg apparently did not know of it until two months later. The discovery of an intent two months after the act would be the function of a psychoanalyst rather than a lawyer. But let this pass. The Nanking Government was recognized, and the Nationalist flag burgeoned on the Chinese legation in Washington. Evidently recognition, whether by intent or by the interpretation of legal experts, can happen almost imperceptibly. It can happen and pass unobserved for two months. On October 9, President Coolidge signalized the new state of affairs by sending a cable to the Minister for Foreign Affairs at Nanking, felicitating the Chinese people upon the anniversary of the establishment of the Republic.

This brings us back to the President-elect. In the matter of relations with the Soviet Union he is uncommitted either by platform pledges or by campaign promises. Whether M. Herbette's visit to the Foreign office in Moscow has in any way committed him may be left to the future deliberations of the State Department's legal experts. It is probably entirely a matter of intent. And yet the silent and almost invisible manner in which Chinese recognition came about invites interesting speculation. If the new President, for any reason, desires the establishment of diplomatic relations with Moscow, he may conveniently discover that the matter has already been attended to and requires no further formality. It may be that the United States has in fact fully recognized the Government of the USSR ever since October 15. In which case, it will be quite in order for the President of the United States to send a cable next November 7 to the Commissar of Foreign Affairs, felicitating the citizens of the Soviet Union upon the anniversary of their Revolution.

In the Driftway

WHILE the United States has been in a state of political eruption, spouting up finally in a lava of votes a man by the name of Hoover and dropping him through the roof of the White House, another upheaval has been taking place in Italy with processes as spectacular and difficult to understand. In Italy old Etna has been having one of its periodic coughing spells, and inhabitants of the mountainside have seen their homes and vineyards buried under a stream of molten stone, moving with agonizing deliberation but relentless power. Those in the path of this stream of lava have had to abandon their homes and livelihood and flee for their lives, as periodically others have fled for centuries. At one eruption—perhaps not centuries but several years ago—the Drifter happened to be on the scene. He was not camping out on the volcano waiting for an eruption—even a Drifter lacks such patience—but was visiting a mountain village some twenty miles away. Etna is the most impressive mountain the Drifter has ever seen. There are many higher peaks, but generally they rise from surrounding heights which account for most, or much, of their total altitude above sea-level. Etna rises, solitary and sheer, for almost two miles out of a valley practically at sea-level. The volcano is an almost perfect cone on a base twenty-five miles in diameter. The upper reaches are covered with snow even in summer. Mongibello is the Sicilians' name for the volcano—a combination of monte, the Italian, and jebel, the Arabic word for mountain. This putting together the two nouns expresses the Sicilians' respect for Etna.

* * * * *

NOTHING could have been more peaceful than Mongibello on the afternoon of the Drifter's arrival in his nearby village. Seemingly the mountain was the same sleeping beauty it had been since the last previous eruption. But the next morning the crater was enveloped in a vapor which toward afternoon became dense black smoke rising skyward like a funnel. Word went round the village: "L'Etna fuma! L'Etna fuma!" Rumbblings, like distant cannon fire, could be heard even twenty miles away. But we had no way of knowing whether lava was flowing. "Wait until night," said the excited Sicilians. "Then, if lava is flowing, it will show red in the darkness." So interest increased toward dusk, and then we saw what looked like an immense bonfire, glowing red and yellow and now and then flaring up as if someone had thrown on fresh brush. When we considered that the burning patch in the darkness was twenty miles away, we realized that it was a roaring furnace and what looked like gentle flickers were in fact huge masses of molten lava spouted many feet into the air.

* * * * *

CERTAIN then that the volcano was in eruption, the Drifter and a friend started early next morning for a closer view. They intended to leave the railway at Giarre, a city in the path of the present lava stream, but by a traveler's mistake were carried five miles beyond. This delayed them somewhat, and nightfall found them still toiling up the slope afoot. They slept in a workman's shack, used ordinarily only as a day shelter, and were awakened frequently by a shiver of the earth which rattled the timbers of their hut. In the morning they reached the lava-bank, ten to twenty feet high. The flow had ceased and a gray crust had formed over the surface, making it possible to approach within a few feet without feeling the heat. The lava looked inert and harmless and the Drifter's companion poked the bank with his walking-stick. When he withdrew the stick a second later, a red hole glowed beyond and the ferule of the cane had been melted off.

* * * * *

WHY do people continue to live on the slopes of this mountain which every few years sweeps away their all? For the same reasons, the Drifter supposes, that boys in fishing villages go to sea and the sons of miners to burrow in the bowels of the earth. With most people occupation, like place of residence, is an accident.

Catholics and Birth Control

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In The Nation there appears a letter from Margaret Sanger, containing statements alleged to have been made by a "Father P. J. Ward of the National Catholic Welfare Council of Washington, D. C." As I am the only person of this name on the headquarters staff of the National Catholic Welfare Conference (not Council) I presume Mrs. Sanger refers to me. I am not a priest, however.

The statements attributed to me and given by Mrs. Sanger in quotation were never made by me and are not a definition of "the attitude of the Catholic church concerning the morals and habits of non-Catholics."

About two and one-half years ago an official of the American Birth Control League came to the offices of the National Catholic Welfare Conference and, without disclosing her identity, asked for information on the attitude of the Catholic church toward birth control. She explained she was a non-Catholic. Toward the end of the conversation, which was more or less a desultory one, she disclosed, in reply to a question from me, that she was an official of the American Birth Control League.

A few days afterward this lady returned to my office with a typewritten statement, prepared by her, purporting to be a report of our conversation. It was an erroneous and misleading report and the statements therein were not a true record of the conversation. I so informed her and expressly gave her to understand it could not be taken as a statement of the National Catholic Welfare Conference. It was simply a garbled and distorted version of a conversation, written by a Birth Control League official.

When the American Birth Control League circulated this report in March, 1926, it was officially repudiated by the general secretary of the National Catholic Welfare Conference, in a letter to Mrs. Sanger.

The circumstances under which the representative of the American Birth Control League came to the National Catholic Welfare Conference headquarters, without having made any appointment, the hiding of her identity as an official of the League until actually taxed with it; the preparation of a report which the American Birth Control League made every effort to have me indorse, all suggest that the whole thing was arranged for purposes of birth-control propaganda. The use of this report in the present instance is convincing proof that such was the case.

PATRICK J. WARD,
Director, Bureau of Publicity and Information

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The typewritten statement of the conversation our legislative secretary had with Mr. Patrick J. Ward was submitted to him on March 2, 1926, for amendment or correction. In a letter dated March 4, 1926, Mr. Ward wrote to the legislative secretary of the American Birth Control League: "... there is one statement in paragraph two of 'Facts Brought Out in the Interview' which escaped my attention and which I would ask you to correct. 'Marriage without the desire and responsibility of parenthood and not lived in strict continence is adultery' should be 'Marriage without the desire and responsibility of parenthood and not lived in strict continence is im*moral and sinful.* . . . I shall be glad if you will make this correction."

The original report submitted to Mr. Ward was entitled: "Report of an Interview with Mr. P. J. Ward of the National Catholic Welfare Council. (Mr. Ward is directing the organized work against Birth Control and has the authority to speak on this matter for the entire Council.)" Nevertheless, the only change or correction made in this respect at that time is the one referred to above.

On April 21, 1926, Rev. John J. Burke, general secretary of the Catholic organization, asked for a further correction of the mimeographed report, stating that the National Catholic Welfare Conference "has not had to come out in the open, but has been in the open ever since the first efforts were made to amend the present Federal Penal Code which forbids the United States mails to be used for carrying contraceptive information. Kindly make this correction."

In view of repeated opportunities to correct our report, the present repudiation of his statements by Mr. Ward is rather belated.

Both officials were given the opportunity to deny the statement that I quoted: "It is her duty [the Church's] to interfere and block all legislation that will adversely affect the morals of non-Catholics as well as Catholics, etc." Neither has ever done so.

Science and Religion

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: You are right in stating that aside from Sir Oliver Lodge and fellow-spiritualists science can make no claim to especial knowledge in the field of religion. However, when high-school instructors and those whose whole knowledge of science has been obtained from the Haldeman-Julius publications, The Mercury, and the Sunday supplement are so emphatic that the scientific mind has no room for religion, are not the confessions of faith of the scholars quoted both justified and valuable from the negative viewpoint at least? Science is quoted as calling religion "bunk." Cannot science deny?

For Chicago Readers

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The Nation Club of Chicago meets every second and fourth Tuesday of the month at the Morrison Hotel. Here in Chicago we have a wealth of talent available in the way of speakers to make our gatherings interesting and intellectually stimulating. Our program committee is busy arranging far in advance meetings for speakers active in various fields, political, educational, literary, and dramatic.

We cordially invite all readers of The Nation in the Chicago area to join with us. The officers of the club are: President, Max Alper, 1532 North Kedzie Avenue; secretaries, Louis B. Cella, 127 North Mayfield Avenue, and Anna Cadkin, 5706 Wentworth Avenue.

The Croatian Crown

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The article entitled Yugoslavia at the Cross-Roads which you printed in your issue of September 19 contains an historical error, "From 1102, when, on the extinction of the Croat dynasty, Croatia entered into a 'personal union' with Hungary, the Magyar rulers became ipso facto kings of Croatia." So far is this from being the case that the Kotromanics dynasty reigned over Bosnia, Croatia, and the various countries constituting Western Yugoslavia uninterruptedly from 1163 to 1463, when the Turks at last succeeded in over-running the country. The last Kotromanic king made good his escape, and the family established itself in Russia.

The Iron Crown of Croatia was last worn by a Kotromanic. It is still preserved jealously by the Croats in Agram and they refused to hand it over to the Karageorge dynasty which at present reigns in Belgrade. In my presence, as it happens, a representative of the Croatian people not later than a few weeks ago formally admitted that this crown belonged to the Kotromanic dynasty in the person of its last living representative, Prince Alexander Dabisha-Kotromanic, who is a resident in Berlin. The Prince is a descendant in direct line of succession from the last king. His claims to the throne of his forebears are being put forward effectively just now.

The "certainty" with which Mr. G. E. R. Gedye asserts that "none of the leaders of the Croat revolt against Belgrade dreams of cutting adrift from Serbia" is merely evidence of a somewhat superficial judgment. It is evident that, with Serbian police and military in charge in Agram, the Agram leaders are not likely to proclaim from the housetops their full and ultimate intentions. That declaration will come in due time when it will be possible to back words by deeds.

The War Song

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: A "song plugger" who has attained a modest success in the theater may be as little expert as professional diplomats in gauging the social implications of "The War Song" current at the National Theater. But because of my great delight in participating in the proceedings, I am bound to testify that this curious play by the Spewacks has had upon at least one person connected with the undertaking a profoundly moving effect.

I speak, of course, out of a great ignorance of the textbook conception of social virtues. After all, one who has busied himself with writing and singing, in a small way, the nation's songs could not have been concerned too much with these elements that make for hatred and bitterness and distrust in the heart of man. Enough that he sang a little and made glad the heart a little—if he did.

But now, for the first time in my life, am I struck by the tremendous importance of the sort of thing we are doing on the stage of the National. "The War Song" presents a viewpoint on war that is certainly much this side of idolatry. It is not weighted down, to be sure, with the dead hand of propaganda, but it certainly portrays the senseless, futile recompenses war seeks to make for love of home, true love of country, and love of humanity.

That this is being done in a spirit of gentle irony and laughter, with here and there an indication of the tragic consequences of war, is, of course, I hope, no detractor from the sincerity with which "The War Song" is being presented. The laughter may not be Olympian (your correspondent and the authors may be more acquainted with Mt. Sinai or the Hill of Golgotha), but it is certainly out of hearts that beat with a generous wisdom.

Though our play deals with war, there is no hate in it. If I may say so, though we are in it, we are somewhat above the battle. If I know anything about such things, "The War Song" has clarity, urbanity, and wit. Having said so much, out of a glad heart, I shall say no more.

On Reviewing Books for Children

IT is, of course, impossible to review children's books. One can describe them and thrust them into convenient classifications for the relief of floundering parents and uncles and aunts. More than that is risky and usually absurd. It is as if some superperson from the fourth-dimensional world of Mr. Wells were to step across that shadowy borderline and begin writing reviews of Mr. Wells's books. Think how embarrassing—for Mr. Wells and for the rest of us! "But we like Mr. Wells," we would insist piteously. "Some of his books. Do let us keep 'Mr. Polly.' You can have 'William Clissold' and all of Mr. Wells's religions if you want." "I am sorry," the superperson would reply, "but you mustn't like them—not any of them. The novels of H. G. Wells are puerile, beneath the contemptuous notice of intelligent beings. Now Proust is better, if you must have novels; and, in the field of serious speculation, Einstein is a reputable thinker. Tentative, of course, floundering, but still reaching out. . . ."

So with children's books. We may approve this one and banish that, we may say that Howard Pyle wrote delightful tales and that Alger wrote nonsense. We may invent categories and attempt to set standards. All our efforts will appear irrelevant and often irritating to the beings of the world we have, half unconsciously, drifted out of. The best we can do is to accept humbly enough the verdict of children on books they have read and salt away what wisdom we can for reference in the Christmas shopping season.

One of the bits of wisdom I have learned is that categories do not exist for children—except perhaps such casual divisions as Books I Like and Books I Hate, or Books I Want to Read and Books I Have to Read. I can remember, for instance, my favorites at two or three different periods. When I was ten or twelve I liked better than any other books "Tom Sawyer" and "Huckleberry Finn." But I also consumed Howard Pyle's "Robin Hood," the Uncle Remus stories, a selection of ten-cent thrillers, the milky charms of Louisa M. Alcott, "Alice in Wonderland," and—with an almost anthropological zest—Hamlin Garland's "Boy Life on the Prairie." When I was in high school I read everything written by Jane Austen, all the novels of George Meredith, and also, with a passionate thirst, the works of Robert W. Chambers, Richard Harding Davis, and Anthony Hope. I am certain that these books, in spite of the judgments of my elders, were to me merely unclassified pleasures. They fell into no categories of major and minor, no divisions as to kind and method, manner and style. I simply liked them. Tentacles of curiosity and emotional need reached out and gathered them in to certain dim ends of satisfaction and delight. This promiscuous attitude of children was illustrated by a comment my nine-year-old son made to me the other day. I urged upon him the virtues of a certain book. "Well," he said, "I bet it isn't as good as 'Winnie-the-Pooh' or 'Trains, Tracks, and Travel.'"

Children should review children's books. This is largely impossible since most children not only decline to classify but remain stubbornly inarticulate about the reasons for their likes and dislikes. They label books with appropriate epithets—"interesting," "exciting," "slow"—and consider the job of criticism done. Perhaps it is; perhaps all criticism is only an elaboration of those words; in any case they are all we shall get from them. The best we can hope to do, then, is to listen to the opinions of those elders who have listened most attentively to the opinions of children. Some parents, some teachers, some librarians, a few writers who are none of these, have been wise enough to suppress their own critical dogmas and forget their own preferences. They have set down, and perhaps tried to analyze for wider use, the preferences of those who must ultimately be the consumers of books written for children. But even they must not be taken too seriously!

This Year's Crop

I WAS brought up on Palmer Cox's Brownies, and Tenniel's pictures for Alice, Linley Sambourne's illustrations for Water Babies, and Doré's Dante: strange and hardy fare that still keeps its flavor. But for all that, the picture books of the nineties compare with 1928's, as the single bitter but exciting grapefruit of Sunday breakfast then compares with the monstrous, tropically sweet and yellow offerings of every day in the week now.

True, this year, as usual, there are a number of undistinguished, false, and gawdy picture books, with insipid tales inside and rhymes that are worse than chopsticks played on an out-of-tune piano. The illusion dies hard with some publishers that a would-be author who has nothing to say to adults and no glamorous words to his bow can always earn victuals by a book for "the kiddies." But the bad books do not matter.

There are so many good ones this year, so many which are not only distinguished contributions in themselves but portents of better and better things next year, that in this one field at least I believe the dull will perish, and beauty shine.

The new lists are full of experiment: the cheaper books, within their limitations, have been made with the same feeling for line and design, humor and savor of text, as the expensive ones. The children's books in the five-and-ten-cent stores are still without style and spirit; but the cheaper counters of the department stores will carry thousands of the Macmillan fifty-cent books. "Three Little Kittens" in that series, by Kurt Wiese, begins to show the freedom in playing with typography and bold use of yellow, green, and purple ink that makes European picture books, especially the Russian ones, so amusing. Mary Lott Seaman's "Golden Goose," in the same series, is another bolt from conventional treatment. The artists are beginning to have fun on these jobs, and this is the beginning of health in any creative field.

Neither of these compares with Peggy Bacon's "Mercy and the Mouse" (Macmillan, $2) or Wanda Gag's "Millions of Cats" (a tale that will last as long as Grimm or Anderson), but the social significance of such yeasty efforts in the cheaper books is bound to alter the base of children's book publishing. It induces technical experiment on a large scale, it joins and encourages the schoolbook publishers who are considering the possibility of color printing. Those children who are slow to the word and pricked by graphic representation will have yet their full measure of schooling.

—By Boris Artzybasheff from

Peggy Bacon has followed her "The Lion-Hearted Kitten" of last year with a tale of careerist adventure about a kitten who was "soft and gray like the dust under the bed, with eyes like huckleberries and whiskers like a thistle." Mercy had charm and S. A. to start with, of course, but the story of her cunning rise from cellar to parlor is told with the saltiness of Aesop. I promise you that no child who is introduced early enough to Mercy will live to believe all the personality stuff in the American Magazine. Nor will Nell Brinkley take any of the attention of a child bred to look at the amazing family scenes in which Mercy moves. Peggy Bacon's second book this fall is "Songs for New Voices" ($5), a group of poems chosen by Louis Untermeyer, for which David and Clara Mannes have selected the music. Harcourt, Brace are to be congratulated on the book not only as a contribution to the musical education of the next generation, but as a piece of book-making.

—By Helen Sewall from

They seem to have made no stipulations with the artist, but left her entirely free to decorate rather than illustrate the book, and the result has been another mile-post passed in American book-making.

"Millions of Cats" (Coward, McCann, $1.25) is as important as the librarians say it is. Not only does it bring to book-making one of the most talented and original of American lithographers, an artist who has a following both here and abroad, but it is a marriage of picture and tale that is perfectly balanced. And the story pattern, so cunningly devised with such hearty and moral simplicity, is told in a prose as skilful as jingle. "Cats here, cats there, cats and kittens everywhere, hundreds of cats, thousands of cats, millions and billions and trillions of cats." Easily the best novel since Cinderella, in that genre.

Lou Rogers in her "The Rise of the Red Alders" (Harper's, $2.50) make another hearty contribution to children's literature; and again there is that happy, firm-knit quality about the book that comes from having text and pictures done by a two-handed talent. It is a pleasure, too, to have a book for children into which the author has poured all her knowledge of the world, so that, really, what Lou Rogers has learned in suffrage campaigns and on soap-boxes and in tenements and on Connecticut hills enriches the beaver society, with its plots, complots, and wars that she writes about with such swiftness and warmth.

—By Peggy Bacon from
"Mercy and the Mouse"

"City Stories" (Macmillan, $2), told by the Lincoln School children, and edited by two of their teachers, is an interesting experiment, and is equally appealing to the young and to their parents. Jacket and end papers are by child artists and the illustrations by Helene Carter. I was astonished to discover that the children had such fine ears and such relish for city noises, and a talent for inventing words to record that relish. This book is by far the best I know which tells about modern city life, simply.

Longmans, Green have republished "The Pig Tale of Ah Lee Ben Lou" ($3.50) and other tales by John Bennett whose "Master Skylark" is classic, a big thick book with the old lively silhouettes by the author; and David MacKay has given new life to "The Legend of Sleepy Hollow" ($2.50) by adding Arthur Rackham illustrations and making a magnificent book. I expected not to like it, but the illustrations are simpler than Rackham has lately seemed to be, less sugar and fewer twined lines. James Daugherty's illustrated edition of Irving's "Knickerbocker History" (Doubleday, Doran, $3) is another payment of effective homage to a classic.

Collectors of children's books, and in Europe there are as many connoisseurs of these as of old lace, will not miss "Ghond the Hunter" (Dutton, $2.50), by Dhan Gopal Mukerji, a tale of birds and beasts in the jungle and in Hindu villages, and "The Fairy Shoemaker" (Macmillan, $2), by William Allingham, which also includes poems by Walter de la Mare and "The Forsaken Merman," by Matthew Arnold. Both

—By Wanda Gag from

are illustrated by the designs of Boris Artzybasheff, which continue to remind one of fine things like old Castilian tortoise-shell combs, gold brooches of the Renaissance, and cobwebs at morning.

Berta and Elmer Hader's pictures for Cornelia Meigs's "The Wonderful Locomotive" (Macmillan, $2) have a thoroughly American flavor. Helen Sewell's beautiful designs for "Menagerie" (Macmillan, $2), a collection of rather bread-and-butter animal poems by Mary Britton Miller, are as fine as Artzybasheff's and have more warmth. Miss Sewell is already well known for her etchings. One by one the best artists of the day are making books. Importations, like Harper's editions of Elsa Beskow's tales for Swedish children, further enrich the shelves.

There has never been any broad market in America for prints. But a generation of children served as this one is being served, may develop new sensibilities.

I HAVE to go on the theory that poems which are good for children are good for adults, and that while the reverse cannot be altogether true it is nevertheless true within the limits set by the experience and comprehension of children—whatever those limits are. In other words, I am unwilling to say of a given poem written for children that while I do not like it myself I can conceive of its being suited to its purpose. There would be no end to concession that way, and there would be, I think, no end of harm done. Undoubtedly many children prefer bad poetry to good, just as most adults do. But this does not mean that anyone, old or young, should surrender his judgment. And I suspect that in the world of good poetry there is no clear distinction between youth and age.

When, for instance, is one expected to cease enjoying Blake's "Songs of Innocence," from which Pamela Bianco's selection is taken; or when to begin enjoying them? I do not know. I only know that they are among the best of English poems, and that since they are simple, at least on the surface, they must be good for children as well as for the scholars who happen to be so busy these days finding evidence that Blake drew in them the first mature lines of his philosophy. I know, too, that I was bored by Pamela Bianco's silly prefatory letter to "Dear Mr. Blake" explaining why she executed the volume; and suspect therefore that it will bore the kind of children I like. The illustrations, though thin and mannered, are by no means silly. But they could not quite make me forget the letter to Mr. Blake.

Mr. Rhys's "Book of Nonsense" places me again on safe ground, for surely it is safe to praise the poems of Edward Lear, Lewis Carroll, and Mother Goose. The question, however, is whether this is a good collection for children. My answer, since it gave me great delight, is that it is. I know no other collection of the kind which is so rich in both poems and pictures, and which is so perfectly printed. Edward Lear's absolutely outrageous drawings are here as well as his absolutely foolish limericks. We get Lewis Carroll, unfortunately, without Tenniel; but get in a later section fresh wealth in the form of two German works by Heinrich Hoffmann, brightly translated and charmingly garnished with what I take to be Teutonic illustrations; and get to boot some of Munchausen's tales in prose, besides pages of miscellanies too varied to describe.

As to the new books judgment is more difficult—or would be if I did not pursue my own prejudices through them. "Jane, Be Good!" arouses, with its crude, preposterous drawings and its ultra-simple verses, my prejudice in favor of absurdity. It is on the plane of absurdity, I fancy, that child and adult can most profitably meet—and who is there to say that this whole question of poetry for children is not simply a question as to how old and young readers may manage to agree? Mrs. Austin's volume seems to me to succeed best in those portions where she has forgotten her purpose, which was, beginning forty years ago when she taught school in the West, to provide for her pupils native poems that kept "the child's approach and the child's feeling for the movement proper to his thought." My suspicion is that no one is wise enough to do such a thing. At any rate, I find Tamalpais, In Papagueria, Dead Water, Seven Rhyming Riddles, and the group of Indian Songs altogether worthy of their very gifted author, whereas I am not attracted by those other pieces in which she has labored to "keep the child's approach."

AFTER I had examined these large, splendid, brightly illustrated volumes I turned to a little book less than six inches square, a facsimile published nearly a quarter of a century ago of the first edition of "The Only True Mother Goose Melodies, without addition or abridgment, embracing, also, a reliable Life of the Goose Family, never before published," which volume first made its appearance ninety-five years ago. And for two hundred years before that children had been soothed with rhymes of Little Jack Horner and Little Boy Blue, of Taffy who was both a Welshman and a thief, and of Mr. and Mrs. Jack Spratt who so successfully arranged their domestic affairs. Contemporary endeavors to improve on these verses, which have become as deeply interwoven into common life as has Ecclesiastes, are always a little pathetic. Let them be as highly colored as they may, they are the old verses still. They will never be any better, for they do not need to be, and they have an integrity and permanence that forbids them ever to be any worse.

This is not to say that pictures may not sometimes be illuminating and desirable. Mr. Pogany has a portrait of Miss Cross Patch sitting by the fire that should make any child more cheerful—or rather, as an awful example, less cross. And by contrary, his Curly Locks, who was required neither to wash dishes nor feed the swine, is depicted seated on a very large, very downy cushion, with a ravishing plate of strawberries and cream at her left elbow. Of the great class of handsome books, this one is unusually satisfying. The other two books are games with Mother Goose rhymes—moving-picture cut-outs for the proverbial rainy day and a history of a circus whose performers are characters from Mistress Goose's troupe. D. ADVENTURE! That high life, that soaring of spirit! But probably the lowest possible ebb of spirits comes while one examines the adventure books of the current season for boys and girls. For most of them there is a set formula compounded of a fair proportion of life on the bounding waves, pirates, the high road, warfare, loot, murder, with a dash of love, honor, and mystery. Historical backgrounds or action set in another country give a special value to a few of the books, chiefly because the pioneer periods in history have fired the imagination of the children of our over-civilized age and they rejoice in tales of earlier and more strenuous times.

Among these are the romantic if harsh tales of the "Knights of Charlemagne" by Ula W. Echols, and the "Tartan Tales from Andrew Lang," also warlike; the ecclesiastically tinged tale of "Edwy the Fair" of Saxon England during the raids of the Danes by A. D. Crake, and of "Wulmoth the Wanderer," of the same setting, by H. Escott-Inman; and Andrew Lang's "The Conquest of Montezuma's Empire," a fiery tale of early Mexico vigorously illustrated by James Daugherty. To all of these writers adventure comes in the shape of an armored warrior atop a swift riding horse.

"Lenape Trails," by Clifton Lisle, and "Andy Breaks Trail," by Constance Lindsay Skinner, have a frontier background of our own country. "Halsey of the West Indies" and "Bradford on Mt. Washington" are two of the latest additions to the Putnam juveniles written by authors under a prescribed age limit. They have the merit of freshness and eagerness. "Martin Johnson, Lion Hunter," by Fitzhugh Green, is probably the best of the lot, because it is a simple direct story of natural elements, animals, hunting, and the wilder Africa.

Fundamentally the books on adventure are a travesty on the term. Tawdry attempts of jaded adults to build up through a quickly changing tempo of action an excitement that may pass for adventure. Nowhere even a suggestion that adventure may emanate from within, that its genuineness may rest on its inner urgency, that, "One man with a dream, at pleasure, Shall go forth and conquer a crown."

What do you know about the "damned Bolsheviki"?

Everybody is talking about Russia! Wherever you go, you hear someone discussing "the Roosians", the "dirty Bolsheviki". And everywhere you meet misinformation. Whether they are right or wrong, the Russians today are carrying on the most important political and economic experiment of our times. Yet few people know the details of this experiment. Will you pay fifty cents to learn?

Will you pay only fifty cents for an impartially and simply written book about the present situation in Russia? The Vanguard books are newly printed, on fine paper and bound in quality cloth. You can buy them for only fifty cents. In this series of eleven books about the Russia of today, you find a fairness which is in none of the biased books about Russia; you find expert research, beautiful writing, simple ideas simply expressed, and a mine of information.

The truth — the whole truth — about Russia!

Here, in eleven compact little volumes, the unbiased, impartial truth about Russia is told. And for the very first time! Roger Baldwin, of our own American Civil Liberties Union, has written the most illuminating and most fascinating account of the present position of the individual in Russia, Liberty Under the Soviets. H. N. Brailsford, one of the world's most famous experts in economics, has set forth a trustworthy and obviously fair account of the actual working of the Russian government, How The Soviets Work. These are stimulating books, written cogently and in simple language. Each of them sells for only fifty cents.

And the other aspects of life in Russia are reviewed in this series, with equal simplicity, equal impartiality. Scott Nearing's book is called The Economic Organization of the Soviet Union. A book by Avrahm Yarmolinsky is The Jews in Soviet Russia. There is a book about women, Women in Soviet Russia, by Jessica Smith. Religion, Village Life, Health Work, The Schools, all are fully and delightfully and impartially discussed in the books which form The Vanguard Studies of Soviet Russia.

Send now for those of these books which interest you. Get for yourself the truth—the whole truth—about the "damned Bolsheviki"!

Children's Books in Brief

Juniper Farm. By René Bazin. Translation by Margery Bianco. The Macmillan Company. $1.75. (Ages 8-12.)

A distinguished French author has made a simple and convincing record of French peasant life. Said the father of four little peasant children: "Isn't it a fine thing to be happy, Marie?" "It certainly is," she replied, "but it's a lot of bother, just the same!" The book's keynote lies in the willing acceptance of responsibilities, and in the old-fashioned teaching of them by farm life.

A Hat Tub Tale. By Caroline Emerson. Illustrated by Lois Lenski. E. P. Dutton and Company. $2. (Ages 6-10.)

This is a book which the author probably had great fun writing, and Lois Lenski still more illustrating, but which only certain children will have fun reading. The qualities toward which its somewhat conscious humor is directed—greediness, selfishness, untidiness, and such—would make a child squirm even while laughing and that is always an uncomfortable form of exercise. The book has imagination and inventiveness and shows familiarity with childish foibles.

Castles in Spain. By Bertha L. Gunterman. Longmans, Green and Company. $2.50. (Ages 9-15.)

Here are collected a group of interesting legends. The material is original and striking, and the Spanish atmosphere and feeling most successfully maintained throughout the book without any undue straining toward ultra-exotic language.

The Story of Youth. By Lothrop Stoddard. Cosmopolitan. $2.50. (Ages 12-16.)

This book will appeal to many adults and to some analytical and inquiring young people. It presents interesting views of the position young people have held in the world during various historical epochs—the Babylonian, Viking, Elizabethan, Georgian, and many others. It treats such fascinating subjects as the Children's Crusade, the whipping masters, medieval childhood, child-labor abuses, chimney-sweeps. An unusual historical background and a fine literary equipment make this book distinct and original.

Nine Short Plays. Edited by M. Jagendorf. The Macmillan Company. $2.50. (Ages 10-15.)

Many have asked the question put in Mr. Jagendorf's preface: "Why are there no children's plays equal in sensitive beauty to Blake's and Stevenson's children's poems?" Unfortunately this collection does not begin to answer that question. It is difficult to judge the acting value of a play by reading it, but these themes appear banal, the characters insipid. Those familiar with the field of children's plays have been sufficiently bored by dreams, seasons, toys, and columbines. Mr. Jagendorf's own play of "Merry Tyll" and, possibly, "The Bean Bag," by Towle Adair, are the only ones of any apparent dramatic value.

Plays for People and Puppets. By Catharine Reighard. E. P. Dutton and Company. $2.50. (Ages 10-15.)

Very different is this collection. Making no strained or hackneyed efforts at originality, "The King of The Golden River," "Rumpelstiltskin," "Aladdin," and similar fine fantasies and fairy tales have been dramatized in such a way that they are invested with additional vitality and artistic worth. Details of scenery, properties, lighting, and bibliography have been worked out by an experienced and careful hand.

The Rose and The Ring. By W. M. Thackeray. Brentano's. $2. (Ages 12-15.)

A new edition of a most beloved satire, with illustrations by J. H. Tinker. These show the influence of Arthur Rackham and, here and there, of Heath Robinson. Silhouettes, while good, do

The Treasure of Carcassonne. By Robida. Longmans, Green and Company. $2. (Ages 8-12.)

Rather an amusing tale of an impractical troubadour whose dream, after many ruefully humorous adventures, finally does assume reality.

Don. By Zane Grey. Harper and Brothers. 75 cents. (Ages 12-16.)

This is one of the Harper Round Table reprints of old favorites—a sketch barely as long as "Rab and His Friends." Lovers of long short-stories as well as lovers of dogs will appreciate this well-told tale of a thoroughbred hound.

Adventures in Afghanistan. By Lowell Thomas. The Century Company. $2. (Ages 12-16.)

Lowell Thomas's place as an adventure writer for boys seems to grow surer with each volume. His narrative appears more thrilling than ever, and his trip through the wilds of Baluchistan, Waziristan, and the Khyber Pass with such companions as Chase, his intrepid cameraman, and Y. B., who became "so thrilled he could scarcely keep his monocle in his eye," will be followed with the usual absorbed interest by even more than the usual number of boys.

The Count of Monte Cristo. By Alexander Dumas. Dodd, Mead and Company. $3.50. (Ages 12-18.)

The illustrations in this beautiful new edition are by Mead Schaffer, and never has he done better work. He will be remembered by his illustrations for "Moby Dick," "Omoo," "Typee," "The Cruise of the Cachelot," and other favorites.

Where It All Comes True: In Italy and Switzerland. Experiences and Observations of Betty and Mary as related by their aunt, Clara E. Laughlin. Houghton Mifflin Company. $2.50. (Ages 12-16.)

This book is a welcome contrast to the recent flood of books by children for children. It has been carefully edited by a discerning aunt, and while it presents a trip through Italy and Switzerland from Betty's and Mary's point of view, it has been enriched by the ample collaboration of Clara Laughlin.

20 Hours, 40 Minutes: Our Flight in The Friendship. By Amelia Earhart. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $2.

A simple and straightforward narrative of a great achievement, stamped with the modesty, quiet humor, and keen intelligence of its famous author.

Flying With Lindbergh. By Donald Keyhoe. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $2.50.

Until now Lindbergh has been, despite the efforts of innumerable reporters, more of a symbol than a human being. His aide, Keyhoe, gives us a quiet account of the recent tour of the United States, under the auspices of the Guggenheim Foundation, with many glimpses of Lindbergh which seem to bring him closer.

The House at Pooh Corner. By A. A. Milne. E. P. Dutton and Company. $2.50.

Since this volume ten days after publication was in its fifty-first edition there seems to be nothing one can say for or against it which will be of the slightest use or interest to anybody. "The House at Pooh Corner" might be called the "Abie's Irish Rose" of juvenile literature if it were not for the fact that, with all its unrestrained whimsy, it is a nice little book. The gloomy and sardonic Eeyore is by far the most attractive character in it.

Early Days in Ohio. By Florence M. Everson and Effie Power. E. P. Dutton and Company. $2.

The idea of describing pioneer life in the form of fiction is excellent. But the fiction must be interesting as well as realistic; and there is no need to "write down" to the intellects of young readers. "Early Days in Ohio," in spite of the alluring subject and of the attempt to make the writing friendly and pleasantly juvenile, is merely dull. And children are twice as impatient of dullness as their elders.

Engines. By E. N. daC. Andrade. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $3.

This is the sort of book that boys—and, thanks to our modern education, girls also in some cases—sit up nights over. There is no attempt at making the subject "attractive"; if you want to know about engines you will read this book and find out. The language is clear, the explanations and diagrams are simple and practical, the plates are many and interesting. Mr. Andrade has forgotten that he was writing to please boys and girls and has merely tried to be explicit. And nothing could please them more.

A Child's Story of Civilization. By Stephen King-Hall. William Morrow and Company. $3.

"You can imagine the story of the world to be like a huge plum cake. You are not big enough to eat it all; it would give you a tummy ache; but we can pick out the plums." Thus Mr. King-Hall urges his young readers to commence his confection; and with all due respect to his physiological wisdom, one would wager a large sum that almost any child would prefer Mr. H. G. Wells, and certainly Hendrik van Loon, even including the indigestible portions.

Fiction and Biography Shorts

Charlotte Löwensköld. By Selma Lagerlöf. Translated from the Swedish by Velma Swanston Howard. Doubleday, Page and Company. 1927. $2.50.

It is a far cry from the "Story of Gösta Berling," which took the world by storm in 1891, to this the latest novel of its authoress. What was then a daring plunge into the deep and alluring waters of mystical romanticism has gradually with her become an habitual mode of attack bordering on mannerism. Worse, the charming and unsought naivete of her earlier productions, which yet valiantly tackled ugly realities and somehow transmuted them, as in "The Emperor of Portugallia," has degenerated into a veritable Victorian squeamishness. It must be said, too, that the loosely episodic structure that was so admirably adapted to the grand epic theme of "Jerusalem" is ill suited to the recital of how a full-blooded, independent girl is weaned from her absorbing devotion to a handsome young clergyman who develops into a religious egotist and cad. The famous authoress will not lose many of her host of admirers through this book, precisely because it is ostensibly in her accustomed manner. But the discerning among them will grieve that she has not seen fit to rest on her well-earned laurels.

Respectability. By Bohun Lynch. Little, Brown and Company. $2.50.

A saga of upper-middle-class English life, written by an English novelist and critic who deserves to be better known in America. We are taken into the inner recesses of the minds and souls of influential hypocrites and smut hounds whose American brothers are to be found in the novels of Sinclair Lewis, the Watch and Ward Society, and the Anti-Saloon League. We are the privileged spectators at the trial and conviction of a distinguished book of essays, carried through in true blue Bostonian fashion. All this and much more indicates the fellowship in folly of the English-speaking world.

Juggler's Kiss. By Manuel Komroff. Boni and Liveright. $2.50.

A puzzling Faustian allegory by one of the more eminent members of the Bewildered School of American fiction, founded by Sherwood Anderson and still marching on to victory—in the reviews. The virtues of this story of the life-defeat of Dundee are its sincerity, its naivete, and its racy narrative flow, observable only in the occasional episodes which wander vaguely in and out of the loose texture of the book. Its fatal defect is that it sounds like an improvisation; the story blunders about in exactly the same way as its hero. Manuel Komroff, like his master, is an excellent short-story writer; in his first novel we have imbedded a few haunting tales of strange trades and adventures; for the rest nothing but a confused series of brief, dissolving views.

Mary Lee. By Geoffrey Dennis. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

This is a reissue of the original edition of 1924. It is mentioned here because so few people seem to be aware that in Mr. Dennis we have one of the few authentic novelists writing in English today. One or two critics have already noted the magnificent originality of "Mary Lee"; possibly, with its reissue, Mr. Dennis's all-too-scanty audience may enlarge to respectable proportions.

Blake's Innocence and Experience. A Study of the Songs and Manuscripts "Shewing the Two Contrary States of the Human Soul." By Joseph H. Wicksteed. E. P. Dutton and Company. $8.

Mr. Wicksteed in this complete and beautiful volume lavishes upon the "simple" poems of Blake the same commentator's care that has until now been the lot only of the prophetic books to receive. Reproducing opposite the text of each poem in "Songs of Innocence" and "Songs of Experience" the engraved page as Blake left it (though, except in four cases, without color), and closing with a facsimile of the famous "MS. of Experience," he has supplied a text much to be desired by all who were not able to afford the expensive editions. But in addition he has done much to illuminate the deeper meanings of Blake's superficially ingenuous songs. There is a danger here, of course. But Mr. Wicksteed has avoided it, and in general has thrown much light on the already shining surfaces of the younger Blake. The poems, as he points out, are of such stuff as will endure examination. His own examination, based upon a special study of Blake's experience in love and marriage, seems likely in turn to endure.

Life and I: an Autobiography of Humanity. By Gamaliel Bradford. Houghton Mifflin Company. $3.50.

Mr. Bradford's biographical writings have invariably revealed a strong bent toward weak philosophizing. This latest volume summarizes his always amiable but never profound reflections on "the general I that fills and makes the world." And here again, as in his biographies, his writing is irritatingly adequate—so adequate that one never becomes excited enough to protest or applaud. One is mildly entertained or mildly bored.

La Vie de Stendhal. Par Paul Hazard. Paris: Nouvelle Revue Française. 12 francs.

The French Academy recently awarded one of its numerous prizes to Paul Hazard for the collectivity of his work. His two new biographies, the "Lamartine" and this "Stendhal," are competent and readable little volumes, not brilliant—Rod's "Stendhal" is much livelier and crisper—but arriving, by dint of many careful and affectionate touches, at an appealing and satisfying portrait. As befits a number in a series labeled "Vies des Hommes illustres," the book deals much more with "Vie" than with "Oeuvres." But surely no study of the man Beyle is complete without some detailed account of the work, since in this case, even more than with most writers, it is the works, and not the queer freak of a man, that have lived.

DOES the new Sacco-Vanzetti evidence fire your indignation?

Then you will want to re-read the story of their last hours as told in Let Freedom Ring by Arthur Garfield Hays, gallant crusader in the battle for civil liberty.

He tells with fearless candor and compelling enthusiasm the fascinating stories behind this and other vital law cases of today, such as the Scopes Anti-Evolution trial, the American Mercury case, the Sweet Murder trial and others.

The book will amaze you by its sheer excitement. It is easier to read than any novel and much more thrilling. And its bitterness is mellowed by a tender humanity and a rich gift of humor.

The Leaderless Orchestra

ASSEMBLED on the stage of Carnegie Hall, on Saturday evening, November 3, eighty musicians gave the first orchestral concert to take place in America without the guidance of a conductor. Whether or not they wrote the opening lines in a new chapter of musical history remains to be seen. Certainly they demonstrated in an all-Beethoven program, comprising the Eroica Symphony, the violin concerts with Max Rosen as soloist, and the Egmont Overture, that it is possible to give a clear, precise, and balanced performance of the classics without the aid of the familiar stick in the hand of the leader.

Since the organization of the Moscow "Persimfans" (an abbreviation of the Russian for First Symphonic Ensemble) six years ago, five other conductorless orchestras have appeared in Russia, as well as those in Leipzig and Berne. According to report, they have successfully challenged the traditions and conventions of more than a century and it has been said that they will in time mean the passing of the virtuoso with the baton. This one must doubt—at least for our city. For, after all, in a music-surfeited town like New York, concert audiences are more than familiar with the literal text of the Eroica. What interests them is the illuminating rendition of the Eroica made possible by the genius of a Toscanini. The faithful transcription of the score given by the American Symphonic Ensemble was refreshingly free of the exaggeration that a great work too often suffers at the hands of a lesser man anxious to impress audience and orchestra with his individuality and originality. For this one was profoundly grateful. On the other hand, one was not always conscious of the intimate communion with the spirit of the music, the awe-inspiring revelation of the real Beethoven, that only the soul of a supreme musician can evoke.

This is not meant in any way to belittle the amazing achievement of these eighty men, whose performance was a logical protest against exhibitionism on the podium and should be a lesson to worshipers of graceful gestures and beautifully tailored backs.

In almost every article on leaderless orchestras mention has been made of the fact that the idea, essentially Russian in its inception, is a form of musical communism. The truth would seem to be quite the opposite. Under a conductor each player must remain part of a beautifully balanced organism, his own individuality repressed or released only in so far as the dictator deems necessary for the common good. In a symphonic ensemble a large measure of responsibility rests with each man who must necessarily be familiar with the whole score and more particularly with his own cues. Interpretations are decided upon by a committee chosen to represent all the players, and suggestions by any participant are welcome. This might be called musical democracy, but hardly communism, which theoretically, I believe, would demand a dictatorship of the rear desks. Indeed had the rear desks followed Mr. Stassevitch's glances and movements less accurately on Saturday night we might have missed the uncanny precision, which to the ordinary listener, accustomed to following a symphony concert partly with the eye, seemed almost to savor of black magic.

From an economic point of view one wonders whether an orchestra that requires sixteen rehearsals for a single concert can pay its way. As Mr. Villard, Editor of The Nation and former president of the New York Philharmonic Society, told the audience, the American Symphonic Ensemble has no "angel," no backing of any kind. Only a very active popular response to their enthusiasm and idealism can make possible the permanent existence of the organization. Let us hope that they will find that response. They have amply deserved it. And let us also hope that these pioneers will inspire other companies of musicians in smaller towns, where the prohibitive salaries paid to star conductors have hitherto made symphony orchestras impossible, to band together for the study of scores and to found symphonic ensembles of their own. It will mean a higher standard of musicianship throughout the country, a saner goal for most students than the already overcrowded concert platform, and perhaps the first real step in the making of a nation of true music lovers.

Logic and Love

SAMSON RAPHAELSON'S "Young Love" (Theater Masque) left Chicago amid shouts of moral indignation. One reviewer there had called it "such a play as Leopold and Loeb might have written" and most of the others had protested that they, at least, had never heard of any goings-on as scandalous as those represented in the offending play. Under the circumstances New York had every reason to expect something horrendous, but New York failed to make allowance for the cloistered lives led by Middle Western newspapermen. It seems that no one out there had ever heard that in this abandoned age of ours young people have been known to consummate marriages before having them celebrated, or that husbands of ten years' standing have been known to make what Chicago newspapers no doubt call "improper advances" to girls younger than themselves. They were not at all reconciled by the fact that the play has a most admirable moral, and they are gasping yet at the audacity of a playwright who would choose such a subject. To those who, like them, believe that only the diseased imagination of a decadent author could conceive a series of events so scandalous, "Young Love" will doubtless afford that peculiar kind of pleasure which many people take in being shocked; to others who have heard rumors that in parts of this country less pure than Chicago people have been known to do things almost as deplorable, it will seem, on the contrary, a very neat little comedy.

The initial situation is as follows: Two young people, thoroughly au courant with the adolescent liberalism of our "younger generation," fall romantically in love. Like all in their condition, they are sure that no human beings ever felt what they feel until, in a moment of folly which they mistake for courageous frankness, they confess to one another that each has felt himself, in spite of his great love, just a little moved by the gallant advances of an older person. Can it be that they are mistaken about the ineffable and eternal nature of their passion for one another? Neither is willing to enter upon anything which promises to be merely a marriage like any other, and the girl, absurdly logical, proposes a test. Each had best yield to the temptation which he has felt and then decide whether or not they really love one another as no two people ever loved before.

Now granted this initial situation—and I for one am quite willing to confess, even at the risk of being thought to have consorted with particularly depraved people, that I have heard of compacts quite as preposterous as this one gravely entered into by very earnest young people—the question remains how it is to be treated upon the stage. The real difficulty is not a moral but an artistic one. The story so inevitably suggests the lurid preachments of the Sunday supplement that it is very hard to conceive of it in any other terms, and the problem of the playwright is the problem of treating it from some angle not obviously moronic. This problem the author has successfully solved and he deserves, so it seems to me, no little credit for having done so. Carefully avoiding all the abundant opportunities for mock tragedy and tabloid sermonizing he has grasped the fact that the heroine is neither a solemn warning of the depravity to be expected from children of the jazz age nor a pioneer experimenter in the realm of rational sex ethics, but merely a fool of that particular sort who makes comedy—one of those, that is to say, who supposes that people will feel rationally about a plan which they have rationally thought out. And having grasped that essential fact he has proceeded to evolve a very convincing as well as amusing series of complications which lead finally to debacle just serious enough to satisfy the requirements of comedy. For when the smoke has cleared away the young lovers go away together convinced that they will "live happily ever after" but obviously destined to do no such thing.

For some reason or other it is always the playwrights who adopt an already established formula who get all the credit for theatrical dexterity. "Young Love" is as neat in its working out as the most conventional dramatic exercise could possibly be and yet there is not a single situation which developed according to the tried and true recipes of the stage "technician." Ten times as much real dexterity went to the writing of it as is required for the handling of a conventional plot and I see no reason why the author should not be given credit for the fact. Dorothy Gish heads an excellent cast.

Noel Coward's revue, "This Year of Grace" (Selwyn Theater) has Beatrice Lillie and Mr. Coward himself as stars. All that can be said of the superiority of the English revue over the American has been said many times. And only part of it is true. There is one excellent satiric scene, the English Lido, and one fine specialty number called Dance, Little Lady, but the chorus is really very bad and much that is usually described as "intimate" or "refined" is only thin. At its best "This Year of Grace" has touches of superior work. At its worst it is faintly reminiscent of an entertainment arranged by the curate for the benefit of the Village Improvement Society.

"Tin-Pan Alley" (Biltmore Theater) is another night-club play with Claudette Colbert as the pure and much-wronged heroine.

“Die Wacht am Rhein”

By EMIL LENGYEL

TEN years after the armistice ex-enemy soldiers are standing in German territory. At the Rhineland conference which took place in Geneva in the middle of September the German Chancellor, Herr Hermann Müller, asked for the immediate evacuation of the left bank of the Rhine occupied by the Allied troops. He based his argument on the fact that the Reich complied with its obligations resulting from the Treaty of Versailles, is executing the Dawes Plan, is a member of the Council of the League of Nations, and a signatory to the Locarno and Paris pacts. The Chancellor, furthermore, invoked the obligation of the Allies to evacuate the Rhineland under Article 431 of the Treaty of Versailles which stipulates that “if before the expiration of the period of fifteen years Germany complies with the undertakings resulting from the treaty the Allied army of occupation should be withdrawn.”

The Treaty of Versailles set up on the right bank of the Rhine a demilitarized zone, fifty kilometers wide, where no German fortifications and military garrisons may be maintained. Inside this zone there is a strip of ten kilometers which is a neutral zone, a No Man's Land. These are the “permanent zones” intended to safeguard France from German attack.

On the left bank of the Rhine there are three “temporary zones,” to be occupied by Allied forces for five to fifteen years. The northernmost zone with Cologne as its center was evacuated in December, 1925. The two other zones with Coblenz and Mayence as their centers are to be evacuated in 1930 and 1935. The occupation of these territories was to guarantee the execution of the financial clauses of the treaty.

On September 16 the representatives of the six interested Powers, Great Britain, France, Italy, Japan, Belgium, and Germany, reached an agreement to the effect that, as the communiqué to the press says, “official negotiations will be opened relative to the demand of the Chancellor of the Reich in regard to the earlier evacuation of the Rhineland.” The good impression created by this sentence is more than counter-balanced by the following two sentences which speak of a heavy price for the early evacuation. As a quid pro quo the Allies insist on the definitive regulation of the reparation question by a committee of experts designated by the six governments. Moreover, to disable the Germans from preparing for war in the Rhineland a military Control Commission will be appointed.

The unfavorable outcome of the Geneva conversations shocked the entire Reich. The liberal newspapers began to lament the end of the era of Locarno. Germania, organ of the Catholic Center Party and a staunch proponent of the republic, hinted of an international calamity. It could not conceive that the winner of the Nobel Peace Prize, M. Briand, in whom Republican Germany had hoped to find the apostle of a new religion, should stage a revival of the dismal days of 1923. The reactionaries of the Stahlhelm reminded Germany by the organization of a mass parade that their policy was right. Even the cautious Minister of National Defense, General Groener, found the time opportune for indulging in a little saber-rattling and asked for equal rights in competitive armament. At the same time Marshal Hindenburg blew the bugle of high nationalism in Upper Silesia. The Reich discovered that the days when the Vossische Zeitung could write so confidently about the Franco-German peace alliance had receded into the dim past. The day has come for the friends of “spite-alliances.” The political Who's Who began to scan the horizon for the foes of France and it did not require much scanning to find them. Communist Russia has once more become the pet of the anti-Communist newspapers of Germany.

In the face of the spontaneous outburst of disgust the French intrenched themselves behind a diehard intransigence. For the first time in many years the ultra-Fascist Figaro and the radical l'Oeuvre found themselves in the same boat. With the exception of the Communist l'Humanité and the Socialist Le Populaire, the Paris press displayed the greatest enthusiasm for the policy of M. Briand. They all sang the same refrain: “How can France know that Germany will faithfully execute the financial clauses of the treaty?” How can she consent to the evacuation of the Rhineland until the problem of reparations is finally solved?

Nor is France reassured regarding the willingness of Germany to settle the reparation problem definitely. Theoretically she owes 132 billion gold marks, the amount which the Allied representatives agreed in 1921 was Germany's capacity to pay. However, it is now tacitly admitted in all former Allied countries that this figure cannot serve even as a basis of new negotiations. The French would be satisfied with Germany's consent to pay 40 or 50 billion gold marks.

The Lokalanzeiger reminds its readers that at the Peace Conference Marshal Foch, with the emphasis of a victorious campaign, solemnly asserted that France could never be safe from German attack unless the Rhine was her boundary. Nor have the Germans forgotten that for five years after this categorical declaration the French left no means untried to annex or at least Gallicize the left bank of the Rhine. Fortunately for them, the English did not participate in the occupation of the Ruhr and in response to the urgent representations of Downing Street Premier Poincaré had to assure them that his government had no intention to annex Rhenish territory. It was chiefly the French who helped establish the abortive Rhenish Republics and gave aid and comfort to the autonomists.

The problem of the Rhineland directly affects the daily lives of three million people, apart from its international implications and from its influence on the life of every German. There are about 50,000 French soldiers in the occupied area and smaller contingents of English and Belgian troops. They make the housing situation even more serious than it is in unoccupied Germany. Many complaints have been made on account of the damages done to the Rhinelanders by the maneuvers of the Allied military. There has been much friction between the occupying forces and the German civilian government. For a time the occupied zones were run by Allied soldiers in violation of the Treaty of Versailles which left the government in the hands of the Germans. Quite recently, however, much progress has been made in this respect. Most of the ordinances of the Inter-allied High Commission which had the force of law have been abolished and the laws of the Reich have been introduced.

It is only fair to admit that the English had a stabilizing influence in the Rhineland and that for a long period they performed a useful service as shock-absorbers. But for their intervention the history of the autonomous republics would be more than merely a series of sometimes amusing and sometimes disgusting incidents.

There are certain hopeful aspects of the Rhenish situation. Most important of them is a closer union of the occupied territory with the rest of Germany. Before the war the people of the left bank of the Rhine, who belong mostly to Prussia, were highly antagonistic to the Berlin rule. The Rhinelanders are mainly Catholics and the Prussians are Protestants. The Rhinelanders are easygoing and jovial with more than a touch of Latin levity. They hated the heavy-footed bureaucracy of the Prussians and, above anything else, they hated Junkerism. There was a serious Rhenish problem before the war. The Prussian Rhinelanders were trying to organize a new Bundesstaat which would have comprised their own province as well as the Bavarian Palatinate and Rhenish Oldenburg and Hessen.

Such plans no longer exist. French oppression and the democratization of Prussia have wrought a complete reversal of public opinion in the Rhineland. The Junkers are being squeezed out of the Prussian administration and the government of Prussia is Social Democratic.

For nearly two thousand years "Die Wacht" and "La Garde" have been fighting on the Rhine. It is no wonder, therefore, that once more the last phase of a great war is being fought out on the banks of the river. M. Briand was mistaken when at the end of the Rhineland conversations he exclaimed: "We have liquidated the war!" As long as the armies of the Allies are standing on the Rhine the war is not liquidated. Even M. Briand's recent declarations were characteristic of the war-time mentality. The Quai d'Orsay does not seem to realize that by insisting on Germany's bad faith it might instil the idea of the revanche into the Reich. The Germans might just as well commit the crime for which they are being punished. They might just as well default on their payments for which they have been put into the debtors' prison. Fortunately, the idea of peace is more deeply rooted in Republican Germany than the French militarists are willing to admit.

The Positive Outcome of Philosophy

Josef Dietzgen, born December 9, 1828, approached the problems of philosophy from the view-point of the revolutionary working class. This book, his greatest work, deals with the nature and substance of thinking. It discards mysticism, and shows brain work as a natural process.

In the twenty years since Dietzgen's works first appeared in English, the name and fame of the "workingman philosopher" have become familiar to an ever-widening circle of proletarian students, who find Dietzgen's logic a sharp and invincible theoretical weapon. SENATOR BORAH'S ANNOUNCEMENT at the Good-Will Conference in New York that he will do nothing to block the passage of the bill for fifteen additional cruisers, but will vote for it if thereby the ratification of the Kellogg Pact can be expedited, is, we fear, characteristic. He knows that the navy bill is uncalled-for and indefensible; that it makes for war and not for peace. If he has read the newspapers, he has learned that in about every country in Europe we are called hypocrites because we offer the Kellogg Pact to renounce war and then go on building more cruisers. "And it is unescapable," Edwin L. James cables to the New York Times, "that the [European] critics refer to the Kellogg Pact with the question: 'If there is not going to be any more war, what will you do with your new warships?'" Why Senator Borah cannot see that the passing of the navy bill will mean that no one in Europe will take any stock in the Kellogg Pact is beyond us. But, just as his ardent support of Hoover after denouncing him as a man unfit to be trusted with the expenditure of $100,000,000 of government money is attributable to his desire to get the pact ratified, so now he is willing apparently to throw everything overboard in order to get something which will have no value if there are more speeches like that of Mr. Coolidge on Armistice Day and we engage in a naval-building race against England. It is a melancholy picture of compromise which he presents.

THE SIMPLE TRUTH is that every cruiser we build from now on is built against England. No one in Washington believes anything else, for there is no other navy to rival ours. Germany has none; neither has Russia nor China. Italy's is negligible, and no one is so silly as to assert that France's navy could possibly attack us. The Japanese "menace" has faded out of the prints ever since the Washington Conference limited Japan's strength to the ratio of three to our five. There remains only England. Against her we build and against her only. Why pretend anything else? The General Navy Board's plans are obviously based on war with England. How else could they possibly be justified? This is the simple fact. Now is the time for the English-Speaking Union, and every other organization that exists to bring about better understanding between England and the United States, to make itself felt.

SACCO AND VANZETTI are dead. But Tom Mooney lives, after twelve years in a California prison. The judge who tried him, the jury which convicted him, thousands of his fellow-citizens, all believe that neither he nor Warren Billings committed the crime for which they are now serving life sentences. That the two men still languish in jail is another instance of the vast abyss between justice and the law, the progress of the courts and reality. Now a national committee is being formed under the auspices and with the approval of Dr. Harry F. Ward, Professor John Dewey, Clarence Darrow, Professor Jerome Davis, Rabbi Stephen S. Wise, Sinclair Lewis, Norman Hapgood, Inez Haynes Irwin, and others. The plan is to set the facts about Mooney's and Billings's innocence—and they are facts, amply substantiated—before Governor C. C. Young of California and President-elect Hoover. Mr. Hoover has only to ask for Mooney's pardon, it is thought, to have his request granted; and if he examines the documents already prepared, he cannot fail to ask. Mooney has declared that he will not accept parole, on the ground that it would imply admission of guilt. He asks unconditional pardon for a crime not committed. This is the least, and indeed the only recompense the State of California can make to a man jailed unjustly for twelve long years. But it is not too much to ask, and one can only wish the new committee success in achieving it.

DULNESS AND UNIMPORTANCE have become the predominating characteristics of recent conventions of the American Federation of Labor, and this year's session at New Orleans has been no exception to the rule. The convention is made up largely of paid officials who pass resolutions year by year in favor of the organization of American industry and then forget them. Two years ago at Detroit a ringing resolution pledged the federation to the organization of automobile workers, but no real drive for organization took place and no industrial union was constructed to cement the quarreling craft unions of the metal industries. For several years the workers in Southern cotton mills, who work the longest hours and receive the lowest wages in American manufacturing, have been almost wholly neglected. The last year has witnessed the ruin of the bituminous section of the United Mine Workers—once the glorious vanguard of the American labor movement—the partial ruin of the unions in the ladies' garment and fur trades, and the evaporation of the remnant of organization which followed the Passaic strike. These disasters are largely due to the overwhelming power and ruthlessness of American employers, and to a much smaller degree to Communist dissension, but no honest friend of the labor movement can fail to place much of the blame on the inept and timid leadership of the American Federation of Labor. Never did our labor movement show more plainly the need of a rebirth of militancy and intelligence.

IT IS A NOTEWORTHY resolution that the American Newspaper Publishers' Association recently passed at its convention, condemning the action of the Supreme Court of Minnesota in enjoining the publication of the Saturday Press. It recalls that the Saturday Press was enjoined from publication after it had printed articles exposing vice and gambling in Minneapolis and alleging inactivity and connivance on the part of police and public officials. This injunction—as The Nation of August 22 recorded—was obtained by the Hennepin County Attorney, one of the persons who had been criticized by the newspaper, the official acting under authority of a law passed by the Minnesota Legislature in 1925 which provides that the courts may enjoin the future publication of any newspaper which they deem malicious or defamatory. Under this law, of course, the Saturday Press was denied a trial by jury; the judge alone heard the evidence and issued the injunction. Such procedure, says the A. N. P. A. resolution, "if permitted to stand, will render all guaranties of free speech valueless in Minnesota, and such choking of thought and expression can be extended further if not checked." The resolution further brands the law as a "deadly attack upon our institutions and government" and calls upon "all free and loyal Americans to demand the restoration of the right of free speech. . . . The ideals upon which our nation is founded are still vital and necessary, and if we are to retain what our forefathers have transmitted to us, freedom of speech and freedom of thought must be preserved." The Minnesota law is the first of its kind in the United States, and we shall watch with interest the outcome of the appeal taken to the United States Supreme Court by the American Civil Liberties Union.

THE RIGHT OF COLLEGE PROFESSORS to state their political preferences in public without concealing their official titles is involved in a bitter controversy at the University of California between President W. W. Campbell and several important faculty members. Shortly before the election, the Smith-for-President Club of Berkeley held a meeting in the Berkeley High School and sent a public telegram of good wishes to Governor Smith with the names and titles of forty-eight teachers from the University of California attached. The telegram did not purport in any way to represent university action, but President Campbell without asking these teachers for their version of the affair attacked them in a letter to the press because they allowed their university titles to be appended to their names. Eleven of these teachers in a public reply declared:

It is impossible for a university professor or administrator to separate himself from his title. If that title is used in public, it is not fair to say that he is "capitalizing his connection with the university for the purpose of promulgating his views." . . . To demand that he take means to instruct newspaper reporters or secretaries or officers of meetings or clubs, political or otherwise, that his title must not be used requires the impossible and denies that freedom which Mr. Campbell declares that he recognizes.

We are glad that these eleven professors had the courage to attack President Campbell publicly and to defend their constitutional rights against a college president who has used his official position to support such reactionary measures as compulsory military training. We also congratulate the editors of the Daily Californian, the student paper of the university, who flatly condemned the action of their president in a leading editorial.

IS COMMUNISM BECOMING RESPECTABLE? The courts of the city of Los Angeles seem to think so. Some weeks ago seven Communists soliciting funds for the National Miners' Relief Committee were arrested in the Hollywood section, charged with soliciting alms without first filing a notice of intention. Their attorney pointed out that the ordinance under which the arrests were made applied only to "charitable corporations or associations," and that the Supreme Court of California had defined such associations as "organizations for the general public good." It had held that certain organizations similar to the Y. M. C. A. were too particular in their appeal to be counted as "charitable." The attorney for the Communists called the attention of the judge to this decision, but the judge found all seven guilty, obviously accepting the Workers' Party as an "organization for the general public good"—a long step for a California court to take.

IF THE WORLD ever reaches prohibition it will not be by a straight line. The issue must be fought over and experimented with for many years on scores of fronts. In a burst of zeal following the World War the Canadian Provinces generally established dry regimes, but one by one they have since returned, in part at least, to allegiance to John Barleycorn. Somewhat the same thing has happened in New Zealand. A quarter of a century ago New Zealand had an excellent local-option law under which the country was divided into districts, each empowered to establish its own liquor policy. Under this system New Zealand was gradually drying up. Not fast enough, however, for the ultra Drys, who demanded a uniform national policy. During the World War prohibition was accepted, only to be defeated soon after by the vote of the returned soldiers. In 1925 the Dominion again decreed prohibition as the result of a referendum, but another popular vote has just been taken in which a licensing system has been voted in by a majority of 100,000. What next?

ENCOURAGED BY A SWEEPING VICTORY in the municipal elections and the Ashton by-election, the British Labor Party is pressing its campaign for success at the next general election with renewed confidence. In the municipal elections the Labor candidates, who included 451 women, made a net gain of 111 seats in city councils outside of London and 77 seats in the metropolis, carrying 180 of the women to victory. In the 51 Parliamentary by-elections since the last general election Labor has made a net gain of eight seats and the Conservatives have lost ten. It is evident that the existing poverty and unemployment in Great Britain are providing the Labor Party with excellent ammunition for attack, and the party's leaders are not slow in realizing their advantage. In a recent broadside from the Labor Press Service is this challenging summary of economic conditions in September, 1928, as contrasted with the same month in 1927:

Unemployment has increased by 2.2 per cent, coal production has decreased by an average of 200,000 tons weekly, iron production has decreased by 88,000 tons for the month, steel production has decreased by 58,000 tons for the month, exports have decreased by £5,200,000 for the month, shipping freights have decreased by 8 per cent, railway receipts have decreased by £140,000 a week!

But stock exchange security values have increased by 4.4 points, having risen to 126.3, on the basis of a December, 1921, index figure of 100, and wages have decreased by £174,300 a week.

A Government which came into power on its promise to restore prosperity is gravely embarrassed by this type of attack. Incidentally in another part of the British Empire on November 17 Labor scored substantial gains in the form of a half-dozen seats in the Australian Parliament. The Australian elections, however, did not disturb the Nationalist majority and Premier Stanley Bruce returns to power.

THE MOST POPULAR MAN in Argentina, Hipolito Irigoyen, has been inaugurated again as President—after a six-year lapse. Twice, in spite of opposition from aristocratic circles, he has been swept into office on overwhelming majorities. Irigoyen, formerly a teacher of psychology and sociology in the University of La Plata, became a powerful political factor because he was the friend of labor. The crowd loves him, and turns into legend the background of his strange, reticent, more than austere, militantly simple personality. During his first term he made a practice of keeping one door of the presidential Pink House—which corresponds to our White House—always open to anybody with a cause or a grievance; and he himself preferred this door. The first time he entered the Pink House it was on the shoulders of voters, and he would have been carried there again had he not raced through the crowd to avoid a triumphal display. Throughout his life he has been a thorn in the side of the classes that have usually elected presidents who are social ornaments. Even now, he is the cause of a schism in the Argentine Congress. The Chamber of Deputies is with him enthusiastically, the Senate bitter against him. The first official act of his second term was to decree an eight-hour day for government employees; next he hopes to nationalize Argentinian oil lands.

THE DEATH OF LALA LAJPAT RAI in Lahore on November 17 comes at a singularly inopportune moment for the cause of the Indian Nationalists, if any moment may be conceived of as less opportune than another for the loss of so valuable a leader. He was the author of the resolution calling for the boycotting of the Simon Commission during its visit to India and took part in the demonstration against the delegation upon its arrival on October 30. His leadership will be especially missed, therefore, in the critical days immediately ahead, for he was practical as well as inspired, not merely dreaming of native rights but working for them with an abundance of common sense. Trained as a lawyer, Lajpat Rai was a leader of the Nationalist uprisings in the Punjab in 1907, for which he was imprisoned. Later he went abroad, living in New York City for some time during and after the World War and contributing to The Nation and other periodicals in behalf of home rule for India. Upon his return to India he resumed agitation, and in 1922 he was again imprisoned, this time with great injury to his health.

TEN SYMPHONIES, six hundred and three songs, endless chamber-music pieces—these are some of the achievements of Franz Schubert, who died, at thirty-one, a failure, quite unappreciated by his time. Today, his death one hundred years ago is being commemorated all over the world and we are especially happy to record the fact that the United States is taking the lead in the celebration. Not until 1843 was there a performance of one of Schubert's works in America—the A Minor Quartet, opus 29. Now his imperishable memory is being utilized to create a foundation in the United States which will make it possible for promising artists to be heard by audiences of genuine musical understanding. Heresy though it be, we still prefer the melodies of Schubert, Schumann, and other great men of the romantic school to any modernist we have yet to hear. We consider the world infinitely enriched by the author of the exquisite "Unfinished Symphony," "The Erlking," and "The Wanderer," and so we print this humble tribute to the great Austrian who, like Schumann, lived briefly but enriched the world enormously.

SIGRID UNDSSET and Henri Bergson have just been awarded Nobel prizes for literature, that given to Bergson having been held over from last year. Few people will be inclined to quarrel violently with these awards, but few will feel that there was anything inevitable about the choices made. Mme Undset is not unknown in England or America but it is doubtful if any committee outside of Scandinavia would have thought of her as the most distinguished of the living writers who have not yet received the Nobel Prize. Bergson has been the recipient of many honors and he is probably less highly regarded at the present time than in the years when his championship of "intuition" created a popular sensation. Other awards went as follows: To Professors Heinrich Wieland and Adolph Windaus for chemistry; to Dr. Charles Nicoll for medicine. The peace prize has not yet been awarded.

THE LATEST ORGANIZATION to appeal to the joining instinct of the American public is the Book League, younger brother to the Book-of-the-Month Club and the Literary Guild and several lesser fry in the same family. The League offers certain novel privileges to those who become members. In addition to twelve new paper-bound books a year, it promises twelve cloth-bound reprints of important old books. The new books will be in magazine form, and following the text a literary magazine containing book reviews and notes will be included. If the prospective subscriber should look dubiously at the pale-brick paper covers of these volumes he will perhaps be solaced by the prospect of having the set bound together at the close of the year. At any rate the booksellers are likely to consider this method of distribution a less alarming form of competition than those offered by the older organizations. On the editorial board of the Book League are the following persons: Edwin Arlington Robinson, Van Wyck Brooks, Gamaliel Bradford, Hamilton Holt, and Edwin E. Slosson. Frank L. Polk is an advisory editor, and the managing editor is Isaac Don Levine. The League's first book, appearing this month, is "Zola" by Matthew Josephson.

Mr. Coolidge Plays with Fire

NOT in years has any American President made so dangerous and so provocative a speech as did President Coolidge on Armistice Day. The very hour which, out of consideration for the dead in France, should surely have been devoted to the preaching of good-will among all nations, the President picked out to devote to an attack—upon the Germans? Not at all. Upon our Allies in the World War; those whom we so solemnly assured in war days were bound to us by indissoluble bonds cemented by our joint bloodshed in France. The White House has since inspired press statements that the President has been delighted by the floods of approving telegrams and letters which have reached him since he made his speech. Undoubtedly the Anglophobes, our militarists and jingoes of every description, have applauded the President. As a result the Washington correspondents assert that the immediate passage by the Senate of the bill for fifteen more cruisers is assured. That may be, but it is also a fact that an amazingly vigorous chorus of disapproval of the President's outburst went up the minute it was printed.

Among those who protested in New York were the Reverend Harry Emerson Fosdick, Henry Sloane Coffin, Rabbi Wise, Nicholas Murray Butler, who declared that the President's policy was "wicked," Mrs. Carrie Chapman Catt and others in the Good-Will Conference for Peace which was taking place in New York just at that moment. The indignation of these speakers was doubtless heightened by the fact that the day after the President's speech appeared in the press the new program of the General Board of the Navy—largely founded, as Dr. Butler said, "on professional vanity"—appeared in the press. It is a repetition of its familiar demand for a navy second to none. Not, it is true, to be created overnight, but none the less as the definitive object of our naval policy. It is once more explained, as President Coolidge declared, that this is not the beginning of a great naval competition. That merely recalls to us the fact that on a certain occasion some twenty years ago the Kaiser of Germany similarly asserted that his naval program was based on needs and not on any attempt to rival Great Britain. "The German fleet," said he, "is not built against anyone, and therefore not against England, but according to our necessity." They are all alike, these militarists; they talk alike no matter what happens, and now as in 1908 they are pointing the way to future hostilities. Yet we are assured by a section of the daily press that President Coolidge merits all praise for telling the Allies that we shall tolerate no more nonsense from them.

To this we reply that that sort of spread-eagleism and saber-rattling is the devil's own work. It is sowing dragons' teeth which can yield only one crop. What has been the retort from Europe? The Italian press denied the truth of Mr. Coolidge's statement that we lost heavily by the war and unanimously declared that his words were the expression of an economic imperialism dangerous to the whole world. A London correspondent of the New York Times reports that British anger is rising; that the public resents the choice of Armistice Day as the occasion for justifying further American naval expenditure and for lecturing down to the Europeans from Mr. Coolidge's high attitude of holy moral superiority. Lord Birkenhead is, of course, among the first to say: "So far as England is concerned, I am not sure that we especially required it"—the "it" being the Presidential advice to European countries. The press of England teems with letters of protest. Half the papers of Germany write against the speech and its implications; the other half welcomes it because of the drubbing given to England and France. As for the French press, it dwells, naturally, on that lack of logic and consistency in the speech itself upon which we touched in our issue of last week. French dailies deny that the President has a right to indict a whole continent. They question his facts and contrast his speech with Mr. Kellogg's extraordinary statement that there are no reservations to the promise of the Powers to fight no more and that we shall assume no responsibility to enforce observance of the Pact of Paris. That the President's figures as to naval construction are wrong is contended by the London Daily News, the Daily Telegraph, and other newspapers. The Daily Herald, representing Labor, solemnly declares: "Despite all reassuring phrases, all the elements of an Anglo-American conflict are present."

Now we are well aware that there was a great deal of bluff in the President's speech. He unquestionably wished to make it clear to Europe once more that we shall not weaken in our determination to exact every cent of the money coming to us under the debt settlements, or demanded by us where there is no settlement as yet. We are aware also that the President thinks that by threatening to build the additional cruisers he can bring pressure to bear toward that further limitation of navies for which he again pleads in this mentally chaotic utterance of his. But this is the stupidest kind of diplomacy. It is a mere following of the example of Woodrow Wilson when in a speech in St. Louis he demanded "incomparably the greatest navy in the world" if our Allies and enemies abroad did not do what we wished. It is the reverse of statesmanship because it is playing with fire. It stiffens the backs of the imperialists in every country; it gives them the very weapon they need to hold out against further limitation of armaments, and it inflames the big-army-and-navy jingoes at Washington. Already Congressman Britten, chairman of the House Naval Affairs Committee, has followed Mr. Coolidge in an attack upon Great Britain and France in which, with characteristic American self-satisfaction and self-glorification, he declares that "the true basis of American statesmanship is honesty of purpose coupled with frank, open expression of opinion, while the very heart of the European diplomacy is the art of deception, the soul of trickery."

If the public opinion of the United States does not speak out promptly, our relations with Europe and Great Britain will be worse than at any time since our unfortunate participation in the quarrels of Europe. We do not deny a certain amount of provocation to Mr. Coolidge, for we have criticized in our columns the stupidity, the folly, and the underhandedness of the Franco-British naval agreement. But the thing to do is not now to threaten and berate and lecture those involved, but to pour oil upon the troubled waters lest we find ourselves far along the road to an Anglo-American conflict.

An Ugly Sea Tragedy

ON a storm-tormented sea littered with the wreckage of a once great steamship, where living persons clung desperately to floating jetsam and dead bodies floated unheeded, a Negro quartermaster with the memorable name of Lionel Licorish found himself in a boat with an injured fireman—and no oars. The quartermaster jumped overboard, swam to a capsized lifeboat, got a pair of oars, and then swam back to his own craft. He then rowed about amid the wreckage, picking up a score of those fighting for life in the water. In that same engulfing sea Paul A. Dana found himself near a stewardess, Mrs. Clara Ball, when their lifeboat—which had had a hole stove in it—capsized and left them to fight the ocean as best they could. Together they swam to a spar to which they clung, immersed in water, all afternoon, all night, and most of the next morning until rescued by the American Shipper. In the radio room of the doomed steamship, an Irish operator, O'Loughlin, continued to send calls for help even after the list of the vessel compelled him to lie on his stomach. The final plunge of the vessel found him still there at his post—and carried him down. On the careening deck of the Vestris a commander who had waited too long to summon help, and been unequal to debarking his passengers in the titantic difficulties of the last hour, nevertheless died like a man and a sailor. Spurning the advice of a steward to save himself with a curt "Hell, no," Captain Carey went with his ship.

Such instances of resourcefulness, endurance, courage, and plain old-fashioned human obstinacy are good to recall against the less creditable background of the foundering of the Lamport and Holt liner. For one is inclined to write down the loss of the Vestris as the greatest disaster of the sea, morally speaking, that has occurred in this century. More persons perished in the sinking of the Lusitania and the Titanic, but the former was torpedoed in war time, and sank so quickly that no skill or heroism could have prevented some human sacrifice. As to the liner Titanic, the loss was due to a lack of sufficient boats in which to lower the passengers. No captain and no crew could rise above that. On the other hand, the foundering of the Vestris will be remembered as one in which the captain was apparently more occupied with the possible hope of preserving his ship and its material cargo than in saving its human freight. And worse still, the wreck of the Vestris will be associated with the ugly memory that while more than half of the passengers—including most of the women and every child—were drowned, three-fourths of the crew were saved.

What we call "fixing the blame" for the wreck is going on apace, and eventually the proper sum of condemnation will be measured out and apportioned among various scapegoats. And as usual the deeper causes will remain unprobed and the blame, in its more fundamental reaches, will never be distributed. Every steamship wreck in our times is different up to a certain point and then it is tragically similar to every other. Up to the moment when the order comes to take to the boats every disaster is a story by itself. From that time on certain facts recur with monotonous persistence. Often there is a shortage of boats, though this is less common since the Titanic went down. That disaster was followed by laws requiring more adequate life-saving equipment which have resulted in genuine improvement. But though the boats be numerous enough, it is invariably found that some of the gear is defective or unworkable, and there is commonly some lack in oars, food, water, or other necessities. It usually turns out, too, that the crew shows itself unfamiliar with lowering the boats or with rowing them once they get in the water. Boat drills on steamships are notoriously farces, and what can be expected on the third day after sailing of a crew most of which was probably new to the particular ship, if not unused to any ship? Finally, it always happens when the order comes to take to the boats that men and women show themselves to be human. Some dominate emergencies and some shrivel before them. Some prove themselves—surprising fact!—to be heroes and others to be rats.

Will we learn something through the foundering of the Vestris? Just as the sinking of the Titanic brought an increase in life-saving apparatus, so perhaps we may hope from the experience of the Vestris that boat drills may be something other than the solemn nonsense now customary and that attention will be paid not simply to having life-saving equipment, but to keeping it in readiness for use. Perhaps, even, we may begin to insist upon having a substantial number of real sailors in the crew of every steamship, though that is rather much to hope for. Finally, the sinking of the Vestris should remind us that the sea is still unconquered. We have so successfully subdued nature ashore that we tend to grow careless and arrogant toward it. But at sea the most we have done, from the Ark to the Leviathan, is to gain a little more speed, a little more comfort, and a little less hazard. We are as far from conquest as ever. It is best so. Man would be insufferable if he were to become master of everything.

Mr. Hoover's Trip

MR. HOOVER, unable to wait until March to begin work, is rushing off to South America on a "mission of good-will," and it is reported that a group of young men in the Department of Commerce are at work compiling whole books full of statistics upon Latin-American trade and resources for Mr. Hoover's edification. Mr. Harding once asserted that his chief reading, in the interval between his election and his assumption of office, was the Old Testament. Mr. Hoover reads trade statistics. On the whole, it augurs well. The Old Testament is dangerous reading for a man who must concern himself with foreign relations. Either the New Testament or trade statistics is better. "Good-will" and "trade" are increasingly synonymous.

Possibly the President-elect is mapping his course after that of the Prince of Wales. There are those who disrespectfully assert that the Prince of Wales is the chief drummer of the British Empire—a better good-will ambassador than even a Rotary Club could provide. He is the symbol of the majesty of empire—even a colony with a grievance is proud to be visited by the son of the King of England. Furthermore, it is quite possible that the Prince and the counselors who accompany him learn by travel. Doubtless the same thing will be true in Latin America. There is not one of the Latin republics which will not be proud to receive the President-elect of the wealthiest republic in history; and even the President-elect also may learn something.

The ex-Secretary of Commerce knows as much of the currents of world trade as any man in America. He knows that our exports to Latin America still amount to only a sixth of our total exports; but he also knows that ten years ago they formed only a twelfth of our export trade; and that so far as manufactures go—the part of our trade which is destined to grow—Latin America already absorbs more than a quarter of our foreign shipments. It was no accident that he picked Latin America for his good-will tour. If he had been seeking merely areas of present friction, he might have made his soothing speeches in Europe; plainly, he preferred to visit not merely areas of friction but areas of possible trade expansion.

Visiting Latin America, however, he is likely to learn of matters which are not reflected in the trade statistics. In Chile and Peru he will still find a lingering bitterness over our mismanagement of the Tacna-Arica dispute. He may learn that sometimes it is better to let the Latins settle their own troubles in their own way. President Coolidge's arbitration, General Pershing's impressive presence, could not calm the ancient passions of that frontier; but when the American officers retired, a Chilean newspaper conducted a campaign of reconciliation; a Peruvian poet visited Chile; and today without alien intervention, the two countries are on the highway to a compromise. We hope Mr. Hoover may hear of these episodes.

In Argentina Mr. Hoover may meet a touch of coolness. His campaign speeches about the tariff were reported in full by the enterprising Buenos Aires newspapers, and resented. Argentina ships a little corn—not much—to our Pacific coast, and a certain amount of hides and meats, all of which are affected by the American tariff.

He may also learn that the United States naval commission which is training Brazil's navy does not conduce to friendship—or trade—with Brazil's neighbors. This active cultivation of a big navy in the Southern hemisphere is one of those matters of American policy least reported and most resented.

While in Brazil Mr. Hoover may not have time to mount the river to Mr. Ford's five-million-acre rubber plantation. But he will hear of it; and he will note that it is an empire within an empire. He has at times shown a resentment of the little baronies in our own home coal fields, where the ordinary processes of civil government are subjected to an industrial despotism. If he has time to visit the American copper mines in Peru and Chile, the rubber empire in Brazil, the oil principalities in Venezuela and Colombia, the banana dukedoms of Central America, he will note what power American capital wields, and understand, perhaps, why thoughtful Latins are appalled at this industrial "progress" in their countries.

Finally, stopping at Mexico on his way home, he will talk with our ablest foreign ambassador, Dwight W. Morrow, who has been able to face an economic revolution and to work with the tide. Mr. Hoover may learn from him how inevitable the Mexican Revolution was in a country governed by a native despot in the interest of such regal foreign landlords. Reflecting upon what he has seen south of Mexico, he may ponder how to avert in those countries the catastrophes which a similar economic status has produced in Mexico. If he reflects deeply enough upon that series of events and phenomena, he might become not merely America's greatest salesman, but the greatest statesman of the greatest economic empire of history.

Those Terrible Britons

IN the interests of international peace and friendly understanding some things ought to be prevented by law. Among those which come in mind immediately are (1) books about the United States by visiting Englishmen—especially visiting English lecturers; (2) Mr. St. John Ervine's drama column in the New York World; and (3) criticisms of American books in any British review.

The English reviewer almost invariably adopts one of two tones: approval tinged with surprise, or disapproval tinged with sorrow. More than often an English critic finds in the book under his eye a microcosm of American civilization. We have before us, for example, a column from a recent issue of the London Times Literary Supplement. The reviewer is discussing a book by an American about "stunts," a word apparently employed to cover all sorts of athletic and acrobatic exercises. It seems to be a solemn book in which are collected some 700 examples of agility and strength. One would hardly think the book worth more than a trifling mention in a literary review. But its reviewer sees in this volume something of vastly greater significance than a rather pedantic compendium of generally unimportant information. He considers it at considerable length as "one more manifestation of American earnestness, industry, and energy." He explains that an Englishman would have described such "minor feats of balance" in fifty small pages, while the American, with characteristic elaboration, consumes 500 large ones. He points out that these "stunts," employed in England to "while away rainy hours in cricket pavilions," are in America seriously applied to the end of physical education and moral improvement for the young. (We should like to urge upon the reviewer, as extenuating facts, that our climate is obviously superior to England's and that we have no cricket pavilions, but we suspect he would discard such frivolous suggestions.) He is determined to make us all Puritans for the sins of one earnest and encyclopedic authority on stunts. The book is interesting to him, he concludes, "as an illustration of the American temperament; and it may be taken as an example of the inability of the American to play or of his aptitude for directing play to some profitable end."

We cannot forbear to quote the directions for performing one of these stunts by which our national character is to be judged. Its simplicity and charm should commend it to everyone. Its name is "Heel Jump," and the instructions follow:

Materials.—A pencil.

Preparation.—Place pencil on floor and stand so that toes almost touch it. Bend over and grasp front of toes.

Stunt.—Jump over pencil without releasing hold on toes.

Coaching.—A sudden raising of the back simultaneously with the projection of the body forward will accomplish the feat.

After all, why should we resent an attempt to explain the temper of the United States by a book packed full of exercises like the above? Who knows; we may achieve new heights of national greatness if we concentrate assiduously enough on the effort to "jump over pencil without releasing hold on toes." Perhaps America's future battles will be won in the heel-jumping pavilions of Yale and Harvard.

It Seems to Heywood Broun

IT is always a zestful sight to see men exercising their intelligences, with agility and sound principle, in the cause of intelligent behavior. It is even possible that on some farthest star this effort will come to some good end. But in spite of these props, I find my spirits sinking lower and lower when I read such expert expositions of the lunacies of censorship as Morris Ernst and William Seagle have just turned out in "To the Pure . . ."* I say to myself "If this doesn't hold them, nothing will," and echo answers promptly, "Nothing will."

For censorship is simply not one of the things that come from intelligent consideration of life and times. It comes from emotional consideration. And when a couple of brilliant young men tear the pretensions of intelligence from the vice crusaders, they have no call to be surprised, when the dust has settled, that the vice crusaders don't even know that they've been by that way at all.

At the end of this antic book, the censors have been made to look like the most hopeless lot of fools in the world, as indeed they are, but I have a desolated feeling that the censors, knowing this already in the secret places of their hearts, won't give a blame. They labor, we know, under what we call, in our neat modern speech, a compulsion neurosis. Their feelings are geared so that, if the skies fall, they can do no other. They are as slick as the next one at calling in the treachery of words and the stencils of "Thinking." But nobody need try to tell me that plain proof that they are fat-heads is going to get anywhere near what's biting them. The point about censors is that there is something they would rather not be than fools. They would rather not burn in hell-fire. If their mothers had caught them young, put a small night-light in their rooms during those hours when bears could be heard creeping up the stairs, or small red devils could be imagined twisting little tails about the corners of the bed, the vice-crusaders might have been led to put away childish things in decent season. If their teachers had been up to snuff, and had calmed their agitations over their little "sins" of pre-adolescence and so on, they would have had a second shot at salvation. If their colleges had breathed a wholesome air, some later tardy reconstruction might have come about. But none of these things happened to censors, as you can tell by looking at them, so by the time they begin to scan bookstore windows and the advertisements of art galleries, their own heavy-hearted emotional fears, undissipated and uncalmed, are so at floodtide that no mere intellectual derision can so much as pin their ears back.

All this would be pretty sad, but for one thing. That thing is the grossly maligned and outlaw business of bootlegging. I hope to live to donate the first dollar to a huge mountain monument to bootleggers—in addition to those dollars already more pragmatically spent by me toward the first down-payments on their Rolls-Royces. If we are to live in a world where the fear-ridden, shame-ridden, emotion-steered censor is to be allowed to flourish because his garb of piety is accepted at its garment value, we must do a little something for ourselves. If it so happens that there are those of us whose mothers did put night-lights at our bed-sides, so that we survived the fears of early childhood, and those of us who outgrew the filthy sense of the inherent evil of the human being in toto, we have nowhere else to turn but to our bootleggers, purveyors of whatever kind of nourishment we regard as valuable to us.

Now there is an odd and somewhat devastating quality appertaining to the bootlegger. He's a pretty lovable guy. This fact makes no more sense than the panting labors of the censor. It also is bedded in the realm of pure feeling. He goads you into the fields of action where the adrenalin runs high. Adrenalin creates a delightful feeling—competence, well-being, delusion—if you like—of vast power. Proscriptions shut off all this surging upward thrust, and invite you to the satisfactions of nullification. Anybody who imagines that these latter are the more stimulating is hereby permitted to go out and count noses.

I shall at this point assume that you have counted the noses, and that you droop sorrowfully back with the numbers outrageously against you—that is, if you are not on my side. I shall then ask, with an acuteness borrowed from the authors who have sent me on this investigating tour, whether or not this brainless, feeling-drenched censor remote from intellectual control and the dupe of himself as well as all his terrified brethren, is not in the end our greatest benefactor. There is really only one thing we really ought to be allowed to find out about "the pure"—namely, whether these treasures that they withhold from us because they tremulously cannot manage them are worth our time to bootleg them into the house. On the basis of the lists provided by Mr. Ernst and Mr. Seagle of books and what not proscribed by the Sumners, the Watch-and-Wards, and so forth, there doesn't seem to be a great deal going about now that is worth fooling around for. A bootlegger of liquor must prove that what he has is something better than merely gin or Scotch—it has to be good gin or Scotch. At least, as good as can be made in the home, and in a short time. A good book-bootlegger has to meet, at the present time, no greater requirement than that, for the moment, his stuff is contraband. To take as our basis just those books listed in "To the Pure . . .," the books that scare the censor are not good enough to be worth bootlegging.

After all, as these prancing and stimulating authors affirm, and then prove, the arch-crime of censors is their folly, and though folly may not seem a reproach to them, to us, after we have had a little experience with them, it is at least no sign-post. A very delightful jurist of my acquaintance said the other day: "Well, the law is always a hundred years behind the lawyers and judges, and the lawyers and judges are a hundred years behind the times." We are here tempted to ask what the times are a hundred years behind, and the first answer that submits itself is "To the Pure . . .," except that we must then change that neat sequence of figures and say that the times are a thousand years behind "To the Pure . . ." And even as I salute the intelligence, the honesty, and the courage of Mr. Ernst and Mr. Seagle, I remember that the Yankee translation, unauthorized, of a musical comedy playing in Paris in 1918, which was called by the French "Plus ça change," was just good old "As You Were."

Chain Stores

The Revolution in Retailing

By MERRYLE STANLEY RUKEYSER

[This is the second of a series of articles covering the more significant aspects of business and finance. The next article, The Federal Reserve System, Is It a Popular Menace? will appear shortly.]

HUGE fortunes are in sight for the skilled merchandisers who can repeat in the field of retailing the more efficient performances which have already been standardized in the realm of production. The trend toward heightened efficiency has been enthroning big business at the expense of little business. Great department stores, chain stores, and mail-order houses are rapidly gaining a larger ratio of aggregate consumer patronage. The movement has recently become so accelerated that statistics become outmoded before they are classified. A wholesale realignment of the agencies which are seeking to woo dollars from consumers is taking place. The battle, though it arraigns big business against little business, is waged less on the issue of size than on that of efficiency. The traditional rule-of-thumb merchant is confronted with a future of diminished prosperity. For several years the statistics of business mortalities have been heavily weighted with the casualties of independent retail stores and of jobbing houses which served them. The independent single unit storekeeper, though not necessarily doomed, seems destined to get a smaller share of the aggregate retail business in the future. At present, independent retailers still do about 60 per cent of the total business.

Of the newer agencies in the realm of distribution, chain stores are having the most rapid expansion. Department stores, which developed several decades earlier, have apparently reached a phase of diminished rate of growth, though their trade continues on a high level. Department stores in the future are likely to grow with the population. Chain stores are expanding far more rapidly, and there are no indications thus far that the movement has yet begun to spend itself.

The scientific approach to problems in retail distribution is so recent a development that adequate data are still lacking, and probably will be until 1930 when it is hoped the government census will be extended to include retailing. It is estimated that aggregate retail sales in the United States in 1928 will attain the unprecedented height of between $42,000,000,000 and $43,000,000,000. According to the best available statistical computations, the department stores of the country did 16½ per cent of the total retail volume in 1926; chain stores about 12 per cent; mail-order houses, 4 per cent; company stores, commissary stores, and that type of institution, 2 per cent; house-to-house canvassing, 1 per cent; consumer cooperatives, ¼ of 1 per cent; and independent small retailers, about 63 per cent. In 1928 the most striking shift has been the relative gain of the chain stores at the expense of the independents. Paul Nystrom, sales specialist and professor of marketing at Columbia University, who made these estimates, believes that chain stores may do 16 per cent of the total retail business in 1928.

Chain stores, though originally established before department stores, at first grew more slowly, especially before 1900 when the department stores were already expanding rapidly. The chain stores began to gather distinct momentum after 1910, and have had their most impressive growth since 1919. Since 1914 the chains have probably quadrupled their volume, which has tripled since 1919.

A gain of 17.68 per cent was shown in the reported sales of thirty-six chain-store organizations for the first nine months of 1928 as compared with the corresponding period in 1927. The net sales were $1,025,158,895, compared with $871,144,486 in 1927. In recent months there have been singularly few new chains. As a matter of fact the number of chains has probably diminished as the stronger and better-financed chains have been absorbing weaker systems. The Kroger Grocery Company, for example, which was recently publicly financed by Lehman Brothers of New York, who have been especially active in bringing capital to companies in the retail field, has been rapidly absorbing other chains. Thus far, this year, the Kroger chain, which is second in size only to the Great Atlantic and Pacific Tea Company, with its 17,000 stores, which do a larger gross business than the Pennsylvania Railroad, has absorbed the Hoosier Stores Corporation, the Folts Grocery and Baking Company, the Eagle Grocery Company, C. Thomas Stores, Inc., Universal Grocery Company, Piggly Wiggly Corporation, Piggly Wiggly Valley Company, Columbus Piggly Wiggly Company, Middle States Stores Company, Missouri Illinois Stores Company, and the Fly and Hobson Company.

There are in the chain-store field two schools of thought on the subject of expansion. One believes in buying out established companies, with proved earning power. That is a quick road to bigness, obviating the delays and the expense of building up new units. The disadvantage lies in the expense entailed in paying a substantial premium to the old owners. Financial sleight-of-hand facilitates such mergers. The financial public is willing to capitalize earnings more liberally when they are included in the statement of a well-managed, publicly financed chain than when they are retained by a smaller, less-known company, whose shares are not readily marketable. From a stock-market standpoint, it is obviously profitable for a big chain whose stock sells twenty-five times earnings to acquire a privately owned chain at fifteen times earnings.

The second school of thought leans to the view that it is preferable to open up new units, and avoid the expense of paying fancy prices to other founders. It is noteworthy that Sears, Roebuck and Company, which recently had 170 stores, and Montgomery Ward and Company, which will have more than 150 by the end of the year, are in each case opening up their own units, starting at scratch. These two mail-order houses, which have been flirting with the chain-store idea for several years, really entered the new field on a substantial scale this year. Montgomery Ward and Company has announced that its goal will be 1,500 stores. The initial stores, like those of Sears, Roebuck, have been profitable and optimistic speculators in Wall Street and, ignoring current earnings of the company, have been extravagantly capitalizing in the stock market their expectations of enhanced earnings in the future. Sears, Roebuck may double its array of stores, which vary in size from mammoth department stores to small automobile accessory shops. At least thirty are urban department stores.

In connection with its recent expansion program, Sears, Roebuck and Company brought into existence the chain department store which has long been theoretically advocated. Most of the older groups of department stores are not really chains but financial affiliations. Sears, Roebuck, however, applies the chain-store methods of centralized buying and home-office direction of individual units. Sears, Roebuck and Company plan to enter only the larger cities, avoiding towns of fewer than 30,000 population.

Montgomery Ward, on the other hand, purposes eventually to go into very much smaller towns, thus giving the traditional customers of catalogue houses an opportunity to visualize actual merchandise. Good roads bring motorized farmers to shops in nearby towns and Montgomery Ward intends to be represented in them. Though the new stores in so far as they cater to rural patrons will compete with the catalogue of Montgomery Ward, the management of the company believes that they will also compete with the catalogue of competing mail-order houses. Four-fifths of the Sears, Roebuck customers also receive the Montgomery Ward catalogue.

The Sears, Roebuck philosophy of chain-store expansion is different. Its executives believe that the catalogue business which caters primarily to the rural classes has already reached its peak of development. Machinery is fast replacing human labor on the farms and threshing machines and mechanical tractors do not require work shirts and boots. According to the estimates of the Department of Agriculture, the following net flow of population from the farms to the cities has taken place in recent years:

During year	Persons Leaving Farms for Cities and Towns	Persons Leaving Cities and Towns for Farms	Net Movement from Farms to Cities and Towns
1922....	2,000,000	880,000	1,120,000
1924....	2,075,000	1,396,000	679,000
1925....	1,900,000	1,066,000	834,000
1926....	2,155,000	1,135,000	1,020,000
1927....	1,978,000	1,374,000	604,000

Believing that the farm population is likely to stand still or decline further, the Sears, Roebuck executives lean to the view that the opportunity for the future expansion of sales lies in catering to the fast-growing urban population. General R. E. Wood, who became president of Sears, Roebuck last January, was formerly a vice-president of Montgomery Ward. He helped to plant the idea of chain-store expansion in the minds of the management of that company and has been a prime mover in getting Sears, Roebuck to set itself up to duplicate its success in dealing with rural folk through the catalogue in the new chain of urban stores.

A group of retailers and bankers is projecting a third chain of department stores. The Hahn Department Stores, under the presidency of Lew Hahn, head of the National Retail Dry Goods Association, is aiming to absorb established stores in cities in all parts of the country. Although planning to effect changes in management slowly, the new company expects ultimately to subject the units to centralized management and buying. The chief riddle in developments of this kind lies in whether the chain principles can be adapted to fast-changing fashions in so-called style merchandise.

The advance of the chains helps further to change the American economic scene. The old-fashioned entrepreneur, who started out with little capital and less grasp of merchandising technique, is not so likely to succeed. He faces a new and threatening competition, from well-administered systems with advantages in mass buying, in a trade-marked name, and in superior merchandising methods. Of course, many students of the question believe that the country has been oversupplied with merchants—with 1,500,000 storekeepers, most of whom have been eking out only a bare existence. Many, of course, have been involuntary philanthropists, working without net return, being rewarded only with insolvency. Others who keep going are in many instances earning little more than wages for themselves and the members of their families who contribute all the labor needed. They mistakenly believe they are amassing profits; adequate bookkeeping would reveal that they have only been earning wages. Only a small minority of the independents are talented merchants who make handsome profits.

In the last session of Congress Senator Brookhart induced the Senate to adopt a resolution instructing the Federal Trade Commission to undertake a thorough investigation of the methods of chain-store systems. Asserting that 4,000 chain-store systems operate 100,000 stores, the Brookhart resolution, suggesting the hazard of a trend toward monopoly in retail distribution, directs the Federal Trade Commission to study the anatomy and physiology of chain-store systems, and to report to the Senate as to

- (1) The extent to which consolidations have been effected in violation of the anti-trust laws, if at all; (2) the extent to which consolidations or combinations of such organizations are susceptible to regulation under the Federal Trade Commission Act or the anti-trust laws, if at all; and (3) what legislation, if any, should be enacted for the purpose of regulating and controlling chain-store distribution.

The Federal Trade Commission has already instituted its inquiries, but has not yet scheduled public sessions. The Brookhart resolution constituted a timely recognition of the importance of the subject. It is desirable that the Government should keep abreast of the movement, and, if not discouraging it, should at least promote public opinion in favor of the elimination of abuses. Though the chain idea has been grasped with renewed vigor recently as an instrument for bringing the rule of efficiency to the slovenly field of retail distribution, it is capable of misuse like other economic tools. Chain systems already differ widely among themselves in efficiency, in social responsibility, in their attitude toward labor, and in other matters.

The F. W. Woolworth Company, a pioneer in the chain-store field which excels in saving for net income an exceptionally high percentage of gross profits, has already demonstrated that the chain idea cannot only be indefinitely extended at home, but also can be successfully introduced in foreign countries. Its earlier success in England has recently been duplicated in Germany, where natives earlier failed in an attempt to adapt the five-and-ten-cent-store idea. To avoid resentment the Woolworth Company specializes in Canadian-made goods in Canada, in English-made goods in England, and in German-made goods in Germany.

In the future chain-store managers will have to show increasing subtlety and business genius, for chain will compete against chain, thus neutralizing the obvious advantages in quantity buying. The retail business in the future will go increasingly to the best-managed chains and the genuinely talented independent merchants, who have emulated chain-store efficiency and tempered it with a better grasp of local idiosyncrasies, the personality of the owner, and the individuality and taste of the smaller shop. Where fashions, artistry, and individuality are important, as in millinery and custom tailoring, the chain idea does not seem readily applicable. Chains are most effective when dealing in staple merchandise, such as groceries.

Consumers are likely to benefit from the heightened race for their favor—in lower prices and in better service. The well-managed chains, though operating in quest of profits, indirectly help to stretch the buying power of the ordinary pay envelope. In so far as this is the case the consumer is little moved by the sentimental pleas of vanishing old-fashioned merchants, whose inefficiency used to levy a substantial cost on the community in which they operated. Accordingly, there is little evidence any longer of the types of appeals which harassed independent merchants vainly made two decades ago. Before the war it was common for an independent cigar merchant, for example, to erect a huge sign appealing to consumers to patronize him, rather than the chain store which opened nearby. The cigar dealer in those days notified the public that his business future had been threatened by the arrival of the trust. Out of sentiment he expected consumers to stick to him. The plea was unrealistic and unavailing. The consumer was primarily interested in lower prices, fresher merchandise, and improved service. Where the chain gave such advantages it prospered, and grew with striking rapidity. Finding consumers hard-boiled and unsympathetic the hard-pressed independents are now looking to the politicians for aid, although such assistance can hardly impress the consumer.

North Carolina, South Carolina, Maryland, and Georgia passed anti-chain-store laws imposing special taxes on such systems. The courts in North Carolina, South Carolina, and Maryland have already declared the measures unconstitutional. Hostile legislation was also proposed in numerous other States. To combat political opposition, chain-store executives have recently formed the National Chain Store Association, an outgrowth of the National Chain Store Grocers Association. This association, it is understood, plans to raise a huge propaganda fund to demonstrate the advantages of chain-store buying and selling.

The Master of the Vestris

By FELIX RIESENBERG

BY the law of the eternal sea the master, as the name implies, stands to the fore. First to board his ship and last to leave, he is the word and the law and the impersonation of the power absolute. His judgment, foresight, caution, skill, and integrity stand between the weak and helpless and the horror of such disasters as those of the Egypt, the Principessa Mafalda, the Angamos, and the Vestris, only to name ships that have foundered recently.

For a lifetime a man may follow the ancient calling of the sea. For years on end he may steam from port to port as master, carrying an aggregate of goods and treasure staggering in amount. He may have been actually responsible for the safe conduct of thousands upon thousands of lives. It is quite possible that never, in all of his time, will he lose a ton of cargo or a single life. All of this is the subject of tabulation, of strict statistics carefully compiled. The stowage of the ship, managed by others, may always be reasonably safe. Cargo and coaling ports and hatches attended to and inspected by others may always be securely closed against the sea. The structure of his vessel, inspected by the surveyors, may be safe at all times and his boats and gear may be legally and actually sound. The dangers of the sea have been discounted. Clever underwriters fill in pious phrases referring to an act of God, and balance chance against numbers. It is all a commercial problem in which the ship and cargo are insured against loss by fire or foundering and tickets are sold to as many passengers as can be crowded on board.

The shipmaster, referred to in the opening paragraph, has become very much of a cipher in the modern organization known as the steamship business. The cold facts are that this man of supreme responsibilities is an employee like any other employee, paid about four hundred dollars a month on large passenger steamers and less in many other services. The master, on practically every vessel afloat today, is an underpaid servant.

The underpaid master, in fear of displeasing his owners and with the constant problem ahead of him of continuing the support of his family, may easily develop a self-protective point of view designed to hold himself in continuous employment. It is a subservient and humble attitude not uncommon everywhere but decidedly out of place at sea. This sort of thing may result in timidity and indecision and even in downright criminal incompetence when some grave emergency demands that the master shall be a man of rapid and decisive action. This is no specific indictment of the owners of the S. S. Vestris, it is a blanket charge against the accumulated stupidity of this age of steel and steam, the marvelous machine age that has filled the oceans with vessels carrying passengers for hire. We have built great ships, but have overlooked the fact that great men are needed to command them in the hour of danger.

The cable robbed the master mariner of his function as a merchant trader. It relegated him, in the minds of many owners, to the status of a ship conductor. The radio has further linked him with the office desks ashore and in many instances has made him a creature of the whims of others. The shipmasters of the days of the clippers would look with scorn on the status of the shipmaster of today.

These conditions, and they are actual conditions, economic facts, as anyone who cares to investigate may find out, have in no way strengthened the hand of the shipmaster. To the great credit of the old fraternity of the sea let it be said that the low pay, small honor, and meager treatment of the merchant master mariner has not completely wiped away his virtue. The great majority of ship-masters today, under the conditions cited, remain true masters of the sea, firm and steadfast in their realization of the overwhelming burdens always upon them. A list of the value of the properties they command, the number of lives intrusted to them, and their compensation would make interesting reading.

While the true seaman cannot be warped by poverty, the weak man becomes more weak under the system now in vogue at sea. Captain Carey of the S. S. Vestris presents a study of criminal indecision almost unparalleled in the recorded history of the sea. His apparent fear of incurring a possible salvage charge against his owners may have been a thought that obsessed him. No other reasonable explanation can account for his long delay in signaling for help. Keeping down costs is a sort of holy gospel on many ships of today, and, as the masters have had this drilled into them both by word and fact, the dollar assumes an importance beyond all else.

Captain Carey, who went down with his ship, while not an admirable figure in any way, is also as much of a victim as the smallest child tumbled into the sea by this disaster, based on negligence and stupidity. He was the victim of an inspection, however perfunctory, that pronounced his vessel seaworthy, an inspection made by officers of the United States Steamboat Inspection Service. That service is charged with the most important duties falling to any public servants. It is under the Department of Commerce, lately conducted by a great administrator and humanitarian, Herbert Hoover. Its inspectors, officers charged with duties that directly concern the safety and lives of thousands, are shamefully underpaid. Its powers, especially with regard to foreign craft plying out of American ports, many of them passenger carriers, are limited. The United States Steamboat Inspection Service has many able men saddled with unending duties but almost submerged by official parsimonious blindness. These United States inspectors saw nothing wrong with boats, ports, or gear of Captain Carey's ship.

The stowage of vessels no longer depends upon the master, even indirectly through his mates. Often the officers are merely watchmen and tally clerks. The habitual and constant supervision of the old time ship's officers has suffered in the process of progress. The constant and careful overhauling of boat gear, falls, and tackle is no longer a seamanlike and thorough proceeding. Captain Carey was not personally responsible for conditions such as these, conditions more or less common now at sea. The security of cargo and coaling ports may never be reported formally to the master, by the mate, but much is taken for granted, and on the average, of course, such ports are closed.

The lifeboats are lifted from their chocks and lowered in port, to comply with the letter of the law, but in no adequate way does this assure any degree of skill in their handling. Certificated lifeboat men are created by some mysterious method not directly connected with the actual handling of lifeboats in a sea. Boats themselves, after certain statutory requirements have been met, vary greatly. No tests have been made to determine and insist upon the staunchest form of construction. Boats called "lifeboats," and more properly deathboats, are built in the cheapest way of sheet metal easily punctured and impossible to repair in an emergency. Other boats are simply planked, easily stove in, and are difficult to keep tight when drying out on the boat deck of a ship. The best boats are those built of two thicknesses of stout oak planking, crossed in diagonal laps, riveted together, and strengthened by heavy waterproof canvas laid between the layers. These boats cannot be stove in except by some extreme force, but they are expensive equipment. Costs and safety to life are often balanced, with the scale inclining toward economy.

And with all of the boat equipment cluttering the upper works of steamers, how little of it can be used! The crews of steamers constantly change, the men never have practice in lowering boats in a heavy sea, they seldom have organized practice in rowing, and almost never lower all boats at one time. Such precautions are too much trouble!

The safety of the million or so of passengers on the sea today is largely a matter of chance. Knowing the terrible risks, the almost insurmountable difficulties, shipmasters alive to their responsibilities grow prematurely old through worry.

Having taken a brief survey of conditions at sea, conditions prevailing on many ships throughout the world, let us follow the S. S. Vestris. She steamed out of the Port of New York, bound for the River Plate, on Saturday, November 10. Her papers were in order, her condition seaworthy, according to certification, this largely a matter of perfunctory detail. The averages, of course, were with her. Heavy seas were met with, it was Sunday, and the vessel took a list. Cargo shifted, she was on her starboard side, her coaling ports were submerged, and one of them, sprung open, or improperly closed, admitted a constant stream of water into the bunker.

Did Captain Carey at once radio the condition of his ship to his owners? If not, what was his object in keeping her condition a secret? He must have realized the danger to his ship and to his passengers. Yet the scant evidence seems to show that Captain Carey held back his S O S, stopped his engines, and attempted to right his vessel. The story of an attempt to bail out the ship, by hand, seems too incredible to believe. The attempt to jettison cargo is hardly in keeping with the tale of high seas. The whole day and night previous to the disaster the S. S. Vestris was in such peril that no explanation seems adequate to account for the silence of the master. Timidity of almost heroic proportions must have gripped him. He must have seen a specter rise before his eye—the terrible specter of salvage costs. Captain Carey seems to have been more afraid of salvage than he was of death, and he certainly had no very great sense of moral responsibility toward his passengers, many of them women and children.

Women and children first! In the bungling experiment of launching boats, the first boats capsized into the sea. The piled-up horror of the picture, of no leadership, no seamanship, no decent foresight under the very shadow of doom must remain an awful daub against the bright record made by British seamen.

This record of the habitual belittlement of the master is no mere figment of the mind. In this state of small rewards and grudging recognition and fear we might find many Captain Careys. The underwriters have figured it all out for us, it is all a business; the premiums are based upon actual percentages, and so you are really quite safe with your women and children, safe to go anywhere in the world today, in comfort and luxury, just as long as you don't sail on an Egypt, a Principessa Mafalda, an Angamos, or a Vestris. Even then you might be safe if you had a master in command who was well qualified for his trust.

Americans We Like Hunt of Arizona

By MARY AUSTIN

GEORGE WILEY PAUL HUNT began his career as Governor of Arizona the earliest possible moment it could be arranged in anticipation of Statehood. This was in December, 1911. His only lapse from office was 1919-1920, which he spent in recovering his health and acting as Minister to Siam, returning by way of the rest of the world in time to defeat certain proposed amendments to the State constitution designed to wipe out the initiative, referendum, direct primary, and other Jeffersonian prerogatives of the people. There was also a lapse of executive activity in 1917 owing to a mistaken impression on the part of the Republicans that Thomas E. Campbell had been elected, later corrected by the courts. Since which time, except for his absence in the Far East under instruction from his Government, George Hunt has remained in the executive chair.*

By his political opponents—and some of Arizona's best men have taken the field against him—the Governor is credited with all the political astuteness which a man can carry without upsetting a reputation for courage and honesty which even his opponents do not impugn. Possibly some light is thrown on the situation by explaining that Hunt is a Democrat from Missouri, of South Carolinian Revolutionary stock; that he came to Arizona in 1881 as a lad of twenty-one or -two, hustling for a livelihood when the West was so new, became a cowboy, a mucker in a copper mine, a clerk in a commercial company, emerging about 1900 as its president and a member of the Territorial Legislature. In 1910 he was made delegate to the Territorial Convention, became its presiding member, active in securing the ratification of its constitution which did not altogether please the timid and conventional Taft. It was the opinion of Arizona at that time that the constitution ought to please the President, since it could so easily be made over to please Arizona at the next meeting of the legislature. Accordingly the Territory came in as a State with George Hunt as first Governor. All of which seems to suggest that Hunt may have a native gift for political management.

In any personal study of the man, however, it is quickly evident that such a gift rests upon a native interest in and sympathy with that entity known as the People. The gist of complaint against him is that administratively he seems to be guided by those interests and sympathies rather than by the rules of the game that are known as "economic and business principles." But suppose that interest in and sympathy with human beings is the only admissible excuse for that play of personal quality on group perception which is the mainspring of politics? And suppose that, when the play of personal quality upon group perception is used to advance political dogmas, it becomes merely a play on human prejudices and prepossessions, as seems abundantly proved in the American experiment. Then the personal quality that can produce such results as George Wiley Paul Hunt's continuing gubernatorial relation to Arizona becomes a primary political interest. To one who believes, as does the writer, that the set of dogmatic behaviors which goes by the name of "economic and business principles" is about as relevant to social progress as the rules of mah jong, people who "play politics" with such "principles" for counters appear about as useful to society as though they were actually engaged in the Chinese game. Therefore the survival of a political type, and enough people in Arizona willing to be interested in him, who without prejudice to his integrity abandons the conventional economic dogma and plays politics on the basis of human interest, becomes at once an object of acute intellectual curiosity. It may be recalled that faith in the political validity of human interest and personal quality were once assumed to be sufficient ground for launching the American experiment. It is only here in our Southwest that the type lingers and reaches its peak in Governor George Hunt.

In part this may be owing to the fact that Arizona is still close enough to pioneer conditions to constitute Hunt's particular personal qualities—courage, honesty, and self-direction—the test of men. Within his sixty-seven years Hunt has been everything an Arizonan can be except rich. Probably no one in American politics grows deliberately rich who is not more interested in the mechanics of the game than in its humanities. Just how astute Hunt may be in the building and management of a political machine must be told by those who have had experience with him; in its final public effect every stroke of his career is seen to be on the side of the humanities. His path is always instinctively in the direction of the Jeffersonian ideal of man as an essentially decent creature of self-governing capacity.

To understand him in relation to these peculiarly Western situations it is helpful to realize that the Governor's formal education ended with the eight grades which ordinarily carry the American boy to his fourteenth year. Later the lack was made up by studious reading of the time-sifted residue of books called classic.

In this manner he escaped that standardization of ideas and thwartings of the natural instinct for his own right way which seems to be the goal of modern education. It is partly owing to the informal quality of his learning that Hunt has avoided that conventionalization of his interests into categories of the "practical" and all others. Anything that people do interests him. Governor Hunt has one of the most complete private collections of Arizona Indian arts and crafts in the State. What he brought back from the Far East were chiefly examples of Oriental handicrafts. He is especially interested in making grow any plant which may prove of use or pleasure to man, and the garden about his home is a horticultural experiment station stocked with contributions from all over the world. He is interested in game laws and the preservation of wild life, himself breeding pheasants and encouraging others to breed them, and wild turkeys, for the replenishing of the depleted coverts of Arizona. He has been active in resisting the "practical" interests that would destroy the alleged 150,000 deer on Kaibab National Forest Reserve. He has reinstated the elk in his ancient pastures. When the artist invasion of the Southwest began a decade or so ago, Governor Hunt did not know any better than to be interested in that, too, and though there were business men enough at hand to advise him how impractical all that art bunk is, he became an early and persistent buyer of pictures, even occasionally buying them for his State. In precisely the same fashion, without reference to the orthodoxies of professional uplift and criminology, he has interested himself in prison reform. He visited prisons and interviewed prisoners, introducing such alleviations as that for every day of the condemned man's incarceration spent in public works he receives two days' remission of sentence, and that while in prison he may take any preferred course of correspondence-school instruction at the State's expense. The Governor is particularly outspoken against the death penalty and in favor of free speech and a free press. Without getting himself tagged with any of the current captions of radicalism, George Hunt is known as a "friend of labor," and at the same time committed away from all leanings toward state socialism and in favor of early American individualism.

This brings us down to the Bisbee deportations in the summer of 1917. Arizona has vast mining interests controlled largely from Eastern financial centers, with labor for the most part imported from outside, particularly from Mexico. At that time the I. W. W. was pretty well intrenched in the mines massed close to the Mexican border, which the prevailing revolutionary conditions rendered a source of general uneasiness. In July a strike was called in Globe and Clifton, followed in no long time by violence. Big Bill Haywood denied that the strike had been called by his organization, which put the trouble squarely up to the local miners and mine-owners. Woodrow Wilson, who, it may be recalled, had a large uneasiness on his own hands about that time, suggested that George W. P. Hunt be asked to act as conciliator, and Hunt accepted. This was during the eleven months when Campbell was in the chair and the courts were trying to find out who had been elected. Hunt's acceptance was regarded as a source of unnecessary embarrassment to the acting Governor, and with some suspicion, since he was known as a sympathizer with labor. Nevertheless he believed himself to be acting for the good of the State as a whole, and the indications are that he might have effected something; but the matter was taken out of everybody's hands by a Citizens' Protective League which promptly and illegally deported about a thousand of the more or less implicated miners.

The details of that dramatic event are too fresh in the public mind to require recapitulation. Acting Governor Campbell appeared to be powerless, and Hunt was asked by the President to investigate and report upon the deportation. This led to further investigation under Secretary of Labor Wilson. Too late to redeem the situation, it was decided by the courts that Hunt was the duly elected Governor of Arizona. One of his earliest official acts was an unqualified condemnation of the illegal and constitutionally inadmissible action of the Citizens' Protective League, composed of some 1,500 influential citizens.

I have never found it possible in my own mind to reproach Arizona for this rejection of a situation originating within its borders at the instigation of influences and interests outside the State's social consent, and in a brief account of the State's evolution, written somewhat later, refused to allow it more than an incidental value. The point in recalling it now is that the group of citizens responsible for the deportations was the one which makes most public profession of "economic and business principles" in the conduct of politics, that the episode was without force in the reelection of Governor Hunt, and that it has at least one point of resemblance to the present situation created by Hunt's resistance to the Santa Fe Compact in respect to the Colorado River Reclamation Project.

Any complete account of the Colorado River difficulty must wait upon a larger opportunity. Briefly, the seven States with rights of usufruct in the river, meeting at Santa Fe in 1923, agreed to an arrangement by which Arizona, which has less than 2 per cent of its lands outside of the river basin and is in every way most intimately affected, is left competing with California and Nevada for 50 per cent of the benefits of the river's reclamation.

This compact Arizona, with Hunt leading, has refused to ratify, first of all on the ground that it puts Arizona's future, with all its implications, at the mercy of California's immediate advantage. Immense resources of irrigation and power will accrue from the conservation of the river. California is working for a plan which will enable her to put in a claim far in excess of her natural right, a plan which if successful will enable other States to enter the territory of a neighboring State and appropriate its natural resources for their own use without the consent of the plundered State.

The "economic and business principle" upon which this revolutionary proceeding is founded is that California wants and is ready to use these resources much sooner than Arizona, which is not quite so far along in her development. This is a characteristically American and distinctly menacing situation. That our modern business world in the United States is woozy with speed and goggle-eyed with the infatuation of size is a fact all the world knows and deplures. The California project is, in the cult of boosters, a BIG THING, RIGHT NOW. Who in this world has attention to spare for a small-print proposal involving the normal evolution of regional culture on regionally circumscribed natural resources? For one, George Hunt has, and a large following in the State of Arizona. That the Swing-Johnson bill, which is one of California's devices for getting what she wants, opens the door to a use of federalization which is clean outside the original intention of the Republic, or that California appears to be willing to make alliance with Mexico in her proposed rape of Arizona's resources, are items which may or may not interest other United Staters. They interest the Governor of Arizona extremely.

There he stands, the representative figure almost solely aware of the nationally threatening implications of his situation. A man on the further side of middle years, bulky, homely in the old sense of looking the sort of person a deep-rooted racial experience recognizes as a familiar home type, a voice smooth but without insistence, an eye that twinkles easily, evident but not obtrusive lack of health, a manner of great good nature and complete invulnerability. Certainly the outstanding political figure in our Southwest.

In the Driftway

THE West Coast! Mr. Hoover's visit along that desolate but majestic stretch from the Panama Canal to Valparaiso brings back many pictures to the Drifter: lighters bobbing up and down in the swell of the Pacific Ocean as they loaded or unloaded cargo from the ship lying in the roadsteads of drought-baked ports; kicking, bellowing cattle hoisted aboard by slings; vendors of Panama hats and other merchandise who came on deck at the various stops, gradually reducing their prices as the hour of sailing arrived, until at the last blast of the whistle they almost gave their wares away; piles of yellowish-white blocks along the waterfronts of the nitrate coast representing its unique wealth; beyond all the ever-present backbone of the Andes—5,000 miles of vertebrae the heights of which were lost in gray mist while their base was obscured in windrows of tawny sand sprawling out to meet the sea.

* * * * *

THE West Coast! Among travelers, of course, that never means the Pacific shore of our own country, but only and exclusively that of South America. There were practically no docks along the entire stretch when the Drifter last saw it, and there are few, he believes, today. The ship stopped a couple of hours or a couple of days in the roadstead of various ports while stevedores worked cargo from lighters and passengers rowed ashore to explore the towns. The Drifter traveled on a Chilean steamship with a bluff, hearty English skipper who insisted that the Drifter occupy two cabins and chose him as partner in the deck sports, doubtless because the Drifter's lack of skill showed off the captain's finesse to better advantage. Anyhow the captain always stood by with encouraging advice and his favorite slogan: "Come on now, Drifter. Faint heart ne'er won fat lady." As our ship belonged to a Chilean line but had an English skipper, and carried a good many passengers of the same nationality, we had to conform to the eating habits of both Chile and England. This meant seven meals a day, which was rather strenuous for us poor dubs who were neither Chilean nor English but just neutral trenchers. In order not to offend either side, most of us compromised by showing up for all the meals of both. It may sound impossible, but it's wonderful what sea air and good cooking will do as appetite producers. We began with coffee for the early risers and at eight we sat down to a good English breakfast, beginning with porridge and running through salt fish and eggs and bacon to marmalade and toast. At eleven the gong sounded for the South American almuerzo—or breakfast—while at one o'clock we were back at the board for a substantial English lunch. English tea followed at four, at seven there was an international dinner, and at about ten the day was concluded with an English cold supper. When we left the ship at her last port some of us could scarcely squeeze between the rails of the gangway. There was danger that we would have to be dropped ashore like the cattle—in slings.

* * * * *

THE West Coast! Mr. Hoover's first large city will be the ancient capital of Lima, just back of the port of Callao. Lima, where the eyes of the women are as soulful as Madonnas and as black as their beautiful mantillas, is probably more Spanish than any city left in Spain today.

The Drifter is sure that Lima has not changed in its essential character since he saw it, and probably not much since the days of "The Bridge of San Luis Rey." Below Lima for a thousand miles stretches the nitrate coast, barren but stupendous. Practically no rain falls on the western slope of the Andes over the entire stretch. No grass, no trees, no littlest redeeming spot of green. But though there is no rain, there is almost no sunshine either. The clouds are always gathering around the gaunt upper tiers of the Andes, though they yield no moisture. Mile after mile of this coast unrolls before one, a wall of parched mountain heights with billows of tan-colored sand between it and the sea. How it is barren, but how, also, it is beautiful! On such a waste of sand sits the city of Iquique, famous the world over for its export of nitrate of soda across the Seven Seas. As if to compensate for nature's lack of verdure, the people of Iquique have painted their houses green. Antofagasta, another great nitrate port lower down the coast, has not been at such pains. It seems utterly dreary, too depressed with itself even to try to recall any distant Eden. Before visiting Antofagasta the Drifter once asked an American drummer what it was like. "If the president of the Anti-Saloon League had to live in Antofagasta for six months," was the reply, "he'd become a drunkard."

Rumanian Minorities

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I want to sketch the background of the minority problem in post-war Rumania. If the various committees that have gone to Rumania had gone in a less partisan spirit (especially the American committees which gave a proselyting and sectarian Protestant point of view), we might have obtained an excellent monograph on the subject instead of vivacious partisan documents. Is it not true that at a recent meeting the Episcopalian proposal to help progress and reform within the various Greek Orthodox churches was turned down by the unanimous voice of the rest of the denominations in favor of the more militant policy of conversion? We know that the great Protestant churches are out for the continuation of the "Great Reform," which is doubly unfortunate because the protagonists of the "Great Reform" in Rumania belong to non-Rumanian races. Rumania is still governed by the old generation, born and bred in a pre-war Balkan atmosphere of suspicion and fear; and what can they oppose to money and foreign influence if not the organized power of the state?

A second point is the fact that the minority groups are themselves ruled by conservatives who prefer association with the so-called Liberal Party (really conservative) because of sympathy with its economic program in spite of the fact that this conservative, chauvinistic party is obviously inclined to curtail the cultural and other rights of the minorities. The National Peasant Party, on the other hand, has an economic and financial program adapted to the needs of a cooperative peasant state, but this is unpalatable to the leaders of the minorities although it would benefit the minority masses both from the cultural and the economic points of view. The leaders have not hesitated to sacrifice the interests of the masses to their own ends, and have thereby incurred the suspicions of everybody.

The German minority has best established its connections with the administrative organs in Bucharest and has accepted the post-war settlement most sincerely. Issues are still pending, for the minority treaty requires interpretation, but it has been interpreted most favorably for those that have gained the confidence of the Bucharest administrative organs. The Hungarian minority, on the other hand, looks upon the present situation as "temporary," since the Hungarian Government is pursuing its revisionist campaign abroad. It has failed to establish connections with the Rumanian administrative organs; worse still, it defies them. In such an atmosphere problems cannot be solved nor treaties interpreted. In Rumania there are at least three distinct Jewish minorities, each with its peculiar problems, so that no general solution is feasible. The Jews, too, are organized into a political party, whose leader is a conservative and has backed the present regime, the leaders enjoying the material benefits of the association while complaining against the chauvinistic policy of the same party.

It is possible that in the circumstances the policy pursued by the Jewish minority was the best for itself; the conservative regime in Rumania had been in power for nine years, and it had to be dealt with. We also know that Mr. Filderman, the leader of the Jewish Party in Rumania, was almost blackmailed into allegiance to the present regime by Mr. Duca, the present Minister of the Interior. There were threats that the Anti-Semitic League would not be curbed, as, indeed, it was not. Rather Mr. Fischer backed Mr. Filderman and obtained some tangible improvements in the situation, which, again from the immediate point of view, cannot be denied. Before this the policy of the United Jews of Rumania had been antagonistic to the Rumanian Government, and no tangible results had been obtained. But in the long run minority rights must spring from a more generous and all-pervading progressive doctrine backed by a new mentality. This is the hope that the National Peasant Party holds out. Under such a progressive rule the Jewish question would certainly be improved.

I doubt whether the problems referring to the Hungarian minority can be solved by any party, whether from the Left or from the Right, so long as a feudal government in Hungary encourages them in an attitude of intransigence. No policy, however friendly, would improve the situation until democratic governments are installed both in Hungary and in Rumania. Till then there will be interpretations of treaties, American commissions, investigations, campaigns, declarations, but no solution.

And, since a tale of murder has been repeated in The Nation and elsewhere, may I say that the December outbreaks, though violent, left no dead, that the Hungarian dispatches that announced them were denied two days afterward by all the American correspondents, that people on both sides were injured, and, finally, that damages have been paid for the destruction.

Socialism and Prejudice

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: During the last campaign more than 10,000 clippings referring to the Socialist Party came to my attention. I traveled to the Pacific Coast with Norman Thomas and attended more than half of his public meetings. I saw a great deal of the correspondence which came to National Socialist Campaign Headquarters as well as the many thousands of inquiries which came to the New Leader, the Socialist publication. In all these contacts I never found one single substantiation of the statement contained in The Nation's leading editorial of this week: "We cannot forget that for most Americans socialism connotes only Bolshevism or anarchy." Only twice have I heard this idea suggested—once in your editorial and once by Mr. Villard in a radio address soon after Election Day.

New York, November 16

EDWARD LEVINSON

[Our expression was perhaps unguarded. But the fact that we meant to bring out, namely, that socialism is utterly misunderstood and damned as dangerous radicalism by masses of Americans, is as true as it is regrettable. The Nation will always be ready to protest against this confused political thinking, but it must recognize facts as they are.—EDITOR THE NATION.]

Catholic Despair

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: We, as Catholic Americans, have no voice in this government, since our boys need never cherish the hope of attaining the office of President of these United States of America. I would like it to be known that sixteen members of this family will never put the government to the trouble of counting our ballots, for we will not vote again. The need of another "Boston Tea Party" is our answer.

Next!

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Now that we have lost the election and the K. K. K., the A. S. L., the Funnymentalists, and the tomheffins are in the ascendancy, along with the priests of Mammon, maybe we will get together and form a liberal party. Or shall we meekly bow our necks?

A Private Letter to H. G. Wells

DEAR MR. WELLS:

Although you do not know me from Eve and as likely as not would disown me if you met me, I am, as you English would say, by way of being one of your daughters. Only in the most figurative sense, of course. Actually I have an excellent father who offered me a cigarette and your novels at almost exactly the same time—when I was about sixteen years old. I imagine he knew I was likely to adopt you as a sort of secondary parent and was willing enough to share the job.

I recall riding in a night train from New York toward the Adirondack Mountains and reading on the way a new novel, "Ann Veronica." Beside me was seated a stout, gray dignitary who knew my family. "Does your father allow you to read that sort of book?" he asked me. "I read them first," I said, "and then I decide whether to allow him to." You can see that the Wellsian influence was already at work. By adopting a new father at that viscous age I took shape gradually in his image: pert, undignified, irreverent, headlong, hopeful, ready to alter everything including myself into almost anything different.

And not only I. By the same process, a whole generation of cocky, iconoclastic young men and women came into being. Of course, you were not our only father, Mr. Wells. There were others, particularly Mr. Galsworthy and Mr. Shaw. Together you formed a sort of Unholy Trinity, a symbol of all that seemed daring and wicked and promising in those pre-war years. So much of us was bound up in you and your creeds that when Virginia Woolf with her thin sharp knife quite recently unfleshed your bones, we felt the blade along our own nerves and shrank slightly—even while we admired her deft and hardy courage.

But you were the most energetic and intimate of our fathers. You covered so much ground. You opened so many doors. You delighted and excited and angered us. You offered us all the world in tempting cans with lively labels: Socialism, Free Love, Marriage, Education, World Organization, and H. G. Wells's Patented Feminism—Very Perishable. Down they went. And gradually, on this varied if not always digestible diet, the children grew older.

You know what happened; it often happens to the better sort of fathers. You stayed just exactly the same age; but we grew up. For long periods we stopped associating with you; then we would run into you again. "He hasn't changed in ten years," we would say admiringly; or, "He doesn't seem a day older. How does he do it?" The war came; and there you were being intelligent, hopeful, inquiring about the war. The Russian Revolution burst—and you were there as the sparks descended. You launched a religion or two and unhorsed a couple of rather worn-out deities. You wrote a history of the universe. You condensed it. You sniffed the smoke of the General Strike, and wrote "Meanwhile." Then, not long ago, you began to map the future, the whole future, to visualize more completely the organizing of the race, the creation of a social purpose, the international control of the collective interests of mankind. In short, you wrote a book on What to Do About Everything, and promised several more to follow. And in the midst of this project you took time out to write a very pleasant sort of novel or fantasy with sermons attached, called "Mr. Blettsworthy on Rampole Island"* which brings us down past the execution of Sacco and Vanzetti.

So here you are, right to the minute, with ideas, humor, plans, romances, charts, slogans, energy, erudition, religion, science, hope. . . . And where are we—the generation you so obviously and inescapably begot? Some of us are dead—because people didn't listen to you before the war began. The rest of us have grown skeptical. We smile paternally every time a new book by you appears and we read one of them now and then if it isn't about religion. We smile and then we go on as we are—expecting little, doing less, seeing and understanding somewhat more. We have lost most of the brash impetuosity and expectant eagerness that characterized our pre-war years. We are not even as pert as we were. War and revolution and peace have combined to make us wary of programs and dubious of collective purposes, especially those developing from the enterprise of "stronger and better men" than we. We are the Mr. Blettsworthys of your world, Mr. Wells. You tell us, out of the mouth of your latest personal spokesman, Mr. Graves, that "this world is full now of enterprise. Confused, conflicting, disorganized, aimless, if you like, but here it is. . . ." We grant the enterprise; it has created an exciting and in some ways a pleasant world. But how much of it is being spent on organizing the equitable distribution of rubber and oil and cotton and coal or in intelligently planning for peace? Such organization may be attempted one day, if the Western World holds together, but not, we suspect, because wise and strong people "are feeling their way; making their plans." Rather because great pressures produce slight shifts.

Still, don't let's argue about that; it would take all night. Let us agree to differ. Let us admit that you are young and we are old and the generation that is just behind us is older still. Let us admit that, from your point of view, your children didn't turn out very well. The truth is, I've been disagreeing with you ever since I adopted you. First about feminism; then about marriage; then about religion. And now about everything. (Particularly, I think you did the natives of Rampole Island a serious injustice; only the seamy side of primitive customs seems to attract your attention.) All in all, I should say that this state of universal disagreement between us proves that you are the ideal father.

Franz Schubert

Franz Schubert. By Newman Flower. Frederick A. Stokes. $5.

WHEN, twenty-six years ago, the late Henry T. Finck reviewed Heuberger's biography of Schubert in the columns of The Nation he commented upon the growing recognition of Schubert's exalted rank among the great masters as "one of the most noteworthy phenomena in the musical world today." Since this was written there has been a steadily increasing interest in everything concerning "the little man who was a giant," culminating this year, the centenary of his death, in all manner of celebrations, memorial concerts, monographs, and biographies both here and abroad.

Newman Flower's interesting work includes much new material made available by two years of research. In his foreword he disclaims any attempt to deal critically with Schubert's music. His aim is to present a picture of the man and his circle, and this he has done with a wealth of detail and as completely as his temperament allows. But the perfect Schubert biographer must be more in sympathy with the Viennese spirit than Mr. Flower has shown himself to be. The "beloved city of song," joyously, sentimentally celebrated by countless of her children, receives none but harsh words from his pen. "Art was dead." "Life moved in the slow, dread circles of fear." Surely this is not the smiling Vienna of Schubert and Schwind, of the "Drei Mäderl Haus," and Grillparzer's "Eternal Bride," the city that Spohr called the capital of the musical world and Sir William Henry Hadow compared with Periclean Athens.

Schindler said of Schubert that his life presented neither hill nor valley but an open plain. In attempting to heighten the interest of a story almost devoid of external incident the story-teller must be sorely tempted to dramatize, even to distort, unimportant details, and Mr. Flower, it seems to me, errs in persistently creating tragedy where probably none existed. He quotes Schubert's well-known letter to his brother Ferdinand as an example of his acute suffering in his student days at the Konvikt. "In a torment of hunger," says Mr. Flower, Franz begged his brother to send him a few groschen a month for apples and rolls. Other biographers have used this same letter to prove that even as a boy Schubert possessed a sense of humor.

"It is doubtful," says Mr. Flower, "that Schubert realized the measure of his tragedy." Doubtful indeed! Surely a life filled to overflowing with a never-failing spring of melody, with the consciousness of genius and the adoration of a brilliant circle of friends, to say nothing of the congenial coffee-house evenings, must have presented compensations far outweighing any lack of public recognition. If Schubert had been as deeply concerned as his biographers with his own success, he would probably have done something about it. He might have been director of the Opera if he had been willing to alter one of his scores. Those to whom success is important are usually ready to compromise. Schubert refused. He might have had help from Weber if he had not been unnecessarily frank in expressing his opinion of "Euryanthe." The first public concert of his works was received with such enthusiasm that a second was demanded. He never arranged it.

In all fairness, it must be admitted that Mr. Flower is not alone in his estimate of Schubert's unhappiness. My quarrel with him lies in the fact that he too seems to have failed to grasp the exaltation that must have filled the inner life of a man whose constant companion was beauty and who could compose seven songs in a day.

Aside from this lack, Mr. Flower's book must be of unusual interest to every Schubert lover. He casts significant light on many disputed questions, notably the love affair with Caroline Esterhazy, and he absolves Salieri from all blame in losing his pupil the Laibach appointment. He also offers a new version of the circumstances attendant on the composition of

"Hark, Hark, the Lark." Special mention must be made of the portrait reproductions, especially the beautiful Teltscher which serves as frontispiece. It is a pity that the names of the artists, many of them members of the "Circle," are so often omitted.

BLANCHE BLOCH

The Wild Goose

Orlando. A Biography. By Virginia Woolf. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $3.

"MY name is Brown. Come and catch me if you can." So the novelist, according to Virginia Woolf when she is speaking as critic, is perpetually solicited by some Brown, Smith, or Jones, and launched on the pursuit of character. Success in the pursuit is the test of his achievement. Mrs. Woolf's Brown has appeared in the guise of the Rachel and Jacob who perished young, the Mrs. Dalloway who found life still exciting at fifty, the Mrs. Ramsay who died in a parenthesis; and now he steps forth as Orlando, hero-heroine, who dies not at all, but spans the centuries from Queen Elizabeth to Thursday, October 11, 1928—at that moment aged thirty-six and a lady. And now we know what we have suspected for some time—but Mrs. Brown in the corner of the railway carriage led us astray: that Mrs. Woolf is not seeking to capture characters, but life. The characters serve her often very well; but when they don't, an empty house in the Hebrides, or a mark on the wall will do. Orlando at any moment of his surprising career is no more alive than his historic house, where "the light airs which forever moved about the galleries stirred the blue and green arras, so that it looked as if the huntsmen were riding and Daphne were flying." Yet life escapes after all. When Orlando's lover swoops down in his plane on the last page, there springs up over his head a single wild bird. "The wild goose," cries Orlando. The wild goose that had haunted her ever since she was a child. "There flies the wild goose. It flies past the window out to sea. . . . I've seen it here, there, there, England, Persia, Italy . . . always it flies out to sea, and always I fling after it words like nets, which shrivel as I have seen nets shrivel, drawn on deck with only seaweed in them. And sometimes there is an inch of silver—six words—in the bottom of the net. . . . But never the great fish who lives in the coral groves." There is much more than an inch of silver in the nets Mrs. Woolf draws in, and the seaweed comes from the gardens of Poseidon, or from those enchanted frozen depths where during the Great Frost in England shoals of eels lay motionless in a trance, and the old bumboat woman sat with her apples in her lap, ready to serve her customers, and only a blueness about her lips hinted the truth.

What can one say of such a book, except that its fantasy is delicious, its poetry exquisite, and that the images into which its scholarship is distilled make one often catch one's breath with delight? One could solemnly explain that such and such an image—say the ice floes, with their fantastic human cargo, carried out to sea on the turbulent yellow flood that followed the Great Frost—meant this and that about Elizabethan life and letters. Better do as Mrs. Woolf does when Mr. Pope is pleased to be witty in a salon: "the little gentleman said. He said next. He said finally," with a footnote that these sayings are too well-known to require repetition. Let all the changes that the long-lived Orlando witnessed be suggested by the lovely image: "High battlements of thought, habits that seemed durable as stone, went down like shadows at the touch of another mind, and left a naked sky and fresh stars twinkling in it."

Exploring the stream of consciousness is still the salient feature of Mrs. Woolf's technique. But Orlando has hundreds of Mrs. Dalloway's moments; Jacob's room has become a mansion of a thousand chambers; and the river up which Rachel drifted is the stream of English life and thought for three centuries and more. Orlando experiences almost everything but birth and death—unless you call his change of sex birth or death: love, happy and defeated; desire for fame, disillusionment that turns him from men to dogs and nature; ambassadorial splendors; profound meditations on his high hill where the oak tree stood about which he wrote his secular poem; the joy of creating material beauty all about him, the urge to seek the strange and exotic, and the yearning to come home again; pleasure in the society of wits and relief in the honest company of prostitutes; the thrill of being a man and pursuing, and of being a woman and refusing and yielding; the comfort of black silk knee-breeches, and also—but no, there was no comfort for Orlando in Victorian crinolines. For it was then that she found it difficult to become one with the spirit of the age, though she did, passing Buckingham Palace one day, become blushing aware of the masculine dress she had been amusing herself in, and fled home, to wrap herself in a damask bed quilt and sit down to a dish of muffins.

Fustian—Not Faustian

My First Two Thousand Years: The Autobiography of The Wandering Jew. By George Sylvester Viereck and Paul Eldridge. Macaulay Company. $2.50.

OF all the legends which have fascinated humanity there is perhaps none which gives more scope for the creative imagination than that of the Wandering Jew. For precisely that reason it can be expected to prove the most treacherous to any artist who is not absolutely of the first rank. If it is treated at all with historical realism, it presents the most delicate problem of selection. It is fundamentally a Faustian theme complicated all the more by the time element. But if even Goethe made himself a little absurd in translating Faust's superhuman ambition to comprehend the whole of human destiny largely in terms of one Teutonic maiden, it is surely not to improve matters to add a thousand and one additional maidens including Hindu, Mohammedan, and Chinese.

It is exactly this, however, that the ambitious George Sylvester Viereck and Paul Eldridge have seen fit to do in pursuing the autobiography of Isaac Laquedem. The adventures of the Wandering Jew, covering the last two thousand years of world history, taken all in all, are supposed to constitute what the authors in the persons of their puppets call "the erotic interpretation of history." The method used to precipitate the story is to have the Wandering Jew stray into an old abbey in Greece where he is made to reveal his secrets in the course of a lengthy psychoanalysis conducted by some scientists who happen to have taken refuge there. And, assert the authors modestly, "Laquedem's analysis constitutes a complete mental chart of civilized men." May one be so rude, however, as to refuse to take "the erotic interpretation of history" to mean that all the history of Western Europe is to be explained by the exigencies of the Wandering Jew's jousts d'amour? He has two thousand years hanging heavy on his hands, and naturally a girl is ruined in almost every chapter. One needs an adding machine to keep track of them all. "Unendurable pleasure indefinitely prolonged" can be too much of a good thing. Nor is the "complete mental chart of civilized man" supplied by showing Nero fiddling while Rome burns, or Charlemagne in the throes of rheumatism, or Luther in the act of gulping a seidel of beer. Mr. Edgar B. Davis, angel of "The Ladder," will no doubt be interested to learn that many of the characters, historical and unhistorical, appear in many reincarnations. The halfpenny cynicism in which the authors revel is of the type which results from a protracted adolescence.

The greatest mystery of it all is that the authors, if not the book, come commended, however guardedly, by no less persons than Sigmund Freud, George Bernard Shaw, and Havelock Ellis. We hear that they have worked for over a decade upon the present opus but we nevertheless think that it has been prematurely published. We shall continue to prefer our Eugene Sue with all his faults. The first two thousand years seem to be the hardest.

A Black Epic

Toussaint L'Ouverture. By Leslie Pinckney Hill. The Christopher Publishing House. Boston.

IT is subtitled "a dramatic history." Its form is blank verse, with occasional rhymed and prose passages uttered by the Haitian and French characters of "a drama not intended for the modern stage." In his foreword Mr. Hill reveals his purpose to refute the error taught Negro youth "that the black race has no great traditions, no characters of world importance, no record of substantial contribution to civilization." "The withering moral effects of this teaching," he says, "can hardly be computed."

In selecting L'Ouverture as his subject the author calls attention to the very considerable achievement of the father of Haitian liberty and its larger part in the independence of the New World. And he casts Toussaint (to whom Wendell Phillips assigned a place in history above Washington) in a gigantic mold, in the grand manner of opera and pageant. In consequence a certain classical unrealism is found in the lofty sentiments and language which flow from the hero's lips, as when he is made to say:

... but this fox
Demurred, and piled a Pelion of affront
Upon an Ossa of disloyalty.

The influence of Racine is clearly noticeable—and of Shakespeare, in such typical passages as this:

TOUSSAINT ( . . . in dreamy soliloquy)

To be a leader! What is that to be?
To stand between a people and their foes
And earn suspicion for a recompense;
To care for men more than they care themselves;
To keep a clear discriminating mind
Between the better counsel and the best;
To be a judge of men, that none may rank
In estimation higher than his worth,
Nor fail of scope to prove his quality;
To search the motive that explains the act
Before it is accounted good or bad;
To trust a man, and yet not be dismayed
To find him faithless, going on again
To trust another; to build failure up
Into the tedious structure of success;

The witches in "Macbeth" clearly inspired this rendering of the incantations of the voodoo conjure women:

Take this talisman—a skin
Of the plantain: here within
We have wrapped in fleecy cotton
Charms of wonder, rank and rotten—
Henbane, hyssop, cactus needles,
Seven sorts of sharded beetles,
The tail of a lizard, the dung of a goat,
A slice of the iguana's throat,
Sweat from thirteen quadrupeds
And hair from seven human heads.

Yet one must not gather that Leslie Hill's "Toussaint L'Ouverture" is a miscellany of adaptations. It has a dignity, a majesty, and a unity all its own. Whatever its technical form it is an epic. It endows the tragedy of Toussaint, of Haiti, of the colored race, with new vividness and coherence.

Books in Brief

Trade Associations: The Legal Aspects. By Benjamin S. Kirsh. Central Book Company. 1928.

The author's training as Special Assistant to the United States Attorney in New York gives this book a direct value for lawyers representing trade associations. Cost-accounting methods, interchange of patents, foreign trade and collective purchasing functions are discussed in a practical manner in the light of the confused state of the law. The Nation's readers will regret the omission of discussion of the existing warfare between trade associations and trade unions.

Bonnet and Shawl. By Phillip Guedalla. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $3.50.

Mr. Guedalla writes in a milk-and-water Stracheyese that does his six women less than justice. He is too brief, too insistently enigmatic and ironical, he will have his little joke if not at the expense of the women themselves then at that of their husbands. Each of the women described—Jane Welsh Carlyle, Catherine Gladstone, Mary Arnold, Mary Anne Disraeli, Emily Tennyson, and Emily Palmerston—was married to a sort of genius; as a result each had more than her share of the seamy side of human relations. And the multiform characters that resulted—the strength, the nobility, the patience, the petty spite, the conniving, even the hypochondria—seem beyond Mr. Guedalla's pen.

The Complete Works of François Villon. Translated with an Introduction and Notes by J. U. Nicolson. Illustrations by Alexander King. Two volumes. Covici, Friede. $20.

Villon is very much in the air just now, and this new complete translation of his poems, including all the doubtful pieces that have ever been scraped together, is welcome. Mr. Nicolson, after an engaging introduction, gives us Villon both in the old French and in his own English, so that we may follow him in his effort to render the famous vagabond in appropriate terms. The effect is most of the time gaily and delicately successful; Mr. Nicolson's stanzas have spirit and flavor, and in the case of the rougher poems his language is the most honestly bawdy that we have in connection with Villon in English.

Pensées and Letters of Joseph Joubert. Translated with an Introduction by H. P. Collins. The Broadway Library of Eighteenth-Century French Literature. Brentano's. $4.

Joubert's "Thoughts" are among the subtlest and most gently penetrating of their kind. Mr. Collins's edition of them fills a definite need for those English readers who hitherto have known Joubert only through Matthew Arnold and others brought now and then in the nineteenth century under his spell.

American Negro Folk-Songs. By Newman I. White. Harvard University Press. $5.

Probably the most copious and fully annotated collection of its sort to date. Mr. White's work comes as a climax to the labors undertaken during the past decade or two for the purpose of recording the American Negro's achievement—already, as Mr. White makes clear in his preface, a matter of history—in the creation of folk-poetry and music. This is a book for specialists, since only they could appreciate the fragmentary nature of many of the exhibits; for them it will prove invaluable.

Famous Prize Fights. By Jeffery Farnol. Little, Brown and Company. $3.

Mr. Farnol was hardly the man to tackle such a sordid subject as this. He visions the broad highway of pugilism as a pleasant path along which saunters a procession of impeccable heroes, from Entellus to Dempsey. Nor is his sentimentality lessened by his twittering, chirpy style.

The Dance

Doris Humphrey and Others

ALREADY, early in the season as it is, two or three dance recitals are filling as many theaters every Sunday night. Last year there were over sixty during the winter. It is a curious phenomenon, not yet fully explained. The performers insist on giving their programs against great odds. Though the vaudeville houses are open and unmolested, an organization called the Sabbath League consistently invokes an ancient blue-law against these unprotected dancers and, unless they prove that part of the proceeds is destined for charity, the recitals are threatened by police raids. Hence recitals are financially a liability, in spite of packed houses. Some of the dancers are backed by rich friends, but most of them save money from teaching or a vaudeville tour or a musical-comedy engagement to buy the costumes, music, and theater for this single Sunday-night effort which will show the public what dancing, undefiled by comedy acrobatics and unrelated pirouettes, means to the artist. Since the theater is theirs only for the day, the entire rehearsing, particularly of the lights, must be done during the eight hours before the opening curtain. As a reward for his efforts (aside from the artistic satisfaction) the dancer gets a tiny paragraph review in some of the Monday morning papers, probably a photograph in the Sunday rotogravure section (for dancers take far more interesting photographs than actors), and, if the enterprising Broadway manager who may be in the audience sees a certain amount of technique and not too much individuality, he may possibly get a future engagement in a show, which will help clear the deficit.

Nevertheless the Sunday-night recitals persist, in some cases, in offering to the public sheer, gay or tragic, exquisite beauty of movement, ranging from that dancing which verges on pantomime—as in the work of Angna Enters, Agnes De Mille, Charles Weidman, and less inevitably Martha Graham—to pure dance design as with Michio Ito and Doris Humphrey.

So far this season we have seen Benjamin Zemach of the Moscow Habima at the Yiddish Folk Theater with Ito assisting, Doris Niles's elaborate production of ballet and Spanish dances, Grace Cornell in her American debut, Hasoutra, again with Ito's help, and, most distinguished of all, Doris Humphrey and Charles Weidman on October 28 at the Civic Repertory Theater.

Doris Humphrey, though differing from both, belongs in the Isadora Duncan and Ruth St. Denis tradition. Their revolt from the stiff conventionality of ballet became known, more or less inaccurately, as "interpretive" dancing. It is a loose term indeed, for what dancer does not interpret? Even the despised ballerina translates a set musical score into movement. But by its constant use the word "interpretive" has come to describe those dancers who use simple costumes which reveal body designs rather than conceal them; whose scenery detracts as little as possible from the projected choreography; whose ballet technique is well hidden if there is any at all; and who emphasize the flow of motion outward from the center of the body rather than extraneous muscular development of arms and legs. Motion is determined by the mood of the music, rather than by any pictorial or story-telling adaptation. The revolt arose from the despair these dancers felt in the lack of grace among the ballet-trained whose exacting technique led to hard crystallization in design, and its consequent inapplicability to natural human gesture. In spite of this, there is something to be said for ballet training (where else, for instance, is to be found the breath-taking defiance of space that the Russians know?) but it need not be said here in the face of the simple, fine beauties of Miss Humphrey's performance.

Though Miss Humphrey did some solo work, notable among her individual dances being her "Papillon," which she has danced many times before but which, for gaiety and grace continues to rank with the loveliest of lyrical dancing, yet her chief artistic interest is in group expression. Here her work resembles that of Mary Wigman in Germany, though Miss Humphrey has never seen this dancer. The most distinguished and the most complex display of group design was in Miss Humphrey's "Color Harmony," the music for which was especially written and orchestrated by Clifford Vaughan. Three colors, red, green, and purple, represented by three groups, danced their color mood, and the conflict was harmonized, in the end, by white (danced by Mr. Weidman) which absorbed the warring hues. The intellectual idea was just sufficient to give a kind of meaning, but the moving arrangements of the three groups to the music allowed beautiful threaded mass effects.

The most experimental venture of the evening was the "Water Study" by the ensemble, unaccompanied by music. A few years ago while still a pupil of Miss St. Denis, Doris Humphrey arranged a design without music. But in this, as she admits, her conception was wrong and the effect not that of a finished whole, but merely of a composition from which the music had been lost. Her new "Water Study" stands alone. In this choreography Miss Humphrey has pictured water in its every flow, from the slow swell and ripple to the breaking high waves of foam. So exactly was the representation followed in the cooperative body movement that it was wonderful in its analogy. The wave beat seemed to give it sufficient rhythm to suggest design beyond the mere imitation of nature, and the result was a thing of dramatic beauty. It was wholly successful. But whereas Miss Humphrey had in her first experiment relied on music for her inspiration and basic design, so here she relies on natural phenomena to copy. Schematic movement alone has not therefore been proved a created entity as yet; it is not yet wholly abstracted. In the recital which Miss Humphrey will give in the spring she plans to attempt pure abstract movement without musical or pictorial pattern.

La Argentina, who came to us recently from abroad and gave her first performance at the Town Hall on November 9, suffered none of the disabilities and inconveniences related above—except the one misfortune that she had to dance in the Town Hall, which is wreathed by the aura of too many political discussions to be the ideal theater of the dance. Her manager, her costumes by Callot, her international publicity achieved for her an enthusiastic, boiled-shirt audience. If this is said with what may appear bitterness it is not meant in any way to slight her brilliant rendition of Spanish dancing, but only out of sympathy for those native dancers whose worth is also high but whose path is less generously strewn with roses and chrysanthemums.

Just as Callot, in the decorative costumes, based her inspiration on Spanish dress but deviated at will from the authentic, so Argentina confines her line and movement to the Spanish mold but translates them into her own forms. The two outstanding attributes of Spain's dances—that high, proud bearing of the head and the use of castanets—she carries to perfection. Her castanets are not just clacking metronomes, but add music and mood to her dancing. Nevertheless these instruments mark the dance as Spanish, and personally I preferred Argentina in those compositions that were more universal in appeal. In the Fire Dance from the ballet "El Amor Brujo," to music by de Falla, which was a rhythmic ritual for driving away evil spirits, the primitive motions and emotional fervor of Argentina exorcised the devils of traditional form and dress, and one could hear the Santo Domingo Indians tramping out their corn dance on the desert of New Mexico. In her peasant dance of the province of Toledo, particularized as it is in the program, the gaucherie and will to gaiety were typical of the peasant from anywhere. The exaggerated pantomime in this number was the one serious flaw in Argentina's performance.

Drama

Amateur Night

THE production of "These Days" (Cort Theater) brings the reviewer face to face with one of those mild mysteries of the contemporary theater which leave him pleasantly puzzled. Before the innocuous little play has proceeded very far upon its way he has already ceased to wonder how it is going to come out in the end, but he has begun, on the other hand, to ask himself repeatedly how it happens that it was ever allowed to come out at all. Mr. Hopkins, its sponsor, is one of the shrewdest as well as one of the most accomplished of our producers, and doubtless he had his reasons for treating it like a real professional play; but what can they have been? Perhaps he did so in order to please some doting father or perhaps he had some other motive which does equal credit to the goodness of his heart, but he can hardly have believed either that it had any chance of success or that it was good enough in itself to justify a financial sacrifice in the interests of art.

"Boarding School Girls. By One of Them" would be a far more comprehensive and descriptive title than that faintly sinister appellation, "These Days," which the comedy bears. There is, to begin with, a scene of a Pullman car in which the heroine is shown reading the American Mercury in order to establish the fact that she is much more than the fluffy-headed little thing one might mistake her for. This scene is followed by several (quite the best of the play) which introduce us to the secrets of Miss Van Alstyne's select finishing school for girls where the Mercury-reading heroine eludes the watchfulness of the presiding dragon and flies through the window with her own true love—a young man who attributes his conspicuous and romantic daring to the fact that his father was an actor. Since this young man is a really nice young man who not only stipulates that they shall stand on their own financial feet but holds up the elopement until he has extracted from the girl a satisfactory answer to the question "What is love?" no further trouble was to be expected and the point of the play seemed directed against the insensibility of boarding-school mistresses. But the third and last act are laid in a hotel on the Riviera, and this is where "these days" come in. It seems that the heroine had been suffering all along from the corrupting effects of a too lavish upbringing as well as from the defects of the finishing-school atmosphere. And here we find her being very hectic in very fast company. It seems further that she has left her husband (the divorce is delivered by mail in the midst of the scene), and in hysterically scornful tones she is telling them all what a joke it is that for a year she was content to live on fifty-dollar dresses and love.

Now, if the early scenes are realistic enough to suggest that the author had been in a boarding school this last act is absurd enough to prove further that she has only recently left it. There is a decadent young man who proposes to take the whole company to the morgue by way of giving them a wicked thrill, there is a dramatic moment when the heroine dashes a champagne glass to the floor, and there are all sorts of lurid touches which can have come only from Michael Arlen at his best or Somerset Maugham at his worst. Of course, everything turns out well in the end and the curtain goes down upon our heroine as she is sending a cable to the actor's son, but not until a schoolgirl's idea of the dregs of life has been drained to the last bitter drop. There are touches of observation in "These Days" and there is some real though distant promise, but to produce a play so obviously immature on the professional stage is to do a very doubtful kindness to the author. Miss Clugston—for such is the young lady's name—seems capable of recording what she has seen, but though she may have paid a well-chaperoned visit to the côte d'azur it is evident that she has observed the wicked only from a safe distance.

The Sixty-third Street Theater (renamed the Coburn in honor of its present occupants) is now housing a revival of "The Yellow Jacket," that phenomenal pseudo-Oriental fantasy which was first produced sixteen years ago and has outlived every other American play of its time so far as contemporary stage possibilities are concerned. A sort of American "Turan-dot" it appeals to the spectator—now through the inherent charm of a simple fairy tale and now through the humor of its gentle burlesque upon the stage conventions of the Chinese. Certain scenes like that supposed to take place in the pleasure-boat on the river achieve a real beauty and create an illusion by naively unrealistic methods; certain others are merely pleasantly childish; but the piece, when produced as well as it is at the Coburn, is unfailingly diverting. All sorts of solemn theories have been deduced from its success, and it has been used to prove that all serious realistic drama is damnable and that the theater should return to the frank make-believe of the children's playroom. The evidence is a little slender, particularly in view of the fact that "The Yellow Jacket" is half burlesque, but, happy accident though it is, there is no reason why it should not go on amusing people for generations yet to come.

Ten Years of Austria's Republic

By KARL RENNER

Vienna, October 31

THE word "Austria" has two meanings for the world at large. For 400 years it meant a great World Power. From 1526 until 1918 it stood for the mighty empire on the Danube which was built up by the German princely House of Hapsburg out of the German Alpine countries, the Lands of the Bohemian and of the Hungarian Crown; and for a time it included also northern Italy and a part of Poland. This great Power broke up in 1918 under the hammer-blows of the Allied armies. The Czechs, Hungarians, Poles, and Jugoslavs formed their own states, and the inhabitants of the German Alpine districts on the Danube (the original family property of the Counts and Grand Dukes of Hapsburg) were left high and dry, deserted by those who for four centuries had shared with them good and evil fortune.

Not only was this country left overnight with no guiding hand and no future; it was flooded with disordered troops streaming back, horrified and bitterly angry, from the Italian front. What was to happen to these German provinces—what was to be the fate of their inhabitants? History will one day record that only the Social-Democratic Labor Party did not lose its head, but found a way out of the chaos and took the lead.

It was primarily owing to the impulse given by this party that on October 21 all German deputies of the old Austrian parliament assembled in Vienna and declared themselves to be a provisional representative body for the German parts of Austria—that is to say, representative of "Deutschösterreich." They decided to form its inhabitants into a separate state and to set up an independent government. It was a revolutionary action; there was no alternative. The National Assembly formed a committee with full powers to draft a constitution. On November 12, 1918, the Constituent National Assembly adopted the provisional constitution, and declared that all the German lands of the old empire now formed the German-Austrian Republic.

In this notable assembly sat also representatives of German South Tyrol and of the German territories of the present-day Czecho-Slovakia. These territories also by the free voice of the people declared their adherence to German Austria. Had the right of self-determination, as proclaimed by President Wilson, been allowed to have effect, these territories would today form part of Austria, which would have a population of at least 10,000,000. But German Austria, though only one-eighth of the old Danube monarchy, was condemned by the Peace Conference of St. Germain in 1919 to bear alone the war guilt for the whole and (what was of much more evil effect) the war debts. South Tyrol was given to Italy and more than 3,000,000 Germans to Czecho-Slovakia, so that there remained only a tiny state of 6,000,000, nearly one-third of whom inhabit the capital, Vienna. Thus there was created a state form unfitted to live at all, with a capital—the fourth largest in Europe—having practically no economic hinterland. The frontiers are drawn at thirty miles distant from this capital! It is precisely as though Paris with a few neighboring departments were to be cut out of France, deprived of access to the sea, surrounded with high customs walls, and declared to be an independent state. The country thus created was forbidden in the Treaty of St. Germain to unite with the other Germans of Europe in a common state, despite the fact that for centuries Vienna herself was the capital of the empire of the Germans.

All the greater difficulties with which the Austrian Republic has had to contend during these ten years can be traced back to these unhappy provisions of the Treaty of St. Germain. At the foundation of the Republic on November 12, 1918, the Constituent National Assembly declared unanimously: "German-Austria is a part of the German Republic." Union with Germany was immediately adopted as the national program. It was not national chauvinism which led the Social-Democratic Labor Party to put forward the demand for union, but the knowledge that Austria could not and cannot exist by herself. But such anxieties were simply brushed aside at St. Germain.

During the first two years of its existence the republic (1918-1920) was governed by a coalition of Social Democrats and Christian Socialists. At the elections held in the autumn of 1920 the Social-Democratic representation was weakened and the Christian Socialists secured a majority. From 1920 until today, eight years, the country has been ruled by the bourgeois party bloc, headed by the Christian Socialist Party and its leader, the priest Ignaz Seipel. This bloc secured the majority—though on each occasion a smaller one—at the two elections of 1924 and 1927. The bourgeois bloc government was at the start strongly influenced by monarchist propaganda and by the neighboring country of Hungary, where the throne was upheld and reserved for the Hapsburgs. Bit by bit, however, the republican idea has grown stronger and today predominates in bourgeois circles also.

The terms of the St. Germain peace were ratified in 1919 by the Coalition Government. From 1920 onward the bourgeois bloc has been solely responsible for foreign policy. Austria entered the League of Nations and through the mediation of Geneva the Federal Chancellor, Dr. Seipel, secured the so-called League loan for the rehabilitation of the state finances and the stabilization of the currency. For five years the country has had the benefit of the stable Schilling currency, though it has never obtained relief from the general economic crisis. Many factories still stand idle—the number of unemployed is, for so small a country, simply terrifying. Still is the country shaken by social crisis following social crisis.

Despite this economic depression, the Social-Democratic Labor Party in Austria has managed to keep the workers uninfluenced by Communist propaganda. Bolshevism found no soil to grow in Austria. Nevertheless, Fascist movements have arisen of recent years under the influence of the Italian neighbor, their leaders fired by the example of Mussolini. Heavy industry has equipped from its financial resources armed bands which threaten the working-classes and seek to sweep away the social-welfare measures created by the Social Democrats and to abolish democratic government in order to replace it by an abso-lutist regime. The working-classes have prepared for resistance and have formed a body which, if unarmed, is of a semi-military character for the protection of the republic—the Republikanische Schutzbund (Republican Defense Corps). There have been frequent collisions between the two formations, and again and again have workers been shot down by the Fascists. When, in July, 1927, the courts acquitted the Fascist murderers of Schattendorf, there was an entirely spontaneous and unexpected outburst on the part of the working people of Vienna, who marched into the Inner City, surrounded the Palace of Justice, and could not be persuaded even by the Social-Democratic leaders to withdraw. When the Palace of Justice was set alight, the police came into action and shot dead nearly a hundred of the demonstrators.

The events of July 15 stirred up the passions of all parties. The Fascist formations were strengthened, and the Republikanische Schutzbund also received fresh recruits, since the working classes are resolved to defend the republic by every possible means from the counter-revolution. The government of the priest Seipel has avoided taking any action which might have modified the differences between the two groups. Thus it was that on October 7 last the two formations marched out in full force and it was only as the result of the most extraordinary precautions that a clash was avoided.

The Austrian Republic celebrates on November 12 the tenth anniversary of its creation, although the grave problems which beset it remain unsolved. Its economic existence is still problematical, the future of the state uncertain, enforced independence the great hindrance to union with Germany, and social peace endangered. At the moment all political parties are endeavoring to celebrate in peaceful accord the anniversary of the foundation of the republic, but this accord should deceive no one. Austria constitutes an unsolved problem of European politics.

Austria—Enter Fascismo

By G. E. R. GEDYE

Vienna, October 31

AUSTRIA constantly voices her need of publicity, but owing to the lack of unity among her various provinces, rarely secures it in the measure she needs and deserves. The events at Wiener Neustadt, described in The Nation of October 24, certainly brought fulfilment to her desire for publicity, though in a peculiarly malicious form. So much so that after the event there was a certain amount of recrimination as to who was responsible for securing publicity in this undesired form. The Socialists pointed to the callousness toward Austria's suddenly developed stream of tourist traffic shown by the Heimwehr (Fascists), who insisted on marching 20,000 men from other provinces through the predominantly Socialist, industrial town of Wiener Neustadt, a bare thirty miles from the capital. Certainly nervous guests left in shoals, and, remembering that during the riots of July 15, 1927, visitors were isolated for four days in Vienna and that American visitors missed their boats, one cannot consider a premature departure on the days preceding the Wiener Neustadt demonstration as other than a wise precaution. Newspapers of the Right which had done as much as anyone to create panic by loud demands for big military contingents to go to Wiener Neustadt, and also for Vienna to be well guarded by troops and police, suddenly discovered after the event that all the alarm had been a Socialist maneuver to force the hands of the Government. Reproaches were leveled at the heads of foreign newspaper correspondents in Austria for "exaggerating" the dangers by those who did not stop to consider where there could have been room for further exaggerating the perils of a situation which induced Herr Vaugoin, the Minister for War, to move to Wiener Neustadt nearly one-third of the Austrian army, including artillery detachments, in order that both Socialists and Fascists might shake their fists at one another at the public expense across a barrier formed of the public forces.

Austria is to be congratulated on having escaped the threatened explosion on this occasion, but en passant only—one need not waste much breath on congratulations over the escape from a peril which ought never to have arisen. The danger was at last brought home to Austria when from various quarters abroad, which are never other than well-intentioned toward this generally popular little nation, came veiled or open warnings that a country whose Government was unable or unwilling to prevent so lamentable an exhibition and so purposeless a waste of money as the Fascist-Socialist marching and counter-marching in Wiener Neustadt offered no very tempting security to the foreign investor. The warning was certainly kindly in intent but quite naturally was received with resentment by the Viennese, who, as Hermann Bahr, that merciless psychoanalyst of his countrymen wrote, "meekly accepts everything unless anyone tries to help him. Then, indeed, he defends himself."

What is the nature of this Heimwehr force which has suddenly written its title across the front pages of the world's newspapers and has procured for Austria the same undesirable publicity which the July riots obtained for her last year? Sometimes it is described by a literal translation of its title as "Home Defense Corps." A statement issued to the foreign press to the effect that the Heimwehr "had never been intended for use against foreign countries" emphasizes the looseness of the translated title as a description of the force. Strictly speaking, however, the communiqué was inaccurate, since the Heimwehr originated in many parts (Carinthia, Styria, and Lower Austria, for example) as a "Home Defense Corps" to resist the Slovene and Hungarian invaders after the war. But that aspect of the force has long ceased to have any meaning. It is now an internal weapon designed purely for use by Austrians against Austrians.

I have heard objections raised to the application of the term "Fascist" to the Heimwehr. Though obviously not literally accurate, I think that the word suggests to Anglo-Saxon readers at any rate something very close to what the Heimwehr really means. Much could be said of the probable reluctance of some of its supporters to see Austria placed under such a regime as that of Signor Mussolini, but the touchstone is that the Heimwehr is an extra-parliamentary political weapon. It would meet with the unqualified approval of Signor Mussolini, the Ku Klux Klan, and the Duke of Northumberland; it must be condemned by every believer in parliamentary methods—or, as its supporters here and abroad would put it, by everyone who makes a fetish of the ballot-box. Some of the Fascists will assure you that they are not opposed to the working-classes, that they do not desire to paralyze socialism, that they only wish to break what they call the "Red Dictatorship" in Vienna. The truth is that the Heimwehr is largely an expression of impatience at the toughness of the Socialists' resistance to all attempts to weaken their power, which has often been abused but was indubitably acquired and is maintained through the ballot-box.

No complaints about an alleged system of rewards for party faith in the allotment of municipal posts, no allegations of "conscience-pressure" (Gewissenszwang) can alter this fact. The forces behind the Heimwehr are many, and powerful. Austrian particularism, the dislike of the provinces for the capital, of the peasant for the townsman, of the devout Catholic for the Social Democrat, who the priest tells him is Anti-Christ—these furnish the nucleus. The assiduously propagated legend of a great "Bolshevist-plot" having been at the back of the rioting of July, 1927, gave the spur to the revival of the Heimwehr. Austrian industry, seeing a chance to curb the power of the "Red" trade unions in the factories and to build up an anti-strike force, made a special levy among employers to provide the Heimwehr with ample funds. The malcontents with the Republic—the young men of the professional, semi-professional, and official classes—deprived of their prospects of a career since the collapse of the monarchy, rushed to the "colors." The anti-Semites fell into line—indeed, they and the class last mentioned are largely identical, for as the corresponding social orders do in Germany, they allude to Austria as the "Juden Republik" and attribute all the sufferings consequent on defeat and dismemberment to the same cause to which their ancestors in the days of Margarethe Maultasch, "the Ugly Duchess," attributed the plague—to the Jew.

The Heimwehr cannot be considered the army of the bourgeoisie in the sense in which the Republikanische Schutzbund, the Republican Guard, is the army of the Socialists, largely because of its anti-Semitic character. The big bourgeois-Jewish section of the population of Vienna has, indeed, been glad to use the name of "Heimwehr" as a threat to scare the Socialists, but the revelation that the notorious German Fascist leader, Major Waldemar Pabst, was the moving spirit behind the Austrian Heimwehr came as an unpleasant shock to these people. This man's connection with political assassinations and with the Kapp Putsch in Germany is undisputed; his attitude was simply that as the German Republic was the result of Jewish-born revolution, all attempts by any means to upset the Republic amounted to fighting on the side of dispossessed law and order. Such are the ideas which have been imported from the ultra-Nationalist German secret societies and the desperate "Baltic troops" to inspire the Austrian Heimwehr. Obviously they must be unacceptable to many of the Christian Socialist Party with its backing of Jewish bankers. These little suspected that behind the eminently respectable, if somewhat bombastic person of Dr. Steidle, the official head of the Heimwehr, was concealed (under a false name) this German Nationalist desperado, until the Socialists published a number of extracts from their own secret dossiers concerning the Heimwehr at the time of Wiener Neustadt.

Does the Heimwehr contemplate "a march on Vienna"? I do not see how any reasonable person can doubt that at least they envisage the possibility of this, for Dr. Steidle himself has threatened something of the sort in far clearer terms than ever Mussolini employed to prophesy the "March on Rome." If they do not, wherefore the hidden stores of rifles, machine-guns, and howitzers? Wherefore the steady rifle practice and machine-gun practice of which anyone with his ears open may often become aware during week-ends spent in quiet corners of the Austrian provinces? Wherefore the recent artillery rehearsal in Tyrol?

With the example of Mussolini and the Vatican before his eyes, it is impossible to believe that a great clerical statesman like Dr. Seipel wishes to place Fascism in control of Austria. Those who nicknamed him as "Austriehelieu" and think of him as a quite remarkable Roman Catholic after the pattern of the great French cardinals, with the interests of the Roman Catholic hierarchy always in view, are probably not far from understanding the man who has guided the destinies of the Austrian Republic almost continuously since its birth. If this is so, then Dr. Seipel need not be expected to cease using the Heimwehr as a useful auxiliary in his fight against Social Democracy so long as he believes that he can advance his general policy by its aid. For that matter, if it would be possible for him to detach and use a section of the Social Democrats to crush the power of Dr. Otto Bauer, Dr. Seitz (the Mayor of Vienna), Dr. Julius Deutsch (the organizer of the Republikanische Schutzbund), and other of his principal opponents, he would doubtless have no scruples about doing so.

The Austrian Chancellor did not create the Austrian Fascist movement, but his action in the matter of Wiener Neustadt has given it such encouragement that one may, perhaps, be permitted to employ the appropriate though well-worn simile of Frankenstein and his monster. How long will the Heimwehr (which immediately after its rebirth in 1927 indulged in rebellious mutterings against the Chancellor) consent to remain a pawn on the Chancellor's political chessboard? Major Waldemar Pabst does not give the impression that he will consent to become any man's catspaw. From the official utterances of Heimwehr leaders, one can prove anything. At one moment they have spoken with the voice of the turtle, at another with the threatening growl of the tiger about to spring upon its prey: in their case, Vienna. Supposing they do spring without consulting the Chancellor, who can hold them in check? The officers of the army and the police are being taught that the enemy is to the left. Many of them are secret, some of them open sympathizers with the Heimwehr.

The Social Democrats, as the Heimwehr and the Chancellor himself must know, are practically powerless in the moment that a Fascist coup d'état is attempted. It is not merely a matter of inferior armament, though that is important. You cannot conceal batteries of howitzers—machine-guns and rifles only with difficulty—in a city where a vigilant police force is neglecting no chance of discovering and seizing them. It is a far more simple proposition to conceal extensive stores of heavy armament in the remote ravines of the Tyrolean, Styrian, and Carinthian Alps from a gendarmerie which, it may be suspected, can on occasion peer through its telescope with a casual eye. The Republikanische Schutzbund is well disciplined—that is to say, it stands under good trade-union discipline. The Heimwehr consists largely of ex-imperial officers and non-commissioned officers, ingrained with the iron discipline of a great army. But the real power of the Heimwehr, of course, is the power of blockade. The Socialists are in strength only in the cities, and the only city of importance on which they can count is the capital, Vienna. For their enemies to cut communications and starve them into submission would be child's play compared with the alternative of the town-bred Socialists pursuing their mountain-bred opponents into the crannies of the Alps. The certainty that a Fascist coup which was not immediately successful—and Vienna could obviously resist for a few days—would mean invasion and partition of Austria will, one may imagine, act as a restraining force on the Heimwehr. But their ranks are permeated with fanatics at least as irresponsible as the most extreme Socialists.

Meanwhile, the Chancellor has stated in the clearest possible terms that he is not prepared to accept the Socialist proposal for simultaneous disarmament and disbandment of the illegal armies, both of the Left and of the Right, as it stands. He insists on coupling with this a revision of the powers of the trade unions in the workshops, and a cessation of the obstructionist tactics of the Socialists in Parliament. Unless the Socialists will agree to this, he intends the Heimwehr parades to go on.

In his fighting speech to a party meeting on October 23, the Chancellor, referring to the Socialist peace offer and to the so-called "Disarmament Conference" (what an opéra bouffe, that such a thing should be needed in little Austria, which could resist no invader, and what a tragedy that in a couple of sessions it should prove abortive and collapse), Dr. Seipel said:

The Socialists' peace offer would have led to a more rapid success, did we not know them so well. . . . I was certain that there would be no civil war in Austria on October 7 . . . for the reason that I had determined to employ the necessary number of police and gendarmes and of Herr Vaugoin's troops. If the Socialists desire a real peace they must first of all cease to be a party with a guard indulging in military marches. Then they must abandon the war which they have aroused since July 15 (the day of the Vienna riots) last year against the forces of the state police, gendarmerie, and army. So long as I am not assured, not that the Socialists are not afraid, but that no one need fear them any longer, there will be no peace and no disarmament in Austria!

It seems not unfair to treat this as a frank statement by the Chancellor that he intends to retain the Heimwehr as a reserve weapon, not only until the Socialists disband and disarm their own militarized force, but until they abandon their feud against the police (of a feud against the army, I can find little trace), whom they accuse of brutality in Vienna in July, 1927.

It is deplorable that the bitter memories of that terrible tragedy should be kept alive as they are by both the Socialists and by their opponents. The continued personal onslaughts on Herr Schober, the Police President of Vienna and an ex-Chancellor of the Republic, as a bloodthirsty murderer by the Socialists, who rule the city, make the worst possible impression, for whatever else may be true in the Socialist allegations as to the behavior of the police on that occasion, no one but the most fanatic partisan really believes that this gentleman is a lover of bloodshed. These considerations, however, are really outside the scope of this article, which seeks only to make clear the continued perils of the situation in Austria and the definite adoption by the Christian Socialist Party of the dangerous weapon of a Fascist-like militarized body to enforce a change of Socialist Party tactics while declining to consider the simple proposition of mutual disarmament.

CENTENARY EDITION OF
JOSEF DIETZGEN'S
The Positive Outcome of Philosophy

Josef Dietzgen, born December 9, 1828, approached the problems of philosophy from the view-point of the revolutionary working class. This book, his greatest work, deals with the nature and substance of thinking. It discards mysticism, and shows brain work as a natural process.

In the twenty years since Dietzgen's works first appeared in English, the name and fame of the "workingman philosopher" have become familiar to an ever-widening circle of proletarian students, who find Dietzgen's logic a sharp and invincible theoretical weapon. This new translation will be welcomed for its added clearness and strength. Cloth, 430 pages, $2.00 postpaid.

LYING IN THE PRESENCE of seven United States Senators is a personal privilege, but lying in the presence of eight United States Senators is a crime. That is the ridiculous conclusion to be reached from the acquittal of Robert W. Stewart, chairman of the Board of the Standard Oil Company of Indiana, who was tried for perjury after contradictory testimony before the Senate Oil Investigating Committee concerning his receipt of stock of the notorious Continental Trading Company. Justice Bailey of the District of Columbia Supreme Court, who presided at the Stewart trial, instructed the members of the jury to acquit the defendant if they decided that less than a quorum—eight Senators—had heard Stewart make his alleged misstatements. So Stewart goes free on a legal technicality which is not only flimsy but in contradiction to legislative practice and the whole intent of our perjury laws. Probably nine-tenths of the legislative committee work at Washington in recent years has been accomplished by committees with "telephone quorums" consisting of a small minority of Senators actually present and the remainder of members in the vicinity somewhere ready to come in an emergency after telephoning their assent to proceeding in their absence. Senator Norris well says that such decisions as that of Justice Bailey "have made our jurisprudence the laughing-stock of the world." Incidentally we recall the fact that John D. Rockefeller, Jr., announced several months ago that he was going to dislodge Colonel Stewart from his position as executive head of the Standard Oil Company of Indiana, but the colonel is still on the job. How about it, Mr. Rockefeller? Have you forgotten your high moral resolve to cleanse the oil industry?

WINTER IS COMING ON, slowly but inevitably. And evidently nothing that man is likely to do can prevent, as an unavoidable concomitant of winter, the Mississippi from rising and overflowing its banks. It does not matter that dwellers along the river have not yet recovered from last year's disastrous floods, houses have not been rebuilt, crops have not been harvested, the burden of suffering and hunger and debt is still heavy on the inhabitants of those counties along the great river's banks. The river is rising none the less. The river with its tributaries always rises, and it nearly always overflows. From Missouri, from Kansas, from Illinois, even from Kentucky come the familiar stories of high water, threatened or accomplished inundation of rich farm lands, a score or so of persons drowned by the rushing waters. And meanwhile the President has not thought it necessary to call Congress to consider the question of flood relief, nor would such action result probably in any but the old platitudes and an insufficient appropriation for temporary assistance. We have no adequate policy for dealing with flood waters. With characteristic American extravagance we had rather spend money every year for relief to flood victims than devise a method of controlling the turbulent waters so that they would not again overflow. Our policy has been to build, in the most haphazard and desultory way, a sort of concrete wall to bind the Mississippi into its bed. Competent engineers think that such a system will never be successful; the river will always rise above its walls. Proposals to make artificial run-offs to carry the surplus water do not find favor with Congress. But no attempt has ever been made to consider the problem as a whole, to make provision for the future. And meanwhile, the waters rise.

FACTS ARE SLOWLY EMERGING from the welter of accusation and cross-accusation that accompanied the sinking of the Vestris. As the official investigation proceeds, as the first hectic questioning of witnesses gives place to a more reasoned examination by men familiar with the ways of the sea, the tragedy takes shape more clearly before our eyes. Blazing headlines that hinted a reluctance to permit the sending of an S O S on the part of the Lamport and Holt officials were wrong; suggestions that radio messages were suppressed were wrong; statements from understandably hysterical passengers that the crew was almost to a man a set of miserable poltroons were wrong. Yet a few unhappy facts remain, and they all point to an unexplicable hesitation and incompetence on the part of the commander of the ship. Why did not Captain Carey send out his S O S twelve hours sooner, when his ship was evidently in the gravest danger? Why were lifeboats launched from the port side of the ship when the starboard side was almost in the water and would have presented a much less difficult feat of launching? Why was not the crew, under the captain's firm direction, ordered to man the boats properly, with a suitable number of officers and men in each, instead of embarking in the most haphazard fashion imaginable, sometimes with only four men in a boat designed for forty? Why were two boatloads of women and children left dangling in mid air until the ship turned over and dragged them into the sea? These questions will never be answered. They can be entered in the column under Human Error, Human Weakness, Human Unpredictability. Captain Carey had for forty years been a capable and sensible seaman. In a dreadful emergency his competence and his sense deserted him. This is the most melancholy fact in the whole sad business; for what precautions can safeguard people from such a possibility?

THE NOTION of a State and federal construction reserve fund to be used in time of unemployment is not particularly new, but it gained fresh authority when Governor Brewster of Maine presented it to the New Orleans conference of Governors with the indorsement of Herbert Hoover. Economists, labor leaders, and Socialists have been urging such a reserve fund for many years, and they have been supported by such official pronouncements as that of the President's Unemployment Conference of 1921. Governor Brewster's suggestion would lead to a reserve fund totaling about twice the amount spent each year for public construction. This would be approximately $3,000,000,000 for State and federal governments, since the amount now spent on public construction by such bodies is $1,500,000,000. The difficulties of persuading forty-eight State legislatures and forty-eight Governors to increase taxation in order to create such an emergency fund are enormous, but the educational value of the suggestion is obvious. Even if the State and federal governments do not create a reserve fund for construction work in advance of the emergency, they may be persuaded to undertake this work through bond issues after a crisis has arrived. Moreover, the presence of unemployment reserve funds in the federal treasury and in a few State treasuries would be a valuable factor in preserving that business confidence which is the best preventive of unemployment.

WE SAID LAST WEEK, on the authority of the Associated Press, that New Zealand had voted to license liquor in place of prohibition. The Associated Press has since issued a correction saying that at the recent election New Zealand voted to continue the licensing system already in effect. Astonishing and disquieting figures have been issued from Washington on the expense of pretending to administer the Volstead Act: $225,000,000 is the total; $25,000,000 is the prevailing annual toll. The yearly cost of maintenance of the Department of State is $16,000,000; of the Department of Commerce, $30,000,000; of the Department of Justice, $24,000,000. And the cost of prohibition is mounting so steadily and so fast that government officials refuse to predict what it will be in ten years. Only by the most wilfully and fatuously blind can it longer be denied that prohibition as now administered—the "noble experiment" of Mr. Hoover—is not a success. Nor does this mean necessarily that the Eighteenth Amendment should be repealed. But it does mean that a large proportion of the people of the United States openly and with impunity disregard one of the laws of the land, that thousands of American citizens make their living by breaking that law, and that millions are annually poured into the leaky sieve of enforcement without avail. Prohibition in nine years has passed the experimental stage; it must stand up to be judged, and whatever the remedy—whether repeal, modification, or real enforcement—only its blindest partisans can fail to see that the subject should be submitted to a referendum of the American people.

ALLIED STUPIDITY in the Rhineland goes on apace and will continue to do so as long as the occupation continues. George Glasgow, who writes on foreign affairs in the English Contemporary Review, is our authority for recent incidents. The Inter-Allied Rhineland High Commission drew the attention of the German Government to the fact that the Graf Zeppelin had flown over occupied territory without having obtained permission to do so; whereupon the German authorities in Coblenz explained with an expression of regret that the commander of the Zeppelin had taken the airship over occupied territory as a result of an "error of navigation"! Mr. Glasgow also relates that the Burgomaster of Königstein had a bandmaster play the German national anthem without asking leave to do so, and was sentenced by the British Summary Court at Wiesbaden to pay a fine of 100 marks or go to prison for two weeks. These incidents would seem humorous if they were not so tragic. When will the Allies learn that the shedding of blood may not be confined to the victim when the pound of flesh is collected?

MOVED BY SUGGESTIONS from Mr. Kellogg, and with his help, Nicaragua and Colombia have settled an old dispute over the islands facing the coasts of those countries and ceded to the United States the right to maintain naval bases, which had already been established upon several of the islands. Colombia, on the basis of old Spanish jurisdiction, claimed the entire Atlantic coast of Nicaragua, several small islands facing it, the San Andres Archipelago, and Great and Little Corn islands, which latter two under the famous Bryan-Chamorro treaty Nicaragua made over to the United States as coaling bases. Nicaragua questioned the rights of the United States in regard to several small keys (Roncador, Quitasueño, Serrana) upon which we had erected lighthouses and defenses to the approach of the projected Nicaraguan canal. Under the agreement just concluded Colombia relinquishes all its claims except to a few small islands, cedes to the United States marine-base rights over some of these, and receives fishing rights in the surrounding waters. Nicaragua keeps sovereignty rights over her own coast, the San Andres Archipelago, and Great and Little Corn islands, giving to the United States the right to maintain the naval bases on the two latter which had already been erected on doubtful authority. Boundary disputes are always a good thing to clear up, and it is well that we have been helpful in settling that between Colombia and Nicaragua—even if we did feather our own nest rather handsomely in the neighborly gesture.

CAN IT BE that American undergraduates are at last coming to realize the unimportance of being earnest about a football victory? We were moved to that hope when the news came from New Haven that only 500 out of 5,000 students at Yale had attended a football rally to create enthusiasm for the Yale-Harvard game. We wonder if the loyal tenth were miserable, cringing freshmen who came because they were afraid to stay away. On the platform before vast stretches of empty seats a famous football coach waved his arms and talked gloomily about the Yale spirit. Out on the campus and in the students' rooms the repositories of this divine afflatus moved about their business as usual. Perhaps they were thinking that a victory in showing, running, and booting a football scored by eleven Yale men over eleven Harvard men had nothing more to do with the Yale spirit than a victory by the White Sox has to do with the spirit of Chicago. At any rate they stayed away from the football rally even when a band and a parade marched across the campus to Woosley Hall in the attempt to seduce them with noise.

PROSPERITY—WHAT IS IT? What is this much-boasted-about, little-analyzed, less-understood phenomenon which seems to have been the inexorable power behind the great avalanche of votes that rolled Herbert Hoover to victory? Is it the profits in Wall Street gambling or the melons cut by some of the great corporations? Is it real-estate subdivisions littering the countryside with badly planned rows of vacant lots and occasional cheaply built houses? Is it bread and circuses—motor cars for the middle classes, radios and seats at the movies for even the poorest workers? Is it a reality or a legend? Is it merely a matter of bookkeeping and paper profits? Perhaps we are on the edge of a heart-to-heart talk among ourselves about this curious manifestation. Virgil Jordan, chief statistician of the National Industrial Conference Board, may have started the ball rolling by some surprising and unflattering remarks about prosperity. Speaking before the National Founders' Association—and he must have jarred his audience—he hazarded the theory that prosperity was merely a state of mind. Money, he said, was accruing to those who were catering to new wants of the population and supplying it with luxuries, but the basic industries—the raising of food, the mining of coal, the making of cotton and woolen clothing—were suffering from worldwide depression.

THERE HAS BEEN NO YEAR since the war, or even in our previous history, according to Mr. Jordan, when "the overworked word 'prosperity' has had less real and definite meaning."

This country is now firmly in the grasp of a prosperity complex which has been gradually and insidiously built up during the last few years. Prosperity in the present situation is rather a state of mind than a fact susceptible of demonstration either by statistics or by actual experience among business men or the general public. In larger part, it is an illusion created by extraordinary financial conditions, by exceptional activity in production of certain types of goods, by radical changes in the organization and methods of manufacture, by changes in methods of distribution, and by shifts in the living habits of the urban population. These changes have been carried forward on a powerful tide of inflation, so that their significance and the problems they raise for the future have been submerged and obscured from public attention.

Some of us may begin to suspect next that our boasted "increased standard of living" adds more to the complexity and burden of living than it does to its quality; that it is as true today as when Thoreau said it that "Most of the luxuries, and many of the so-called comforts of life, are not only not indispensable, but positive hindrances to the elevation of mankind."

ALTHOUGH THE NATION'S astronomical expert is not in the office as this paragraph is written, we venture to estimate that the center of the universe is 258,532,712,000,000,000 miles from Arkansas. Professor Harlow Shapley and his associates of the Harvard Observatory have at last located in the constellation of Sagittarius the elusive spot which is supposed to be the magnetic focus of our system of stars. We, it seems, are near the edge of things, but nobody knows just where the jumping-off place is located. Beyond our universe may be other universes—no comfort for the monists can be found anywhere. There is something incalculably cold-blooded in these astronomers who can toss off lightly a statement that we are a few quadrillion miles away from that Bosom of Omnipotence where our forefathers thought we were. No wonder our Arkansas kinsmen are afraid of these men. While they are measuring the distances between stars, their brethren in the field of physics have learned to use light waves so accurately in measuring an object that the measurements are subject to an error of not more than three-one millionths of an inch. Some day they may be able to measure the mind of a fundamentalist.

THOMAS FORTUNE RYAN! Is it possible, as the newspapers say, that he has just died? Most persons had thought of him as dead for many years. And in a sense he had been. He retired from business activity twenty years ago, and for the last decade his name, once on the lips of every commentator on financial news, had hardly been heard in a public way. It is poetic justice, perhaps, that when our so-called "captains of industry" quit the steering wheel they are forgotten quicker and more completely, regardless of their wealth, than almost any of the persons who people for a day our crumbling halls of fame. Mr. Ryan bought a seat on the New York Stock Exchange at the age of twenty-three, and amassed an enormous fortune in a lifetime devoted to the mere manipulation for his own profit of the wealth others had produced. He was never a producer, a distributor, or in a creative sense a financial organizer, and in a sane economic system he would not have been conceded his board in a water-front lodging house. Yet he was a man of real talent, pursuing what he regarded as the wisest course in life, and he was wasted by his fellow-men quite as much as he exploited them. It is the fashion to call him a leader in a more ruthless finance than we know today. The fact is he was only a little more frank. The men of his time had not learned to conceal their ruthlessness behind a polite pitter-patter about service and patriotism.

An Open Letter to Owen D. Young

DEAR MR. YOUNG:

YOU have achieved by your own ability a very important, almost a commanding position in the field of electrical engineering and manufacturing. Your valuable public services have confirmed the high opinion held of you by public and press—the latter attributes to you the chief credit for the creation and adoption of the Dawes Plan which has done so much to restore and to sanitize Europe. You have repeatedly shown independence of action in the political world, as when you heartily approved of Governor Smith's water-power policy in the State of New York. On more than one occasion you have shown your understanding of public rights in the field of electrical power enterprises in sharp contrast with the point of view of many others affiliated with what has come to be known as the super-power trust. You are, therefore, deservedly ranked as an unusually liberal and public-spirited head of a great corporation.

It is precisely because you have this reputation and standing that we address ourselves to you in this public manner in relation to present conditions in the power industry. We refer especially to the revelations as to the underhanded attempt to make and control public opinion in this country in favor of private ownership and operation of public utilities which are dependent upon electrical power. The public has learned—not from any muck-raking press campaign, but as a result of the official inquiry conducted by the Federal Trade Commission—of far-reaching efforts to influence the press, the pulpit, the school, and the university. It has already been shown that the power lobby was prepared to spend more than $400,000 during the last session of Congress. The National Electric Light Association alone spent more than $250,000 for propaganda; thirteen geographical divisions disbursed $237,300; not less than $700,000 was disbursed by twenty-two State and regional bureaus created by utility corporations, operating hand in glove with the National Electric Light Association, the American Gas Association, and the lobby in Washington. In addition millions have been disbursed for advertising in the newspapers, much of which has plainly been inserted for the purpose of controlling editorial opinions.

If any proof were needed of this, it is to be found in a letter written by J. B. Sheridan, manager of the Missouri Committee on Public Utility Information, to C. H. Gallo-way of the Continental Gas and Electric Company of Omaha, Nebraska:

I am much interested in the very handsome little ad. which the Maryville Electric and Power Company is running in the Missouri newspapers. When all is said and done it is the advertising that counts. The fact that Carl Thompson [head of the Public Ownership League of Chicago] has received practically no notice in the Missouri newspapers is, I believe, due to the fact that the Electric Light and Power Company are good customers of the newspapers. It is not easy for anybody to bite the hand of a good customer.

So shameful has been the subservience of the press to this insidious form of bribery that this same J. B. Sheridan wrote a letter to an editorial friend thanking God that there was one man who would not yield himself. It is significant, too, that this same Mr. Sheridan received a letter from John W. Colton, editor of the American Electric Railway Magazine, in which the latter said:

The thing about the utility industry that disgusts me is lying, thieving, faking, and downright evasion of trust or violation of trust that marks the progress toward enormous wealth of the so-called big men in the industry. When I see some of those fellows waving the flag, I am filled with not only disgust but rage, for they are anything but patriots.

You will not have forgotten, Mr. Young, that interests closely connected with you stood behind E. Hofer and Sons of Salem, Oregon, to the extent of $80,000 a year for sending out matter to the press opposing government and municipal ownership, attacking labor unions, and criticizing "radical programs" for the relief of the farmer. Mr. Hofer testified before the Federal Trade Commission that he had succeeded in getting 3,000,000 column-inches into the papers to which he sent this matter during 1927—more than 20,000 newspaper pages.

Now, as Senator Norris has pointed out, public-utility concerns have the right to state their case in public, provided that they do so in an open and above-board way. If, however, they hire Governors of States to sign articles favoring them and their policies, the public has a right to know why the Governors signed and who wrote the articles. Again, Senator Norris is on indisputably sound ground when he points out that the millions that have gone into this propaganda come in the last analysis from the consumers themselves, and are one element in the failure of the electric companies to reduce the rates. You will certainly not deny that the subsidizing of school officials and college professors, and the editing or suppression of textbooks, is entirely contrary to the public welfare; that if it should be undertaken by other industries it would poison the whole atmosphere surrounding public questions.

You will recall, without our reminding you, the fearful scandals of a similar nature connected with the insurance business which were exposed by Charles E. Hughes, with the result that there was prompt government interference with this private business and the establishment of public control of insurance companies. It will be amazing, indeed, if the disclosures in Washington do not result in the creation of a federal commission to control public utilities and at least to insure the publication of their expense accounts. It is because you must be aware of these things, and because you in your person have seemed to stand for a different policy and attitude toward the public, that we are appealing to you to come out against this whole procedure. With other men in the industry who are like-minded, you could well join in a public statement which would reassure the public to some extent and would put you on record as being opposed to the corruption that has been revealed, and as being more than ready to clean house from top to bottom. In the earnest hope that you will take the leadership in this matter we are,

Yours very truly,

Boston Protects Itself

THE producers of "Gods of the Lightning," after a short run in New York City, decided to take this "Sacco-Vanzetti play," as it has been called, to Boston. The officials there, we understand, have the authority not only to stop a play which offends the law but to close for a period of time the theater in which it is produced. It is customary, therefore, for theater-owners to insert in their contracts a clause by which the producer undertakes to indemnify the owner in case his theater is closed. Hence, Hamilton MacFadden, before taking "Gods of the Lightning" to Boston, submitted the manuscript to John M. Casey, Chief of the Licensing Division, to learn what the official attitude would be. The latter passed the play along to the Corporation Counsel, Frank S. Deland, for an opinion. And this is what he got:

In compliance with your request this department has carefully examined the manuscript of the play "The Gods of the Lightning" [we preserve the spelling used in the city of learning] with a view to advising you as to the course to be pursued by you.

Unless changes are made in the various passages of the manuscript wherein the name of the Lord is used in such a manner as to be obnoxious to any one, whether he be believer or otherwise, and which in many instances borders on the blasphemous, you would in duty be bound to recommend to the statutory board or officials who pass upon the suspension of theater licenses that the license of any theater which allows this performance to be shown in this city be revoked if such passages were allowed to remain after a first performance in this city.

There are also many passages in this manuscript that are so condemnatory of our government, its form, its practices, and its officials, both national and State, that it would require but a little stretch of the imagination to term them anarchistic and treasonable. The whole play, it seems to me, is an attempt, while depicting the recent trial of Sacco and Vanzetti in Massachusetts, to bring into disrepute our judicial system and our judicial officers, especially those officials who participated in the Sacco-Vanzetti trial. It is unfair to them and only tends to hold them up to ridicule and to unfairness. It is in reality a dishonest attack upon our courts and our judicial system. I do not believe it is worthy of a place on any American stage, more especially a Boston stage. In my opinion the producers should be notified that their play does not meet with your favor and probably will not meet with the favor of the statutory board on licenses in this city.

Mr. Casey forwarded a copy of this letter to Mr. MacFadden with a brief note saying that the Corporation Counsel's "opinion in no manner differs from the conclusion I had arrived at."

This is as one might expect. The Sacco-Vanzetti tragedy is not dead, as the State of Massachusetts hoped it would be long before now. Indeed it is a more living issue today than a year ago, and the action of the Boston officials is the natural response of frightened, crawling little bureaucrats in the circumstances. The Nation discussed "Gods of the Lightning" in its issue of November 14 (page 528), and in our opinion the charge of blasphemy is in no way warranted and has been trumped up to give a technical basis for action. On the other hand, the complaint that the play ridicules the courts is amply justified. So is the ridicule. Nothing needs to be more ribaldly pooh-poohed, more mercilessly held up to the scorn of decent citizens, than so-called American justice—a stupid, archaic, doddering hocus-pocus of pious humbug and downright corruption which in one part of the country tortured for seven years and then murdered two friendless, moneyless aliens and in another has failed to convict of crime a single principal in the stinking oil frauds of the Harding Administration.

But even if the ridicule of "Gods of the Lightning" were unjustified, the authors of the play, Maxwell Anderson and Harold Hickerson, are entitled to express their opinions in Boston or anywhere else in the United States without interference from mob-fawning political job-holders. We hope a way may be found to put on "Gods of the Lightning" in Boston. The city officials will probably stop it, and if the courts uphold the action, the public will have new and dramatic proof that all the vitriol of the play is justified.

Hermann Sudermann

HERMANN SUDERMANN, the internationally known novelist and playwright, died in Berlin on November 21 at the age of seventy-one years. A few hours later his publishers announced that the most famous of his novels, "Frau Sorge," had sold some three hundred thousand copies (an almost unprecedented number for Germany). Yet in spite of the fact that he was also author of one of the most successful plays of the nineteenth century, he died a much embittered man who had seen the critical acclaim with which he had formerly been greeted gradually replaced by persistent disparagement.

Sudermann, born of humble parents and deprived of the advantages of formal education, passed, like Ibsen, from a chemist's shop to journalism, but there was something fateful in the fact that his first and triumphantly successful play, "Honor," appeared in 1889, which was also the year of Gerhart Hauptmann's first drama, "Before Sunrise." At the time the two men could hardly have guessed that they would be rivals. Sudermann's fame immediately rose to very nearly its highest point while that of Hauptmann remained relatively slight. But over a period of ten years the positions were gradually reversed. Though he continued to write plays (there are a score in all), some of which achieved great popularity, critics fell into the habit of contrasting Sudermann's theatrical adroitness with what appeared to be the greater sincerity of the rising star. Superficially the two men belonged to the same school. Both dealt with the social problems of their time and both appeared as champions of liberal ideas, but Sudermann was accused of sacrificing truth in the interest of striking theatrical effect, and he came more and more to be used as a foil in celebrations of his rival's greatness. He found in his financial rewards no compensation for this loss of critical esteem, a bitterness against Hauptmann sprang up, and when the latter became a member of the newly formed German Literary Academy Sudermann refused to join it.

One of his hitherto untranslated novels, "The Mad Professor," has just been published here by Horace Liveright, but his plays disappeared some years ago from the New York stage, where one in particular ("Heimat," translated as "Magda") had been played by both Modjeska and Mrs. Fiske. A little later the novel called "The Song of Songs" achieved considerable popularity in America and a dramatization was played by Irene Fenwick, but Sudermann's reputation here has followed the same course as in Germany. Commonly regarded as a significant figure in contemporary German literature, he is nevertheless treated less and less seriously and, in all probability, less and less read, in spite of the fact that "Heimat" has been widely used as a textbook in modern-language classes.

Doubtless Sudermann has been to some degree unjustly treated and the victim of the persistent comparison with Hauptmann. It became fashionable to depreciate him, and there was little possibility of his being able to recapture the reputation which he had lost. Yet the artistic defects of his work are not only real but of a sort which inevitably become more and more conspicuous as his once daring themes are less and less sufficient to distract the attention from them. When "Honor" and "Magda" were first performed his criticism of the military code in the one and his defense of the free life of an opera singer against the opposition of her family in the other was sensational and socially important. Today, when his paradoxes are no longer paradoxical, one is much more likely to perceive the mechanical and rather over-simplified character of his dramatic construction.

Even Hauptmann has already begun to pay the penalty almost inevitably exacted of the writer who founds a hope for permanent fame upon work which depends for a considerable part of its interest upon the treatment of current themes, and Hauptmann is a solid writer than the author of "Heimat." Sudermann's place in history is secure, but probably it is so in history alone. He will be remembered as one of those who helped revitalize the stage by bringing it into contact with the life of his time long after he has ceased to be acted or read.

Harvard's New Plan

THE official statement of President Lowell throws little additional light upon Harvard University's decision to accept an anonymous gift of $3,000,000 to institute a "house" or "hall," after the manner of the separate colleges at Oxford and Cambridge. Hence it is plain that Mr. Lowell himself has no clear-cut ideas as to just what form this extraordinarily interesting experiment will take. That is wise. We fancy that those teachers at Harvard who know Cambridge and Oxford best will be among the first to advise caution in adapting the English college-plan to Harvard conditions. The difficulties are obvious. Harvard is not Oxford and, though it is shortly to celebrate its three-hundredth birthday, has not behind it the same body of tradition as the oldest English universities. Nor is it prepared to substitute for its present teaching system the English one in which almost the whole burden is laid upon the tutors. The tutorial developments at Harvard point in that direction, and so does the recent setting aside of a reading period for upper classmen in the academic year during which lectures and recitations are suspended. But a more radical change can only come through experimentation.

That, we are sure, is President Lowell's idea. Several years ago an extraordinarily able undergraduate council reported upon the necessity of some such device to overcome the lack of social solidarity among three thousand undergraduates drawn from many countries and all sections of the United States, representing very different individual training and backgrounds. The class system long ago broke down at Harvard because of numbers, and with the disappearance of the old commons in Memorial Hall there was no even that much of a common meeting ground. The freshman dormitories were then instituted in order to shuffle the freshmen, so that they would not segregate according to their preparatory schools or previous habitats and might have the opportunity to meet more of their classmates. But this left unsolved the problem of the other three years. Only a relatively few of the upper classmen took their meals together. One member of the faculty, therefore, writes us that "if the new plan accomplishes nothing more than to restore the habit of dining 'in hall' instead of 'on stool in cafeteria,' it will have something in its favor." So will it considerably justify itself if it can restore some of the old contacts between teachers and students, now so much decreased even when the professors have every desire to meet their students outside of the classrooms. Finally, we would point out again that from the days of President Eliot and the late Frank Bolles, so long connected with the administration of the college, the desire has been there to try the experiment of subdivision.

When it comes to the dangers of the experiment, they are obvious. Harvard suffers enough in all conscience because of its reputation for snobbishness and a hard-and-fast division of the sheep from the goats, the sheep being those whose parents are well endowed with worldly goods. If the idea should go forth that Harvard is now engaged in segregating its students so that the poor among them, the Jews, the Negroes, and odd persons generally, can be segregated or eliminated, still further mischief will be done. What is to be the basis for selection for residence in the first house or hall?

Plainly it ought to be restricted to honor students. If later there could be developed a wholesome rivalry between halls in intellectual pursuits, so much the better. But the experiment will surely fail if the student body within the halls is not chosen on a purely democratic basis. If it is to be merely social segregation of like-minded youths it will work injury and be an extremely bad example to the rest of the university world. There is far too much of that now in some of our colleges. The sole common denominator ought to be the intellectual tastes and achievements of the undergraduates, tutors, masters, and, perhaps, research fellows who will probably be in residence.

If it succeeds well there will be an increase in the intellectual life of Harvard greatly needed to offset the materialism of its Business School. Anything that will lead Harvard back to pure scholarship, which will bring about stimulating intellectual companionship among students and between them and their teachers, is altogether in order. Here, too, there will be some to dissent, to remind us that beautiful quadrangles and ivy-covered halls do not make a university and that Harvard would do well to put the money not into new buildings, but into larger salaries for teachers so that greater minds and characters may be drawn to Cambridge and be freed from that desperate struggle to live which is touched upon by a college professor in an article elsewhere in this issue. Finally, it must not be overlooked that this revolution in Harvard University has been brought about by a single gift from an unknown donor and that the college is committed to it without its being thought worth while to consult in advance the students or the alumni as to whether they desire the change.

More Revelations of Colonel House

By OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

THE third and fourth volumes of the "Intimate Papers of Colonel House,"* edited by Professor Charles Seymour, constitute a notable historical document, a contribution to the story of the American waging of the war and the American participation in the making of the Treaty of Versailles which no future historian can overlook. These volumes, moreover, put Colonel House personally in a better light than did the first two. With the United States in the war, he was able to play a better and a more honorable role. The die was cast. There was no need of his being for American participation in the war one day and against it the next; no need for the trickery, the insincerity, the double-dealing, and the hypocrisy which made the earlier volumes so sad and so shocking a revelation of the true Colonel House. Moreover, in these volumes the Colonel is no longer merely an unofficial, backstairs personality who relieved the President of endless interviews and made himself the medium of such communications as he thought should reach the Chief Executive. Here he appears chiefly as the officially designated spokesman in Europe of the President, and the leading peace commissioner next to Woodrow Wilson himself.

Not that Colonel House could divest himself altogether of the habit of fooling some of those who came into contact with him. Of this let one striking example suffice: his offering to Clemenceau the proposed perpetual Anglo-American guaranty of French territory, a proposal properly ignored by Congress. We now learn that the suggestion of this guaranty came from Lloyd George. House eagerly "proceeded to define it, and on March 20 took it to the French Premier"—plainly with his tongue in his cheek. Clemenceau, he reports, fell for it "with keen delight." But the wily House added in his diary on that same day: "I have my doubts as to the Senate accepting such a treaty, but that is to be seen." One week later his tell-tale diary records this: "I thought I ought to call the President's attention to the perils of such a treaty. Among other things, it would be looked upon as a direct blow to the League of Nations"! In other words, in a time of great stress and much muddying of the waters, when the whole Peace Conference was nearing the rocks, the Statesman-Colonel drafted for Lloyd George and Clemenceau a proposal whose acceptance he greatly doubted, only to become frightened at his own handiwork, and to warn the President against it. Yet it was accepted by Woodrow Wilson and with his consent was made into a treaty and given to the two Allies. How disgusted with himself the Colonel must feel today that his interference, plus that righteous refusal of the Senate, which he anticipated, to consider the treaty has laid the United States open to endless Gallic charges of perfidy, of obtaining certain concessions in the treaty by this false promise of a permanent guaranty. The whole country still stands accused of chicanery and bad faith because of this supernatural, not to say diabolical, cleverness of the Texas colonel.

Allowing, however, for the obvious faults of his character and for the nature of the role he was called upon to play, one cannot withhold from Colonel House one's admiration for his extraordinary industry and devotion, and the dexterity, versatility, and skill with which he played the game. He subordinated everything to his job, and spared himself not at all. As to his all-embracing activities and the remarkable power he exercised, his editor inserts repeated proof. When war came everybody—literally thousands upon thousands with an ax to grind—wrote to him asking for jobs or seeking, legitimately, to obtain action from the over-burdened departments of the government. As Professor Seymour puts it:

Those planning the mobilization of scientific and industrial effort sent him their memoranda for criticism; industrialists wrote him on the proper method to settle the coal or the railroad problem; financiers wrote regarding the tax plan of the Secretary of the Treasury; naval experts on the policy of Secretary Daniels; journalists on the unsatisfactory relations between the Administration and the press "which have become intolerably tangled. . ."

At home the whole world was at his feet; abroad he was greatly liked. His quiet, ingratiating manners, his unselfishness, his readiness to fall in with every suggestion he could meet, and his eagerness to compromise made him a very welcome plenipotentiary of Woodrow Wilson.

Thus A. J. Balfour—whom Colonel House believed to be the most liberal member of the British Government!—considered his help "inestimable." Northcliffe wrote that through House "I have been able to effect much more good than I have achieved at Washington"; this great newspaper magnate rejoiced that Wilson and House were "both pro-English." Sir William Wiseman declared that it is "difficult for the chronicler to define and the reader to appreciate the position and influence of Colonel House during the World War." The British and French leaders sought his aid at all times and by it cut through red tape and got things accomplished. Before he held office the British Government actually negotiated directly with him, a private citizen, appealing to him at one time as its only hope of heading off financial bankruptcy. France and England learned early that Colonel House was the State Department; there is nothing more striking in these volumes than the almost total absence of references to the Department which was supposed to be in charge of our foreign affairs. As for the power the Colonel exercised, he even dared to alter, without asking anybody's consent, an official dispatch received by him in London from Woodrow Wilson before giving it to Lloyd George and the press—"rephrasing it" is Professor Seymour's euphemism. For this the Colonel was momentarily disavowed in Washington, but only momentarily. This long record teems with praises of him; David Hunter Miller glows over the "extraordinary influence" of the Colonel in all the negotiations leading to the writing of the Covenant, and Sir William Wiseman, who was the liaison officer between Colonel House and the British Government, repeatedly pays tribute to Colonel House's ability, sagacity, and remarkable accomplishments.

Much of his popularity was due to the fact that the Colonel loved everybody—at least when he was with him.

Everybody was his best and dearest friend. Balfour, Orlando, Clemenceau, whose grateful kisses are constantly recorded; Reading, Northcliffe, Tardieu, Lloyd George, Wiseman, Joffre (about whom the Colonel's judgment was particularly at fault), Foch—one gets nauseated finally by the lack of discrimination until one begins to wonder whether there is not much truth in Ray Stannard Baker's sharp assertion that "There was nothing hard, clear, sure, definite, in his [Colonel House's] intellectual processes." One even for a moment wonders whether Karl Friedrich Nowak, one of the historians of the Treaty of Versailles, has not some right on his side when he speaks of the Colonel as a delightful person who "entirely failed to comprehend what was being discussed with him"; who "amid the stern realities of the conference table . . . never grasped what was going on between those present." Yet it is indisputable that the Colonel did play an immensely valuable part in organizing for the Peace Conference both here and abroad, in defining the war aims and the peace points, in snatching other people's ideas and putting them to work, besides originating a number himself, and doing everything in his power to forward business and hasten the coming of some kind of peace. "My province," he wrote, "is to keep things running smoothly . . . to find in advance where trouble lies, and to smooth it out before it goes too far." In other words, he was a service station which was never without its supply of gas. Side by side with all this were the often execrable blunders of judgment which both the Colonel and his editor are frank to record.

It is not easy to assay exactly the value of one who by choice tried to play simultaneously the role of errand boy, glorified private secretary, privy chamberlain, and a fairly liberal Talleyrand. Some of his weaknesses are very plain. As I have said, he was an eternal compromiser. The fact that his nature prevented his ever bursting out with passionate emotion against any injustice, that it kept him from practically ever making a speech, from ever taking a strong and unyielding position, made him fall back upon wheedling, upon suggesting other ways of beating the devil around the stump, made him be forever finding alternatives, sometimes furtively, and forever compromising. Never could he put his back to the wall and take a stand, or seek by the power of righteous indignation to overcome the "vanities and ambitions" of the various statesmen, to which Wickham Steed attributes the worst evils of the treaty-making. He deplored privately the policy of the Allies and the United States in starving to death hundreds of thousands of citizens in Central Europe, chiefly women and children, the aged, and the feeble, but as for making an effective outcry against it, no, indeed. If it had depended upon the Colonel to rescue them they would be dying yet.

Amusingly enough, the Colonel looked down upon his Chief because Woodrow Wilson was a compromiser! "The President," he wrote in his diary, "often tells me that under no circumstances will he do a certain thing and, a few hours later, he consents. . . ." Plainly this was a grievous fault in anybody else. The difference between them was that Colonel House never recorded himself as refusing to recede, and therefore always left open the line of retreat. He never made a frontal public attack, but was silent at all the meetings, for instance, of the commission that drafted the League of Nations, always seeking to deal with individuals and to mold them behind closed doors; behind those doors he receded and compromised. Compromise was his and Wilson's joint undoing. As Leonard Woolf has recently said of Wilson and House at Paris in the London Nation: "Once they began to compromise they were lost, the Allied statesmen saw they had America on the run, and they kept her running until she reached Versailles." Those skilful men soon had Wilson and House sized up, and knew just how far they could go with them. Every time Clemenceau kissed Colonel House he celebrated another victory, and Colonel House loved him all the more dearly. It is revealed now that Woodrow Wilson's gesture of summoning the George Washington to France was a mere accidental one, and that it did not, as is popularly believed, result in the Allies yielding to him. On the contrary, both House and Wilson compromised more than ever after that.

As for the record for compromise of the Colonel who himself records the melancholy compromising of Woodrow Wilson, here are a few facts brought out by Professor Seymour: He out-compromised the President by agreeing to a buffer Rhine state which Wilson, to his eternal credit, declined to accept; he again out-compromised his Chief on the Sarre question: "I advise yielding a little in order to secure harmony so that the accusation would not be made that we were unreasonable. He promised to do this thing." "This thing" was the present outrageous arrangement, in violation of Wilson's principles, under which the French have for the last ten years been administering the Sarre Basin. Like Wilson in Paris, the Colonel often overrode the unanimous opinions of experts in order not to raise an issue; he accepted the wrongdoing without a protest. Together they yielded to Japan on Shantung, thereby so outraging their three fellow-commissioners that one wished to resign to keep his self-respect, and several of the experts did. They themselves were responsible for the denial to the Japanese of their just demands for the incorporation in the Covenant of a statement of the national and racial equality of all member nations of the League, and of their citizens. Swearing they would ne'er consent, Wilson and House consented to French troops camping years upon German soil; to the failure to specify the exact amount of reparations which Germany was to pay. For the crime of yielding the Tyrol to Italy—to which both Lloyd George and Clemenceau were, it now appears, opposed—Woodrow Wilson, however, alone deserves the reprobation of the 300,000 Germans who are daily violated and outraged in all their feelings by the Italy of Mussolini*. His is also the sole shame for the inclusion of pensions among the legitimate war reparations in the face of the private protests of Colonel House and our economic advisers. It was Wilson who, after demanding open covenants of peace openly arrived at, opposed the publication of the peace treaty long after it had been agreed to, and it was not given to the world until copies from Berlin came filtering through to Paris. It was he who was against an international court, and then came round in favor of it. It was he who finally made a stand for Fiume, at last carrying out his public threat to go over the heads of the peace-makers to their people, and then went wrong in the eyes of many American experts. Together these two men bargained away everything for the League of Nations, and then, with rare poetic justice, they failed to carry their nation into it.

House was sure that they would win over the Senate if they only compromised enough, so he labored hard and ably to wring changes in the Covenant from the Allies to meet Senatorial protests. Again his judgment utterly failed him. Always he was certain that he knew just what public opinion was at home—it always coincided with what he wanted or feared. There never was a moment when he hesitated to speak out in the name of the American people as if he were chosen by them to be their mouthpiece. For example, he did not hesitate to tell the Prime Ministers of his belief that the United States would accept mandates over Armenia and Constantinople, as a result of which the United States has also been accused of breach of faith. "America will not and ought not to fight for the maintenance of the old, narrow, and selfish order of things," he once wrote to Woodrow Wilson. Yet, as a result of their joint handling of the fate of America, that is exactly what it did. Colonel House now admits that the treaty was bad, that it worked great injustice. Wilson had said in a speech at Buffalo: "What I am opposed to is not the feeling of the pacifists, but their stupidity. My heart is with them, but my mind has a contempt for them. I want peace, but I know how to get it and they do not." Then he went to Paris and scored, with Colonel House, the most terrible failure to get a just peace and to advance civilization the world has ever seen. Colonel House now confesses it, but the admission was not necessary. It is proved on every page of his book. He and Wilson were both temperamentally unfit to carry through their cause to success.

* On May 26, 1917, this same Woodrow Wilson had written to the Russian Government: "No people must be forced under sovereignty under which it does not wish to live."

This question will, I suppose, be debated as long as the Peace Conference is discussed at all. Ray Stannard Baker has tried to place the blame for the failure at Paris upon Colonel House as well as the foreign Premiers. His argument is demolished by these "Intimate Papers" at several points; Colonel House has a complete alibi to the charge that he betrayed his Chief. Professor Seymour tries to find a middle course by laying all the blame upon the time and the conditions. By March 1, 1919, it had become clear, he says, that "an unbending insistence by President Wilson on his program would precipitate an open quarrel with the European Prime Ministers. They protested that if they yielded it would mean the overthrow of their governments. All were caught in a net of circumstances which made free and reasonable decisions impossible. Tales of confusion in Central Europe, Russia, the Far East, the Near East complicated the problems at Paris." Now, this was perhaps true at the time. The crucial point of the whole battle was at the very beginning of the negotiations. Then it was that House and Wilson should have pointed out that they would make terms on the Fourteen Points and nothing else; that they would not yield an inch, as America had pledged its national honor, as the other statesmen had pledged the honor of their countries by promising the Germans in the armistice a peace on the Fourteen Points. That was the time for the ultimatum, for the threat to make a separate peace, to take the strongest army out of Europe together with the representatives of the only Treasury that had unlimited sums of money in it. Later on they were enchained by their own compromising.

Of course, if Wilson and House had obtained an ideal League of Nations and had had it accepted by the United States; if by this time war had been outlawed, and the promised disarmament of the Allies realized, there might be a defense for their compromising. As it is it would have been far better if, either at the beginning of the conference or about the first of March, the Americans had marched away from Paris without a treaty but with their flags flying. In that case, we should not, as a nation, have a lot of things on our conscience of which we ought to be thoroughly ashamed. Our honor would be unsullied. The beaten Central Powers would not be able rightly to charge us with breaking our word, our national faith. Instead we have Colonel House writing: "How splendid it would have been had we blazed a new and better trail! However, it is to be doubted whether this could have been done even if those in authority had so decreed, for the peoples back of them had to be reckoned with." This from the man who in Paris on November 11, 1918, sent the following triumphant and adoring telegram to Woodrow Wilson:

Autocracy is dead; long live democracy and its immortal leader. In this great hour my heart goes out to you in pride, admiration, and love.

EDWARD HOUSE

This same Edward House now writes in the work before us that if he and the immortal leader of democracy had won at Paris he is not sure that their peace would not have been followed by as much bitterness as has resulted from the betrayal at Versailles. The peoples had to be reckoned with? It was Wilson himself who declared at the first plenary session in Paris that the delegates were all there merely to obey the voices of the plain people who had made the sacrifices. Indeed, on the way over on the George Washington the President told the assembled American experts that "the men whom we are about to deal with did not represent their own people . . ." and that "this was the first conference in which decisions depended upon the opinion of mankind, not upon the previous determination and diplomatic schemes of the assembled representatives." Which is right, Wilson or House? They cannot both be.

Unfortunately for Professor Seymour, there is proof in his own volumes that if House and Wilson had made a stand they could have achieved much. For instance, when Colonel House got mad at the attacks upon America and its emissaries in Paris he went to Clemenceau and demanded that they cease. They did the next day. Again, Colonel House had an inspiration in the night of October 29, 1918, which led to his telling the Prime Ministers, who were then haggling over granting the armistice on the basis of the Fourteen Points, that if they did not yield the President would go before Congress and discuss whether we should not make a separate peace. Again Colonel House on another occasion showed spunk in demanding financial aid for Belgium. On page 351 of volume IV will be found clear evidence of the gravity of the French financial situation which was alleviated only when Colonel House interceded for the French with Lloyd George. The financial straits of the Allies alone gave the Americans the whip-hand. These instances show that when House and Wilson wanted to bring influence to bear they could. Indeed, the two men had every card in the pack with which to play the game, as everyone who was at Paris at that time knows. They were simply execrable poker players, and they lost the greatest stakes for which two men have ever gambled. Colonel House's volumes prove this.

As for the relations of the two men, Colonel House frankly admits that he still loves and admires Woodrow Wilson. He is surely sincere in that, though to admit anything else would inevitably damage his own prestige, since, as he shows, so many of Woodrow Wilson's acts were due to himself, his suggestions, his letters, telegrams, memoranda, and programs. On June 10, 1919, he confided to his diary: "He [Wilson] is one of the most difficult and complex characters I have ever known. He is so contradictory that it is hard to pass judgment upon him. . . . When one gets access to him, there is no more charming man in all the world than Woodrow Wilson. . . . He could use this charm to enormous personal and public advantage if he would. . . ." He has no explanation for the break between them and declares that it is a mystery which will never be solved because the explanation is buried with Woodrow Wilson. We are not quite so sure of this as he; there are three persons who may yet throw considerable light upon it. But it is true that he never received an unkind word in writing from his friend. While he says that he often disagreed with Mr. Wilson, he also flattered him eternally and never ceased to feed his enormous vanity and egotism. Once the Colonel said to the President: "No man has ever had deeper or graver responsibilities, and no one has met them with more patience, courage, and wisdom." He assured Wilson that his name "should be linked during the ages" with the League. A little later he found that the growing desire for the League "has crystallized around your name. . . . Now if war can be made impossible what a glorious culmination of your other accomplishments." Wilson's speeches always seemed to Colonel House the greatest ever made. "Your speech was as great as the occasion." On another day: "I believe that what you said today will hearten the world as nothing you have said before." If it was a melancholy ending which came to their friendship Colonel House may solace himself with the thought that he is but one of a long list. Sooner or later in the nature of things a break had to come.

Finally, I would emphasize again the value of the historical revelations which Colonel House gives us as well as the personal ones, made the more striking because of Professor Seymour's skilful editing. He gives us for the first time the true story of Wilson's part in the Siberian adventure of the Allies and ourselves—Wilson's yielding and agreeing to an unconstitutional act clearly forecast his similar surrenders at Paris. House, too, at first opposed and then accepted, and it appears that the Allies really believed that they had no chance of final victory in France unless they intervened in Siberia! Here, too, are extraordinarily interesting accounts of the negotiations to obtain an early German surrender by strengthening the German pacifists by American propaganda—apparently the President had no contempt for their desire to obtain peace. The whole story of the conception of the League is given in detail, together with a remarkable picture of how the Covenant was finally licked into shape by the League Commission at Paris. Excellently told is also the narrative of the way the armistice terms were worked out by Colonel House and Mr. Wilson; it is probably the last word on this subject from the American point of view. Also extremely valuable is the portrayal of the admirable work done by General Tasker H. Bliss and Colonel House on the Supreme War Council during the spring and summer of 1918. The plain effort to be frank and straightforward and the self-revelation of this autobiographical work stamp it as one of the really great personal contributions to American history.

China and Japan—1928

By THOMAS F. MILLARD

[This is the first of three articles by Mr. Millard. The second, Did Japan Kill Chang Tso-lin?, will appear shortly.]

Shanghai, October 1

UNLESS readers are ready to accept some things as ponderable propositions in the Chino-Japan situation of today, viz.:

That sending Japanese troops into Shantung Province, into Hopei (Chihli) Province, and into Manchuria, in April and May, 1928, were coordinate moves in a broad political project of the Japanese Government;

That one motive of that project was to prevent the Chinese Nationalists from securing the hegemony of all China;

That to obstruct the northward advance of the Chinese Nationalist armies and to give excuse for the Japanese re-occupation of Shantung the Japanese military command provoked a clash with Chinese troops at Tsinan;

That the Japanese military command at Mukden planned and executed the assassination of Chang Tso-lin;

That, later, the Tokyo Government by menacing the Mukden Government prevented the Manchuria provinces from peacefully accepting the authority of the National Chinese Government at Nanking;

That the Japanese Government tried, and presumably is still trying, to compel the Mukden Government to sign an agreement which would detach Manchuria from China and make that region virtually a dependency of Japan;

Unless, as I said previously, readers are willing to accept those things as being within reason and perhaps provable, they would do well not to read any further. For this analysis will deal with realities and will make no effort to write down to international political amateurishness.

It should be said at once that some of those matters are not positively provable and probably they never will be. It is very difficult to prove ulterior motives and crimes of governments positively. If that ever is possible it usually is only long after the event. The proofs, or perhaps it is better to say the known facts, of the China-Japan imbroglio of 1928, in so far as it has developed, are largely circumstantial. By narrating the material facts and their connotations whatever there is of proof comes out.

A presumption exists in Western countries, which gets oblique recognition from official quarters that ought to know better, that Japan has an exceptional treaty status in China. That is not so. Japan's treaty rights in China are the same in principle and almost identical in fact as the treaty rights of the United States here. The American Government has the same right (?) to send troops into China that Japan has. The American Government has as much right to "advise" Chinese in Manchuria about recognizing the National Government of China as Japan has.

For many years the Japanese Government labored to establish among the Powers a recognition of Japan's "special position" in respect to China and did get a presumption to that effect worked into secret agreements with some of the Powers. The Japanese Government tried to twist the Lansing-Ishii Agreement to that interpretation but the American Government repudiated it. All pretense of Japan's having a special political relation to China was abandoned at the Washington Conference.

The principal points of China-Japan friction now are in Shantung Province and in Manchuria. Manchuria is the real crux. Japan's moves and actions in Shantung now (having failed to block the Chinese Nationalists' progress northward) are to establish diplomatic trading points to get something in Manchuria.

Since the latest crisis in the relations of China and Japan developed, the American and British governments have declared that they do not regard Manchuria as being different in political status from any other part of China. No question of Shantung having a different status than other parts of China ever has been raised.

The Powers taking part in the Washington Conference and who signed the treaties made there (United States, Belgium, Great Britain, China, France, Italy, Japan, Holland, Portugal) made a particular agreement relating to principles and policies to be followed by those Powers in matters concerning China. That agreement has nine articles of which I will quote two:

ARTICLE I

The Contracting Powers, other than China, agree:

1. To respect the sovereignty, the independence, and the territorial and administrative integrity of China;
2. To provide the fullest and most unembarrassed opportunity to China to develop and maintain for herself an effective and stable government;
3. To use their influence for the purpose of effectually establishing and maintaining the principle of equal opportunity for the commerce and industry of all nations throughout the territory of China;
4. To refrain from taking advantage of conditions in China in order to seek special rights or privileges which would abridge the rights of subjects or citizens of friendly states and from countenancing action inimical to the security of such states.

ARTICLE II

The Contracting Powers agree not to enter into any treaty, agreement, arrangement, or understanding, either with one another, or, individually or collectively, with any Power or Powers, which would infringe or impair the principles stated in Article I.

At Washington, in 1922, China and Japan, with the approval of the other Powers, made an agreement whereby Japan was to evacuate Shantung Province, which was supplemented by a subsequent agreement made in China afterward. Those agreements, subject to interpretation under the terms of the Articles previously cited, define the China-Japan status in that province.

A story is told that during a discussion in committee at the Washington Conference Mr. (then Senator) Oscar Underwood, one of the American delegates, asked one of the Japanese delegates:

"You continually use the term 'interests' in reference to Japan's relations with China. Just what do you mean?"

Somewhat embarrassed, the Japanese went on to explain about large Japanese investments in China. After listening a while, Mr. Underwood said:

"You mean property, then, when you say 'interests.' I think it would be better if we use the word property when property is meant. Interests is a broad and vague term."

The Washington Conference itself was proof of great international interest in China and of extensive foreign interests here. Japan has no monopoly of any forms of interest in China. Japanese property in China is not one-fourth the value of British investments in the United States. It is less than the value of American investments in Japan. It is a fraction of American investments in Europe. Other foreign investments and property in China greatly exceed those of Japan.

Japan's property in China is based on wars and is the spoils of wars; not wars of Japan with China, but wars of other Powers against one another when China was the unwilling and principal victim. Japanese private investments in China were largely acquired by questionable methods and in all other respects their present status is the same as American or any foreign investments here.

Railways constitute the major part of Japan's property in China. The South Manchuria Railway is that part of the Chinese Eastern Railway (built by joint Russian and Chinese participation) held by Japanese armies when the war between Russia and Japan ended. Japan was in a position to demand and to obtain abandonment by Russia in Japan's favor of the Russian railway rights in that section. Japan virtually compelled China to consent, afterward, to Japan's inheritance of Russia's rights, and, still later, to give Japan a lot of additional privileges. A good deal of Chinese private property in Manchuria was taken by Japan during the war and never restored to its owners.

Under the terms of the old agreement with Russia, China had the right to buy the Chinese Eastern Railway outright within a time which already has expired. Japan forced China under pressure to agree to extend that limit for ninety-nine years; an agreement which China protested at the Washington Conference as being given under duress. Later Dr. Wellington Koo, then Peking Foreign Minister, denounced the Liao-tung lease (Port Arthur and Dairen area) and announced that China considered that all foreign tenure of railways in Manchuria was void in respect to extraterritorial status. That is the situation now. Naturally, in the circumstances, China has made no attempt to enforce that declaration. Neither in Shantung nor Manchuria has China tried to confiscate foreign railway investments. She merely has wanted to buy them back. Japan has refused to sell.

Japan's railway property in China is now estimated by the Japanese Government at a very high valuation. In statements published in America and other countries the total runs to hundreds of millions. This is for property which cost probably less than $50,000,000. None of that original cost was borne by Japan or by Japanese private investors.

One concedes that those railways are worth more now than when they were built. What has given them increased value? It is partly material improvements; better rolling stock, equipment, and the like. But the greater part of the increased value comes from operation of the lines; from hauling passengers and freight. The passengers are almost all Chinese. The freight is chiefly produce of Chinese farms and factories. The Chinese people by their labor have given value to those railways. If they stopped producing, the railway properties would drop in value to what the equipment would sell for. If ten million Chinese had not moved into Manchuria in the last twenty years the South Manchuria Railway would not be so good a property.

To follow Japan's finger in China's domestic politics one needs to go back a little. That Japan has been afraid of the Chinese revolution from its beginning is known to all who have any background on Far Eastern affairs. That the downfall of monarchy in China presages the downfall of monarchy in Japan has been the theme of Japanese political writers ever since the Manchu court went. At different times Japanese statesmen have dwelt on that theme, and some of them have said plainly that Japan would be justified, for her own security, in preventing the adoption of republican institutions in China. The military oligarchy that has ruled Japan until lately, and which controls the present government there, always has feared that republicanism will spread from China to Japan. The Japanese Government has sympathized with and at times has obliquely encouraged attempts to restore the monarchy in China.

As long as real republicanism in China seemed remote, as long as Chinese military dictators and would-be dictators fought among themselves for place and power and wealth, as long as those internecine struggles kept this country divided and weak, as long as the Nationalist movement was confined to the region of Canton, as long as Japan had especial influence with the dictator of Manchuria and by propinquity a particular influence with any government at Peking, Tokyo was not much concerned. But when Nationalism advanced northward, occupied the Yangtze Valley, and threatened to extend its power even to Peking, Tokyo became uneasy.

Chinese domestic politics, as in most countries, expresses itself largely in personalities. Certain men stand for certain things and tendencies. Thus Japan's hostility to Wu Pei-fu, when that warlord was ascendant, was obvious. General Wu was noted for his intense opposition to Japan's aggressive policy in China. In the wars between Wu and Chang Tso-lin, Japan's good-will was on the side of Chang.

Then up came Feng Yu-hsiang, who succeeded in crowding Wu Pei-fu out of the picture and became for a while the dictator of Peking. When Chang Tso-lin drove Feng out of the old capital, Tokyo's relief was evident. Feng, like Wu, was outspoken about China's rights and Japan's aggressions.

Along with Chang Tso-lin's extension of power in North China came Chang Chung-chang, a henchman of Chang Tso-lin, who got as far south as Shanghai in 1925, then was driven back into Shantung, where he stayed until 1928. It is interesting to note that he was expelled from Shanghai by Sun Chuan-fang.

All that time the Nationalists were hardly in the picture. The year 1927 brought the Nationalists into the Yangtze Valley and put Japan on the alert. Tokyo regarded Shantung and Manchuria as Japan's "spheres of influence," and from then the purpose to obstruct a Nationalist progress northward developed.

There is little reason to doubt that Japanese provided arms and munitions for Sun Chuan-fang's attempted comeback in the summer of 1927 when his army almost retook Nanking. When Sun's army was disastrously defeated its remnants retreated into southern Shantung, where, again with Japanese help, it was reorganized. One should say that Sun Chuan-fang, while he held Chekiang, Kiangsu, and Anhui provinces, had the option of throwing his lot with the Nationalist cause or of joining the northern militarists headed by Chang Tso-lin. Japan's influence is credited with affecting Sun's decision at that juncture.

The year 1928 opened with this situation. Chang Tso-lin held Peking and Chihli (now Hopei) Province, and, of course, Manchuria. Chang Chung-chang held most of Shantung and part of Honan, with Sun Chuan-fang's small army as a first line of defense to an advance of the Nationalists along the Tientsin-Pukou Railway.

The Nationalists, whose capital now was at Nanking, had by dint of propaganda and persistent work brought Feng Yu-hsiang and Yen Hsi-shan into their fold. Feng had recovered from his defeat in 1926 and was established rather firmly in western Honan. Wu Pei-fu had passed into oblivion.

After much negotiation Feng and Yen agreed that Chiang Kai-shek should be commander-in-chief of the National armies, which were divided into four "groups." Chiang Kai-shek led the first army, Feng commanded the second army, Yen commanded the third army, and one of the Kiangsi generals at Hankow commanded the fourth army. Anti-Nationalist propaganda in China predicted that those groups would not hold together, but, like so many things about the Nationalist movement which are inexplicable to some people, they did hold together until the successful finish of the campaign.

Evening Before Rain

By L. A. G. STRONG

Walking at last by the tame little edge of the sea
I have found a quieter haven and rest for my thought
Than any I called to my comfort, the time I crept
Watchfully through those fields there in dread of the bull.

The bull broke loose and tore up my neighbor's garden.
Four men went out with a rope, but they have not caught him.

He is roaming the fields, yet I am already rested
Looking across the quiet water to the Isle of Skye.

The sea is pale as a sheet, the dark island
Mottled with tiny fields, touch-close, clear;
A silence has fallen over the rocks and sea-birds
Who will soon be listening to the tingle and whisper of the rain.

My fear has gone, I can scarcely remember it.
There is a magic in this hour that calms behavior.
I am going back in the stillness, and if he is abroad
The gray bull will browse, his back to me, when I go by.

Padlocking the "Talkies"

By JAMES N. ROSENBERG

THE censor's power to muzzle the talkless movie has been established in this country by statute and court decision. The Censor and the Talking Movie is my present theme. Can the censors throttle speech via the talking movie as they are permitted to muzzle the film without vocal accompaniment? This is no academic subject, for the Pennsylvania censors have already asserted such power.

Dare they do so in the face of our federal Bill of Rights which disposed of the matter for all time by declaring that "Congress shall make no law abridging freedom of speech or of the press"? Can speech be stifled in the face of the constitutional safeguards written into the constitution of every State of the Union? By what authority do the Pennsylvania censors presume to apply the now popular padlock principle of government to speech, whether between man and man face to face, over the telephone or the radio, or via the talking movie? By the best and most august authority, the Supreme Court of the United States. Read the Mutual Film cases in Volume 236 of the United States Supreme Court Reports decided in 1915.

But before I discuss these cases, definition and a dip into history become useful. What, precisely, is censorship? Ernst and Seagle in their path-finding book "To the Pure . . ." use the word in its wider and looser sense. They include all action whether by government or other agencies, and whether repressive by padlock in advance, or punitive after the event. This is inexact and leads to confusion of thought, for the difference between punishment for an act already done and the doctrine of "Thou Shalt Not" is no mere difference of tweedledum and tweedledee. Webster describes the censor as "one who is empowered . . . to forbid publication." From Blackstone's days censorship has continuously been defined as "previous restraint."

Our Bill of Rights and our State constitutions left us free to publish what we would and face the consequences whether it were a libel suit or prison for incitement to riot and bloodshed. Their virtue was that they preserved us from the padlock. This was what the Fathers meant when they wrote into our Constitution that "Congress shall make no law abridging freedom of speech or of the press." A single quotation will prove my point. In 1907 the Supreme Court (in Paterson vs. Colorado) declared that "the main purpose of such constitutional provisions is to prevent all such previous restraints on publication as had been practiced by other governments. They do not prevent subsequent punishment of such statements as may be contrary to the public welfare." The learned justices who wrote those words were not only sound constitutional lawyers. They were good historians. They knew their "Areopagitica." They had heard of the Inquisition; the Index Librorum Prohibitorum; the Star Chamber; the Napoleonic censorship; the slowly won liberty of speech in England; the fatal result of the muzzle.

Then came the movies. If Gutenberg's hand press struck terror into the wielders of authority, it is not difficult to comprehend that in order to control movies, which contain untold power of regimenting public opinion, the forces of virtue girded their modest loins. The mothers of America, led by Canon Chase, gathered for battle. It is true that for a while they made little headway. In 1912 Mayor Gaynor of New York denounced and vetoed a New York City censorship ordinance, saying: "Ours is a government of free speech and free press. This is the cornerstone of free government." But such outworn mouthings of Patrick Henry, of Jefferson, Madison, Franklin belonged to the high-school debate rather than the forum of life. In 1913 an Ohio moving-picture censorship bill was enacted. Other States followed suit. It was in 1915 when German spies, packed with poisonous propaganda, lurked in every American areaway that the Supreme Court of the United States was called on to decide whether an Ohio statute providing for censorship (i. e., previous restraint) over the movies was constitutional. Though the Ohio State constitution guarantees against censorship by declaring that "every citizen may freely speak, write, and publish . . . on all subjects, being responsible for the abuse of that right," the Supreme Court held that the police power which is exercised in granting licenses to theaters (chiefly in relation to fire hazards) justified censorship over the movie, and so sustained the statute; and at the very same term of court a similar Kansas statute, giving the censors power to suppress even the news reel, was likewise held constitutional.

These decisions the Supreme Court predicated largely on the theory that the moving picture is a mere spectacle. Counsel for the film companies urged expertly that censorship contravenes the constitutional safeguards. They pointed out that moving pictures are displayed not only for entertainment but as "exponents of policies, teachers of science and history." The only answer of the Supreme Court was that since, according to the statute, "Films of a 'moral, educational, or amusing and harmless character shall be passed and approved'" "No exhibition, therefore . . . will be prevented if its pictures have those qualities." That the determination of these qualities was left in advance to the decision of a censor, the Court refused to consider as an infraction of the constitutional safeguard. Its declaration, made only eight years earlier, that the purpose of the constitutional provision was to prevent all previous restraint, the Court held inapplicable to the mere spectacle. Thus in 1915 the principle of previous restraint was for the first time adopted as a part of American jurisprudence. The Court, after declaring that freedom of speech was "too certain to need discussion," disposed of the nice problems involved by saying, "the argument is wrong or strained which extends the guaranties of free speech to the multitudinous shows which are advertised on the bill-boards of our cities . . . the common sense of the country is against the contention." Thus through war-time decision, not only were "Dr. Caligari" and "The Covered Wagon" subjected to censorship as mere spectacles, but even the daily news reel with its pictures and text was relegated to the same category. Other courts soon followed suit. The New York Court of Appeals (Justice Cardozo not sitting) acquiesced.

Behold the result. Film censorship was attempted in thirty States, was actually put through in seven, operates in over thirty cities by process of municipal ordinance, and the Battalions of the Blue Menace have made six tremendous assaults on Congress for national censorship; assaults defeated only by the single-handed opposition of Calvin Coolidge—who while Governor of Massachusetts vetoed a censorship bill on “constitutional grounds.”

And how does all this relate to the talking movie? The present censorship statutes and ordinances on their face are broad enough to cover any kind of movie; the accompaniment of the voice does not preclude the censor from presuming, under the express language of the statutes, to rule over and suppress them. The Pennsylvania censor has firmly announced he has such authority. Here, then, is a nice question which must some day come before our Supreme Court. If a silent news reel, including its printed matter, may constitutionally be made subject to the censor’s “previous restraint,” why not a news reel with words? Why not a speech of Al Smith or Herbert Hoover? And if the talking movie is to be subject to censorship, what has become of our constitutional safeguard that “Congress shall make no law abridging freedom of speech”? Is speech, when mechanically reproduced in its every accent and intonation, no longer speech? If not, what is it?

The censor is an official of the government. Is it to be assumed that he will favor free speech for those who would criticize or ridicule that particular government of which that particular censor is a part? Despite his exalted office, the censor remains a mere man. Can we expect him to aim the gun at his own breast? Or to permit the talking films to become a means of attacking his boss.

Let us hope that when this riddle comes before the Supreme Court the creed of the Star Chamber will not prevail. Let me suggest to the movie kings that Calvin Coolidge is the man they ought to engage as counsel for that argument. His is a consistent record and a good one. I should like to have a hand in writing the brief. It will be a cause célèbre. Speech by movie (and its sister, the radio) bids fair to become, if it has not already developed, into one of the mightiest weapons in the world for molding thought, emotion, and passion.

“The previous restraint.” The Fathers got rid of it because history taught it to be the tyrant’s surest weapon. Have the lessons of history become worthless because speech and the press now reach millions instead of thousands? Or do those lessons thereby gain increased vitality? Is freedom of speech and thought so heady a drink that it ought to come within the purview of the Volstead Act and the padlock? So at least think the good ladies who put through censorship to protect their offspring.

Advice to a Prospective Teacher

By GEORGE WILLIAMS

MY DEAR HARRISON:

I HAVE before me your letter asking advice. You write that you would like to become a teacher of college English, since it would give you the opportunity to make living and real to others the works of the great English masters; that you would appreciate information which would aid you in accomplishing your desire.

To begin with, as a teacher you must have a Master of Arts, in addition to a Bachelor of Arts degree. I should recommend some first-class Eastern or Midwestern university. At a smaller college expenses may be less, but you will work just as hard, and your degree will not have the prestige that one from a large institution conveys. It will cost you approximately $1,000, an amount you should possess before you start (borrow it, if necessary), since earning your living and studying in the graduate school, as I have found, are entirely incompatible with the best achievement. Then, with your master’s degree, you can probably obtain a position paying $1,600 or $1,700 a year.

But don’t think that you have begun to mount the ladder of teaching success; you have not yet reached the first rung. As soon as you are a Master of Arts, your superiors will inform you that you can advance neither professionally nor financially without a doctor-of-philosophy degree. Your money is gone, you reply; what are you to do? That is your affair, you are told; get a Ph.D. or get out. Well, you can attend summer school. All the large universities offer summer courses, and while the instruction is, in most cases, inferior to that of the winter terms, time spent thus is better than time spent in private study (for you are at least earning credits) or in doing some uncongenial type of mental or physical labor. In the meantime, you must be saving your money for your “year off,” the year when you will show that you possess a reading knowledge of French, German, and Latin; that you have mastered Anglo-Saxon, Old German, Old French, Icelandic, and the whole range of English and American literature; and that you are capable of writing, in from 50,000 to 120,000 words, the results of some philological investigation or literary research—your thesis. All in all, your Ph.D. will have cost you $6,000, and your reward will be the title of Assistant Professor of English at a salary of $2,300. You will be, then, about thirty-five years old.

In the meantime, what of your teaching? What of that yearning to make the great world-writers “real and alive” to the younger generation? Shakespeare, Wordsworth, Tennyson, and the others will, indeed, furnish mental pabulum, but only for you. In the classroom you will speak of commas and semicolons, of restrictive and non-restrictive clauses, of “so-faults” and of “and-which” constructions. For you are not a teacher of literature; you are a teacher of composition—three to five sections—and you will have 100 to 175 300- to 500-word themes to read every week. You will soon tire, too, of the few far-fetched occasions when you can make a reference to “The Lady of Shalott” or “To a Skylark” or the “Ode on a Grecian Urn.” With the acquisition of your Ph.D., your composition sections will be cut to two or three, and you will be allowed to offer a course in your beloved Tennyson-Browning-Arnold, if you have made these writers your “field” in the graduate school.

You, with your Ph.D., are now on the first rung of the teaching ladder. After two or three years, you are still in the same position. Why are you not being advanced? Your superiors will tell you that you are not publishing anything. You immediately write and publish a series of articles dealing with the teaching of English (articles which pay nothing financially, and which add nothing to, if, indeed, they do not detract from your teaching reputation). And you suddenly find within you a certain lyrical vein, which, when mined, gives you twenty or thirty beautiful sonnets and short lyrics, not quite beautiful enough to appear in the "paying" magazines, but beautiful enough to be welcomed by the poetry journals that pay in "prizes" and subscriptions. For some reason, you have lost that youthful desire to create short stories, and to finish, perhaps even to begin, the novel you once planned to write. The academic atmosphere is not conducive to creative writing. By the time you have read the weekly average of 40,000 words in student long-hand, by the time you have made your class-preparations and have thought out new plans and methods for revivifying the deadly composition meetings, your mind desires passive recreation in the form of some stimulating reading, not renewed activity in artistic literary creation. Also, the academic life is not the life from which come the great modern masterpieces, or even interesting, readable literary productions. The teacher of literature is experiencing life vicariously, through the eyes and through the words of those who have lived life at first hand and have written of it and who have not had to absorb millions of words by immature minds in the course of a year. All of the teachers of English in this generation who have become successful in writing readable and potentially enduring creative literature could easily be gathered, without danger of overcrowding, in the smoking room of a Pullman car.

With your twelve or fifteen educational articles, your twenty or thirty poems, you send in a list of your "publications" to your superiors. And they tell you that still you have not published anything; that anyone can write articles dealing with teaching problems (which is true), that creative writing in any form, unless it bring national reputation, can not be considered "publishing" in the eyes of the university. You must do research. So, for ten or twelve years you spend from $300 to $600 a year visiting Chicago, Washington, New York, Boston, and London, in order to make use of the library facilities in each city. You write research articles, tracing the definite article "the" through its ramifications in the eighteenth century, or assigning, with scientific accuracy, the day, month, and year on which each of Bacon's fifty-eight essays was written; you publish a scholarly monograph on the ablative case in Latin, and announce that you have almost enough material ready for a similar monograph on the Latin ablative absolute. Or, if your field is the nineteenth century, and some one has shown that Godwin influenced Shelley's ideas to a great extent, you prove that Godwin's influence on Shelley's ideas is entirely negligible; if it is commonly believed that Tennyson was profoundly disturbed by the tendencies of his age, you show, with convincing logic, that it was the tendencies of the age which were profoundly disturbed by Tennyson. And so on. The philological journals are glad to get your research articles and pay you with complimentary copies of the magazine. For the $300 to $600 you spend in the summer doing research, the university increases your salary $100 a year. Your reward is coming at last. By the time you are forty-five or fifty, you are an associate professor with a salary of $2,700 or $3,000. And at fifty or fifty-five, if you have managed to include two or three books in your publications, you are promoted to professor of English, relieved of all composition work, and given a salary of $3,000 or $3,400.

Your life, then, will have been an exceedingly busy one.

I do not believe that you can afford to marry. The first years of your teaching you will scarcely earn enough to support yourself and pay your expenses in summer school, in addition to putting aside a few dollars each year for your "year off." You cannot count upon a Sabbatical year, with half-pay, for instructors usually are not accorded Sabbatical privileges, and you can scarcely hope for an assistant professorship before acquiring a Ph.D. Scholarships, fellowships, and loan funds are at best uncertain sources, and often embody undesirable conditions by which the student should not be hampered. Even with your Ph.D. salary, I doubt if there is enough for two people to live comfortably and happily on. You will scarcely be in a financial position to marry before you are forty or forty-five. By then you may have lost the inclination; you may feel that you can no longer make the personal adjustments which marriage demands; or you will have fallen in love so deeply with your mistress, literature, and her child, research, that you will be unable to sacrifice this interest for any one.

If you do marry early, you will probably succeed just as well in the end, but the price you will pay for that success will be immeasurably great. "Love," my married colleagues say, "overcomes all difficulties," but I often wonder! Married, you will have to "skimp" twice as much to save half the money that you did before. And wife will have to work bitterly hard, doing her and your washing and ironing, mending and sewing, cooking and housework. And you will groan and curse, impotently, but the authorities above you will answer by saying, do graduate work, then research, research, RESEARCH! There will be babies; there usually are, no matter how carefully a young married couple plans. Then, when you have saved the sum for your year off, if, indeed, you ever do, you will go to the graduate school, and live for a year or more, with your wife, and a baby or two, in a couple of rooms which must serve as kitchen, dining-room, bedroom, nursery, study, and library. Unmarried, you will be able to maintain yourself, modestly but without danger of starvation; you will be able to do some traveling, including, perhaps, two or three trips to the Continent and to England, the country whose literature you teach; you will be able to enjoy occasionally—and from orchestra seats—the theater, the opera, and music; you will be able to build up a library without feeling that you are robbing your children of a possible college education. Perhaps I am wrong on all this; perhaps marriage, a loving, constant wife, affectionate children, more than compensate for all sacrifices made. I do not know. I have never felt that I was in a position to marry and find out.

You are thinking that I have painted only the dark side of teaching college English, that there must be a bright side. There are, indeed, certain advantages. Your hours of work are virtually your own; you are not under an eight-to-five regime; you can postpone work to the evening, to the next day, sometimes for several days. You have leisure for reading, perhaps the most desirable advantage of the situation, and leisure for writing if you can overcome the inertia imposed by enervating academic conditions. Sometimes, but not often, your leisure is destroyed by some additional work imposed by the university which even a stupid stenographer could do just as well. You are constantly in contact with minds on the threshold of developing, minds seeking for satisfactory nourishment, and one of the teacher's great personal satisfactions is his feeling, rightly or wrongly, that he is a great aid and inspiration to his students. When your years of composition apprenticeship are ended, and you begin to teach the authors near to your heart, this satisfaction is infinitely increased. Also, the teacher who conforms to the "system" and makes research the one great lasting reality of his life finds after a certain span of years that he has developed a genuine enthusiasm for his work; that the search for new truths or old truths reinterpreted, as he phrases it, is worth a man's best years.

And, quite recently, there have arisen two factors, already in force in a number of our larger universities, which will tend more and more to alleviate the financial strain under which a teacher works. One is the "permanency of tenure" rule, by which a teacher, if he shows promise of excellent teaching ability, genuine scholarship, and productive research, is, at the end of a certain period of years, usually four or five, given a permanent contract with his university. If, however, the young teacher fails during this apprenticeship, especially in the last two qualities (the Ph.D., after all, is a training for research, not a training for teaching), he is politely discouraged, and, if this has no effect, he is impolitely discharged. More important than permanency of tenure are old-age pensions. A small percentage of the teacher's salary is withheld annually, and an equal sum is added by the university; then, when the teacher reaches the age of 65, he is retired, and is given a certain sum each year, sufficient for the necessities of existence. This old-age pension idea suggests two interesting points of view: first, that universities realize teachers are not paid sufficiently to enable them to make their own adequate provision for old age; and, second, that a widely current belief is true, namely, that teachers, with ministers, are the most impractical and gullible of men, and therefore unable to save money.

These, then, seem to me the advantages and disadvantages of teaching college English. These seem to me the price one must pay for the privilege, and the rewards one receives for the service. They seem to me to be true of the average college or university. There will be exceptions, of course, more desirable conditions prevailing in some places, where teaching conditions and salaries are especially good, less desirable conditions prevailing in other places. But no one, unless financially independent, should enter the field of college English, without a reservoir of enthusiasm and energy which can supply a broadly flowing river for thirty years.

Your desire to become a college teacher of English is an honest and a laudable one. But my best advice to you, present conditions considered, is Don't.

How to Win Free Speech

By RUBEN LEVIN

THERE is a lesson for the free-speech fighters of the country in an episode that agitated Dallas lately and that acquired almost a national interest. That lesson is: do not become aroused over restrictions upon soap-box liberty, do not rake the thesaurus to call the censors names, do not parade the city or picket the authorities with self-righteous posters. Instead, make a laughing-stock of the proscribers of free speech, of those who seem to dread criticism of established institutions.

The Dallas loyalists began their noble work of defending the government against destruction when they revoked permission granted Ben Gitlow, Communist candidate for Vice-President in the recent campaign, to speak in the city-hall auditorium. Hitherto the auditorium had been allowed to anyone, of whatever shade of opinion, of whatever religious or economic quackery, provided the $5 rental fee was paid. It was the only available hall for public meetings, and it was commonly assumed to be open, without partiality, to anybody who applied. But no "Red" speaker had ever sought use of the auditorium before this time, for communism has been a rather vague, foreign, undisturbing idea hereabouts. Even so, Arthur Reinhart, commissioner of public property and custodian of the hall, accepted $5 from the Workers' Party and gave them permission to congregate in the hall for one night.

But then the American Legion, ever alert to defend American liberty, jumped into the breach. Loudly, publicly, it protested against allowing Mr. Gitlow "to spread his pernicious and un-American doctrines in the city of Dallas." It viewed with alarm the sanction given Gitlow as an "insult to the United States Government and a blot upon the memory of the American soldiers who died in Flanders fields to make the world safe for democracy."

"It would be a dishonor," said the Legion's spokesman, Allan C. Ater, chairman of the central committee, "to the American soldiers in the World War, those dead and those living, especially those who suffered and were maimed, to permit a meeting of the kind advertised."

At once Mr. Reinhart, himself a legionnaire, rescinded the permit. No representative of Moscow, he announced, should be allowed to speak in a Dallas public hall. The City Commission by a majority vote upheld him.

The incident might have ended there, except for a few outcries from the handful of local Communists, had not Richard Potts, the town philosopher, scholar, and wit, and editor of the Common Herd, "The only Rationalist magazine in Texas," come forth to the undoing of the Legion and the city commissioners.

With all seriousness, he advanced upon the city hall and asked for a permit to use the assembly room for an "open forum." It was granted, as he delivered himself of $5. The next day he announced to the press of the city that the "Royalist League of America" was to hold a mass meeting the following Sunday (five days later) in the auditorium. He styled himself secretary-general of the league. He issued a manifesto, as follows:

All citizens who are tired of our so-called democracy, who believe in a paternal government and the rule of a wise and judicious monarch, and who believe the time has come when we should begin active propaganda for the overthrow of this so-called republican government and for the establishment of a benevolent despotism in this country are invited to come and hear an address by an eminent exponent of the benefits of monarchical government over any democracy such as exists today in the United States of America.

As he had hoped, the Legion again leaped forward on behalf of 100 per cent Americanism. Mr. Ater announced weightily:

The Legion does not wish to shackle free speech, but it does think it improper for the city government to encourage movements aimed at the destruction of democracy by permitting its representatives to speak at the city auditorium. The Legion is opposed to any movement to overthrow democracy, for the legionnaires fought in the days of 1917 and 1918 to deliver democracy from the oppression of a German monarchy.

Annoyed at having been taken in by the "open forum," Reinhart quickly seconded Ater, announcing: "There is no room in America for people of that kind and their talk. Let them go to Russia and talk for a monarch. . . . The man who shot McKinley said on the scaffold with the rope around his neck that he had heard Emma Goldman preach communism. If she had not been allowed to speak, President McKinley would not have been killed."

The same day the American Civil Liberties Union wired Potts: "Congratulations on recognition of free speech and assembly. Will you join us in an effort to extend the same rights for Communists whose vice-presidential candidate was denied the use of the city-hall auditorium? Who is your candidate for king?"

Potts replied: "Will cooperate with you in securing hearing for Gitlow and Communists, or even for Dr. Straton and fundamentalists, provided I do not have to hear the latter. American Legion wants Mussolini, but my personal candidate for king is George Bernard Shaw with Will Rogers for vice-king."

But the Civil Liberties Union's relief was not needed. Potts sought his own. He applied for a writ of mandamus requiring the City Commission to remove all obstructions to the scheduled royalist meeting, not only on his own behalf but for "all those persons who desire the bona fide compliance of the city government with the Constitution of the United States and of Texas relative to freedom of speech."

"Such action [the revocation of the permit]," Potts set forth, "is designed and intended indirectly to establish the practice of censoring the words and thoughts of prospective speakers, so that the freedom of speech will be made a mere mockery, and the said auditorium used only by those whose words have been censored and approved by said defendants."

Potts lost the legal battle but he won a moral victory. Judge Towne Young in the Forty-fourth District Court denied Potts his writ on the ground that Reinhart, as custodian of the hall, had complete authority over the room, but he added: "If it were I, I would permit any person to speak there on any subject he chose."

Before the trial was at an end Potts had captured the chuckles, the applause, and the sympathy of the city, and had succeeded in throwing the city commissioners and the legionnaires into great discomfiture. The newspapers unanimously supported Potts in editorials, and after the legal fight was over Colonel William E. Easterwood, Jr., commander of another Legion post, finally came out publicly in favor of "free speech for nonconformist groups."

And to top it all, a Socialist, Lee L. Rhodes, candidate for Governor of Texas, applied for the use of the hall. Reinhart no longer dared deny the application, though he muttered weakly, "there are 3,000 street corners in the city for men such as these; there are as many soap-boxes."

Potts had won, and then he had his laugh. He disclosed the awful truth about the "Royalist League":

I really was not going to speak. I was only going to read a tirade on democracy, describe it as weak and distracted, and then advocate a benevolent monarch. I intended to say that I believe the British government formed the best model the world ever produced and then refer to the democratic system as imprudent. If not arrested by this time I would have gone further, and when I had completed I intended to tell the audience that the talk was not original, but that I had been quoting verbatim from the address of Alexander Hamilton, founder of the Republican Party, in his speech before the constitutional convention.

In the Driftway

SOONER or later the rule was bound to be challenged anyhow. The sinking of the Vestris merely hurries the issue along. Our feminists can hardly fail to see in the catastrophe a new point of attack—to use it as the beginning of a campaign against the ancient chivalry of the sea which is crystallized in the slogan "Women and children first." On the Vestris this rule sent the women and children to death, and has come in for some little public criticism on that account. The feminists, of course, will not base their opposition on any such reason. On the contrary, they will attack the rule on the ground that it doesn't give them a fair chance to drown. Their slogan henceforth will be: "Equal rights with men in Davy Jones's locker."

* * * * *

FOR the Drifter, who regards himself as something both of a sailor and a feminist, the controversy presents a dilemma. The Drifter is a feminist within reason. He agrees with the feminists consistently when they are right; and naturally he determines that point. He is a sailor a good bit beyond reason, for nobody would be a sailor at all if he were to confine himself to reason. But to get back to the rule "Women and children first." Let's take the children out of the discussion at once. Probably even the most virulent feminist would agree that in a moment of danger they should receive special consideration. The argument is whether women should. The Drifter is ready to admit that most of what we call chivalry toward the "weaker sex" is hocus-pocus and ought to go overboard. But in a shipwreck somebody must have the first—and generally the best—chance. If not the women—who then? Some may say that the most valuable persons should be saved first. But that would eliminate the children and the aged, the former because society has spent less on them and they are not yet productive; the latter because they have outlived their productivity. But even if we were to accept this gruesome philosophy, who would pick the fittest among the remaining passengers? The captain would be too busy, and if the job were left to the stewards they might be unduly influenced by prospective or already-garnered tips. The only way would be to include an intelligence test with the issuance of every passport, and assign precedence in the lifeboats accordingly. To this the Drifter would most emphatically object. It would take all the joy out of a sea trip to know that in case of accident he would be the last one over the ship's side.

IT'S highly unlikely that the rule of putting women in the lifeboats first will be abandoned in the discernible future, even if the feminists decide to turn their guns upon it. For one thing, tradition—generally all too strong ashore—is ten times as strong at sea. Customs still survive there out of the Middle Ages which have long been forgotten ashore—such as the virtual serfdom by which a sailor is bound to his ship and the caste distinctions between officers and crew. But there is better backing for giving preference to women in case of accident at sea than mere tradition. Somehow we must manage to preserve, in moments of danger and panic, all the practices of civilized humans that we can—the crude savage reappears all too readily. At such times reason goes by the board. Men and women are guided by their instincts and their habits. Their only hope of decency toward one another lies in those rules of conduct which have been instilled into them from childhood—and into their parents before them. Since all cannot take to the lifeboats at once—or at all—there must be some established and accepted precedence if brute force and anarchy are not to prevail. It has been established in favor of women and there are rational grounds to support it. In spite of all the feminists, the Drifter dares assert that in this day at least women have less brawn than men, are less often swimmers, and are not as able to fend for themselves when cast as wreckage into the sea. But, when possible, the Drifter would modify the rule of "Women and children first" so as not to separate families. As matters stand, husbands are often parted unnecessarily from wives, while it can do small good to save a mother and her children if the father, in another boat—or without one—never reaches land.

* * * * *

IN ANY event, among up-to-date women the Drifter looks for some skulking. Just as, at present, the captain has to keep an occasional fear-crazed man out of a boat by drawing his revolver, so in future he may have to threaten to shoot some ardent feminist whom he finds hiding behind a ventilator in the hope that she may be the last "man" to quit the ship.

Pure Boston

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Those of us concerned with reawakening Boston to its heritage of free assemblage, free speech, and free press are driven to despond. The denial of that heritage in the past three years is bad enough. Now comes another incident, unheralded, of course. It is simply the treatment accorded that penetrating study of censorship, "To the Pure . . ." by Morris L. Ernst and William Seagle, at the hands of the Boston bookdealers. If ever there was a book made to order in defense of the booksellers, it is this book. The authors even dedicate it to "The Perplexed Booksellers who, under the unknown rules of literary decency, cannot insure themselves against imprisonment, even by reading all the volumes on their shelves."

But what do the Boston booksellers do with the book? They keep it out of sight. Almost timorously the clerks in the various bookstores where I sought the book confessed that they had it—fearful, it seemed, that I might be an agent of that Boston Watch and Ward Society which is so fairly revealed in all its tyrannical stupidity in the study by Mr. Ernst and Mr. Seagle.

The truth seems to be that Boston is in the grip of fear in all departments of its life—fear stimulated and heightened by the pocket nerve. The booksellers are a pitiable example.

German Poverty

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In an admirable article in yours of November 7, page 484, Arthur Feiler says: "The German people is crowded into a territory which produces neither adequate foodstuffs for the population nor sufficient raw materials for its industry." Again, on page 476, Ignaz Wrobel, in a keen analysis of the Germany of Today, makes this definite statement: "the country is overpopulated."

Compared with almost any European neighbor, with the possible exception of France, Germany is not by any means overpopulated. She still has 185,889 square miles of territory, and only 62,500,000 inhabitants, or about 328 persons to the square mile (say, one family to each eight acres). Belgium has 648 inhabitants to the square mile, Holland 563.3, and Italy 329. None of these countries raises all the foodstuffs for its population, or produces anywhere nearly sufficient raw materials for its industries. As Mr. Feiler says of Germany, their "wealth is in the willingness and capacity of their people to work."

If decreasing population caused national prosperity, then Ireland should be one of the wealthiest countries of Europe today, for her population has dropped from 9,000,000 in 1846 to less than 5,000,000 in 1926. If the overpopulation theory were correct, there would be no poverty and want in Ireland now. But Irish poverty persists. Spain has only 108 inhabitants to the square mile to Holland's 563 (or to Germany's 328); Spain has the better natural resources; but in which country is the wealth more abundant? The degree of wealth of any country is not dependent upon the number of its inhabitants, but upon the freedom of access to resources by its inhabitants. Germany's drawbacks are not due to natural disabilities, or "overpopulation," but to laws which restrict labor's access to natural opportunities, and also hamper the interchange of labor products with the rest of the world.

Some of these hampering trade laws are of Germany's own making, and some are imposed by other countries. But for the laws which allow land to be held out of use, or only put into use after an exorbitant price has been paid for the privilege, Germany is herself responsible, like every other country in the like case.

Now Is the Time

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I wish to express myself as heartily in accord with your statement, in the editorial Hoover Wins, to the effect that now is the time "for a union of forces to create a truly liberal party." It is surely the more timely in that the liberals have so long had to accept the half-hearted reforms of the leading opposition, and to no avail. Most liberals are waiting only for someone to cry "Now is the time for all good men"—and to follow the leader who is willing to make himself the prophet of the new liberalism. Let us hear more on the subject. The times are ripe, and need but a man who has no ear for Republican silver or eye for Democratic ribands.

Appreciation

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I should like to congratulate you most cordially on the splendid service you have rendered the American people by the special "German Republic" edition of The Nation.

I somehow find it impossible to get out of my mind the clear conviction that the human family can look forward now to a brighter future than it has ever enjoyed in the past, provided there are no more world wars. But if—and I say this after two years of service with combat outfits in the World War—there is to be another war of world scope, the human family might just as well not look forward at all. The best way to avoid such catastrophes is not by federal appropriations for bigger and better guns, but through the channels of that high type of intelligence that is based on understanding. To bring about this understanding you have rendered a gallant service in the 3305th number of your weekly. I most sincerely hope that this will not be the last time you issue a number of this sort; for real peace is still some distance off.

Southern Gloom

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Although of Southern and slave-holding descent, and the editor for thirty years of a Democratic, Jim Reed, country weekly in the very fastness of the Missouri Bible Belt, with a complex on political Protestantism almost as violent as that of Mr. Mencken himself, I, like The Nation, have looked forward eagerly to the day when the Solid South would be broken—but I wanted the cleavage to come on economic issues, with a promise of genuine political realignment. That hope, you know, and I know, and every intelligent man knows, has not been realized in the present break. Faced candidly, it was brought about by religious hate and a stupid fear. In Texas a moronic Baptist clergy and pew did the work—preachers pick off objectionable citizens from the pulpit with automatics down there and are acquitted by prayerful juries—and in Virginia the Methodist hierarchy, grown both corrupt and arrogant, did the job. Also in North Carolina, where the senile but still cunning Senator Simmons strove diligently and successfully to pay the possible debt he owed a Republican administration. Add to these the scurrility and the stupid fear aroused among the ignorant by the night-gown boys following Senator Heflin in his march on Rome, and you have summed up the reasons why the Solid South broke. Better far had it remained benighted for another half a century.

Southern Defense

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: 1. You say that Hoover owes his success to Prejudice, Bigotry, Superstition, Intolerance, Hate, Selfishness, Snobbery, and Passion. These things—all of them—I have fought all my life, and I have fought them when it cost something. This warfare is nothing new to me. I loathe these things with a profound nausea. The great mass of Texans who voted for Hoover were not guided by these unworthy motives. There was a noisy group played up in the papers to which such considerations did make an appeal, but they were not representative. I doubt whether over 7 per cent of the people voted against Governor Smith primarily on account of his church connection.

Now Comes The New Shorthand

FOR years there has been a crying need for a really modern, scientific shorthand that could be written RAPIDLY—that would be more ACCURATE—more PRACTICAL—and could be learned more EASILY and QUICKLY than ordinary shorthand.

Now at last it is here—the new shorthand. Business and professional men and women everywhere have hailed it with enthusiasm. Experienced stenographers as well as beginners are adopting it.

Speedwriting
The NATURAL SHORTHAND

Right this minute you know the principle of this amazing new method—you use the same "A, B, C's" as you do in your daily speech. No need to spend long, tedious months memorizing a "foreign language" of dots and dashes, hooks and curves. You start using Speedwriting in a few hours and in a few weeks you can acquire all the speed and proficiency necessary for practical work.

Speedwriting was originated by Miss Emma B. Dearborn, who has taught practically all systems for eighteen years in such institutions as Columbia University, Rochester Business Institute, Simmons College, and the University of California.

opposed Governor Smith because he is a Roman Catholic? I think there is. I have found very few persons—not a half dozen—who would have opposed Senator Tom Walsh for the Presidency. I advocated his nomination heartily, and others have again and again expressed themselves in the same way.

3. Five times as much has been said about the religious question by Governor Smith's supporters in Texas as has been said by those favoring Mr. Hoover. For months I have been reading several dailies and attending political meetings of both sides. Sometimes the supporters of Hoover have made no reference to the religious question, and in other instances they have taken it up simply in reply to Smith's supporters who first introduced it. I do not want to bring any charges, but the impression has been made that the opponents of Hoover sought to dwell on the religious issue in order to keep in the background the weakness of their own candidate, so that the impression might go out that opposition to him was due to his religion.

4. Your insult to the Methodist and Baptist churches is of course noted. You are not fair enough to them to give their real grounds for opposing Governor Smith. I have read many pronouncements from these and other religious bodies, and not in one have I seen objection made to Governor Smith's religion. I read weekly several denominational organs, and have found occasional reference to the religious question but comparatively little discussion of it, though for other reasons both editors and contributors have opposed the candidacy of Governor Smith vigorously.

5. Your unfairness is manifested in your failure to say anything about the number who supported Governor Smith on account of his religion. I would not say anything offensive to the Roman Catholic church or to any other religious communion, nor will I attempt to estimate the number of voters whose one reason for voting for Smith was that he is a Roman Catholic. In spite of the fact that Catholic papers urged them to vote for Smith, some Catholics did not.

The great mass of Texans who supported Hoover did so in the face of intimidation, threats to drive them from their party, offensive epithets, deep-seated bias; but instead of commending their independence and idealism The Nation has only insults for them.

The suggestion that he might go to America came not from the G. P. U. but from the N. T. U., Scientific Technical Administration, a body that plays an increasingly important role in the industrialization of Soviet Russia.

Opium-Smoking in the Far East

By ELLEN N. LA MOTTE

WHAT happened this September at Geneva was right in line with the best traditions of the opium interests. No deviation from their policy of protecting the thing—not for an instant. On the contrary, with their usual foresight, they seem to be laying their plans well in advance so that nothing shall interfere. This time the question switched from drugs to opium itself, and the smoking of opium in the Far East was the problem that occupied the Fifth Committee of the Assembly of the League of Nations. This Fifth Committee deals with the social questions of the League, and has about forty delegates, or one for every country. It always includes, however, that strong, influential, and determined minority which makes up the Opium Committee.

A few weeks before the Assembly opened the press contained short notices of a British proposal to send a commission to the Far East. Among other things, to look into conditions in China. It will be recalled that five years ago the European Powers excused themselves from carrying out their treaty obligations to suppress opium-smoking in their Far Eastern possessions on the pretext that China was to blame. They said Chinese opium was being smuggled into their colonies, and if they stopped the legalized sales through government shops this legal traffic would be supplanted by illicit supplies from China. However, they agreed to review the situation in five year's time, and this proposed Commission of Inquiry was apparently to make the review promised. But the fact that the commission was to go to China, made it look highly suspicious that China was again to be made the excuse for evading treaty obligations and for continuing this profitable trade.

The Council of the League met just previous to the Assembly meeting, and at the Council the Chinese delegate made a disconcerting proposal. If, he said, Chinese opium was considered a menace to European colonies in the East, he would draw attention to the fact that European drugs were a great menace to China. They were being smuggled into China more extensively than Chinese opium was being smuggled into certain colonies. Therefore, if this commission was to be sent to China, he would ask that it be likewise sent to investigate the drug-making countries of Europe. The over-manufacture of drugs in Europe was a tremendous danger to China, and he would like these countries investigated as well as his own. Only on this condition, this basis of equality instead of discrimination, would his Government agree to receive the commission in China.

This logical demand was most unwelcome. The European countries wished no investigation as to their manufacture of drugs—far from it. But they wanted badly to “prove” that China's opium was a menace to their colonies and the reason why they have failed to suppress smoking as agreed to by the Hague Convention, signed some fifteen years ago. Chapter II of that convention calls upon the contracting Powers to take measures for the “gradual and effective suppression of the use of opium for smoking,” which has not been carried out.

Matters were at this stage when the Fifth Committee began to discuss opium on September 13, 1928. The session opened with a solemn announcement of the need for economy. The League, it seems, had been splashing around rather freely, incurring all sorts of expenses, and this must be stopped. The Fifth Committee was thoroughly impressed with this imperative need, the announcement of which took up a lot of time and was well pounded in.

One wondered what they were aiming at. It soon became clear. It was to defeat the Chinese proposal of a double investigation. A Commission of Inquiry was expensive—its duties would continue for months, with traveling expenses and other costs. Therefore it soon developed that while there would be enough money to investigate China, there would not be enough to investigate the drug-making countries of Europe as well. “Economy” stepped in to prevent that. Whereupon the Chinese delegate said he was sorry, but under those conditions the commission could not go to China. The time had gone by when China would accept inequality of treatment.

At which announcement the British delegate naively remarked that in that case the value of the investigation would fall to the ground.

However, they soon thought of something else, since “conditions in China” was not available as an excuse for evading treaty obligations. This other was the Philippines. The Dutch delegate proposed that the commission be sent to the Philippines to see how prohibition of opium worked—the United States Government does not sell opium in licensed shops and divans for the sake of revenue, and the Dutch delegate was anxious to see how far it had been possible to prevent smuggling from the mainland. [If there is a great deal of smuggling into the Philippines, the commission may “prove” that it is better for governments to sell opium rather than smugglers.]

At this point a plump cat escaped from the bag. We of the audience had long been wondering what was back of this Commission of Inquiry, why the British, spokesmen and sponsors, had been pressing for it so insistently and persistently. On the face of it, it seemed innocuous, and indeed rather valuable. But why, then, should the British be so anxious to have a record of conditions in the Far East, which they must know thoroughly themselves? The audience, even members of that guileless Fifth Committee itself, began to search into old records and look into documents issued years ago. And they found this:

In the protocol of the agreement of the First Opium Conference, signed at Geneva in February 1925, Article III:

A commission to be appointed at the proper time by the Council of the League of Nations. . . . The Decision of the Commission to be Final.

In other words, should this commission report that it is impossible to stop opium-smoking in the Far East—on whatever pretext—there can be no appeal from its decision.

Light then began to filter in upon the members of the Fifth Committee. And in the course of a heated debate whether to approve this commission and ask that it be appointed, still further light was shed. The more the British pleaded that they were just straining at the leash and wild to carry out their treaty obligations but couldn't do so till this commission had reported, the more the Fifth Committee began to see daylight, to remember these ominous words, "the decision of the commission shall be final."

And then the British delegate made this significant admission: "What we really want is independent proof of our inability to carry out our obligations arising from the Hague Convention."

After a three days' debate a vote was finally taken as to whether or not this commission should be asked for. China was the only country with courage to vote No. There were seventeen abstentions, including that of Italy. There were thirteen votes in favor, including the six British, and the measure was carried.

So this Commission of Inquiry, consisting of three members, is to go to the Far East to decide whether or not it is possible to carry out treaty obligations. A heavy responsibility. And the decision of the commission shall be final. The following table shows the stake which European nations have in the opium traffic in the Far East.

The revenue figures are quoted for the last year for which statistics are available—1925 in most cases, 1927 for the Dutch East Indies. The figures for British Possessions come from blue books and annual reports, the figures for French Indo-China are from the Bureau de l'Indo-Chine Colonial Library, and the rough estimate of Dutch East Indian revenue is from "The Statesman's Year Book." The Sarawak estimate is in Sarawak dollars, about fifty-six cents in United States currency. The figures from North Borneo are in British pounds, from French Indo-China in francs, and from the Dutch East Indies in guilders. Other revenue figures are in American dollars.

The Continental Book Flood

By CLIFTON P. FADIMAN

NOT very many years ago the typical American book publisher regarded with a fishy eye the notion of translations from the European literatures. There was no more money in translations then than (with a gesture of apology to Miss Parker, Mr. Benét, and Miss Millay) there is in poetry now. The foreign productions presented to the public generally had to possess intimations of pornography. It was thus, and thus only, that Zola and Balzac and Maupassant quickly found their way into conservative American book-cases. Today all this is changed. The publishing season we are now passing through has witnessed a veritable flood of translations—and not merely from the French and German, as in former years, but from practically every European tongue, including the Finnish and the Albanian. Once Mr. Knopf stood practically alone in his valiant cosmopolitanism; but all can grow the flower now that he has sown the seed. There is hardly a publisher's list that does not boast two or three translations; and the larger firms announce anywhere from three to twenty-five of them. Many houses employ special European agents, and there are few, even among the most modest, who do not send over a representative for an annual trip. Hardly has a novelist won one of the innumerable prizes which form one of the most exciting of French institutions than the book is contracted for over here. In the domestic editorial sancta the catalogues of a hundred foreign publishers are gone over with a fine-toothed comb. The larger establishments often employ readers whose sole duty is to read and report on foreign books, not only books of fiction but biography, travel, memoirs, history, philosophy, and the fine and decorative arts. The publishers often do not wait until a foreign writer has achieved some reputation in his own country, but seize upon him while he is still young and tender and an unknown quantity.

The immediate cause of this astonishing development in the history of the American book trade is not far to seek. One can find it in the enormous successes of a few writers such as Ibañez, Wassermann, Hamsun, Ludwig, and Maurois. Publishers are, on the whole, an optimistic lot, being of the opinion that lightning often strikes twice in the same place. They subscribe to the belief that there is such an entity as a "Ludwig audience" or a "Maurois audience" and that if they can only discover another Ludwig or another Maurois they will be able to make a profitable substitution. But Maurois, Ludwig, et al., have only been the most brilliant successes; modest fortunes have been made by investments in much smaller fry. During the past few seasons, for example, noteworthy sales have been achieved of Feuchtwanger's "The Ugly Duchess" and "Power," Salten's "Bambi," Julian Green's "The Closed Garden," Bedel's "The Latitude of Love," Schnitzler's "Fräulein Else" and "Theresa," Bonsel's "An Indian Journey," Neumann's "The Devil," Pirandello's plays, Pourtales's "Chopin" and "Liszt," and, to sink to a lower level, Dekobra's "Madonna of the Sleeping Cars." Enough individual successes have been registered to encourage the publishers to further efforts in the same field. Most of them believe that, even if they fail to hit the bull's-eye within a given season, the policy of translation is in general a far-sighted one because the public, or at least a goodly portion of it, seems to have abandoned its long-standing prejudice against foreign works, so that sales resistance is lowered and the chances for the future correspondingly brighter.

Another and less obvious reason for the increase in translated books is to be discovered in the changing character of American publishing. At present one can discern two main and opposed trends. One, in harmony with the entire current of American industry, is toward combination and quantity production. The recent Doubleday-Doran merger is the first impressive indication of a movement which may, in seventy-five years, leave only five or six gigantic companies in the publishing field, differing from one another, perhaps, in the class of mentality which they serve. The other trend, more immediately apparent, is toward the establishment of numerous small houses, one or two of which have enjoyed conspicuous success. Many of these smaller firms are headed by young men, often of considerable wealth or, at any rate, possessing solid financial backing, who do not have any distinct and ineluctable vocation for book-publishing. They might have been equally successful as bankers, advertising men, or tennis champions. But book-publishing has something in it of the false romance and speculative quality that play-producing has: and so it is beginning to attract the same kind of amateur temperament that succumbs to the lure of the theater. The situation is such that we have on the one hand a large number of publishing firms who take their business as a business and a smaller number who take it not only as a business but as a sport, or an opportunity for organizing a social milieu in which one will meet "interesting people." To the dilettante publisher the foreign field beckons inevitably. In the first place, there is a glamor and a distinction about translations from foreign languages which a plain bread-and-butter American novel apparently lacks. In addition, the dilettante publisher finds competition in the foreign field much less rigorous than in the domestic one. While he may be unable to secure competent American fiction, he can always "complete his list" with a scattering of foreign books which have earned some critical approbation in the lands of their birth and which, therefore, it is no disgrace to publish. He finds the obtaining of such books an easy matter, for European firms are, unfortunately, ignorant of the relative merits of American houses and are inclined to let their books go to anyone that asks for them.

The most fundamental cause, however, of the foreign deluge is the real lack of American books, either of literary quality or with sales possibilities, but particularly the former. As far as the publisher is concerned, there is only one remedy for this situation, and that is to cut down his list. But this he will not do or at any rate he does not do, perhaps because, like most American industrialists, he be-believes that each year's production should be greater than that of the preceding year, or because he is vain, or because he believes that the more books he publishes the more new authors he will attract, or, finally, because his editorial department is too laxly organized and lets through many volumes which should never be printed. This enormous production does not necessarily mean enormous profits, and certainly it does not mean what every publisher of any standing is eager to acquire, namely, literary acclaim. Accordingly, recourse is had to the foreign field. Even if a Ludwig or a Maurois is not available, at any rate the publisher's list is bolstered up by the inclusion of foreign works which sound as if they might be "literature." With all his business acumen and despite his hard-boiled air, the average American publisher has a deep reverence for the intellectual classes. He is perfectly willing to produce the books of Wyndham Lewis at a loss.

The result of all this is that a great many books are translated which simply do not deserve it. Not only are they of mediocre literary quality but they are entirely devoid of sales pull. They merely crowd an already overcrowded market, confuse booksellers, drive reviewers mad—and never reach an audience anyway. Most of them are fortunate to achieve a total sale of fifteen hundred copies. From them the American reading public learns little. They influence too small a fraction really to be of any value in modifying our literary provincialism. And even in those cases where the books do reach a large audience, they may hardly be said to spread any cosmopolitan enlightenment. On the contrary, the American reading public which devours Keyserling and Ludwig is swallowing authors which the cultivated European taste hardly deigns to notice.

Formerly bookish persons rarely discussed Continental literature because they did not know anything about it. But at least their ignorance prevented them from falling into errors of perspective. Today we juggle with a dozen foreign names as if they were representative of the artistic leadership of Europe when, as a matter of fact, they often represent writers whom Europe has rejected or who have developed tricks particularly calculated to please Americans.

And this brings up the most interesting and unfortunate situation of all. European writers, fired by the success of Ludwig and Maurois, aflame with rumors of enormous royalties, and dizzied by the plenitude of generous book clubs, are beginning to write with the American market in mind. Why not? American publishers are not over-particular. There is always the possibility of highly profitable first- and second-serial rights, which in Europe have very little monetary value. Then, these mad Americans seem willing to be lectured at—at $500 a lecture. So the European novelist or biographer of competent but not outstanding talent reasons to himself. Consequently, the next ten or fifteen years may witness a partial Americanizing of Continental literary production, paralleling, in a small way, the conquering career of our industrial methods. The American magazine has already become the Mecca of English short-story writers; eventually it and the American publishing house may also become the be-all and the end-all of a great many Continental artists. When this happy result is accomplished, the last American conquest will have been achieved and we will have established a pleasing literary feudalism with ourselves as lords of the manor and our European brothers, of the pen playing the part of the willing, because well-paid, serfs.

What Ails the Metropolitan Museum?

By WALTER GUTMAN

FOR a good many years those interested in modern art in New York have found their chief amusement as well as their chief shame in the collection of the Metropolitan Museum. It was said that the only way to get a Cézanne into the collection was to sneak it up the stairs some night and hang it. Then, by the time they got around to shifting the hangings, it would be an old master. In September of this year Murdock Pemberton published a series of Impertinent Questions in Creative Art, among which were the following:

What is your objection to pictures by the younger living artists?

Failing to provide museum space for the work of contemporary men who have not received the accolade of the Academy, would you consider spending $10,000 a year on unknown Americans and giving them a fortnightly or monthly show?

Did you have a chance to buy Cézannes when Stieglitz tried in vain to sell them at $40 apiece?

Could you tell a good picture if it were offered at any price under $5,000?

But on examining the collection thoroughly one finds that a cold attitude toward the moderns is perhaps the least of the Museum's faults. If it were hostile it might have a great and intelligent love for something else. But in fact it does not show itself particularly hostile to the moderns, or adverse to buying unknown men, or particularly aggressive and intelligent in collecting the old. In the end, the task of a public museum is not especially to encourage contemporary art. That is up to the artists and the private enthusiasts. Nor should it be to specialize in one narrow field so as to outrival every other institution in possessing the work of some artist or period. Its job is to excite the public to an interest in art and to inform it as to its history. To do this a museum must have works of the highest quality in every field, and enough of these to give a conception of the variety of each period. Then again, the largest part of its collection should be made up of works which have the widest appeal, and the funds budgeted to that end, leaving the finer points in history to be taken care of by the specialists. It is in this duty that the Metropolitan Museum fails more completely than in its appreciation of the moderns, and it is a failure that is considerably more serious.

Of course, in the collection of old masters the Museum is handicapped by reason of its age in comparison with museums abroad. Yet, granting this, a lack of intelligence and aggressiveness has been in evidence ever since the Museum became a competitor. For example, compare it with the National Gallery of London. Let us take twelve painters of unquestionable merit who were also prolific and compare the examples of their work possessed by each, according to the museums' most recent catalogues. Let us confine ourselves to artists who are foreign to both countries so as to eliminate the effects of patriotism. It is obvious that a museum's policy is most clearly shown by what it buys.

The Metropolitan Museum was organized in 1870. However, it took time to get well under way, and it was not until the Rogers bequest in 1903 that the Museum was in a position to buy quite as it wished. That year it spent $244,139.09 on works of art. For the next ten years its average was $271,140.03, spending in the last year of that decade $373,774.23. In 1926, the year of its last catalogue, the figure had risen to $1,145,316.75.<sup>1</sup> Making the comparison, then, from 1903, we find: The National Gallery has seven Velasquez's of which one was bought after this date; the Metropolitan, two given. The National Gallery has thirty-six Rubens's, none bought after that date; the Metropolitan nine, three bought. The National Gallery has nineteen Rembrandts, one bought; the Metropolitan, the same number, given. The National Gallery has seven Raphaels, one bought; the Metropolitan, one given. The National Gallery has five Tintoretos, one bought; the Metropolitan, three, all purchased. The National Gallery has seven Titians, one bought; the Metropolitan, one, given.<sup>2</sup> Of Goya, Veronese, Poussin, and Claude the Metropolitan has eight, of which six were bought; the National Gallery, thirty-three, none purchased after 1903. Of Delacroix and Ingres, the Metropolitan has four, all bought; the National Gallery, seventeen, fourteen purchased. In total the National Gallery has within these years bought nineteen and the Metropolitan sixteen. While the result is not a crushing victory for the National Gallery in point of numbers, it becomes more complete when we consider that the National had ninety-nine examples of these men before our chosen date, and the Metropolitan just six. Strangely enough, if we compare the figures since the opening of the World War, we find that the National Gallery has purchased sixteen paintings to the Metropolitan's nine, though the Metropolitan spread its paintings over six men to the National Gallery's four.

However, let us not stop with the big names but take the completeness of representation by country. It would be cruel to compare the Metropolitan's Italian collection with those of museums abroad, for we cannot expect it to have the Michelangelos, the da Vincis, the Orcagnas, the Duccios, the Cimabues, which those museums had the fortune to inherit; nor the Dutch and Flemish. Still what about the French? The preface to the catalogue of the exhibition of French primitives held at the Kleinberger Galleries in New York in October, 1927, said that it was only between two and three decades ago that the world became aware of the importance of these works. Then:

In consequence of the exhibition of 1904 [of French primitives in Paris] the Louvre, aware of its gaps and in order to complete its collections, hastened to acquire some of the masterpieces of French primitive painting.

Why then has the Metropolitan no example of Jean Malouel, or of his school; of Henri Bellechose, Jean Fouquet, Michel Colombe, La Maitre de Moulins, the two Clouets, Nicholas Froment? Of the important men of these centuries the Museum has just three paintings: a school panel of Simon Marmion, and two portraits by Corneille de Lyon, all of which were given to it.

From the seventeenth century to the nineteenth the list is not much better. The Museum has no example of Watteau; none of Fragonard or of Rigaud, Lancret, La Tour, Le Brun. It has three Le Nains, two Chardins, three Poussins, two of Largillière, one of Claude, two Bouchers, four of Greuze, two Nattiers, one of David. In other words, of the fifteen important men of two centuries it has twenty examples distributed over nine of them.

Of the nineteenth century its collection, because it could so easily have been so much better, is a disgrace. Two Delacroix. Why could it not have had some of the ten bought at the Degas sale in 1918 by the National Gallery? Two Ingres. The National Gallery bought four at the Degas sale. One Géricault, one Daumier, two Millets. Of Corot, Courbet, de Chavannes, and Monet, good numbers: thirteen, seven, four, and four. Of Manet, three. The National Gallery has seven of which five were bought between 1918-1926. Of Cézanne, one; of Degas, one; of Renoir, one; of Redon, one, a sketch; of Gauguin, none; of Van Gogh, none; of Toulouse-Lautrec, none; of Seurat, none; of Pissarro, none; of Forain, none. Plainly from its inclusion of Cézanne and Renoir the Museum is not afraid of the new school of the last century. Then why not the others and why not more of the ones we have? The National Gallery has three Cézannes, nine Degas's, three Renoirs. Of those the Metropolitan has none of, the National Gallery has the following: three Gauguins, four Van Goghs, two Pissarros, two Forains, two Seurats, one Toulouse-Lautrec. Even the collections of our smaller museums are superior to the Metropolitan on this score. The Art Institute of Chicago has four Renoirs, two Degas's; five Pissarros, three Gauguins; one Forain. The Museum of Fine Arts of Boston has listed in its catalogue of 1921 four Degas's, two Pissarros, two Renoirs. Of these men the National Gallery has bought nineteen examples, the Metropolitan and the Art Institute two, and the Boston Museum one. But perhaps the directors felt that as long as there was such a charming collection across the East River, theirs could be neglected. In the Brooklyn Museum one can find a Cézanne, three Degas's, two Toulouse-Lautrecs, two Pissarros, two Forains, a Renoir, a sketch, and a Gauguin. Of these five were bought.

In the twentieth century the Museum has no examples of Matisse, Picasso, Derain, Segonzac, Braque, Forain, Utrillo, Vuillard, Bonnard, Modigliani. These painters were once, like the Cézannes Mr. Pemberton speaks of, to be bought at bargains. This is so no longer. It does not take a prophet to see what the French collection of the twentieth century is likely to be like when so far it consists of one water-color copy of Manet's "Olympia" by Jacques Villon.

In the section of American painting much the same condition exists. The Museum boasts<sup>3</sup> that "The collection of American art of today . . . is the most complete branch of the collection and gives a wide representation of what is being done in our own country." It is without a Marin, an O'Keeffe, a Preston Dickenson, a McFee, a Chapin, a Sheeler, a Hartley, a Leon Kroll.

In its collection of sculpture one does not expect the Museum to compete with the public monuments abroad. Among the more recent, the only really excellent group is that of Barye; and the only extensive one, that of Rodin.

<sup>2</sup> The Museum has, since the issuance of its catalogue of 1926, bought a Rubens and a Titian. I was not, however, able to get equally complete information on the accessions of the National Gallery and have therefore let the comparison stand.

It has one Epstein, the head of an American soldier. The Tate Gallery has, if I remember correctly, either three or four; and, as everyone knows, the British Government has granted him commissions for two public monuments. The Metropolitan has none of Maillol, who is generally considered the greatest of living sculptors. It owns no Despiau. The Luxembourg bought one of his busts as long ago as 1912. It owns no Bernard. The Luxembourg has two. It has no Lachaise, no Archipenko, no Brancusi. It has a "Herakles" and a "Beethoven" by Bourdelle, of which it bought the latter, and a head by the rather advanced sculptor, Allan Clark. It has bought, too, a good number of Dianas, a "Song of the Wave," a statue called "Needless Alarms," in which a nude girl is frightened by a toad, and an "Ephèbe" by Louis Aime Le Jeune, the original of which is in the Luxembourg.

What is the reason for this series of omissions? Not prejudice. Some of these men are represented in the print room, where they are seldom seen except by students already familiar with their work. The Museum has arranged temporary exhibits of modern decorative art and has a small but fairly representative collection of its own. The reason is hardly that the names are unknown. Many of them have been so much discussed that they are as familiar as old masters.

The causes are generally said to be "old fogyness" and committeeism. The directorate is certainly not composed of men who have distinguished themselves by their understanding of current movements in art. Neither are they, with possibly a few exceptions, known as independent scholars or connoisseurs of the past. It is the common museum blight. Some museums, such as the National Gallery and the Art Institute, seem to have overcome it. Others, such as the Louvre and Boston Museum, have had more fortunate gifts. Still, what would become of a bank directed by artists who deprived the financiers they hired to run the bank of any power to make a loan or place a mortgage?

Again, there seems to have been a misapplication of funds. It is useless to compare the number of items bought by different departments, since one does not know the prices paid; but the vastly more numerous purchases of pieces of ancient decorative art—Coptic, German, Turkish, Persian, and so forth—of pieces of ancient armament, of steel engravings done after old masters, of portions of Chinese and other deities, point to funds spent where they are not most useful.<sup>4</sup> For, however excellent these things are in themselves, they have not the importance for the public of major works of painting and sculpture, especially those in the European tradition; and until such collections are better than they are, the others should be more neglected.

Angna Enters

By LOUIS UNTERMEYER

A DANCER who does not dance; an actress who does not speak; a dramatist who makes the audience supply the drama. She is to the stage what the imagists are to poetry. There is the same unemotional projection, the stripped and scrupulously selected image, the cleanly visualized line. This is to imply that the painter predominates and, in effect, the art of Angna Enters is that of a painting which has escaped the static limitations of its canvas. In the "episodes" entitled "Promenade" and "Aphrodisiac—Green Hour" she makes scarcely a step, never any but the most furtive motions. And yet in one, a half-bold, half-bored flirt has walked out of a Manet portrait; in the other, the ennui of the unsuccessful street-walker, the mechanical smile fading into apathy, the cold shudder, are a shifting composite of a dozen Daumiers. Enters's "Odalisque," with her slow curves, hard eyes, and soft sloven perversity, is definitely Renoir. "Moyen Age" is a set of frescoes in counterpoint. No wonder that her admirers are largely recruited from the field of art: John Sloan, Georgia O'Keefe, Robert Henri, Alfred Stieglitz, Robert Edmond Jones have praised her in unreserved superlatives. And rightly. She is one of them, and she is more. She is what their work moves toward.

What are her qualities? From the complexity of effects, wit emerges first. Extraordinarily subtle, almost febrile, here is a species of wit that is both lightly mocking and completely devastating. Observe "La Sauvage Elegante," with its self-contradiction of the formal pirouetting of the court of Louis XIV and the latest fashion note from Peru. A properly draped leopard-skin over billowing silk; a primitive crown surmounting a coiffeur's chef-d'œuvre of the highest; a court lady determining to be savage and succeeding only in being the more obviously a ghost of her tradition. Observe "Feline" where, instead of a costume made to imitate the body of a cat, the woman, in quasi-Spanish black lace, is a cat. A cat? Here, in its combination of suave cruelty, smooth grace, abnormal wisdom, and uncomprehending innocence, is Cat abstract, complete, and absolute. "1927—Entr'acte" is, on the surface, ridiculous; a sketch at criticism. Yet here, in the least lovely of her compositions, this girl pillories a whole generation whose rosary is a lipstick and whose Golden Treasury is a "line" of wise-cracks.

But wit alone would make her work dry and over-cerebral. Humor saves Angna Enters from a tendency to intellectualize, an impulse to allow the wicked brain free run of its own malice. Sometimes the humor is broad, as in the almost boisterous delineation of the schoolgirl in "Field Day." Boisterous but unhappy, as the mosquitoes nip her ankles, the vicious sun bites her neck, and the gawky child parades, drills, and goes through her dumb-bell exercises in an agony of precision. Less burlesque but even richer in humor is the earthy and robust "Contra Danse." Here is a sweep more liberal than the artist usually permits herself; the mime not only dances the peasant off her feet, she creates a stageful of dancers, each vigorously and swiftly differentiated. This is the very antithesis of the stilted, ogling "cake-walk"; comment and criticism cease; Breughel is joined to Beethoven.

<sup>4</sup> For example, in 1927 the Museum bought 90 classical antiques, 624 Egyptian antiquities, 23 pieces of arms and armor, 694 pieces of pottery, 4 costumes, 1 piece of crystal, 1 piece of enamel, 431 objects in glass, 1 piece of stained glass, 1 piece of lacquer, 3 pieces of leatherwork, 11 medals and plaques, 8 pieces of metal work, 3 pieces listed as miscellaneous, 4,044 prints, 27 pieces of woodwork, 5 miniatures and manuscripts, 202 examples of textiles, 19 paintings, 23 sculptures, and a drawing.

But much as one respects the witty exposé of sham elegance and enjoys the hearty Naturkind, the two qualities which distinguish Angna Enters are curiously combined: the macabre and the tender. The former is the more pronounced. Whether the bizarre is Miss Enters's natural gesture to the world or whether she cares for the grotesque line rather than the fluent motion, the cynical frequently resolves into the sinister. "Black Magic" and "Heptameron No. 1," that concise drama with its reminiscence of Brownings "The Laboratory," which all but baffles the audience, are cases in point. Here is an evocation of all that is masked, twisted, paradoxical, perverse. . . . And then, amazingly, when we have concluded there is no warmth in the woman, she breaks down the last reserve with tenderness. With a minimum of "effects" she reveals all the awkward coquetry of a Viennese Backfisch ("Geschichten aus dem Wiener Wald"); the incredible pathos of long adolescent afternoons in "Piano Music," in which there is no mere appearance but the essence of reality; the dissolving and fusing of a hundred Madonnas in "The Queen of Heaven." Here is the eternal mother, baring her breast to anguish, disclosing the world's secret in the Rose of the World. Here instead of gesture is illumination.

Yet, at the end, having had so much, the heart (not the eye) asks more. How far can so strange a talent go? Miss Enters has characterized her own periphery: "Episodes." But these episodic studies, these skilful observations so often sly and sardonic, these nuances of nostalgia, boredom, frustration, these brief snatches of ecstasy. . . . One hopes for a time when Miss Enters will achieve a furthering if not a fusion of these characteristics, a larger rhythm, a longer and more noble line. Meanwhile, within her self-imposed limitations, she is an arresting and even astonishing phenomenon. Beginning where other choreomimes leave off, she furnishes one of the most imaginative experiences in the theater today.

The Little Triangle

By MARK VAN DOREN

Into the smoothness of their days,
Into their little nest of nights,
Flew something jaggeder than death,
And more intolerable than truth.
Each had now a separate mind,
And both were scared, and each was blind.

Within her midnight still she kept
A soft remembrance of his mouth;
But he was looking far away,
At lips that laughed and counted three.
In his own darkness he could tell
That other face by which he fell.

And though they both have day again,
And hold each other through the night,
There is a little shudder comes
On her, remembering sometimes
How at the second of sunrise
She caught the profile of his eyes.

This Week Hungarian Magic

ROSIKA SCHWIMMER has been known for long years as a public personage. She has lectured and written in Europe and America on behalf of all manner of causes—equal rights, legislation for women and children, peace. She was active in the launching of Henry Ford's Peace Ship. As Hungarian Ambassador to Switzerland after the revolution, she was the first woman diplomat in modern history. A long career of heavy campaigning; a reputation as a political and social reformer. . . .

And now Mme Schwimmer has written a book—and revealed a personality. "Tisza Tales"* is as remote from the struggles of public life as "Cinderella" is from the latest history of the World War. It is a collection of old Hungarian stories retold, and restrung on a rich, gold thread. They are as good as they are ancient and each one has that air of absolute and solemn verity that inhabits the true folk-tales of all countries, however preposterous and fantastic, if they are told as they should be. These stories are at once delicate and graceful and hearty and humorous and filled with a warm gusto. The characters who are introduced to help tell them, whether they are shepherds on the wide, flat alföld, or fishermen on the banks of the Tisza, or villagers in the inn, or boys and girls gathered for a corn-husking, are as living as the heroes of their stories. They drink hot, spiced wine and eat poppy-seed cakes, they laugh and dance to the accordion and flute—and always the old stories are told and retold.

We meet the good king who, disguised, mingles with his subjects, dispensing riches to the poor and worthy and dark disgrace to the wealthy but mean. Here, too, is the clever tailor who outmaneuvers the devil himself; and the farmer who is rewarded by good King Mathias for his kind deeds; and the miller's daughter who marries the king because of her cleverness. Their stories are written in such simple, direct language as must have cloaked them in their original form; yet they are more than translations, reduced and diluted for children. Mme Schwimmer has told them as a good story-teller must, whether he be old Karad básci wiping the paprika-fish from his mustache and lighting his pipe or a young girl winning her first laurels at a spinning-bee. Her language is her own, and so right and well-chosen that it manages to absorb appropriate fragments of American slang without the least ill-effect.

"Tisza Tales" are intended for children, and no child could resist them. But neither could an adult who preserved any sense of kinship with his own past or that of the race; and for jaded minds, oppressed by intellectual complexities, such books as this should be prescribed as a gentle drug, satisfying, more completely than a movie melodrama, the desire for a friendly world and for simple solutions and for an intelligible system of rewards and punishments.

The book would be incomplete without the illustrations by Willy Pogany. Here his lively talent has an unmatched opportunity to display itself in designs and clear colors. Seldom has a Hungarian decorative artist been allowed to be more completely himself.

Boston

Boston. By Upton Sinclair. Two volumes. Albert and Charles Boni. $5.

The Letters of Sacco and Vanzetti. Edited by Marion Denman Frankfurter and Gardner Jackson. The Viking Press. $2.50.

"A MILLION men! Give me my million men!" cried Bartolomeo Vanzetti, pacing up and down in the death house at Charlestown a few days before his execution. His lawyer was distressed. So were all of the assorted liberals, radicals, and journalists who were struggling frantically to save him. Vanzetti was raving, they thought, broken at last by seven years of incredible judicial torture. They were wrong. Vanzetti was wholly sane and clairvoyantly right. A million men called out on a general strike might have clubbed a little of the fear of God into that prosperous Massachusetts mob which worshiped only the devils bred of their own hate and fear and hypocritical blood-lust. Probably nothing else would have helped, because ultimately everything else was tried, and nothing else did help.

Vanzetti was right. Upton Sinclair in "Boston" makes the point that he was usually right, from the beginning to the end of his ordeal; that again and again his predictions were fulfilled; that his counsel regarding the conduct of his own case might conceivably, if followed, have brought freedom to himself and Sacco. This, of course, is debatable. But it is true that Vanzetti's comprehension of his own and Sacco's predicament was extraordinarily clear, and even prophetic.

How could this be? Who was this Vanzetti? On what food had he fed that he could think so precisely and see so clearly? He was an Italian peasant who had been successively a pastry-cook, a factory worker, a pick-and-shovel laborer, and a fish-peddler. He had been an anarchist agitator and propagandist, "speaking at street corners to scorning men." He became, not by an accident, but by loyally following the dictates of an illumined soul and an honest mind, a revolutionary saint and martyr in the blaze of whose spirit America has been made to see herself as never before in all her history.

Something of that blaze kindles much of the writing that has been done about Sacco and Vanzetti. It flickers through the pages of "Boston" and makes Upton Sinclair's two-volume novel-history almost continuously alive and moving. It burns unquenchably in the speeches and letters of Vanzetti and of Sacco—for Sacco, although a less reflective type than his comrade, on occasion shows himself to be almost equally clear-headed and perceptive. This material, which does not include translations, but only the English letters and statements of the two prisoners, has now been collected into a volume by Gardner Jackson, secretary of the Sacco-Vanzetti Defense Committee, and Marion Denman Frankfurter. Sinclair has woven many passages from these letters and speeches into the fabric of his novel. He is right when he declares that here is some of the greatest English prose of our time and of all time.

This, for the little children of the Boston grammar schools to recite on May Day in that far time when Sacco and Vanzetti will be safely sculptured in bronze on the Common, and when

Boston, quite probably, will be engaged in making new martyrs

If it had not been for these things, I might have lived out my life talking at street corners to scorning men. I might have died, unmarked, unknown, a failure. Now we are not a failure. This is our career and our triumph. Never in our full life could we hope to do such work for tolerance, for justice, for man's understanding of man as now we do by accident. Our words—our lives—our pains—nothing! The taking of our lives—lives of a good shoemaker and a poor fish-peddler—all! That last moment belongs to us—that agony is our triumph!

This, for the Minute Men of finance and business to declaim at law-and-order rallies:

My father has many fields, houses, garden. He dealt in wine and fruits and granaries. He wrote to me many times to come back home and be a business man. Well, this supposed murderer had answered him that my conscience do not permit me to be a business man and I will gain my bread by work in his field. And more: The clearness of mind, the peace of the conscience, the determination and force of will, all, all what make the man feeling to be a part of the life, force, and intelligence of the universe, will be brake by a crime. I know that, I see that, I tell that to everybody. Do not violate the law of nature if you do not want to be miserable.

This, for those feeble intellectual snobs who could not get interested in the Sacco-Vanzetti case, because, forsooth, Vanzetti was a simple Italian peasant and an illusioned crank who "could not think":

It is now customary to speak of objectiveness—as of a great thing. Relatively understood, it is a great thing, absolutely it is trash. A human being can perceive, understand, judge from and with his being and he can only be objective according to the very nature of his being, in respect to each and all the questions and the problems of life. Nothing is worse than a false belief of self-goodness or greatness. It is that which permitted Nero to kill his mother without remorse. . . . The convinced of the most bad belief may wrong everything and everyone, convinced to be objective.

This, for the columnists and smart-crackers who find radicals drearily and unhumanly humorless, and who therefore, with at least one honorable exception, saw no reason to comment on a case which for long months and years stretched the best and bravest spirits of our time on the rack of anger and grief:

Mr. A. Brisbane always troubles me. Several months ago I read in a book of physical culture, that to sit down is an unhealthy habit, and that the more one stands the better he feels. I like to feel well and consequently I took the advice. But today Mr. A. Brisbane tells me that the more we lay down the better it is. So I do not know what I have to do for my good health. Till now I used to read on my feet, more often leaning like an elephant against the wall; from now on I will maybe sit down. Of course, the best way to prevent diseases and troubles to a man is kill him while he feels well.

This, to stuff down the throats of the lickspittle preach-

A Judge

By JAKE FALSTAFF

*There was a satisfaction in his heart
Because two men were dead.
Meanwhile, the apples were heaped in the tilted cart,
And the swine were fed.*

*Young randy gusts of wind went south and north Across the fields, and rose and fell,
And the earth, our mother and wife, gave forth
A fat and amorous smell.*

*There was abundance of flesh and fish and grain
And flowers to spare;
Wedding and childbirth; fertility and rain;
And harvest everywhere.*

*The cart stood tilted up as it always had
And the swine were fed
The night that the poorest man on earth was glad Because two men were dead.*

ers, debased inheritors of the Christian ideal of perfection, who all over this land howled for the blood of men whose deeds and words they did not trouble to know—men who in mind and spirit stood immeasurably above them:

The price to perfection is high, sorrowful. I suffered more in making my conscience, than in facing my trial.

Sacco and Vanzetti have indeed given us a new testament for our time. One thing, further, we learn from the letters and statements, and the lesson is reinforced by Sinclair's tracing of the pattern of events, semi-fictional though it is: Whom the coward, the knave, and the fool would destroy, they first hate, then slime with lies, and finally kill from ambush.

We saw the hate and we read the lies, but not all of them. Toward the end of the second volume of "Boston" Sinclair details some of the ugly and preposterous gossip which cops, stool-pigeons, crooked detectives, and respectable gentlemen and lunatics were depositing in the Governor's office during the last days before the execution, and which Messrs. Fuller, Lowell, Stratton, and Grant found it convenient to believe—tales connecting Sacco and Vanzetti with a dozen remote crimes—cheap poison-gas that spread all over the State and the nation. What does it matter whether or not they believed these tales? Whether they knew it or not—though probably they were too small and too stupid to know it—they killed in self-defense. They killed safely, respectably, in the name of their Nordic gods and their sick and dwindling investments. They will kill again if similar occasion arises. So will almost any other American community which, rightly or wrongly, believes itself threatened. The liberals will plead, the communists and anarchists will demonstrate. One thing alone will stop them, and it is not the law. It is power.

It is probably too bad that "Boston" was not written either as straight fact or straight fiction. As it is, one can never tell where the fact ends and the fiction begins and this is likely to cause a good deal of unprofitable argument. On the surface it would appear that Mr. Sinclair has digested the facts reasonably well and built them into a clear and convincing pattern. What one objects to, as usual, is Mr. Sinclair's tendency to point the moral and adorn the tale with the observations of his own exacerbated social conscience. The tale itself should have been enough. It is strong wine and needs no bush.

Probably Mr. Sinclair would reply that by resorting to this semi-fictional form he has been enabled both to widen the scope of his exposition and to give movement and poignancy to his drama. Most of his characters are real people whose real names are used. The others are obviously composite portraits. The sub-plots of financial, political, and social intrigue and corruption appear to have been taken bodily, for the most part, from the newspapers. Naturally the reviewer cannot vouch for them or for what appears to be stated as fact about the Sacco-Vanzetti case. But surely there was little need to invent. At least Mr. Sinclair has given us no incredible villains: merely a sick and phobia-ridden old man; a Cambridge Jehovah; an automobile salesman with cold agate eyes who staged a big political gamble—and lost.

Mr. Sinclair has been equally realistic about his heroes. Bart and Nick were not perfect, although they were exceedingly fine and lovable human beings. They were anarchists—class rebels who fearlessly and unreservedly gave over their lives to fighting for liberty and justice as they conceived these things. It is possible to say that they did not understand very well how to fight; liberals and communists alike will say that. But certainly they were not failures; they forced thoughtful people to question anew our concepts of the state, the law, the social compromise. And they knew how to die.

A great tragedy has been enacted in our time and these are among its important records. Let no one read these books who is not prepared to weep at the terror and the beauty of life. There are five men who will not dare to read them as long as they live.

JAMES RORTY

The Importance of Albert Mathiez

The French Revolution. By Albert Mathiez. Translated from the French by Catherine Alison Phillips. Alfred A. Knopf. $5.

IT is possible for historians of France to disagree about her great men without the mayors of her chief cities going into hysterics. In fact, the city of Paris endows a chair in history at the University of Paris which was first held by a pro-Mirabeau, pro-Danton, anti-Robespierre incumbent and is now held by an anti-Mirabeau, anti-Danton, pro-Robespierre incumbent. The second (Albert Mathiez) was at one time the student of the first (F.-A. Aulard). When Mathiez was awarded his doctoral degree in 1904, none was more enthusiastic in his praise of the younger man's thesis on the theophilanthropists than his mentor, to whom it was dedicated.

But since that time they have parted company. Aulard, trained as a student of literature, whose original studies in the French Revolution were of its oratory, was chiefly interested in the political phases of the revolution. His greatest contribution to its understanding, aside from the publication of dozens of volumes of valuable documents, is an "Histoire politique de la Révolution française." As the title indicates, he was interested in constitutional changes and party policies. He never emphasized economic and social causation, going so far as to maintain that the quarrel between the Girondins and the Jacobins was nothing more than a question of whether the Departments or Paris were to dominate the policies of France. Despite the insistence of Jaurès and Kropotkin upon the social antagonism of these two groups, Aulard's views were generally accepted for an entire generation both in France and abroad. The Société de l'histoire de la Révolution, of which he was the guiding spirit, and the journal La Révolution française, of which he was the editor, were the media through which new documents were published and current literature discussed. Soon Danton was given a statue.

In the meantime, Albert Mathiez had become professor at the provincial University of Dijon. His temperament is radical, his historical approach Marxian. He could not long remain a passive recipient of the Aulardian doctrine that the most significant factors in the French Revolution were political. Furthermore, he was inclined to reject his former tutor's preferences for Danton and antipathy for Robespierre. In 1908 he founded a journal called Les Annales révolutionnaires and in it he published several essays tending to show Robespierre in a new light. This journal was the organ of the Société des Etudes Robespierriennes, of which Mathiez was the leader. There followed a dozen or more volumes on the same theme. One proved that some of the chief opponents of Robespierre in the Convention were grafters ("La Corruption parlementaire sous la Terreur"). Another showed that the foreign plot, which Robespierre and the Committee of Public Safety so frequently used as a justification for their stringent measures but at which historians were inclined to smile skeptically, was a real conspiracy of formidable proportions ("La Conspiration de l'étranger"). Another was a series of essays showing Robespierre to have been a brave, clear-sighted, and democratic statesman ("Autour de Robespierre"). This was followed by another series of essays showing that Danton, instead of being the patriot who constantly risked his good name that the Patrie might be saved, as Aulard described him, was one who always sat on the fence, leaning safely to the leeward, but carefully preparing a soft spot to fall upon on the other side, should the wind suddenly change. There were two volumes on the church during the revolution ("Rome et le Clergé français sous la Constituante" and "La Révolution et l'Eglise"), describing the counter-revolutionary activities of the Catholic church during the entire course of the revolution. In "Danton et la Paix," Danton was shown to have been a defeatist at the time when the bitter-enders were beginning to gain predominance. In "Robespierre Terroriste" Robespierre is shown to have been only apparently responsible for the severity of the Committee of Public Safety; others were more ruthless than he, and the entire scheme of the Terror was a justifiable war measure. An other study is devoted to a crying scandal that almost entirely escaped the attention of earlier historians—"L'Affaire de la Compagnie des Indes," in which it is revealed that Danton's followers, if not Danton himself, were sadly involved in as neat a case of graft as ever marred any revolutionary annals.

In the meantime, the social history of the Terror had received admirable elucidation in regular articles from the same pen in the Annales Révolutionnaires. These articles and some more recent ones led to the publication of Mathiez's latest volume, showing how the economic factors (food shortage, low wages, paper-money inflation, war conditions, etc.) led to the necessity for economic reorganization and the extension of the Terror ("La Vie chère et le Mouvement social sous la Terreur"). Mathiez has shown that Robespierre, Saint Just, and their faction had committed themselves definitely to a policy of redistribution of wealth by confiscating that of the "suspects" and partitioning it up among indigent "patriots." It was this policy which, as much as any other, hastened their overthrow on the 9th Thermidor.

These are not all the books that Mathiez has published. Nor does this enumeration take full account of his energetic editorial activity. Despite the censorship during the war, the Annales révolutionnaires continued to appear, the editor (he told me) refusing to let it be censored until a censor could be found with sufficient scientific training to do the work capably. Since the war (1924) the Annales révolutionnaires and the Revue historique de la Révolution française have been united under the joint editorship of Albert Mathiez and Gustave Laurent with the title of Annales Historiques de la Révolution française, Organe de la Société des Etudes Robespierristes. If you pick up any of its six issues a year, you will most probably find that the leading article, several of the smaller notes, and almost all of the reviews are by Mathiez. The Société is also publishing the works of Robespierre, in which Mathiez is actively interested, though not formally engaged. Mathiez has also published a very carefully annotated edition of Jaurès's study of the French Revolution (the first three volumes of the "Histoire Socialiste").

Such a man, of course, has enemies. Since no one has written a book on the French Revolution in the last twenty-five years without hearing from Mathiez and since Mathiez is not given to calling a spade an agricultural implement, the pages of the Annales Historiques frequently carry bitter controversies between the editor and some author who feels he has been victimized. When Aulard retired from the chair in the History of the French Revolution established at the University of Paris by the City of Paris, it was felt in several quarters that someone more in sympathy than Mathiez with the attitudes of the outgoing incumbent ought to be found to fill the post. The choice fell logically upon Professor Sagnac. But within a few years, Professor Sagnac felt obliged by ill-health and a shift of his interests to Napoleon likewise to retire, and Albert Mathiez necessarily was made chargé du cours in the history of the French Revolution at the University of Paris.

"La Révolution française," Mathiez's general history of the French Revolution, began to appear in 1925, when the author was still professor at the University of Dijon. The present translation contains in one large volume what appeared in French in three small volumes. The last two were published while Mathiez was chargé du cours d'Histoire de la Révolution française à l'Université de Paris. They are characterized by the point of view that the previous monographic studies of the author would lead one to expect. The first volume was a study of how conservative opposition led from absolute monarchy through limited monarchy to a bourgeois republic. The second volume dealt with the second revolutionary movement, by which the Girondins were prevented from establishing a bourgeois republic by sans culottes and Jacobins, and were overthrown by popular patriotic demonstrations. The third volume described the failure of the Jacobins to establish a sans culotte republic because of bourgeois reaction to Terror and socialism. It is unfortunate that the publisher of the translation did not wait for the fourth volume, which the author informs me will appear shortly. It will deal with the Thermidorian Reaction.

This translation will come as a surprise to the thousands in this country who have learned their history of the French Revolution in the school of Aulard. They will find Robespierre the hero of the story from first to last, adapting himself slowly but with statesmanlike wisdom to the demands of the revolutionary cause, always taking the patriotic and popular point of view, seldom mistaken about the corruption of the men he attacked. They will find Marat regarded as a clear-sighted journalist and an honest statesman, sincere leader of the lower classes against bourgeois interests and policies. They will find Mirabeau described as a self-seeking, bribe-taking, aristocratic voluptuary. They will discover Danton as a corrupt defeatist trimmer, though occasional words of praise for his personal courage are let fall. They will find that Lafayette, Brissot, Roland, Charlotte Corday, and even Camille Desmoulins were not without fear and without reproach.

But the most significant contribution of the author to the study of the French Revolution is not the reevaluation of personalities. It is his insistence upon social and economic developments as the determining factors in the revolution. The winning of the war, which he makes the chief motive of Jacobins, Hébertists, and Robespierrists, may be regarded in itself as a patriotic and sheerly political consideration. But the war could not be won except by the conscription of men, money, munitions, food, and opinion; and the regulation of each of these was determined by social and materialistic considerations on the part of individuals, parties, classes. Since Aulard wrote his "Histoire politique de la Révolution française" and published the political documents of the French Revolution there have appeared a great number of documents published by an official commission on the economic history of France. These "Documents inédits sur l'histoire économique de la Révolution française" have been used along with Aulard's by our present author, but he has also depended upon his own researches in the Archives nationales, which perhaps no man other than the archivist himself (Pierre Caron) knows better. The result is a work that might be called an "Histoire sociale et économique de la Révolution française."

Strangely enough, the mordant, polemical manner for which Mathiez has become famous is not to be found in these volumes. It is a straightforward, sober, objective, uncontroversial style he uses, with few literary tricks, but with a clarity and smoothness that mark it as unmistakably French. Mathiez has been more fortunate in his translator than Aulard, since Mrs. Phillips has not tried to improve upon his text and has done as little editing as was reasonable. There are a few typographical errors that a more careful proofreading should have caught. For example, July 18 (p. 48) should be July 17, as it is in the original. On the other hand, there is a good index that will make the translation more usable than the original.

Of the author's work there are only minor criticisms to make. It is regrettable that he accepts the kind of testimony against people he does not like as would make him writhe in protest if others were to use it against his friends. He repeats, for instance, against Brissot that "his enemies alleged" that he had been in the employ of the police before 1789 (p. 138). It would go hard with any other author in the columns of Mathiez's journal, however, if he were to use such evidence against Robespierre. Sometimes, too, Mathiez makes statements on too flimsy evidence. I should like to know upon what evidence he bases his statement that Marat, a few days before the September Massacres, posted placards calling on recruits not to leave for the front until they had meted out justice to the enemies of the people (p. 179). The author's American public, at least, will find it confusing that he so frequently gives the dates of important events in the Revolutionary calendar without indicating their Gregorian equivalents. Finally, there are a few errors of detail. The procession preceding the opening of the Estates General came after (May 4) and not the day before the king's reception of the three orders (May 2). On the same page (p. 41), it is inaccurately stated that Necker made no statement on the question of vote by head vs. vote by order, for he let fall some inadequate expression in favor of voting by order. Can the French Guards be called the "premier regiment of France" (p. 46)? Is not the inference which one is allowed to draw that De Launay deliberately and cold-bloodedly fired on a flag of truce on July 14, 1789, an injustice to that incompetent, panic-stricken, but well-intentioned gentleman? Finally, in view of Dr. Cabanis's testimony that Mirabeau lay on his deathbed for five days it is unfair to say that "Mirabeau died suddenly . . . as the result of a night of orgy."

But these are mere details and unimportant. The fact is that, for once, a publisher's "blurb" tells no more than the truth: "The announcement of this book is a distinctive event in the field of historical literature." Perhaps now Robespierre will have a statue.

At the Clinic

Whither Mankind: A Panorama of Modern Civilization. Edited by Charles A. Beard. Longmans, Green and Company. $3.

IN this contribution to our growing library of surveys Mr. Beard has sponsored an attractive volume, the outcome of sympathetic collaboration among seventeen widely scattered and diverse commentators, drawn from the intellectuals of three continents. From the Orient comes Hu Shih, from Germany Emil Ludwig, from England Bertrand Russell, Beatrice and Sidney Webb, and Havelock Ellis, and from America a choice group including James Harvey Robinson, John Dewey, Lewis Mumford, Everett Dean Martin, Stuart Chase, and Carl Van Doren. The editor opens the debate by proposing the problem—What in the eyes of an intelligent realism is likely to be the future of this present civilization, based on the machine and guided by science? Will it run its course as other civilizations have done and give place to a different order? And the reply in discussion and summary is a rebuttal of the pessimism of Spengler's view—that is adjudged to be only a lament for an obsolete agricultural and handicraft order—and the substitution of a sober, judicial optimism. If our civilization is suffering from the sickness of an acquisitive society, in the pharmacopoeia of science are the remedies to cure it.

I frankly confess to a distaste for any sort of symposium. Too often the thing is little more than a pot-au-feu into which go such odds and ends as the cook has at hand. It is perhaps better to regard this study as a social clinic, a consultation of physicians, a learned deliberation of highly trained specialists, at the bedside of Western civilization. In the eyes of the family nothing could be more impressive than this businesslike procedure. Seventeen learned heads bending over the patient, seventeen stethoscopes clapped to lungs and heart, seventeen analysts consulting over blood pressure and gland secretions, seventeen pathologists inquiring into all possible sources of infection. And when the report is in the judgment is highly encouraging. The diagnosis gives no great cause for alarm. What these gentlemen find is that Western civilization is suffering from a mild attack of machinitis, superinduced by a diet of science lacking in certain necessary social vitamins, chiefly vitamin E commonly known as aesthetics. Fortunately, the disease is not incurable, for the present ill-balanced diet can be corrected by the same science that brought on the disorder.

It is comforting to know that the hair of the dog will cure the bite, that, as used to be said about democracy, the remedy for the evils of science is more science. But to enjoy the full measure of comfort one must have complete faith in the competency of our diagnosticians. These gentlemen profess to be realists who are under no sentimental illusions in regard to either the past or the present. They project a future derived from present fact, and they assume that the civilization of tomorrow will be the civilization of today with its foundations established more firmly in industrialism and its soaring towers refined and ennobled by increasing wisdom. They accept science and the universe revealed by science, and they confidently expect science to push forward unceasingly its conquest of nature. They accept equally the machine as the inevitable and beneficent instrument of science to create the milieu of civilization—a kindly giant that is counted on to eradicate serfdom and slavery from human society. And they envisage the future in terms of an increasing mastery of physical forces, an augmenting well-being that is destined eventually to uproot poverty, a clarifying intelligence that will mitigate if not destroy the ancient evils of superstition and cruelty and fear, and provide a more generous, humane, and creative life for men.

The picture is attractive—for many social critics it will seem too attractive. It waves aside somewhat too blithely the Victorian criticism of the machine order and the Victorian emphasis on the psychology of work. Ruskin and Morris it dismisses with Spengler as mourners over the past rather than critics of the present. Yet the question at the heart of Victorian criticism—Can an exploitative machine-order produce free creative minds, without which there can be no worthy civilization?—remains unanswered. Indeed the whole vexatious question of the machine versus the workman—the saving impact on the mind of the creative workman of the tool that fashions the raw material, and conversely the stamp of the machine on the unthinking "hand" that tends it—is given rather too scanty consideration. Everybody knows that our mastery of the material world, our technology, and our accumulations of scientific knowledge, are a good many laps ahead of our ability to use them in realizing the good life. The education of our technicians and laboratory workers is narrow and lopsided. Outside their special fields they are likely to be as guileless as any twelve-year-olds. After all, we are only children playing with poison gas, and whether we shall eventually control the gas or be destroyed by it is a question on which competent judges differ. Only a few of our present diagnosticians deal with the question at all and those who do are precisely the ones who report least glowingly on the condition of our civilization.

Among so many contributions one must expect a certain inequality in merit. Every reader will evaluate differently, but to the mind of the present reviewer certain contributions are quite inadequate. The chapter on law and government is the slightest of sketches that scarcely touches the fringe of the subject. The editor would have done better to have written that particular chapter himself. The analysis of business is idealistically hopeful in minimizing the fact that every business group is brutally unsocial in temper until it has conquered its realm. The present power group is only repeating the history of the railway group, the oil group, the steel group, in their reaching out for mastery. Only after the world is at its feet, dutifully paying its price, does business formulate codes and endow schools of research in business ethics. But if certain portions of the book are feeble they are compensated for by the excellence of other parts. Here, again, each reader will judge for himself, but one reader at least confesses a partiality for Bertrand Russell's discussion of science, Stuart Chase's discussion of play, and Everett Dean Martin's discussion of education. The last in particular offers some sharp and wise comments on a subject that goes to the heart of our civilization. In the four hundred pages there is good picking for many tastes—none perhaps better than the editor's introduction—and no reader need leave the clinic hungry. The metaphor is badly mixed, but let it stand.

A Note of Confession

Shorter Novels of Herman Melville. With an Introduction by Raymond Weaver. Horace Liveright. $3.50.

I HAVE a confession to make. When, a dozen years ago, I wrote for a learned work an account of Herman Melville and compiled the first extended bibliography of his writings, I outrageously neglected his "Piazza Tales," which I then called "not markedly original." This was not because I had not read them, but because, I suppose, I had read them with some kind of critical blind spot in my eyes. It does not comfort me to realize that Raymond Weaver, to whom I suggested that he write the biography of Melville, seems to have read these tales with eyes hardly more alert than mine. He said that Benito Cereno and The Encantadas "show the last glow of Melville's literary glamor." He said of Billy Budd, which he discovered in manuscript and which I had had no chance to read, that it was "not distinguished." We—do I seem to be confessing for Mr. Weaver too?—left it for Michael Sadleir and John Freeman, both in England, to do justice to masterpieces which nobody who had even glanced at them can ever have had an excuse for overlooking.

Now, however, Mr. Weaver has atoned for his error by bringing together Benito Cereno, Bartleby the Scrivener, and The Encantadas from the "Piazza Tales" and Billy Budd from its place in the limited edition of Melville issued recently in London. Thus for the first time in America since 1856 the "Piazza Tales" (at least, three of its six titles) is recovered from the dust of the first edition; and for the first time Billy Budd, left unpublished for a generation, is issued in the United States. That such merit should have been obscured so long is one of the shocking incidents in the history of American literature.

For these shorter novels of Melville belong, whatever may formerly have been said about them, with the most original and distinguished fiction yet produced on this continent. Perhaps Bartleby the Scrivener is a little thinner than the others, a little touched with the dry pallor of the fifties. Perhaps The Encantadas drifts rather than marches in its construction, quickening in one episode and then settling back again to a different tempo. But Benito Cereno, to use a more or less unavoidable standard of measurement, equals the best of Conrad in the weight of its drama and the skill of its unfolding. And Billy Budd surpasses the best of Conrad in the music of its language, as in the profundity and serenity of its reflections.

Billy Budd is particularly important among the works of Melville because in it alone he rises above the dark problems which tormented the later years of his life. No longer asking himself, of course vainly, why evil should exist, he asks instead how it moves on its horrid errands and what is to be done about it. Or rather, he answers by telling the story of Billy Budd, a handsome sailor who is hated by a petty officer on the ship, is unjustly accused to the captain, in a burst of worthy indignation strikes the petty officer and unintentionally kills him, and has to be hanged for his offense though the captain believes the sailor to be essentially without guilt. Hardly anywhere in fiction is there a more penetrating representation of native malice than in Melville's account of how Claggart comes to hate Billy for his beauty and his innocence. The processes of Iago are superficial in comparison. Seldom in fiction has any character been so powerfully and lucidly exhibited in any such moral plight as that of Captain Vere, faced with a plain duty and a conscience plainly urging him not to do it. And neither of these parts of the story is so memorable as the scene, at once terrible and exalted, in which Billy, innocent of everything but innocence and manslaughter, is hanged, the victim of his own victim, who was evil as Billy was innocent. The innumerable implications of the plot are broodingly revealed. Wisdom surrounds it as the water surrounds the ship. But the narrative has none of the dispersion, as of light in a prism, which often goes with wisdom. In this last story Melville wrote he thought of all he had ever thought, and yet moved forward through it with the tense, straight line of art.

The Origins of the World War

The Origins of the World War. By Sidney Bradshaw Fay. The Macmillan Company. Two volumes. $9.

In Quest of Truth and Justice. By Harry Elmer Barnes. National Historical Society.

THE appearance of Professor Fay's long-awaited work on the origins of the Great War means simply this: that the controversial stage in the question of war origins has been pretty well passed and that the problem has at last been examined as a whole by a professional historian of international standing whose impartiality is beyond cavil. Few books have ever been awaited with so much interest and impatience by the profession, for the author took high rank as a writer on the subject some eight years ago when he first exploded the myth of Germany's sole responsibility in the American Historical Review, and it has been generally felt that his detailed exposition of the problem and his reasoned opinions would go a long way toward clearing up the controversial points and supplying an authoritative statement. The feeling was fully justified, for here is no attempt to prove the responsibility of this or that individual, of this or that nation. Professor Fay has spent years in careful investigation, there is almost nothing in the way of source material in any language that he has not seen and weighed, and his account is written with the same cool detachment with which he might have written of the origins of the Seven Years' War. The book marks a veritable epoch in the discussion of the greatest controversy and the most important problem of our time. It is a monument to American scholarship which will stand as the first purely scientific treatment of the question based upon adequate source material.

Professor Fay reminds us, in his concluding chapter, of Napoleon's famous dictum that over-simplification is the enemy of precision. He himself has made no attempt to reduce an extremely complicated problem to a few superficial formulas, and it would be ridiculous for a reviewer to essay a brief summary of the wealth of material in this book. You have here two substantial volumes, the first dealing with the underlying causes of the war and the history of international relations prior to June 28, 1914. To the student of diplomatic history this is, perhaps, the most impressive part, for it is nothing less than a series of monographic studies covering the whole period from 1870 to 1914, many of them touching upon subjects which have never before been systematically investigated, but all of them well-knit into a coherent story. As of greatest importance the reviewer would single out the treatment of the Anglo-French military and naval conversations, the exposition of Russia's policy in the Straits question, and the general account of the Balkan situation in the period following the Balkan Wars. Professor Fay shows clearly how England gradually drifted into what Churchill rightly describes as a "moral obligation" to France from which she could not extricate herself in 1914;

how Russia's attention was focussed on the problem of opening the Straits for her warships while keeping them closed to the ships of other nations; and how, in the year preceding the July crisis, the various Powers were attempting to outdo one another and draw the Balkan states to their side.

The curtain was ready in 1914 to rise upon a great conflict. Europe was divided into two hostile camps, and international rivalries were accentuated by bloated armaments, by economic antagonisms, by nationalist aspirations, and by newspaper polemics. But Professor Fay is probably right in saying that these tendencies, however dangerous in themselves, would not have led to war. It was the assassination of Franz Ferdinand that precipitated the crisis, and this was the result of Serbian nationalist agitation. One could not ask for anything more lucid than the author's detailed study of the Austro-Serbian problem as it presented itself in 1914, of the political ideas and position of Franz Ferdinand himself, and of the plot and intrigue which led to his assassination. With this the second volume opens. The remaining chapters are in no sense inferior. Closely adhering to the chronological approach, which is the only profitable one in dealing with a problem of this kind, the author reviews the legend of the Potsdam Council and the story of Germany's blank check to Austria, the preparation of the ultimatum to Serbia, the Russian attitude and the role of France, the Serbian reply, the British peace proposals, Germany's belated efforts to restrain Austria, and, finally, the Russian mobilization and the declarations of war. Throughout the author's conclusions do not differ materially from those presented by the writers of the so-called revisionist school. But the great value of Fay's conclusions lies in the fact that they are the independent conclusions of an independent historian working out the various aspects of the problem from the sources. The fact is that no impartial scholar using all the material can come to substantially different conclusions. It is probably safe to say that Fay himself would have preferred to leave each reader to form his own opinions, but he has, in a few closing pages, briefly summarized his views, and with limited space one can hardly do better than to extract them.

None of the Powers, says Fay, wanted a European war, and the mere existence of national aspirations cannot be adduced as evidence that they intended to realize their ambitions by force of arms. The war broke out because in each country political and military leaders did things which led to mobilizations and declarations of war, or failed to do things that might have prevented them. All are, in a degree, responsible: Serbia because of her corroding agitation, because Pachich knew in advance of the plot to assassinate the Austrian heir, and because he failed to prevent the assassins from crossing into Bosnia or to warn the Austrian government; Austria because she determined to cut the Gordian knot by crushing Serbia and acted accordingly; Germany because she gave Austria a blank check and attempted too late to put on the brakes; France because she encouraged Russia instead of trying to restrain her; England for having failed to throw her weight into the balance one way or the other at the start. But "it was the hasty Russian general mobilization . . . while Germany was still trying to bring Austria to accept mediation proposals, which finally rendered the European war inevitable." This is the crucial point and enough has been said. Coming from so conservative and moderate an historian as Fay it sounds the death-knell of the Allied thesis and spells the condemnation of Article 231 of the Treaty of Versailles, which Fay describes as "historically unsound" and which he thinks ought to be revised. Those who have fought in the last years in the cause of historical truth may rest their case there, and those who have been on the fence can use this authoritative work as a stepping-stone into the revisionist camp. If any exception were to be taken to Fay's conclusions it would not be on the score of radicalism, but because of the fact that he is, if anything, too cautious and guarded.

While Fay's book has, for the time, put all other writings on war origins into the shade, students of the subject should not overlook Professor Harry Elmer Barnes's "In Quest of Truth and Justice." The author has long since taken his place among the leading writers on the question and has waged a courageous fight against staggering odds in this country. His latest book is divided into two parts, the longer one devoted to a reprinting of his numerous reviews and controversial articles and the replies made to them. He has reduced many of his opponents ad absurdum and the process is highly illuminating and instructive. As a record of a great debate and as evidence that the truth will out this part of the book should be of interest to those who have followed the subject or who desire a general picture of recent developments. But of greater intrinsic value is the earlier part in which the author surveys briefly the present status of the question, elucidating various disputed points by statements made to him by many of the leading statesmen of 1914. Of particular importance is the new light thrown on the Austrian attitude and policy. Barnes argues convincingly that the Austrian case was good and that the government had full information as to Russian-Serbian intrigues, though the facts could not be made known in 1914. The Austrians, he shows, did not draw up the ultimatum in the hope that it would be rejected, neither were they pushed into war by German encouragement. On the contrary, they relied upon English neutrality and did all that was possible to prevent a general conflagration. But a punitive campaign against Serbia they regarded as a life-and-death matter, and in this they were justified. As Professor Fay says: "No state can be expected to sit with folded arms and await dismemberment at the hands of its neighbors." The whole matter is one of prime importance and Barnes deserves high commendation for the perseverance with which he has run down this and other points. But the nicety of argument cannot be appreciated without reading the book itself.

A Modern Poet

A Son of Earth. Collected Poems by William Ellery Leonard. The Viking Press. $3.

DEFINITELY coming to the fore among contemporary poets upon the first publication of "Two Lives" in 1922, Mr. Leonard needs no apology for this volume of his collected verse. Unfortunately, he seems too lenient a judge of his work and among a good deal of poetry of high merit he has admitted some facile versifying. Two qualities characterize his best poetry: lyric piety, which becomes articulate without sentimentality as an awareness of nature's moods, and intellectual consciousness, manifesting itself in awareness of man in his social environment. But because experimentation in form and diction seems the most important function of the artist today, Mr. Leonard's mixture of homely with learned phrase and his frequent use of the "thou" when there seems to be no need of it often come annoyingly forward as evidence of his failure to break the language successfully to his own personal needs. Yet a criticism which confined itself to the formal qualities of his poetry would be pedantic and superficial, since its import easily transcends its formal shortcomings. For his verse is the objective autobiography of a full-blooded, impetuous personality, capable of passionate immediate reactions, and of a wide range of preoccupations, scholarly, social, political, philosophic, lyrical, religious, and playful. It is the record of an earthly man who has lived intensely for the spirit, who has written himself out as few men of his day have, and who has thus expressed his day in a more significant way than those who claim to be modern merely because they have not used a phrase or word found in the language before 1914.

HOUSE of ROTHSCHILD

by Count Egon Caesar Corti

Here the House of Rothschild uses its billions to dominate world politics.

In this companion volume to "The Rise of the House of Rothschild," Count Corti carries on the career of the most powerful family and financial institution in history from 1830 to the present time.

During a century of revolutions the Rothschilds play a dramatic and leading financial part in the fate of nations. Dynasties change, thrones topple, captains of industry fall, but the sway of the great Rothschild banking firm continues.

It was said: "The Rothschilds do not wear crowns, but have them at their feet."

The Rothschilds as a World Power

Here the five brothers of the Frankfort Ghetto are seen developing the first railways; jockeying for position with Louis Napoleon, Bismarck, and Cavour; overcoming the prejudice against their race in a series of triumphs; marrying their daughters into royalty while their sons continue the traditions of the Rothschild dynasty—and in world politics, while throwing their influence always in the balance for peace, not failing to reap the profits of war.

Count Corti presents this astounding record of wealth and power with the documentary evidence which assures authentic history and makes "The Reign of the House of Rothschild" as outstanding a contribution as its predecessor.

slenderness. "This is the first book of poems by Edna St. Vincent Millay in five years!" exclaim the publishers. Why, then, so slender a volume? Is life perhaps a little too peacefully beautiful up there on the snowy bloomy farm at Austerlitz—a little too far away? It is hard to write poetry when you're not in trouble. I remember when Edna Millay was in trouble all the time and singing like the lark in her poem:

She would not end her singing, she would not have done.

I wrote a sonnet to her then. The octave has got lost or broken, but here are the last six lines, still saying what I want to say after reading "The Buck in the Snow":

Above the clash of battle, and the rage
Which is existence in this place and age,
Above all wounds and weapons it could send,
You have held high and beautifully strong,
And flowing rose-and-silver in the wind,
The bold clear slender pennant of your song.

Yiddish into English

Lamentations. Four Folk-Plays of the American Jew. By Alter Brody. Coward-McCann. $2.50.

IN the heyday of Maeterlinck and Synge one had only to offer a reasonably protracted piece of maudlin pessimism to be hailed as a writer of folk-plays. The neo-romantic tradition, as we academically called the epidemic spread by these gentlemen and their followers, was a form of hysteria in which Irish, Flemish, and, less frequently, Gallic and English spirits appeared as misty ectoplasm struggling soulfully against this too material world. One needed the will-to-believe in its most fanatic form in order to recognize their nationality.

Mr. Brody falls too readily into this tradition and if this criticism does not altogether apply to his work it is only because he is saved from much of the mushy sentimentality and the murky vagueness of the folk-play school by a healthy sense of reality. His women chop their meat and onions into palpable hash and they interrupt their mystic rhapsodies with memories of "scraping some beets to pickle for Passover." More important, they attribute their problems to human agencies and they are characteristically direct in laying the blame on the villain's head.

Here Mr. Brody achieves something new and distinctive. In rendering the language of his complaining Jews he discards entirely the idiotic inversions and infelicities of phrase by which previous translators and interpreters of Yiddish tried to communicate the original. There is no mistaking the racial quality of his speech, yet it has neither the caricature which vaudeville comedians nor the milt-grossness which other Anglo-Jewish writers have presented as the equivalent of an eloquent and dignified idiom. But this is his sole vital achievement, an achievement of considerable magnitude, to be sure, and one that will undoubtedly influence all future work in the Yiddish field.

There is little else impressive or outstanding in these one-act plays, although they suffer more from generic weakness than from individual faults. Like other folk-plays they are less dramatic pieces than poetic monologues; and, again, they consciously represent life as a complaint against the inevitable rather than as a struggle against the impedient. A mother sorrowing for her East Side Ophelia, a neurotic child dreading her surroundings, a wife indicting the father of her children for the sadism which tortured and wrecked their lives, and, most powerful of all, a woman lamenting her sterility—these are the themes, hardly normal and certainly not exclusively Jewish, which the author develops in sonorous rhythms. Given a full-bodied, well-balanced subject, Mr. Brody should create something tremendous with this rich prose he has mastered.

Amateur Play Production

The Art of Play Production. By John Dolman, Jr. Harper and Brothers. $3.50.

IF it is true that the future vitality of the American theater is being generated in the increasing number of community players, little theaters, art theaters, and university play-houses, then Professor Dolman's book should be made required reading in most of them. There may be better manuals, but I have not run across one. Written for the amateur, "for the beginner but not for the dabbler," this outline really clears the ground for intelligent amateur effort because of its continuous and well-directed attack on the original sin of the amateur theater. This might be described (in words that the author uses in another connection) as the method "of those careless and lazy people who cannot bring themselves to the labor of thinking things out in advance, and of those supreme egoists who think their unguided aspiration more truthful than accumulated experience." Fortunately, experience to Professor Dolman means, not the inviolate traditions of all the ages that are usually invoked, but the experience of the most important professional theaters of this country and Europe during the last twenty years. He has analyzed their experiments with remarkable liberality and common sense and edited them for the benefit of the amateur.

What makes his analysis valuable, even though one might dispute any number of its particular conclusions, is that Professor Dolman never for a moment loses sight of the fact that the amateur's problem and the professional's are essentially alike. For a Mérimée or anyone else, out of a French government office for a spare afternoon, the going was essentially the same as for Zola who did his regular stint of so many thousand words a day. Gauguin the stock-broker or Rousseau the customs inspector, starting to paint one Sunday morning a week, were faced with the same problem of pictorial organization as any "professional" painter covering canvases every day under his studio skylight.

The word amateur has come to denote the slipshod and the half-baked because we have so foolishly assumed that half-time or part-time effort in any art must imply intellectual laziness, and then condoned it. As a matter of fact the amateur, even in the theater, because he inherits less professional routine and stereotyped tradition, is often better able to become an effective professional than most of his so-called professional brethren, provided he hammers away at his ideas consistently enough. The Moscow Art Theater was founded at a meeting between two amateurs and the Theater Guild resulted from a conference between half a dozen.

Art in the theater, like art everywhere else, is a matter of the deliberate organization of aesthetic material. No amount of veneration for the theater gets any further than the limbo of excellent intentions until research and experiment are begun with the ways and means whereby all the elements of a theatrical production—words, voices, gestures, movement, settings, color, light—can be organized into effective expression of dramatic ideas so that a play can get over the footlights and arouse an audience.

Professor Dolman (who teaches English at the University of Pennsylvania) makes a bad professorial start by wading into the muddled stream of aesthetic theory in pursuit of some definition of beauty from which all necessary procedure can be deduced. Fortunately this is nothing more than preliminary bravado. After the first few pages he becomes a thoroughgoing pragmatist, clambers back to solid ground and blazes his trail like any experienced backwoodsman. His trail leads through the entire thicket of production, from interpreting the first stage-direction of a script, choosing the cast and planning the action, to the placing of the last spotlight. The section which re-

STANDARD BOOKS ON LIBERTY

Our Ancient Liberties

By Leon Whipple

$1.50

"What were the liberties of our forefathers to which we so often appeal? Where did they come from, and what were they worth in practice? Mr. Whipple considers realistically the English origins and American contributions to civil liberties and then examines in some detail the intent and practical meanings of the amendments to the federal Constitution which make up our American Bill of Rights. The book is well written and genuinely illuminating. Judge Julian W. Mack contributes a thoughtful introduction. . . ."—The Nation.

Civil Liberty

Compiled by Edith M. Phelps

$1.25

Here are reprinted in one volume the outstanding arguments for and against freedom of expression from Milton's "Areopagitica" to Mussolini's recent pronouncements. Along with the Constitutional guarantees are printed the Amendments and the various State laws which seem to modify them; the opinions of Justice Brandeis, Holmes, and others; and Communistic views of the question, as expressed by Lenin and Trotsky. Valuable bibliography.

Free Speech Bibliography

Selected articles on the historical, geographical, ethnological, religious, and cultural background of modern China, with discussions of internal problems and international relations. Chosen by the China Institute of America for its list of selected books on China.

lates the design of stage settings to the design of a production as a whole is excellent—despite a blind spot as to some of the values of constructivism. There is a valuable chapter with a color plate on the effect of colored light on pigments of which most professional directors are still ignorant. Unfortunately the nerve center of a playhouse—the lighting switchboard—which presents problems of installation and maintenance that determine the effectiveness of almost any production, is slurred over, including the first-rate equipment designed by Monroe Pevear of Boston specifically for small theaters.

Nevertheless the book contains so much sound elucidation for the amateur director, actor, and designer (including a well-annotated bibliography of special publications on all phases of theater art) that every group of amateurs able to profit by it could set up shop immediately. Through it all there is no dictatorial schoolmastering but instead what James defined as the pragmatist's virtue: a lively sense of alternatives, and an equally lively sense as well that the problems of production remain the same everywhere in the theater, whether you have to reckon with the limitations of the local parson's daughter as the heroine or a supposedly leading lady's, the lack of equipment in a high-school auditorium or the lack of stage-depth in the average Broadway theater.

But I hope that amateur organizations will grasp Professor Dolman's central idea while studying his series of plans and diagrams and analyses. When these are all superseded and every college and community theater is as completely equipped as Baker's at Yale, we shall all be attempting fresh solutions to the problems this book so clearly dissects, and continue to work for the coherent craftsmanship which can make play-producing a living art.

The Mexican Commonwealth

Mexico and Its Heritage. By Ernest Gruening. The Century Company. $6.

THIS volume automatically becomes the classic work on Mexico of our time. It holds a more important place in the serious and inspired examination of the Mexican world than does Bryce's "American Commonwealth" in relation to the United States. In the whole range of literature on Mexico, only Alexander von Humboldt's "Political Essay on New Spain" can claim a similar position with respect to its time—the latter days of the Colonial period. Dr. Gruening's book surpasses both in its massing of facts, its scientific approach, its scope and greater emphasis upon racial and economic factors. It is a book for the student and the statesman, a mine of hitherto unrepresented information, an encyclopedia of the contemporary Mexican scene, enriched by copious quotation and anecdote, painted upon the broad canvas of historical origins and causes, written in an animated, modern, and occasionally brilliant style. Though it deals so extensively with the events of our day, with the revolutionary period since 1910, every statement is painstakingly documented; causes and antecedents are exhaustively traced, current prejudices—both of our own State Department and of Mexican officialdom—are avoided. The proportion of ephemeral material is exceedingly small. One wonders why such far-sighted scholars as Dr. Gruening have not been called upon by our Government to assist in the satisfactory solution of some of our thorny Latin-American problems.

Undoubtedly the most brilliant sections deal with the Indian heritage, the church, and politics (and jurisprudence). Gruening's most important chapters are those on the post-revolutionary efforts in education and public health. Heretofore, no adequate account of Mexico's "health dictatorship" has been presented anywhere. Gruening's medical training permits him to approach the theme scientifically and enthusiastically.

Above all, the portions on the church stand out as a masterpiece of research and presentation. The nobility and self-sacrifice of the early church fathers, the cumulative corruption of the established orders, the growing acquisitiveness of the clergy, the conflicts between the viceroys and the ecclesiastical authorities, the opposition of the church to independence and the Inquisition's attempt to thwart it, the ultimate seizure of the independence movement by the church for its own ends, the precipitation of the state-versus-Vatican conflicts involved in the overthrow of Emperor Iturbide, the splendor of the church in contrast to mass poverty, the great reform of Juarez, the church's abetting of intervention, the conflict between the church and its puppet Maximilian, the church and the revolution—these topics unfold concisely, brilliantly, colorfully, with a mass of supporting documentary material which only the most thoroughgoing devotion could have unearthed. To regret that Gruening did not give more space to the unceasing preliminary efforts of Gómez Farías in the struggle to separate church and state, is not criticism of this astonishingly adequate presentation of the religious problem. Even better is Gruening's analysis of the Mexican religion: his survey of the Indian elements conserved in the actual so-called Catholic faith, his account of the Indianization of the Catholic saints, the persistence of pagan rites, the survival of idolatry and superstition, the continued animus of the Indian gods of the Sun, the Chase, the Harvest, the abiding popular faith in miracles and bloody penitence. No better description anywhere of the deep-rooted duality of Mexican culture, as potent a factor in the church as in all other institutional activities. And where will be found as fearless and substantiated an account of the libertinism and corruption of present-day clergy? Here lies the key to the reason—which has so long puzzled many Americans—why the Mexican Government could so successfully maintain its position in a nation presumably 95 per cent Catholic.

The study of the church is paralleled in incisiveness and strength, though not in style, by Gruening's study of local and state politics. He makes an intimate survey of the politics of fourteen out of the twenty-eight states for a period of six years (1921-1927), a record taken almost entirely from the archives of the Secretariat of Interior and checked up by personal observation. The result is a terrific indictment of Mexican state political practices: a sordid picture of corruption, imposition, brutal injustice, military arrogance. In few states, indeed, is there any semblance of the working out in the so-called elections of any principles other than lust for gold and power. It is a somber picture which reveals that the Mexican revolution may ultimately be doomed and that no stable and enlightened regime can ever be established in Mexico until popular organization becomes sufficiently conscious and effective to limit the rapacious activities of the militarists and rulers.

Gruening traces the rise of some of these popular organizations, for instance the Mexican Regional Confederation of Labor (CROM). But if this is an encouraging picture, here, too, appear the age-old blots—greed, corruption, graft on the part of the leaders, the manipulation of strikes for personal advantage, the use of the organization for political purposes and job-holding, the crushing of independent organizations. It is to be regretted that he did not trace more closely the growth of the non-militarist peasant movement.

Less adequate, but nevertheless full of original material, is Gruening's consideration of the role of American capital in Mexico and his account of international relations. This section contains a damning analysis of Ambassador Henry Lane Wilson, his machinations in conjunction with the Díaz Científicos, and his efforts to undermine the Madero regime. Earlier international relations, however, should be supplemented by Rippey's "The United States and Mexico." Gruening's chapter on the Cultural Products of the Revolution is, because of lack of space, rather slight, and his Conclusion with its journalistic analysis of the Calles Cabinet might have been omitted.

But these matters occupy only a few scant pages. During

CARLETON BEALS

Cluttered Up with Progress

The New Exploration. By Benton MacKaye. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $3.

"MANKIND has cleared the jungle and replaced it with a labyrinth." Great explorers visited China, rounded the Cape of Good Hope, landed on a small island in the Americas and thought they were off the coast of India, sailed around the world, pushed up the Mississippi, sought the Northwest Passage, invaded equatorial Africa, and finally conquered the Poles. Only Everest still defies them. Behind them marched buccaneers, covered wagons, locomotives, steamboats, turbines, realtors, automobiles, telephones, and skyscrapers—except where it was too hot or too cold or too dry (this is not a joke), or too rocky. And a fine hash they made of the sparkling, clean, primeval lands the great explorers found.

As a net result, we are all cluttered up with progress. When we gaze with awe and admiration at a machine in the sky, another one rushes up from behind and knocks us unconscious. About two million persons were injured by automobiles last year. The bulk of the horse-power generated in a modern city goes to pumping people back and forth from "places where they would rather not live to places where they would rather not work." A reasonable guess would give a hot-dog stand for every man, woman, and child in the country, but just try and find a cozy, quiet, comfortable inn.

Mr. MacKaye is worried by the mess. As a good engineer he wants to do something about it; clean it up, untangle it, by-pass it, plan it. The new exploration is the attempt to find a way out of the labyrinth which the industrial revolution, with the most remarkable ingenuity, mind you, has been building ever since James Watt took a walk out to the golf house on a Sunday afternoon and suddenly hit upon the answer to the problem of a vacuum in the cylinder of a steam engine. Our author, bless him, presents us with no cooperative-credit colonies, new currency systems, old-age-pension levies, taxation schedules, land banks, or variations on the McNary-Haugen bill. Instead he shows how to plan cities so they will not develop elephantiasis; and countrysides, the filling-station rash.

There is a stiff peppering of philosophy with the diagrams. Mr. MacKaye is not only prepared to tell us how to keep out of subways, but why our souls demand a minimum of subways and a maximum of mountain tops. He has a chapter on the art of living, which, from a technical man, is as good as it is astonishing. Also he is a past master of definitions. I tried to find a page without a good thumping definition on it, but failed. I do not think there are any. The definitions are admirable, but what did God give us imaginations for? Morons will give Mr. MacKaye's book a wide berth, and thinking folk do not need quite so much blackboard and bell. A reviewer, not to be charged with venality, ought to have something to kick about, and this is all I can discover.

"The New Exploration" is the fresh, clearly blazed trail of the pioneer, running from Magalopolis to the mountains of the moon. It is replete with new conceptions, new images, new ways of looking at the problems which Watt bequeathed to us. Particularly illuminating is the parallel between the flow of rivers, the flow of goods, and the flow of people. It is not the cry of the back-to-nature prophet. Modern technology is accepted; the machine is regarded as something to be tamed, rather than banished. It is the first large-scale attempt that I have seen to plan an environment where genuine culture and recreation may flourish.

A Man of His Time

Zola and His Time. By Matthew Josephson. The Macaulay Company. $5.

THE greatest single merit, perhaps, of this thoroughly admirable biography is its impetuous galvanizing of a personality and an aesthetic which are at complete odds with our own time. The reason for the contemporary neglect of Zola lies very deep. It is not merely that it is difficult to know how to choose from amid the jungle of his productions; not merely that an inevitable reaction has taken place against his method; it is rather that his greatness shames and saddens us. His heroism and his failure were both of a glowing magnificence which makes the products of our own novelists look sickly and greenish. In short, we neglect him not because he was a bad writer (although that is the excuse we offer) but because his life and work make us uneasy.

What did Emile Zola believe? He believed that he could apply to the novel the methods of nineteenth-century experimental science. He believed that every great novelist must base his labor on a coherent philosophy, his to be discovered in Taine, Darwin, and Claude Bernard. He believed in the value of an exact observation of the details of life and in his ability to use this observation to represent final truth. In his later years he abandoned his theory of objectivity and, affirming that the truth could make us free, tried to make his art conduce to social betterment. He believed in democracy, in progress, in the beneficent functions of science, in socialism. He believed in everything at which the typical modern novelist smiles. And if there is anything Mr. Josephson's book makes clear, it is that the faith of Emile Zola, naive and "mistaken" as it was, had in it a grandeur and a power we shall never, in our smiling resignation, attain to.

Out of the innocent sociology and superstitious rationalism of the nineteenth century Zola drew mighty sustenance, an enormous energy which was to produce not merely the twelve hundred characters in the Rougon-Macquart series, but the glorious liberation from his rocky prison on Devil's Island of Alfred Dreyfus. Emile Zola fed on what we now term unrealities, but what works he produced, and how organic and logical a life those unrealities enabled him to live! Today, being much too wise, we are not taken in by them, and our novels are bloodless, our energy trickles thinly, and our lives are broken, tentative, and literary. That is why, if we laugh at the fussy, humorless, bespectacled little fat bourgeois who was Emile Zola, we do so with a rueful bitterness. It is not Zola who symbolizes the failure of the nineteenth century; it is we who are that very failure.

What Mr. Josephson does, then, is to bring back to overflowing life a personality seemingly antithetic to our own times. He does this by virtue of a vitality, an enthusiasm, and a humane scholarship that are almost beyond praise. His book is a glorious relief, being entirely free from the brittle debunking note of modern biography, its complacent "detachment," its pseudo-artistic fictional rearrangement. Mr. Josephson writes with a large, engaging sweep. He is not interested in a neat theory but in following the broad current of a tempestuous life. He has plenty of time for side-excursions, for graphic portraits of Zola's friends and enemies, Manet, Cézanne, Flaubert, Renoir, the Goncourts, Gambetta, Clemenceau, George Moore. When the time comes to discuss the Dreyfus affair he gives us no neat and frigid telescoped account, no picayune ironies, but an energetic narrative that requires three breathless chapters. Mr. Josephson's literary criticism is no less vital and humane. He has no patience with the academic modernist who would pigeonhole Zola as a naturalist, but makes us perceive how fundamental was the romantic and poetic strain in the author of "Germinal." He destroys, too, that other myth, the allegation that Zola wrote badly.

And yet, despite his sympathy with his subject, he is none the less careful to suggest constantly Zola's great limitation. This limitation was not merely aesthetic or intellectual in the narrower sense; it was the very thing that made him a really great force, just as it prevented him from being a really great man. Cézanne was misunderstood and forgotten while his boyhood friend conquered two continents and moved a nation to frenzy; but Cézanne was a man who lived in many centuries at once and so could understand the basic weakness in one who seemed destined for immortality. When others spoke ill of him, he remarked, very quietly: "Zola was not a bad man; he simply lived entirely under the influence of his time." "He lived entirely under the influence of his time"—the phrase is an exquisite distillation of the magnificence and the failure of the life and works of Emile Zola.

War Itself

Squad. By James B. Wharton. Coward-McCann. $2.

SURELY you remember that saddest of nursery rhymes which tells how ten little niggers, one after the other, were overtaken by a terrible fate. Ten little niggers . . . and then there were nine. Nine little niggers . . . and then there were eight. And so on until at last there is but one little nigger and presently he has gone "and then there were none."

It is upon this simple yet effective design that Mr. Wharton has built his epic of a squad. There are eight men in a squad. There are eight parts to this novel, and at the end of each part there is one man less. On the last page the war is over and only Gray from Center High School, Columbus, Ohio, is left of the original squad. He is cleaning up odds and ends of abandoned German equipment—potato mashers, helmets, old clothes. His foot comes down on something hard, he "sees fire, is aware of a roar, of intense heat . . . feels lifted into the air . . . flying through space . . . distended like a frog over a pool . . ." and then of the squad "there is none."

Without plot, without a central hero, without a romantic—or even unromantic—"goal" for which the characters strive, the story is still far from shapeless. It has a fine sense of design and proportion which gives it the weight of unescapable tragedy, inevitable doom, such as one associates more with the great dramatists of the past than with a realistic novel of the war. Part of the emotional power the book undoubtedly has is due to the fact that the reader guesses almost from the beginning that not one of these eight men will escape destruction, yet they themselves are utterly unconscious of their fate. They talk and talk and talk. They complain of their food, their packs, and their feet. They make jokes without end. They swear prodigiously and continually. They eat, drink, march, and sleep. And, yes, they fight; for this is the story of the front line. Not once do they seem conscious that man after man they are to follow each other to cruel and heart-breaking ends. It is this innocence that makes them so piteous and memorable.

However, one might read this book through quite as unaware as the men of the squad that the villain is fate and that the hero is, in a sense, all privates of all armies in all time. One might see in it only a glorious protracted conversation (for all that is not conversation is subordinated to little more than stage directions) and still get a tremendous thrill from it. To thousands of men the accent of that trivial, tragic, endless talk will bring back the very sights and smells of the war.

Among all the novels which the war has brought forth it is hard to think of any more poignantly realistic. Here, one feels, is no mere story; here is war itself. It is thus and thus that men, usually very simple men, lived and, if they had bad luck, died. Both as a record and as a literary work "Squad" is important. As reporter and as artist Mr. Wharton has with one book gained a distinguished position.

Books in Brief

Sails and Swords. Being the Golden Adventures of Balboa and His Intrepid Company, Freebooters All, Discoverers of the Pacific. By Arthur Strawn. Brentano's. $3.50.

Even the greatest adventure rarely ends in a great climax. There is no clearly discernible supreme moment or, worse still, it has been sapped of its savor by the delay and disillusion that have gone before. A shining exception is the discovery of the Pacific, for certainly it was a great moment of history when Vasco Núñez de Balboa, having fought his way through the jungle, left his companions behind and, like Moses ascending Sinai, climbed alone that peak in Darien and looked out over el Mar del Sur. Balboa had come to Darien from Santo Domingo as a stowaway, had risen to leadership by his personality, and finally had been led to press westward through the land that he believed to be India by native tales of a great sea beyond—and much gold. Stephen Graham, who followed the trail of Balboa 400 years later, wrote in his "In Quest of El Dorado": "Wings came out from my heels and I stood on tiptoe and stared." Imagine, then, the sensations of the first white man to behold that scene! Arthur Strawn has told the story dramatically, picturesquely, yet with dignity and apparently only after a careful study of all historical sources. And what a story it is!

Raiders of the Deep. By Lowell Thomas. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $2.50.

Mr. Thomas has collected in this volume many stories of the U-boat warfare of the Germans gleaned from the lips of surviving officers. It contains, therefore, first-class historical material, especially as he has checked the German narratives wherever possible by information from Allied sources, chiefly British. Thus we have the inside story of Weddigen's sinking of the Hogue, Aboukir, and Cressy, and of Schwieger's destruction of the Lusitania. As to the latter, Mr. Thomas shows that Schwieger was not instructed to sink the Lusitania, that his meeting with that vessel was purely accidental, and that he fired only one torpedo. The second explosion was undoubtedly an internal one. In every narrative the kind treatment accorded to prisoners by the Germans is stressed by Mr. Thomas; there is no trace of any outrages, except the terrible and fundamental one of sinking passenger ships without warning—which every nation will do in the next war. Mr. Thomas has rendered a genuine service by collecting these narratives—especially that of the cruise of one of the six boats assigned to attack the American coast—while the witnesses were still available.

The Discoverer: Christopher Columbus. By André de Hevesy. Translated from the French by Robert M. Coates. The Macaulay Company. $3.

M. de Hevesy ought really to be severely disciplined—he has audaciously defied the chief canons of contemporary debunking, smart-Aleck biography. Doesn't he realize that there are no heroes nowadays, that there never were any, and that his principal job, therefore, is to reduce epic figures to their proper pygmy size? Doesn't he know that he ought to have at least one wisecrack on every page? Doesn't he understand that biography should rightly devote a large proportion of its contents to scandal? In short, how dare he write a sober, unbiased, non-fictional account of a preposterous rogue and cheat whom he even admires a little?

scandal; Franklin's genial humanity rightly seems far more important to Mr. Steell than his sexual peccadilloes.

The Not-Quite Puritans. By Henry W. Lawrence. Little, Brown and Company. $3.

A diverting account of the "lighter and less pious sides" of our ancestors. Dr. Lawrence has compiled a vast array of Puritanic peccadilloes which he chronicles with a perhaps too obvious relish, but he amply proves his point: all our contemporary excesses (our bootleggers, petting parties, extravagance in dress, and so on) were distressingly prevalent in the good old days. If someone would do a good deed, let him send this book as a Christmas present to John Roach Straton.

Forgotten Ladies. By Richardson Wright. J. B. Lippincott and Company. $5.

Fascinating material about American women from the days of the Indian frontier to the Civil War, women who, indeed, do not deserve to be forgotten. But although Mr. Wright deserves much credit for unearthing them, he has been so literary, so involved, so relentlessly witty in dealing with them that they are in danger of sinking back to an ill-merited oblivion.

The Lost Sail. A Cape Cod Diary. By Alfred Kreymborg. Coward, McCann. $2.

As he confesses in his Praeludium, Mr. Kreymborg has broken faith with himself and written another sonnet—in fact, a whole diary of sonnets. The book is casual, intimate, personal. One feels that Mr. Kreymborg was right in suspecting that the sonnet form is unsuited to such material. An accomplished vers librist, he finds writing sonnets very easy and relaxing; too easy. Remembering Kreymborg's considerable resources of irony and wit, one is inclined to urge that he stop being "mellow" and practice again the mental and verbal acrobatics which best exhibit his talent.

Yet Do Not Grieve. By Conal O'Riordan. Scribner's. $2.50.

This is a slow-moving story which suggests at times that the author is dragging the weight of his historical accuracy. But the accuracy is there in the spirit as well as in the substance. The whole may give the effect of a "command" artistic performance, such as is commonly seen in European guild-halls, but the delicacy of Conal O'Riordan's character sense and the vigor of his descriptive faculty insure more than a passing glance from the discriminating. The setting is the era of Napoleon. We see Irish Catholic peers guarding the privacy of their domestic refinement under the penal laws with an affectation of a peasant exterior. We see their son fighting for an English king who must refuse him entree to his court because of his religion. We see their grandson, educated in England partly because of poverty and partly because of a clash of principles, leading his men against the French at Waterloo. O'Riordan's battlefield makes a memorable picture. David Tyrconnel Quinn is the leading character, half English, half Irish, half Catholic, half Quaker. He is one of a notable gallery of portraits, of which his father is another.

The Search Relentless. By Constance Lindsay Skinner. Coward, McCann. $2.

The theme of this romantic yarn started to be the relentless search of the individual for the one perfect mate. It met and merged with the search of a member of the Canadian constabulary for the murderer of a white prospector found dead in a little cabin on the edge of an Indian settlement in the Northwest. Adventures of the body—gun fights in the snow-covered wilderness, intrigues in gambling dens—were added to adventures of rather faintly indicated souls. The result is a typical Wild West thriller of the sort long familiar to us in the movies, its movement made a little slow at times by Mrs. Skinner's desire to make us see and hear the country she loves.

Fiction Shorts

Ryder. By Djuna Barnes. Horace Liveright. $3.

"Ryder" is a remarkable and ingenious olla podrida, harking back, in its style and its outspoken quality, to Sterne and Fielding, though these are only two of the writers parodied. The central figure is conceived too much in the stock Cabell manner to be very amusing, but the two wives are richly eighteenth century. The jacket states that the book is written in "the great picaresque tradition." This is true as far as its vigorous masculine coarseness is concerned; but it fails of the true picaresque quality in that the scenes and characters and dialogue are not tied down to one definite homely locality, as in "Don Quixote." They are abstracted so that in the end the impression given is of an allegory, which is in a sense the very antithesis of the picaresque novel. However, the particular name one gives to the form of "Ryder" is not half so important as the fact that it is a witty and original book, fat with rich phrasing and written with an almost too facile brilliance.

The Women at the Pump. By Knut Hamsun. Translated by Arthur G. Chater. Alfred A. Knopf. $3.

Here is a long, thoroughly formless and easy-going novel, compounded entirely of village gossip, the talk of the women at the pump in a tiny Norwegian port. The flow of the narrative is so quiet and the abstention from profound themes so obvious that one is likely to overlook certain beautiful qualities in this book. In the first place, it will reveal to those who know Hamsun only through "Growth of the Soil" and "Hunger" an aspect of his genius that is too little appreciated—his humor, which is as broad and pervasive as it is quiet. Allied to his humor is his wonderful gift of observing simple and even mean people from a point of view which is at once ironical and sympathetic. How he manages to convey this double feeling I, for one, cannot make out: it seems to be connected with his peculiar style. The prose is finely rendered by Arthur G. Chater.

The Assassin. By Liam O'Flaherty. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.50.

A hard, tight psychological melodrama that aims to analyze the idea of political assassination. The central figure, Michael McDara, with his fierce nihilism, his strange fanatic idealism, and his equally strange ability to concoct and carry through a difficult and complex murder, is amazingly well conceived. The subordinate characters, particularly the heroine, are less clearly drawn. The story suffers from an almost unavoidable difficulty: after the murder has been committed the reader's interest drops and the plot appears to peter out. A book depending as much as "The Assassin" does on the simple emotion of suspense should not situate its climax very far from the last page. "The Assassin" gives renewed proof of the almost savage abandonment by modern Irish writers of the twilight school of literature. The era of William Butler Yeats and Lady Gregory will never return.

Mist. By Miguel de Unamuno. Translated from the Spanish by Warner Fite. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

The first of Señor Unamuno's works of pure imagination to appear in English is more an ironic exercise in dialectic than a novel. The central character is designedly rendered vague and elusive so as to offer Señor Unamuno an opportunity for some ingenious reflections on the world of illusion and the world of reality. Here one's memory harks back to Pirandello. A slight work in itself, "Mist" is interesting for the insight it gives into the curious hard and biting quality of modern Spanish humor, which is never satiric and yet never good-natured in the English manner. ## Music

Strauss in Philadelphia and New York

RICHARD STRAUSS, the transcendent lyricist of the earlier tone poems and "Rosenkavalier," strives in "Ariadne auf Naxos" to unite a vein of fantastic opéra bouffe with the sweep and glow of his more youthful style. In "Ariadne" he is constantly interrupting his own inspiration to strut just a bit as becomes a clever showman, and thus Strauss the Charlatan takes precedence over Strauss the Poet.

This double role is no doubt caused in part by the exigencies of the text, for Hugo von Hofmannsthal has provided an enigmatically paradoxical libretto, full of involved situations and the most subtle and biting irony. First written as an adaptation of Molière's "Bourgeois Gentilhomme," the play was later recast in Viennese setting. The structure involves a play within a play, and this element proves both the strength and weakness of the production. Great deftness and lightness of touch are demanded by such treatment and the action, it must be admitted, crawls along pretty ponderously at times.

A wealthy Viennese parvenu, according to the Hofmannsthal version, has invited his friends to hear "Ariadne auf Naxos," the work of a young protégé-composer. In order to satisfy diverse tastes and preferences the evening's entertainment is likewise to include an act of clownish song and dance led by the soubrette, Zerbinetta. On the eve of the fête, as the stage is being set for the opera, sudden and dire consternation is spread abroad by the Major Domo's announcement that by special command of his master both troupes must give their performances simultaneously and at once. The efforts of soubrette and disgruntled composer to combine their opposing "shows" conclude the prologue.

The play itself now follows, largely based on certain well-known pages in Greek mythology which tell of the lamentations of Ariadne, deserted by Theseus on desolate Naxos, and there consoled and translated to realms of joy by the god Bacchus. This apparently slight fabric of plot is variegated by gyrations, vocal and otherwise, of Zerbinetta and her motley crew, and therefrom we are expected to deduce many symbolic shades and meanings. With a mating of such divergent elements, however, we are relentlessly flung from the idealism and grand manner of the classic style to the whimsicalities of the Commedia dell'arte, and small wonder it is that Strauss, with all his vainglorious sangfroid, occasionally has to turn showman to fit in the squares of the mosaic.

And what of the music itself? We find in "Ariadne auf Naxos" the same superlative craftsmanship, the same unerring orchestral intuition which have become hallmarks of Strauss's style. But the hinges creak a bit now and then, and there is conspicuously absent that supreme felicity of touch which makes of "Till Eulenspiegel" an epitome of delightful wit and satire. Indeed, in the passages of pure comedy such as Zerbinetta's coloratura skylarkings in Act II the vein of playfulness and diablerie is often far from spontaneous. On the other hand, in the setting of the classic outlines of the story, Strauss has achieved results of singular distinction. With a small orchestra of thirty-seven pieces, he has woven a score of constantly changing beauty and has given to his line of sustained melody a degree of plastic grace that sets "Ariadne" apart from all his other works. He leans a bit heavily on Wagner occasionally, and there are moments when the honeyed sophistication of his idiom becomes a bit thick-scented; but these are not serious defects for the reason that Strauss uses them to the advantage of his orchestral picture.

Of the production itself there can be little but praise. The Philadelphia Civic Opera Company is to be highly commended for undertaking a work of so many inherent difficulties, both of ensemble and execution. With the exception of Zerbinetta, the parts were well cast and the whole performance overflowed with zest and enthusiasm. Perhaps our own Metropolitan might take a leaf out of the Philadelphia Opera Company's book and interest itself in the more frequent introduction of operas which are new to our public and make an intimate rather than a spectacular appeal.

In "Die Egyptische Helena," recently produced with regal splendor at the Metropolitan, we find not the apotheosis of the Straussian style, as was true of his progenitor, Wagner's, final efforts, but rather a general sinking into a state of quasi-decadence. He is still Strauss, the mighty virtuoso of the orchestra, the molder of tremendous tonal structures, but the music itself is heavy-souled and empty of high inspiration. Indeed, he borrows many musical gestures from his own earlier works and from other sources as well. All this may be due, of course, to advancing years. (It is now seventeen years since the first production of "Ariadne auf Naxos.")

Certain it is, however, that Hugo von Hofmannsthal has provided him with as ramshackle and un-Greek a libretto as may be imagined. The luminous Helen of legend has been allowed to become involved in a mass of tiresome and banal artificialities, with magic potions galore, superfluous lovers, and all the paraphernalia that composers since Wagner's time have happily thrown into the discard. Beyond failing absolutely to catch the magic and glamor that have lingered through the ages about the name of Helen, the libretto is lacking in consistency and coherence. It would have been wiser had von Hofmannsthal stuck to the main outlines of the Euripides version, which develops the idea of the two Helens, phantom and real, with such puissant artistry—but modernity must be attained even at the cost of trying to improve on Greek models.

Despite these glaring defects in his text, Strauss has succeeded in giving substance and dramatic import to his setting; indeed his perfect instinct for tonal portrayal of the heart and essence of a dramatic mood never seemed keener and more unflagging than in this opera. As examples of this rare power let us note the orchestral pause following the first entrance of Helen and Menelaus, the description of the wreck and storm, and not least of all the bitter-sweet notes of the celesta which accompany Hermione's entrance and reunion with her father and mother. In truth, Strauss has done all that he could to make good theater of this rather futile libretto without being able apparently to clothe his inspiration in robes of greatness.

Drama

Reinhardt's "Redemption"

THE more ambitious and ingenious producers sometimes suffer from an ailment (very common among actors) which manifests itself in a tendency to consider their own activities more important than those of the playwright and to treat his script as though it were only a pretext for the display of their virtuosity. Max Reinhardt, whom someone is always having "the distinguished honor of presenting," has received an amount of adulation sufficient to turn anyone's head and he has not always resisted the temptation to indulge a prima donna's gesture—to invite one of those appreciative Ah's by which audiences reveal the fact that their illusion has been broken sufficiently to make them feel the duty of recognizing some stunt calling violent attention to its own cleverness. Both his "Midsummer-Night's Dream" and his "Danton's Death" (seen here last year) were marred in this fashion, but for the limited engagement of his company at the Ambassador this season either chance or wisdom has selected Tolstoi's "Redemption," which seems to me quite the finest of his productions that I have had the opportunity to see either in New York or elsewhere.

Here is a play which invites no riotous indulgence in spectacle, which, except for the one splash of color contributed by the gipsy singers in the second scene, is sober in atmosphere, but which is, on the other hand, marked by innumerable little touches of character contributed by the genius of the author who had a delicacy as great as his strength. In producing it, Reinhardt takes advantage of every legitimate occasion for visual effects. He loves, for instance, to place his characters in a spot of brilliant light in the midst of a stage whose confines are all but lost in the darkness; and he finds a perfectly justifiable occasion for the introduction of one of his favorite devices when the informer, whose presence has been hinted to the audience by the glow of his cigarette, steps out of the shadow into that pool of light which seems to represent both a corner in a grog-shop and the circle of Fedya's awareness. But he never obtrudes himself in any fashion calculated to distract the attention by the introduction of effects irrelevant to the play itself. He seems to have for it a respect which he did not demonstrate in, for instance, the case of "Midsummer-Night's Dream," and to feel that he has done enough if he has made as effective as possible all the values latent in Tolstoi's text.

Alexander Moissi, whose appearance is stressed in the announcements of this engagement, is an excellent romantic actor who depends not a little upon temperament and who has, if the truth must be told, a touch of the matinee idol in his make-up. He has, however, received the benefits of a thorough German training and he makes an excellent Fedya in part because of those very touches of a slightly morbid egotism which mar his performance in straight heroic roles, but which seem part of the character of the romantic weakling whom Tolstoi drew. Fedya is, of course, not a wicked man. His cry "I have not done anything bad" is in one sense true, since the desire which led him from the quiet loveliness of his wife to the music of the gipsies was the thirst for that wild beauty of which the gipsies themselves seemed to have caught some glimpse. But the Tolstoi who created him was the Tolstoi who was soon to turn ascetic, the Tolstoi who feared that beauty more than anything else because it seemed not bad but beautiful, and who, therefore, made Fedya a weakling too egotistical to perceive that evil may be done without willing it, and that the cult of self is, in the eyes of his creator, the source of all unhappiness. Moissi may or may not proceed from an intellectual understanding of this fact, but he has the temperament to comprehend the character he is portraying, and all the little gestures of romantic self-pity which he indulges belong to the role itself. Considered as pure acting, no scene of his is, to my mind, as good as that carried off with well-nigh perfect art by Johanna Terwin as Anna, the mother of Victor Karenin; but in the theater it is temperament that usually wins the large type on the program and one must consider oneself lucky to discover a "star" like Moissi who has at least permitted himself to learn something instead of running riot as temperamental actors are generally permitted to do in America.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

If one had the foresight to go home at the end of the second act of "Tonight at Twelve" (Hudson Theater), he would carry away the impression of an amusing and adroit comedy. But the pleasurable curiosity with which one returns to his seat for the third act oozes away in the face of Owen Davis's preposterous solution and final curtain of sheer farce. Still there are laughs a plenty throughout, and the cast is consistently good—especially Owen Davis, Jr., as an awkward but ingratiating young swain.

EVEN A POLITICIAN ought to be willing to take his own medicine. So, although we can view the discomfiture of Representative Britten without poignant regret, we have still less sympathy for the dilemma of Secretary Kellogg. Fired with the idea of direct action, Mr. Britten, who is chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs of the House of Representatives, suggested to Premier Baldwin a pow-wow between committees of the British House of Commons and our House to do something about disarmament. Heaven knows somebody ought to do something about it, but Mr. Britten was more than a little rash to go over the head of the State Department, leave out our own Senate, and neglect even to get the consent of the House before going ahead with his project. What Premier Baldwin thought, we don't know. We don't even know what he said. He sent a polite acknowledgment to Mr. Britten, but when the official reply was presented to Mr. Kellogg by the British Ambassador our august Secretary of State refused to receive it. But did he realize, we wonder, that it was a dose of his own drug—Kellogg's Matchless Compound for International Relations? Did our Secretary of State reflect that he had set an example in the usurpation of authority by waging a war in Nicaragua without the consent of Congress?

IN SPITE OF A VIGOROUS and intelligent campaign, Norman Thomas apparently polled only 300,000 votes in the Presidential election. Returns made to the National Headquarters of the Socialist Party up to December 4 indicated a vote of 179,800 in nineteen States. In these same States in 1920 Debs polled 554,200 votes, about three times the Thomas vote. If the same proportion holds good in States not yet heard from, Mr. Thomas will fall just short of a 300,000 total. The Socialist Party made its best showing in New York where, in spite of the popularity of Governor Smith, Mr. Thomas polled over 100,000 votes. In Wisconsin the great majority of the Socialist voters flocked to Governor Smith on the Wet issue, giving Mr. Thomas only 18,000 in the returns. Victor L. Berger, who has been elected to Congress from Milwaukee seven times, increased his vote by 16,000 but was beaten by a margin of 300. After twenty-eight years of struggle the Socialist Party cannot extract much cheer from these results. Its vote was the smallest Socialist vote cast in any election since 1900 and less than one-third of the record Socialist vote of 920,000 for Debs in 1920. Many extenuating circumstances help to explain the disappointing showing. The Socialist Party partially surrendered its own organization to support La Follette in 1924 and the work of building anew from the bottom presented great difficulties. Governor Smith's clear margin of progressiveness over Herbert Hoover lured the great majority of the La Follette vote. But when all is said and done we see no reason for the poor showing of the ablest candidate whom the Socialist Party has ever presented except the stupidity and conservatism of the voters.

GOVERNOR ALVAN T. FULLER made an address the other day in Boston to the heads of the State departments. It was his valedictory, for Governor Fuller retires on January 1 after a term of office whose importance in history will be due largely to a certain event which occurred at Charlestown prison on the night of August 23, 1927. He said in part:

The greatest danger that confronts us in Massachusetts, in my humble opinion, is the result of avarice on the part of our "best people" who want something more than they are really entitled to. I think in the last analysis, provided the matter was discussed without the heat of controversy, as public officials we must not expect those who would have special privileges to realize that they are doing that very thing which will be used as material by their opponents. . . . I have been discouraged to find that those people who throw out their chest the furthest as our leading citizens, somehow or other in private are not quite as uniformly patriotic and disinterested as one might expect when listening to their Fourth of July speeches.

This is a mild attack but none the less an attack upon the "best people." It was the "best people" who killed Sacco and Vanzetti. As years go on—years of private life away from the controversy and pride that official life generates—is it possible that "consciousness of guilt" will make a liberal out of Governor Fuller?

THE FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION filed its case against the Electric Bond and Share Company on December 1, asking the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York to order the company to open its operating-expenses ledger to the commission's examiners and to require its officials to answer questions concerning expenditures for propaganda against government ownership and its financial arrangements with subsidiary and affiliated companies. The case tests the commission's power to inquire into the activities of individual companies as distinct from their associated activities. The connection between rates and the expenditures for political and propaganda purposes is clearly set forth in the Federal Trade Commission's petition. Pointing out that rates are established to insure a net profit above operating expenses, the petition says:

The profits of the Electric Bond and Share Company depend in part upon whether it uses its fees or commissions for service above its expenses, including disbursements, if any, "to influence or control public opinion on account of municipal or public ownership of the means by which power is developed and electrical energy is generated and distributed, or since 1923 to influence or control elections" of President, Vice-President, and members of the United States Senate. The existence of such expenditures would necessarily increase the charges made by the company for its services in order to make the same profit. Such charges to its clients, the holding and operating companies, are logically reflected in the rates collected by the operating companies in order to earn a profit.

The electrical industry is construing the election of Herbert Hoover as a "vindication" of its practices. But is the electrical industry willing to have the "glass pockets" which Mr. Hoover said big business should have? Not unless the court so orders, it appears.

THE GERMAN GOVERNMENT won a temporary victory of great importance when the five-weeks' lockout of 250,000 metal workers in the Ruhr ended on December 3. Nominally the fight in the Ruhr was between employers and labor unions, but the real conflict was between the Government and certain great capitalists who had defied it. Since 1923 German industry has operated under a species of compulsory arbitration, with a tripartite arbitration board in each district including two representatives of the employers and workers involved and a chairman representing the Government. The decisions of these arbitration boards have not been legally binding but they could be made binding by ukase of the Reich Minister of Labor. In the particular dispute between metal workers and employers in the Ruhr the district arbitration board decreed an increase in wages and the Reich Minister of Labor made it legally binding. Whereupon the great capitalists refused to obey the Government, locked out their workers, and carried their case against the arbitration award to the courts. A grave crisis ensued, almost as grave as that of the British general strike. The employers finally compromised and opened their shops with the understanding that both sides would accept as binding a decision of the wage question to be made after fresh investigation by Dr. Severing, Minister of the Interior. The employers' decision to yield was partially due to the unquestioned public sympathy for the locked-out men and the vote of a $5,000,000 relief fund for the workers by the Reichstag. Meanwhile the employers have set an ugly precedent in defying the Government without being adequately punished. The workers may turn the precedent back upon the employers when another struggle arises between them.

WITHIN RECENT WEEKS portentous events have taken place in South Africa, where five-and-one-half million natives, who have no vote except in Cape Colony and are barred from Parliament because of their color, are dependent for their rights on one-and-one-half-million white Europeans. In the first days of November Mr. Madeley, Minister of Posts and Telegraphs in the Cabinet headed by General Hertzog, Nationalist, received a deputation from the Industrial and Commercial Workers' Union, a native organization, to discuss working conditions and wages in his department. General Hertzog requested that Mr. Madeley resign because his action in receiving the native deputation was contrary to the pure-white policy of the government. Mr. Madeley, who belongs to the left wing of the Labor Party, refused. Thereupon General Hertzog himself resigned and re-formed his Cabinet, neatly dropping Mr. Madeley and appointing in his place Mr. Sampson, who adheres, along with Mr. Creswell and Mr. Boyde, the other Labor members of the Cabinet, to the white policy of the party. General Hertzog tried to befog the issue by saying the I. C. W. U. was not a trade union but a "political organization with members recruited from every walk of life." Mr. Tielman Roos, Nationalist and Minister of Justice, was more frank. "We cannot possibly have any truck or sympathy," said he, "for the I. C. W. U. movement," adding that in all parties "there is a feeling that a more powerful weapon should be created to save South Africa from the native menace." The incident is the culmination of a conflict in the Cabinet which has been going on for several months. This conflict is the reflection in the Cabinet of the split in the Labor Party, with Mr. Creswell and Mr. Boyde on one side and Mr. Madeley on the other. The Labor Party in South Africa has not been a Labor Party in the real sense of the word. Its founder, Mr. Creswell, then a mine manager, first attracted attention when he proposed to work his mines with white labor.

THE LABOR PARTY is more white than labor, except for the inroads which such men as Mr. Madeley and their followers have made into it. It is significant that the deputation which Mr. Madeley received was headed by representatives of the South African Trades Union Congress. Two years ago this body refused to have anything to do with the native union. Sometime later, through the efforts of Europe of Mr. Kadalie, its leader, the Workers' Union was recognized by several international labor bodies and by the British Trades Union Congress. A year ago the Workers' Union applied for affiliation with the South African Trades Union Congress and was refused for the given reason that as the native union claimed 100,000 members, it could not vote all the other unions put together, which number only 20,000; but at that time a movement was started not toward amalgamation but toward cooperation between the two bodies. Since then, largely through the efforts of W. F. Andrews of the South African Trades Union Congress, this policy of coordination has been developed by means of meetings for consultation on matters of common interest. The latest of these took place on August 30, this year, when at a joint meeting of the National Executive Council of the Trades Union Congress and the executive of the Workers' Union discussions were held on several subjects important to both organizations—including "ways and means whereby the I. C. W. U. can be assisted in its trade-union activities by the S. A. T. U. C. and vice versa"; and methods for ining "the S. A. T. U. C.'s active assistance in formulating demands for better wages and conditions" The deputation Mr. Madeley, including as it did members of both black and white organizations, may mark a step toward a real labor party in South Africa, regardless of color.

THE SNOWS OF YESTERYEAR did not fall faster than does the Soviet Government—in the news columns of the New York World. So far other newspapers do not seem to have taken cognizance of the disaster and the editorial writers of the World seem equally oblivious, which encourages one to think that these gentlemen are like the proprietor of the restaurant who had just stepped out for dinner. A couple of weeks ago the World headlines ran "Soviet Terrors, Europe Hears; Peasants Rise"; subheads announced "Government Set Up 11 Years Ago by Lenin and Trotsky Facing Revolution." A few days later the World added for good measure: "16 Districts Join Ukraine Revolt—Anti-Communist Uprising Centers Around Charkoff." Both of these reports emanated from Paris; there was no confirmation of them either in the World or in any other paper. Reliable observers just back from the Soviet Republic—even from the Ukraine—report that the Soviet Government is as strongly entrenched as it ever was. There are many grave problems in Russia that must be solved by men inexperienced in government—problems of population, of the rehabilitation of industry, of foreign versus home capital, of the peasant versus the proletarian. But these problems are not nearer solution as a result of misguided and misleading reports in ordinarily sensible newspapers. Nor is it to the credit of the American workingman—or such workingmen as are represented by the American Federation of Labor—that a reference to the great services to education of the eminent philosopher and educator John Dewey was struck from the records of the A. F. of L. because Mr. Dewey has expressed himself as not in favor of the immediate destruction of the Bolshevik government but is, on the contrary, interested in and an admirer of phases of the experiment.

NEVERTHELESS WE FORGIVE the World its Russian news because of an item which appeared the day after Thanksgiving in that newspaper which we—in defiance of the law of libel—believe to be completely false. It can't be true—yet it ought to be. For solemnly and with all the earmarks of an authoritative statement comes the news that a baby has just been born in Knoxville, Tennessee, with a tail even inches long! Shades of the Scopes trial! Was it or was it not in Tennessee that learned lawyers in a court of law proved to the satisfaction of a judge, a jury, and the majority of their neighbors that the theory of evolution was base libel on man, that to teach it in the State of Tennessee was unlawful, that teachers who did so would be deprived of their jobs? We are familiar enough with stories of disaster that followed hard upon the heels of blasphemy; the God of Hosts has not scrupled to pursue with fire, pestilence, and sudden death those who dared to defy the lightning. But this is the first time that Darwin's ghost has been sufficiently interested to attach a tail to a human infant. We are told that Dr. Adolph P. Schultz, associate professor of anthropology at Johns Hopkins University, is eagerly awaiting a sight of the tail, which a thoughtful surgeon immediately removed from the too generously endowed infant and sent to him. It would take the combined testimony of Dr.

Schultz, the unnamed surgeon, and the baby himself to convince us that the tail, if any, was really attached to the baby. Nevertheless, if there was no tail, there is certainly the finger of fate—and the anti-evolutionists had better watch out for the direction of its pointing!

THE SPORTING WRITERS are choosing the all-American football team of 1928, but nineteen men who trod the gridiron this year are not eligible, for they were killed this season while playing the game. We could pass over the death of these men as an incidental misfortune if it were not for the fact that scores of other young men have been killed in the same way in recent years. (Seventeen players were killed last year and twenty in 1925.) An analysis of the circumstances under which the nineteen players were killed this season shows that most of the deaths resulted from injuries due to tackling and collision, the commonest cause of death being a broken neck. Most of the victims of the game died on the altar of senseless tradition, the tradition that mass collision and physical stoppage are necessary to make football exciting. In basketball and soccer the ball is the object of attack and defense; in American football the human body must bear the brunt. We believe that football as played in the United States is not only unnecessarily dangerous but is a third-rate game to watch. In soccer the spectator can see and appreciate every play because the ball is in the open; in American football half of the plays present the spectacle of a mass of tangled bodies. Perhaps fifty years from now, when the beauty and skill of open football are duly appreciated, our present game will seem as crude and brutal as a Roman gladiatorial combat seems today.

CHARLES FLETCHER LUMMIS, a valued contributor to The Nation, reached the end of a varied and useful career on November 25 at Los Angeles, California. Born at Lynn, Massachusetts, on March 1, 1859, he attended Harvard for a brief period, and then went into journalism in Ohio. He set out from Cincinnati for the Pacific coast in 1884, walking the entire distance to Los Angeles, a result of which was his "A Tramp Across the Continent" (1892). Here he resumed newspaper work, being city editor of the Times in 1885-1887. But the appeal of the primitive was so strong to him that he returned to New Mexico, which had attracted him while on his long tramp, and lived at the Tigua Indian pueblo of Isleta on the Rio Grande for five years. From this center he made extended excursions through the Southwest with his camera, and pictured and recorded everything that met his fancy, especially subjects of an ethnological and archaeological nature. His books on the subject have been widely read. Ever acknowledging the influence of the ripe scholarship and delightful companionship of the late Adolphe F. Bandelier, whom he first met in New Mexico, Mr. Lummis wrote his excellent "Spanish Pioneers," which passed through many editions and was translated and published in Spanish (Madrid, 1915); and later, as a product of his association with Mr. Bandelier on the Henry Villard expedition in Peru and Bolivia, he wrote "The Gold Fish of Gran Chimú." Mr. Lummis founded the Landmarks Club, which has preserved three of California's early Spanish missions; the Sequoia League "to make better Indians"; and the Southwest Museum at Los Angeles. In his later years he recorded phonographically hundreds of Spanish songs of the Southwest, two collections of which have been published (1923, 1926).

A Swan Song for Lame Ducks

ON December 4 a tight-mouthed, dry Yankee gave his legislative valedictory to the second session of the Seventieth Congress. Dull and solid, it reflected the philosophy of a party and the character of a man, a man who rose to the Presidency by virtue of an untrue newspaper account of a police strike and the bad digestion of his superior, and who became a political myth with benefit of the great, conservative newspapers. Observers did not expect the present session to be a model of progressive legislation, but whatever chance it had of progressive accomplishment has been lessened by the President's message. There he stands between the progressives in Congress and the great business interests he protects. He has been denounced as timid and vacillating, but in every section of his last message is the grim determination to protect the "American system" of private enterprise from the attack of the Congressional minority which believes in social control. He puts himself squarely on record against government operation of Muscle Shoals and Boulder Dam for power purposes; he advocates the cruiser bill in one breath and the Kellogg pact in the next; he throws a sop to the farmers in the form of a recommendation for a revolving loan-fund for cooperative marketing. But the real heart of his message is contained in the first sentence: "No Congress of the United States ever assembled, on surveying the state of the union, has met with a more pleasing prospect than that which appears at the present time."

Lame-duck sessions of Congress are frequently sterile, and this particular session is likely to be more sterile than usual because of the prospect of a special session after March 4. Mr. Hoover's eleventh-hour promise to call a special session if a suitable farm-relief measure could not be passed before his inauguration will serve as an oxygen-tank to every filibuster. The more the filibusterers talk the better will be their chance of an encore. If they can out-talk and outmaneuver the most vital pieces of legislation which come before the Congress, their reward will be a new session without the obnoxious time-limit. The Boulder Dam bill comes first on the Senate's calendar, and three notches farther down on that calendar comes the fifteen-cruiser bill. After these measures will come the Kellogg peace pact and the bevy of lesser bills which their proponents will attempt to jam through the tense, overcrowded days just before March 4.

Washington opinion is almost unanimous in agreeing that the cruiser bill will pass easily in the short session in spite of the opposition of peace societies. Legislators who vote for it will salve their consciences with the excuse that this fifteen-cruiser bill with an appropriation of $274,000,000 is only the tag end of the gigantic Wilbur program which called for an appropriation of $740,000,000. But this salve will be a most insufficient ointment because the present cruiser bill comprises the most important and provocative part of the Wilbur program. The Wilbur proposals called for a five-year building program to be headed by the construction of twenty-five cruisers, but the proposals included only fifteen cruisers during the first three years—and the present bill provides for all of these cruisers.

What a hilarious farce it will be when the "big-navy" men, having jammed through their cruiser bill, solemnly drag forth the Kellogg pact with its pledge that "the high contracting parties agree that the settlement or solution of all disputes or conflicts of whatever nature or of whatever origin they may be, which may arise among them, shall never be sought except by pacific means." Senator Borah of the Foreign Affairs Committee will shake hands with Senator Hale of the Naval Affairs Committee and will hold the treaty until the cruiser bill has passed. The militarists, flushed with genial triumph, will vote for the treaty, and the guilty "liberals," searching for moral compensation, will fall in line. Also, a great many Senators will vote for it because they believe that the defeat of the treaty with all its defects would create so much hostility and bitterness in Europe that the cause of lasting peace would suffer. On this point we agree with them, and for this reason only we hope the Kellogg pact will be ratified. It is a faulty, feeble, hypocritical compromise, but it can be a useful instrument in creating public opinion for something better and more concrete.

What will the Congress do with Boulder Dam and Muscle Shoals? The Boulder Dam bill won several preliminary votes in the Senate during the last session, and Ashurst of Arizona will have difficulty in smothering it by filibuster because it is the unfinished business of the new session. But President Coolidge is quite likely to kill it by his veto. The bill does not make government operation mandatory, but it gives wide latitude to the Department of the Interior to develop government-operated plants, and even this small concession to the public-ownership advocates may be too much for Mr. Coolidge.

The Norris bill for the government development of Muscle Shoals was technically killed by the pocket veto of President Coolidge on the last day of the former Congressional session, supposedly because the President flew into a temper over the rejection by the Senate of a minor political appointee, but the indomitable Senator from Nebraska refuses to admit that it is killed. He does not propose to bring it up again in the short session because he knows that he cannot carry it over the President's veto, but he maintains that Coolidge's pocket veto is void in a Congress which has two sessions. He is carrying his contention to the United States Supreme Court. Meanwhile Muscle Shoals is being partially leased to the Alabama Power Company at a figure which does not even cover the government's overhead expense, and President Coolidge declares that he is opposed to the construction of the additional dams on the Tennessee River which are required to make the project a great community asset.

What of unemployment and injunctions? The President says not a word about them, and it will be miraculous if the Congress succeeds in the short session in enacting any useful legislation on these subjects. The Wagner bill calling for federal employment exchanges has some adherents and the revised and improved Shipstead injunction bill is still alive. But what chance have social-welfare bills on the calendar of a Congress which has just received a new mandate from the American people to support the status quo?

Hope for Nicaragua?

THE proposed loan of $12,000,000 to Nicaragua follows the usual devious and dangerous course of our diplomacy in the republic for the last twenty years—a policy which is hurting our reputation and legitimate commercial expansion all over Latin America merely to benefit the special interests of a small group of money lenders and concession grabbers in Wall Street. There has been the same two-faced jobbery in this financial maneuver as in the return of our marines to Nicaragua in the winter of 1926-1927. William W. Cumberland, formerly our financial expert in Haiti, was sent to Nicaragua in the autumn of 1927, with the acquiescence of President Diaz, to report on the finances of the republic. Mr. Cumberland recommended that our bankers lend Nicaragua up to $30,000,000—$12,000,000 immediately—establishing in return a financial dictatorship.

Mr. Cumberland sent his report to the Department of State on March 10, last, but it was not made public. Certainly not. We were then in the midst of an unauthorized and unpleasantly stubborn war against Sandino on account of which the Administration was receiving criticism from unexpected quarters. With the fortunes of the Republican Party at stake in a then-impending national election, the Administration couldn't risk further attack on its Nicaraguan policy. But the existence of the Cumberland report was known and there was a threat of a demand for information by various Senators and Representatives as soon as Congress reassembled. So just after the election, and before Congress had met, the report was made public.

It didn't land right. Even the usual defenders of an imperialist policy in the Caribbean balked at so bald an announcement right on the eve of Mr. Hoover's "good-will visit" to Central America. It was a bit too raw. The New York Times gave a dignified rap on the knuckles to the Administration, and if Mr. Coolidge had had a secret idea that he wouldn't mind embarrassing his one-time Cabinet officer just a mite he now realized it wouldn't do. Four days after the report was published brief statements came from both President Coolidge and Mr. Kellogg indicating "Thumbs down" on the Cumberland recommendations for the rest of the present Administration. What Mr. Hoover may do remains to be seen, but although his preoccupation with foreign trade sometimes blinds him to higher conceptions, it may serve to change our Latin-American policy for the better. For the ruthless imperialism we have exercised in the Caribbean has hurt our trade and bona fide commerce all over Latin America. Our merchants and other business men of a legitimate sort cannot make headway in an atmosphere of hate and distrust.

The fact is that Nicaragua doesn't need a loan at this time. By Mr. Cumberland's own statement half of the proposed $12,000,000 would go for refunding existing loans which the country is already carrying on a satisfactory basis. The only reason for refunding would be to supply a handsome commission for some Wall Street loan sharks. About a fourth of the loan would go for claims, mostly due to our forcible intervention in Nicaraguan politics. These claims can be cared for out of existing revenues if the country is let alone. This leaves 25 per cent of the loan for productive purposes, to which Thomas W. Lamont has said we ought generally to limit our advances to foreign nations.

The 25 per cent for productive purposes is destined for the construction of highways. Doubtless these are needed, but they would best come gradually. In Haiti the large sum spent for roads has resulted to a regrettable extent in motor speedways for North Americans who honk the donkeys of the poor natives off into the mud. In any event such construction ought to be done by taxation. For its own good and ours Latin America ought to cultivate the habit of taxing itself more and borrowing less.

Finally, the Cumberland loan is proposed on terms which would make Nicaragua a financial peon to Wall Street. The financial control of the country—including the budget and a veto on all legislation regarded as likely to reduce revenues—would be placed in the hands of three men. Two of them—a majority—would be citizens of the United States nominated by our Secretary of State, acting presumably according to the wishes of the bankers floating the loan. The Bank of Nicaragua, which has just been redeemed from the foreign control exercised under the last loan, would be sold—this time into permanent captivity to North America. For these kind services our pawnbrokers and racketeers of Wall Street would be allowed to charge $400,000, which is nearly 3½ per cent, an exorbitant commission for floating a loan of $12,000,000. Meanwhile Mr. Cumberland's plan calls for adequate upkeep for the recently reorganized constabulary, or national guard, from a fund which would be a charge on the government revenues second only to interest on the public debt. As the People's Lobby puts it, this would "give the bankers first call on the nation's resources and the protectors of the bankers second call."

There seems to be a probability that the proposed loan to Nicaragua, at least on the terms proposed by Mr. Cumberland, will be shelved for good. We hope so, but believe that Congress should investigate our entire course in the republic for the past twenty years.

American Notables

THE publication of the first volume of the new Dictionary of American Biography was celebrated by a dinner given recently to several hundred scholars in New York City. The book, which contains more than six hundred pages and records the lives of 666 persons arranged in alphabetical order from Cleveland Abbe to Maurice Barrymore, is the first tangible result of the work begun three years ago under the direction of the American Council of Learned Societies, which is administering a fund of $500,000 contributed for the purpose by the New York Times Company. Allen Johnson, editor-in-chief, expects the last of the proposed twenty volumes to appear seven years after the publication of the first.

Such a work has long been needed, but no American biographical dictionary of anything like comparable scope has ever been undertaken before, and it could be prepared only by a large staff of organizers and editors working in cooperation with experts in every field. Undertaking as it does not only to give an outline of the life of every American who has distinguished himself in any line of endeavor, but to define briefly the nature of his achievement, it will be for students of the American past what the Dictionary of National Biography, already affectionately known to more than one generation of scholars as the D. N. B., has been to all who have concerned themselves with English history or literature.

Though all living persons are, for obvious reasons, excluded, inventors, industrialists, business leaders, etc., will receive recognition equal to that given to writers, preachers, statesmen, and soldiers whom tradition has made the more usual subject of biographical treatment. Thus, for instance, the first volume includes, in addition to such well-known names as those of Louis Agassiz, Benedict Arnold, George Bancroft, and John Jacob Astor, sketches of the careers of Frank Abbott, a pioneer in dentistry, Adrian C. Anson, famous baseball player, and William Taylor Adams, who wrote the well-known stories for boys which appeared under the pseudonym of Oliver Optic. The work aims to give a complete conspectus of American notables, and in order that men whose achievements were of the sort not usually recorded in biography shall not disappear in oblivion, lists of names to supplement those drawn from the ordinary sources of biographical information have been drawn up by experts familiar with the history of American business, sport, science, technology, etc.

Such a compilation as this can, of course, be thoroughly tested only by long use, but a cursory examination of the first volume indicates that it attains in every respect the high standard which the editorial and advisory boards would seem to guarantee. The sketches are not only concise and informative but very often vivid and colorful as well, so that the book might properly be called a dictionary not only of biography, but of personality also, and it will probably be read for pleasure as well as for information by all who have any interest in American characters. Scholars will, of course, find it invaluable, but its service to them will be no more important than that which it will render to the general reader, who will find himself turning to it hardly less often than to the encyclopedia or the dictionary if he wishes to make his reading of American social or political history as fruitful as possible.

Space is naturally allotted in accordance with the importance of the person to be treated and the amount of information available concerning him, but the shorter sketches are often the most valuable. The great names may usually be found in an encyclopedia and, if one wants still more information, there is usually an individual biography to be consulted, but hundreds of people have contributed something to American civilization without having achieved an eminence sufficient to justify a "Life and Times" or even to win for themselves a mention in any general work of reference. Their names bob up in unexpected places, but no information can be found concerning them without an amount of research into newspaper files, local histories, and the like which involves a serious waste of the scholar's time and is quite unthinkable for the general reader. There is no research scholar who has not been baffled, and no intelligent reader who has not experienced a sense of impotent irritation, when the ordinary sources of information failed him upon occasions like this, but when the work at present under discussion is completed it will contain accurate information about hundreds of persons concerning whom nothing could be conveniently learned in any other place, and that fact will be responsible for its unique value.

All copies of the Dictionary of American Biography will be printed on rag paper to insure their permanence and will be issued through Charles Scribners' Sons. The subscription price (payable in instalments) is $250.

Chivalry and Labor Laws

IN several recent legislative hearings certain well-groomed ladies from the National Woman's Party have fought shoulder to shoulder with the manufacturing interests against special labor laws for women. The manufacturers have welcomed this feminine support with great gusto and the press has given generous headlines indicating that the women reformers are divided among themselves. Behind the public hullabaloo there has not been an adequate body of facts on either side of the discussion. The trade unionists and social workers who support labor laws for women have given reasoned testimony for their belief based upon long experience, but the left-wing feminists have talked well and marshaled enough individual instances of sex discrimination to impress the public.

As The Nation has frequently pointed out, the leaders of the Woman's Party do not oppose labor legislation as such but only labor laws which apply to women as a sex. The question at issue is largely one of social philosophy. The left-wing feminist tends to see society as a sex struggle in which man exploits woman, while the laborite looks upon the same milieu as a class struggle in which employer exploits worker. The rub comes when the two struggles overlap and labor concedes the sexual status quo by appealing to the chivalry of the employer and the community for special labor laws for women. The intelligent labor champion does not make this appeal because he likes to make it; he prefers to win justice for woman as a worker through organized power but he will take justice for woman as a woman if he cannot get it in any other way. The appeal for woman as the weaker sex arouses the ire of the left-wing feminist. Chivalry is for her as bad as poverty because it perpetuates the prejudices which have kept women in subjection. Moreover, she claims that women workers actually lose by special labor laws because such laws throw them out of work and limit their employment opportunity.

This claim has been analyzed with great care by the Women's Bureau of the Department of Labor in a new study, "The Effects of Labor Legislation upon the Employment Opportunities of Women." The published facts knock into a cocked hat the arguments of the Woman's Party that shorter-hour legislation for women in the manufacturing industries has taken away opportunities to work. The investigation shows that most women who are gainfully employed are not affected one way or another by special labor legislation for their sex, but in five important manufacturing industries which employ women in large numbers the legal limitation of hours for women only has "not brought about any degree of substitution of men for women."

The investigation proves that in the matter of laws against night work for women the Woman's Party has some justification for its claim that men have supplanted women as a direct result of the laws. Likewise certain laws designed to protect women have caused the substitution of men in such tasks as running street cars and operating elevators. But these are individual instances and custom has done much more than law to eliminate women workers from night shifts, street cars, and certain types of elevators. On the whole the cases of individual injustice to women workers caused by special legislation seem unimportant compared to the resultant improvement of industrial standards.

was sent in late in the game while the score was still a tie. On practically the first play after his entrance he dropped a punt which led directly to a Yale touchdown and victory. Throughout the rest of his university career he was known in college as "the man who dropped the punt." When his brother entered Harvard two years later he was promptly christened and known for his next four years as "the brother of the man who dropped the punt."

Isn't this a little excessive? It seems so to me but there appears to be reason to hope that at last there has come a break in the emphasis. Less than a month ago Tad Jones broke down in public and sobbed out the horrid charge that the old Yale spirit had begun to wane. It was not like that in my day. Some years ago I talked at New Haven before an organization of Yale graduates upon a subject as non-partisan as the American drama. To be sure Harvard has turned out ten playwrights of note to every one from Yale, but I didn't go into that. Somehow or other the talk drifted around to football and in pleading for less intensity of feeling I happened to mention the man who dropped the punt and told how Yale had recovered this fatal fumble on Harvard's nineteen-yard line. Then, with the intention of being jocose, I remarked: "The Yale eleven with characteristic bulldog grit and courage carried the ball over the line." To my horror the audience broke into long cheers.

Some of my best friends are Yale men and there is no basis for the common Harvard assumption that graduates of New Haven's leading university are of necessity inferior to the breed of Cambridge. After all we should never forget that Lincoln was born in a log cabin. Still, there is, perhaps, just a shade of difference in the relative keenness of perception for wit. Practically all the Harvard anecdotes about Yale which I know are pointed and sprightly while Yale is content with such inferior and tasteless jibes as the falsetto imitation which begins, "Fiercely, fellows, sift through . . ." Even the audience of graduates to which I have referred was singularly cold to the anecdote about the difference in tradition which prevails at New Haven and at Cambridge. "When a Yale man is sick the authorities assume that he is drunk. When a Harvard man is drunk the authorities assume that he is sick."

Nor was I successful in retelling the stirring appeal of a well-known organizer who was seeking to consolidate various alumni bodies into a vast employment agency for college men. "There should be," he cried, "one great clearing house. Then when somebody came for a man to tutor his children we could send him a Harvard man, and if he needed somebody to help with the furnace we'd have a Yale graduate."

Now that Harvard has won a well-deserved triumph by a score of 17 to 0 (which does not begin to indicate the margin of superiority held by the winners) it is not likely that the men of Yale are one whit less sensitive. When a letter begins, "My attention has been called to your article," it is generally safe to assume that your correspondent is a Yale man. Still people from Princeton are like that, too.

And the name of the New Jersey institution does suggest a manner in which Harvard and Yale might possibly get together into closer amity. Of course they can hardly meet upon the basis of a common language. (At New Haven, I am told, "Oh, yeah!" is supposed to constitute a conversation.) There are obvious reasons why they cannot meet as equal members in a fellowship of educated men. Since this is a non-partisan article designed to promote good feeling it will probably be just as well not to go into this. Religion won't do as a common factor, for Yale is evangelical and prays between the halves, while Harvard is agnostic or Unitarian. No, there is just one great cause in which Harvard and Yale can stand shoulder to shoulder. Each year some public-spirited citizen should hire Madison Square Garden and turn it over to all graduates and undergraduates of Harvard and Yale for a great meeting in which past differences should be forgotten in one full-throated shout of "To hell with Princeton!"

THIS is about as far as the old song should be carried. Perhaps it is too far. My plea today is for something of abatement in the intensity of the rivalry between Harvard and Yale. To be sure I realize that the plea has been made before by mightier men and that they were unsuccessful. Indeed it was Charles W. Eliot, himself, when president of Harvard, who rebuked the students as first they began to sing, "Three cheers for Harvard and down with Yale." This, he said, seemed to him hardly a proper spirit. He suggested an amendment so that the song might go, "Three cheers for Harvard and one for Yale." Such 75 per cent loyalty was not acceptable to men with good crimson blood in their veins.

Naturally it is not to be expected even now that Harvard and Yale men should meet on terms of perfect amity and that the old bitterness should disappear within the time of our own generation. Such a miracle is beyond the scope of my intention. Too much has happened. Just what it was that Yale originally did to Harvard I don't profess to know. It was enough I suppose to justify the trial of the issue by combat on the gridiron every year. Curiously enough, for a good many years Yale seemed to grow righter and righter if judged in the light of these tests. But the truth is mighty and shall prevail and the justice of Harvard's cause became apparent this year through the grace of God and the lateral pass. God, as some cynic has said, is always on the side which has the best running backs. Neither Copeland nor Kittridge ever quite sufficed to convince the general public of Harvard's superiority. That task was left for French and Guarnaccia. It was this lad with the fine New England name who scored the two touchdowns.

My suggestion is that whatever deep wrong Yale once committed against Harvard a process of diminution of feeling should be allowed to set in. After all can't the men of Cambridge be broadminded about such matters and remember that nothing within the power of Yale could possibly hurt Harvard very much? Even in the days when the blue elevens were winning with great regularity there should have been consolation enough in the thought that Harvard's Greek department still held the edge.

In the game of 1906 a Harvard halfback named Nichols was sent in late in the game while the score was still a tie. On practically the first play after his entrance he dropped a punt which led directly to a Yale touchdown and victory. Throughout the rest of his university career he was known in college as "the man who dropped the punt." # The Sea Is Not Safe!

By FELIX RIESENBERG

WITH the Vestris disaster still in mind, a seven days' sensation, that almost immovable mass called public opinion shivers slightly while the crack of a growing yawn begins to mar its perfect indignation. All of the children drowned! Only ten women saved, most of them picked up hours after the disaster, floating helpless in the sea! Most of the crew saved, having themselves abandoned ship via the boats easiest to launch, while leaving the women and children suspended in two boats hanging from the davits on the high side and at least a fathom from the water, all to tumble and perish with the turning over of the steamer! One gruesome mistake piled upon another; delays, confusion, incompetence, and personal cowardice the order of the day. Lack of judgment is no excuse; in fact, it is criminal in men of the sea specifically charged with the duty to safeguard others. But so much for the blame. In this case there is blame enough and to spare and plenty of people to absorb it; it will probably be spread as far as possible.

But the blame goes far beyond mere personalities. To a very great extent the blame must rest upon all of us, myself included. I knew what would happen in a disaster calling for the use of boats. In the Nautical Gazette of June 6, 1925, I wrote an article called The Next Great Sea Disaster. In part I wrote:

The war was so full of disasters it almost seems at present as if the disaster-business had been definitely closed out with the signing of the treaty. But a look over the log-book of the sea will show a succession of great disasters even in time of peace. It is a gruesome list, the most spectacular of victims being the giant Titanic. . . . A time comes at sea when assistance is of little use. Given a fatal combination of circumstances the result is certain. But there always must be the first weak link, the crash through the shell of the ship, from the outside or from within, and the sea of such temper that the small boats of the modern dumpy school cannot live, or cannot be handled by the crews of Ritz waiters and saloon-deck sailors now provided for that service.

When the next great disaster comes and is finished a great commission of experts will be assembled. Most of these gentlemen are now seated behind their desks. A few sad and expensive reports will be added to those collecting dust on the shelves of the Library of Congress, etc.

Describing the supposititious disaster, I wrote: "Great confusion prevailed. An outrageous riot and an utterly unparalleled state of criminal negligence held sway."

So much for my own opinion expressed some years ago. I might have raved up and down the piers shouting my warning, but the chances are that some general passenger agent would have had me arrested as a disturber of the peace. What I then wrote made no ripple, and having written for the better part of fifteen years without swamping any of the shallow but established skiffs upon which we embark our souls, I will expect this article to drop into the ocean of public indifference with little more than a momentary splash.

The sea is not safe! Passage at sea, at this very moment, is as hazardous an adventure as at any time since the Phoenicians trimmed their sails and manned their oars on the first great trading and exploring voyages. Hazards have increased ten thousand fold with the vast increase in size, speed, and number of ships afloat. Fog is as thick as when the world began, ice as frequent in high latitudes, and far more dangerous in the case of large fast vessels built of steel; and derelicts, often of great tonnage, are added to the unseen but ever possible obstacles in the path of ships racing over seas at night. The hazard of collision, one vessel with another, is a constant source of danger. Only the utmost vigilance of faithful men, alert and experienced, stands between these dangers and their consummation in some terrific catastrophe.

Every time you take passage on a steamer, no matter how long or how short the trip, whether to Albany, New Orleans, Buenos Aires, or Australia, a hazard, and a great one, ships with you on the voyage. Without consulting records, almost without thinking, a list of names springs to mind that would fill whole pages of this paper—Oregon, La Bourgogne, Slocum, Titanic, Cyclops, Egypt, and Vestris, each different, each unexpected, and some of them, as in the case of the great collier Cyclops, utterly unexplained. Hundreds of lesser ships, such as the Suduffco, just sailed out to sea and never returned. In the latter case one of the ablest sailor men, Captain Thomas Turner, trained in the whale-ships of Nantucket as a lad and for long years an officer on transatlantic liners, was in command.

No sane man will contend that the hazards at sea are fewer simply because the percentages of disaster are low. No sane person will believe that because the percentages are low the total loss is also low, or that the lives sacrificed are negligible. Such reasoning may work out in the matter of tonnage and values, coverable by insurance, for which we all pay, all the time, in millions upon millions of dollars annually. The lives that go with the risks are not covered; in fact, are specifically exempted when disaster can be blamed on "an act of God."

In the first place let me say that most vessels, built to the specifications of the classification societies, are safe in any weather, if safely loaded, skilfully handled, and not brought into contact with one another, with ice, or with derelicts. It is upon this fact that the insurance business establishes its rates. The insurance underwriters also recognize a "moral risk," and some care is taken in approving the master. The records of master mariners are scrutinized by those who bet that a ship will not meet with disaster, for which risk they charge a fee. No special effort, however, is made by these gentlemen to see that the high character of shipmasters is as highly paid for as it deserves to be.

The question of making a ship safe, except in cases where no ship can ever be safe, is a matter of competent design and of sound construction. It is a vitally important matter, and is so recognized by naval architects. Double cellular bottoms, wing bunkers, blisters, bulkheads, watertight doors, secure hatches on strong decks capable of keeping water out from the top and of holding down air pressure from beneath should a compartment be holed below the water line, these matters, with the exception of the last, are reasonably carried out. The great risk is in the upkeep, inspection, and handling of ships. It is a matter of the human equation, the same human equation that often goes wrong ashore, wrecks trains, and smashes automobiles.

Now we come to the disaster. For some reason or other, including the ever-present risk of fire, a ship founders, or becomes untenable to those on board. For instance, a ship may lose her stability, heel over on her beam, and even if still afloat she becomes a supremely dangerous carrier. The terrible moment comes to abandon ship, to clear away the boats. In the case of the Vestris this happened near noon, in daylight and in moderate temperature, and after hours, in fact almost after days, of warning. It was not a sudden emergency.

Now let us consider a steamer in the passenger trade, commanded, officered, and manned by able and brave men. The sea is no respecter of persons, and our disaster happens at night, on a cold night of high seas and strong winds with sleet and snow, or perhaps it is in the midst of a night fog. There is a sudden crash, out of the black pocket of the future, and in a few minutes the huge steamer is foundering. Thousands of persons, men, women, children, and the army of stewards, engineers, deckmen—the crew—attempt to rush to their stations and lower boats. We hear the crack of the radio for a few minutes perhaps. The position given may be correct, unless the ship has been running by dead reckoning for a day or more; the whole system of signals may function, but we know that it requires very little time for a ship to sink if mortally holed. In fact, if we combine some of our possible disasters with winds of hurricane force, the coming of rescue ships may be delayed for hours on end.

What have our seamen to work with?

Open boats—open boats often stowed, one on top of another.

These boats, to hold, on paper, the total number of persons on board, must be bulky, heavy barges, carried high above the hull, and hung under a great forest of clumsy davits, suspended by complicated tackle, operated by screws and winches. Under the conditions assumed for the purpose of illustration, conditions not at all impossible, no crew of today, or even of the day before yesterday when sailors were real sailormen trained in handling rope falls, could launch them safely, let alone fill them to their rated capacity, lower them slowly into the sea, and release them.

The whole matter of boats, their equipment, their launching from the tall topsides of steamers, upright or listed, needs a radical overhauling. Today the boat equipment on the best steamers built is obsolete, unworkable, unsafe. Open lifeboats can be launched safely only under favorable conditions. Most disasters happen amid the most unfavorable circumstances.

I would propose the following suggestions for consideration at the coming International Conference for the Safety of Life at Sea, to be held in London next spring:

1. Place a definite limit on the overall length of ocean passenger liners. They are again growing too big for safety.

2. Consider the financial incentive now offered to carry boys of the highest type into the sea service, and to keep them there up to the important position of command.

3. Carry light, open boats under davits, for rescue work only, not for the purpose of abandoning ship with passengers. Boats for the purpose of abandoning ship should be of a radically different design and construction. Such boats should be of steel, shaped somewhat like short blunt-ended spindles. They should be constructed of two thicknesses of metal, separated by tough water-resistant material, capable of swelling if punctured, and strong enough to be filled with passengers and dropped into the sea from launching ways on the boat deck. These boats would stow, side by side, ends outboard. In this way, by stowing at right angles to the keel of the ship, the lifeboats could be carried in a single tier. The launching ways should be so arranged that the boats could be dropped on either side, depending on the list. The boats would have a large hatch, always unlocked, on their upper turtle deck. In a great emergency the passengers would be put into these boats, the hatch clamped down, with dogs operating both from the outside and the inside. The clamping down could light the interior by storage battery. Proper hand-holds, kapock cushions, and other necessities would be fitted, and the under side of the boat would be ballasted by a tank containing fresh water. Then the boat would be easily slid into the sea. It would take a dive, right itself some distance from the foundering ship, and could not be swamped by heavy seas or sucked under. The people in the boat could open the hatch, and other hatches as provided, ship oars, or a mast, or just stand by in comparative comfort and safety.

Dare-devils have gone over Niagara Falls in barrels; the short drop of a lifeboat as suggested is not half as bad as the clumsy practice now followed with open boats hung from swaying and tangled falls. A few motor-boats, as now carried, could be launched by the crew to round up the safety spindles.

The art of engineering must supersede the tangled mess of rope and gear now provided by law for launching boats. Safety, speed, dryness, warmth, and the protection of the contents of the boats from weather during the long time they rest in the cradles can all be accomplished by a system such as this. At one stroke this does away with scores of expensive davits, tons of costly rope, and all of the assorted junk now provided and utterly unmanageable under extreme conditions. Such boats could be released, and if the emergency was so sudden that launching was impossible they would bob up free from the ship when she went down. At the first sign of real danger people could be put into such boats and kept there while the master made up his mind as to the course of action. Under our present system boats have been lowered and lives lost while the ship remained afloat.

Most suggestions entail added expense on the shipowner. I respectfully suggest this as one of those rare ideas that is both practical and economical. Now boats are covered by canvas, a great expense in itself, their contents are constantly deteriorating, the boat literally falls apart from lack of use.

Spindles, such as I suggest, could be hoisted by suitable lifting bolts, by a single derrick on each side, and lifted on board and slid along into place on their greased launching cradles. The inspectors, overworked men, could have some fun filling one of these boats with members of the crew and shooting them into the sea, just to note that all was shipshape and correct. This would not be as tedious as the present system of creaking blocks and gear, and would only take a minute or so of their valuable time, when the proper entries could be made on the record.

I don't know what the rope bill is for a great ship, for boat falls alone, but it is considerable, for rope must frequently be replaced. Some use wire and this, too, is costly, and when the decks are icy it is almost impossible to handle.

I feel certain that something positive in the way of reserve safety, aside from rafts and independent of the skill of a doubtful crew under stress of weather and excitement, would go a long way toward making a sea passage reasonably safe even when the fateful moment comes to clear away the lifeboats.

Did Japan Kill Chang Tso-lin?

By THOMAS F. MILLARD

[This is the second of three articles by Mr. Millard on China and Japan. The last, Japan Fights for Manchuria, will appear shortly.]

Shanghai, October 1

IT is a relevant fact that for several years before his death Chang Tso-lin's relations with Japan were strained. The dictator gradually had become less disposed to accept advice from the Japanese on political and military matters. He was restive under their tutelage and more than once disregarded their wishes in important affairs. He did that when he established himself at Peking, where he was much less under Japan's influence than at Mukden. It was well known to Chang's intimates that his chief reason for wanting to hold Peking was to avoid getting back where the Japanese could put pressure on him. Chang felt, and often so expressed himself to his intimates, that Japan would like to get rid of him.

The Tokyo Government, through the Japanese legation at Peking, advised Chang not to risk a battle with the National armies inside the Great Wall. To enforce that point Tokyo told him that if his army was defeated the Japanese would not permit it to retreat into Manchuria. That is why 25,000 Japanese troops were sent there and more were mobilized ready to go. Chang did not want to give Peking up without a fight, but his troops were disaffected, some of his principal generals were pro-Nationalist, and in the end he decided to withdraw.

Chang Tso-lin left Peking early the morning of June 3. A steel coach painted conspicuously was provided for him and his intimate entourage. That he felt himself in danger is shown by precautions that were taken. At points during the journey the position of Chang's coach in the train was changed. At times he would leave that coach and sit for a while in another one.

The train approached Mukden very early the morning of June 4. At a station some miles from the city a number of important officials met the train to welcome the dictator and continued on it. Among those officials was General Wu Chung-chen, Chang's most trusted lieutenant and military commander of Shengking Province. When the explosion that wrecked the train and killed Chang Tso-lin happened Chang and General Wu were in a wooden coach next to the steel coach where Chang was supposed to stay.

The explosion occurred at about half past six o'clock. It was terrific and startled the city. Many people hastened to the scene, but in a short while Japanese railway guards (soldiers) formed a cordon and kept people away. Among the foreign employees at the arsenals are a number of experts on explosives and some of them were quickly at the scene and made such examinations as they could. Both Japanese and Chinese commissions of inquiry were appointed and they conducted investigations. Every consulate and nearly every foreigner at Mukden tried to learn what they could.

I arrived at Mukden three weeks after the explosion. By then what could be found out, and probably all that ever will be found out, had been assorted and digested. The material and pertinent facts that are known follow.

The explosion occurred at a point where the Chinese Peking-Mukden line passes under the tracks of the South Manchuria Railway. There are concrete blockhouses guarding the bridge by which the South Manchuria line crosses over the Peking-Mukden line and Japanese soldiers always are there. As that point is within the South Manchuria Railway's zone, which had priority over the right of way of the Peking-Mukden line, Chinese police are not allowed there. On that occasion the Chinese had requested to be allowed to send some soldiers to watch the Peking-Mukden tracks at the time Chang Tso-lin's train would pass. That request was granted, but the Chinese soldiers were not permitted to approach the place until shortly before the train was due.

An expert examination of what evidence was discovered in the wreckage and an expert analysis of that evidence seemed to prove that the explosive was attached to the granite retaining wall supporting the southern end of the bridge, adjacent to the track on which the Peking-Mukden train would pass. It would require six to eight hours to drill the holes, to put the explosive into position, and to make whatever connections were used to discharge the bomb.

Item. A foreigner who lives near by noticed on the evening of June 3 some Japanese working at the bridge with wires and other appliances. When out riding early on June 4, about 5 a. m., he again noticed the Japanese workmen and the wires. That made no particular impression on that observer at the time. He remembered it later, however. He noticed also that on that morning more than the customary number of Japanese railway guards were about.

Item. Two Chinese who approached the place early that morning were challenged by Japanese guards and when they stopped they were bayoneted and died immediately. Another Chinese who witnessed this assault ran away and although he was fired on at once he escaped. The Japanese say that those Chinese were "acting suspiciously" and they did not stop promptly when challenged. The Japanese tell a story about some small bombs having been found on those Chinese. The Chinese version is that those men were ordinary Chinese workmen who lived in a suburb west of the South Manchuria Railway's tracks and who were in the habit of walking under the bridge when going to their work. On that morning they might have seen something which they could have told about afterward.

Item. People living near the bridge noticed during that night that men were working there and using strong lights to see what they were doing. Sounds of drilling were heard. Those who saw and heard it thought at the time that some ordinary repairs were being made.

The matter sifts down to this. It required eight to ten hours to instal the explosive that wrecked the train. During all that time the scene was exclusively under the authority and the policing of the Japanese. The Chinese guards did not come on the scene until shortly before the train arrived there and then they were told to stay some distance from the bridge. By then the bomb was in place and everything was set. Only experts could have installed the explosives. The job was expertly planned and scientifically executed. Just how the bomb was set off is not known positively.

One might theorize endlessly regarding motive for the crime. Japanese point out that had they plotted the thing why would they choose the exact place that would put them under suspicion? Chinese say that if the deed was done by Nationalist or Communist or anti-Chang Chinese plotters they would surely have chosen another place than the one spot on the whole Peking-Mukden line where Japanese are on guard night and day and where such operations could not fail to be observed by them.

The Sino-Japanese "joint investigation" resulted in disagreement in some particulars. The Japanese members wanted to make it appear that Chinese guards were at the scene from daylight, about 4 a. m., onward. The Chinese members say the Chinese guards were not on the scene until about 6 o'clock. It is a material point on which all the neutral evidence supports the Chinese contention.

Three months have passed since the crime and no one has been arrested or charged with having done it. Among neutral foreigners at Mukden the opinion is almost unanimous that Japanese prepared and set off the explosion that ended Chang Tso-lin's life. Chinese believe that too. However that may be, Chang's death opened a way for the promotion of Japan's policy vis-a-vis China and Manchuria which Tokyo's previous moves had foreshadowed.

Chang Tso-lin died a few hours after the explosion that wrecked the train at Mukden, but his death was not officially announced until nearly three weeks later. From June 4, when the explosion occurred, until June 21, when the foreign consuls were notified that Chang was dead, his death was denied and extraordinary measures were taken to keep it secret.

If the Japanese planned to seize the opportunity and take control they were nonplussed by the calm and inoffensive attitude of the Chinese. (The Japanese consul general, Mr. Hayashi, expressed in a conversation with me great admiration of the Chinese handling of the affair.) It is said that Chang's eldest son made a secret trip to Mukden to kneel at his father's bier and then returned to Shanhai-kwan. Apparently he did not think it was safe to remain in Mukden then. A week later he returned there and stayed, but Yang Yu-ting, Fengtien's ablest general and chief of staff for Chang Tso-lin, stayed inside the Great Wall with the four best divisions of Fengtien troops. Those Manchuria troops are still inside the Wall, obviously because of Japan's moves at Mukden.

In those circumstances, if there was any disposition of some men in Manchuria to grasp power, that was suppressed because of fear of what the Japanese would do. It was thought better to give the chief office to Chang Tso-lin's eldest son, the young general, for the time. That was done with approval of the principal Chinese leaders.

The National Government made pacific overtures to Mukden and sent a deputation there which was well received. At about the same time persons presumed to represent the deposed emperor, Henry Pu, who lives in the Japanese concession at Tientsin, arrived at Mukden and began an intrigue to restore the Kingdom of Manchuria with the former emperor on the throne. This scheme has become familiar by its frequent discussions in Japan's propaganda organs, the idea being to restore the ancient Manchu kingdom under Japan's protection, with Henry Pu on the throne and married to a Japanese princess, repeating the story of Korea. The plot to restore the monarchy made no headway with the Chinese in Manchuria. They understand what that means.

It was evident that the eastern provinces were confronted by the alternatives of either remaining a part of China, which means accepting the National Government, or of taking a fictitious attitude of independence, which means coming definitely and perhaps forever under the tutelage of Japan. On that point there is hardly any difference of opinion among Chinese in Manchuria, who are strongly, now almost bitterly, anti-Japanese.

An agreement was reached whereby Manchuria would recognize Nanking's authority under certain conditions and would raise the National flag in the eastern provinces. That agreement was to be promulgated July 21. Information of it leaked out and of course reached Tokyo. General Chang Hsueh-liang and a deputation were to visit Nanking to signify the rapprochement.

On July 20 the Japanese consul at Mukden, Mr. Hayashi, requested an interview with Chang Hsueh-liang, which took place early the following day. Mr. Hayashi asked General Chang if the reports about reaching an agreement to affiliate with the National Government were true and learned that they were. He then said, in effect, that the Japanese Government could not fail to be gravely disturbed by such action and strongly advised the Mukden Government not to proceed with that agreement. Mr. Hayashi stated that, in the event Japan's views were disregarded, the Japanese Government would take steps to preserve the status quo.

Mr. Hayashi's declaration was followed at once by dispositions of Japanese troops at Mukden, who took positions outside the railway zone and the Japanese town in proximity to the aviation field and the arsenal. The Mukden Government proved unexpectedly stubborn. It replied politely to Mr. Hayashi but intimated that it would proceed with its purpose to recognize the National Government of China. However, in view of the situation and the Japanese military dispositions, promulgation of the agreement was postponed and the National Government was informed of the reasons.

Soon afterward the Japanese Government sent Baron Gunsuke Hayashi, Japan's senior diplomat, to Mukden. The ostensible occasion of Baron Hayashi's visit was to represent Japan at the funeral of Chang Tso-lin, an ironical touch that was not lost with Orientals. The real reason of the visit was to repeat in a more forcible and impressive way the previous admonition given by Consul Hayashi. Indeed, Baron Hayashi went further. He insisted that the Mukden Government should make an agreement confirming and extending Japan's special position and rights in Manchuria that would be tantamount to establishing Japan's suzerainty there.

Again the Mukden Government showed unexpected firmness. It refused to make a new agreement and it would not promise to remain independent of Nationalist China. Baron Hayashi did extract a promise that Mukden would wait three months before taking further action in the matter.

The Respectable A. F. of L.

By CARL HAESSLER

New Orleans, December 1

JOHN DEWEY'S charity need not be stretched very far to understand and forgive the American Federation of Labor for pinning the Bolshevik label on him. That action was in accord with the dominant tone of the recent New Orleans convention and of all the interim acts of the executive council and of President William Green, namely, a passionate middle-aged pursuit of conformity and respectability.

Mr. Green's opening address to the forty-eighth convention, after church and state had welcomed the delegates of labor to Louisiana, sounded the keynote. "I think we must be pretty decent, respectable citizens when we are able to invite the opposition and the antagonism of these two extremes." The extremes were the National Association of Manufacturers and the Workers (Communist) Party.

It was with the same notion that delegate John H. Walker, president of the Illinois State Federation of Labor and acting chairman of the convention's education committee, brought against Mr. Dewey and his associates the charge of misleading respectable trade unionists by Communist propaganda, saying: "I want to move to strike out his [Dewey's] name in the report and all reference to what he has said. Anything that I can do to prevent them from misleading decent trade unionists is going to be done."

And struck out it was. Though Mr. Dewey may read on page 310 of the seventh day's proceedings that the convention unanimously agreed he is "recognized on every hand as the leading educational authority in America and perhaps the most outstanding figure in the educational field in the world today," he may further read on page 315 that Vice-President Matthew Woll of the federation knows him [Dewey] to be a "propagandist not for special interests but for Communist interests . . . and is he not the one who a few years ago went to New York City for the purpose of planting the germ of communism in our educational institutions?" Then he may read that on the next day after a spirited debate the delegates by 91 votes to 39 carried Mr. Walker's motion and the name of Dewey was deleted, eulogy, denunciation, and all. The more intelligent and able delegates like Victor A. Olander of the seamen, secretary of the Illinois federation, fought against the ridiculous action, but the mob spirit was running high as it will in respectable mobs and so the Dewey scalp as well as Brookwood's was hung on the federation belt.

Most of the delegates, like most of the gentlemen of the press, had never heard of the name and fame of Dewey, but with the label of communism attached to him they would take no chances. So also Brookwood Labor College was lynched without a trial. Mr. Woll, more in his role as chief of the National Civic Federation than as member of the executive council of the American Federation of Labor, led the pack with an array of accusations of much the same portentous grotesqueness as his indictment of Mr. Dewey, which was indeed part of his general attack. Chief among them was a quotation from Dean A. J. Muste, of Brookwood, who is a vice-president of the teachers' union, a quotation that was put forward by Mr. Woll and accepted by a great majority of the delegates as infinitely damning. The quotation was:

"I am a revolutionist, that is to say, I do not believe that capitalism is an efficient, just, or humane system of industrial and social organization. I want to see it replaced by a cooperative commonwealth under the control of the producers."

At this point the British fraternal delegates, John Marchbank and Ebby Edwards, whose movement is firmly rooted in Marxian economics, fairly gasped. They did not understand the ambition of Mr. Woll and his followers to be regarded as patriotic economic statesmen. A reading of the introduction to the executive council's report would have proved illuminating.

"Our movement," the introduction reads with characteristic distrust of the highbrow, "has ever been a most effective Americanization agency. As economic statesmen we are doing a constructive work second to no other group in the country. In common with the change that has come in the use of this word in the field of politics we no longer think of a statesman as a person above the affairs of daily life, who gives utterance to ponderous statements and is generally out-manuevered by the politicians. We use the word to designate men actively responsible for urgent problems of national welfare, alert to see where constructive principles can be applied, and competent to achieve practical results."

The Britishers had previously brought upon themselves the thunderous rebuke of President Green when they had urged that war "can only be frustrated by a united working-class solidarity, by the workers refusing to obey the war-lords of any country" and by letting "the people who want the wars to go and fight the wars because you have never got anything out of any of them that has been fought up to the present time." Green's heated reply was not so much an ungracious slap at guests who had been cordially welcomed and were later to be blessed with beautiful gifts, as it was public notice meant to reach the ears of Washington and even higher authorities that American labor is safe and dependable, not to be seduced by John Dewey at home or Karl Marx and his crew of foreigners abroad. Similar motives underlay the riotous greeting to Commander Paul McNutt of the American Legion and the rising tribute to his jingo speech which under phrases of peace pointed plainly to the coming war with Britain, a speech so blatant that the British fraternal delegate made an acid reference to the danger of approaching the peace table with a war mentality.

BRENTANO'S

All the other convention doings except one were of a piece with this ifch to conform to the psychology of America's rulers. The exception came when Secretary of Labor James J. Davis went beyond his customary insolent assurance before labor audiences and dared to say:

"Some of you may have been politically opposed to Mr. Coolidge, which was your privilege, but I want you to know, now that he is on the eve of retiring from active participation in politics, that no sincerer friend of labor has ever sat in the White House."

That was too much. The convention received it in stony silence.

The power trust, symbol of sinister influence in American life today, was a beneficiary of the federation's anxiety not to offend anybody that ranks as respectable, except such undisguised enemies of trade-union organization as injunction judges and rampant open-shop manufacturers. A resolution "opposing use of public schools to spread propaganda of power interests" was changed by substituting the word "special" for "power" wherever it occurred and a reference to the "hydro-electric power trust" was deleted.

Most of the convention personalities performed as usual. John L. Lewis of the miners delivered himself eloquently of ponderous nothings. Matthew Woll, a frothing Napoleon but also a very industrious and intelligent Machiavelli, had his hand firmly on the convention throttle. John H. Walker did his best to keep the intellectuals from putting anything over on the untutored toilers in convention assembled and he did not relish the plain intimations of Victor Olander that his best was not good enough. John P. Frey, of the metal trades department, tried to startle the delegates into the belief that the Hoover plan of a construction reserve against unemployment was an indorsement of that will-o'-the-wisp, the "A. F. of L. wage-theory." Andy Furuseth, of the seamen, was even more independent and peevish than usual. President Green conducted the proceedings with his accustomed dignity, kindness, and fairness except on the rare occasions when his respectability-neurosis was active. Martin Ryan, a mountain of good-natured Irish avoirdupois, succeeded the tight-lipped Tobin as treasurer.

The absent because defeated champion of a Labor party, Max Hayes of Cleveland, would have been gratified to hear three comparative youngsters voice some of his progressive ideals. The outstanding example of militant labor conflict for the year, the lockout-strike of the Allen A hosiery workers in Kenosha, was brought before the somnolent convention by William Smith, secretary of the American Federation of Full Fashioned Hosiery Workers. Brookwood was ably and courageously defended on the floor by the sole delegate who claimed it as his alma mater, Charles L. Reed of Salem, Mass. And the cynical doctrine of the aged William D. Mahon of the street-car men that labor solidarity is mostly empty words and that each craft must fight its own battles was crushingly put to rout by James M. Duffy of the potters, though no syllable of his just and manly rejoinder appears in the printed convention proceedings. Duffy was appealing for aid to the operative potters against the open-shop Kresge chain-store potteries; Mahon doubted the wisdom or the efficacy of labor solidarity, and in reply Duffy simply described how his union had once come to the support of Mahon's street-car men in East Liverpool, Ohio, to such good effect that the fight was won, but not without a universal blacklist against Duffy that compelled him to quit his home town for five years in order to get a chance to earn a living. Mahon decently subsided.

Apart from this trio the outstanding progressive figure was Mrs. Florence Curtis Hanson, secretary of the American Federation of Teachers and also secretary of the education committee of the convention. Though a grandmother she was a youngster in her sturdy and able championing of advanced ideals. Respected by the delegates for her genuine unionism and for her well-known willingness to guide her federation without demanding the customary $7,500 to $15,000 a year of the standard union executives, she was yet regarded with apprehension because she was that doubly incalculable thing, a woman and a white-collar worker, an intellectual, in other words, that could not stay put if she wanted to. From a number of remarks made on and off the floor it would not be surprising if the next heresy hunt of the indefatigably suspicious Mr. Woll were directed against the teachers' union.

While there is youth there is hope. The convention this year, unlike the Los Angeles and Detroit conventions immediately preceding, had a significant trace of youth. But it was too weak to combat President Green's querulous complaint, voiced in his denunciation of Brookwood:

"The tragic feature of it all is this, that some of our organizations affiliated with the American Federation of Labor and some of our members seem to take the side of Brookwood. They join with our enemies in condemning us. They seem to think that the executive council is made up of old fossilized members and that the council is always wrong and our enemies always right."

In the Driftway

IF the Drifter were a spinner of tales there is one New York newspaper to which he would subscribe—the Evening Post. Then he would never lack plots, for on the humblest of pages, the last, is material sufficient to provide the literature of a generation. Moreover, if the Drifter were a cultural historian he would treasure that same page, for there is to be found each day a cross-section of life in these United States. But though the Drifter is only a Drifter, it is still one of his favorite newspaper pages. It is to this section, which is called merely News from Other Cities, that the Drifter turns for amusing, or pathetic, or ironic—often significant commentary in American English on the American scene.

ALMOST every city every day reflects our widespread interest in aviation:

Cleveland Airport passengers taking regular planes out hit new high at 418 past week.

Shuttle service from Ford airport to Toledo, linking Detroit with trans-continental air mail, has begun over lighted airway.

Out of fourteen items from Chicago, seven are violent, at least by implication. These include one assassination, one downtown robbery in broad daylight, two explosions, and the news of a divorce which was granted to Helen Wilkowski because her husband, Anton, "always sleeps with a fourteen-inch butcher-knife in bed with him in case of robbery." Chicago has its humorous news too:

Mike Damolas, restaurant waiter, rushing a "bolla Zup," stumbles over cat, causing soup to go down patron's neck. Mike kicks all nine lives out of the kitty. Patron is S. P. C. A. worker and Mike is arrested and fined $9 for cat murder at the rate of a dollar a life.

And contributes a historic note as well:

Export commission fixes value of land on which [stands] London Guaranty Building, at intersection of Wacker Drive and Michigan Avenue, at $200 a square foot. This is site of original Fort Dearborn and represents an increase in value of 5,000 per cent since pioneer days.

Kansas City leads off with an amusing item:

Walter Earl Daniels, eight weeks old, baptized by three bishops of Methodist Episcopal Church and doctor of divinity, and sleeps through it all.

And Baltimore offers a "blue law" incident:

Frank R. Williams, barber at Southern Hotel, is arrested as violator of Sunday "blue laws," but Police Sergeant Fred Johnson kindly allows him to finish shaving Joseph Fink, 2400 Block Eutaw Place, before making arrest.

Prohibition and Citizenship

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: May I commend to the thoughtful attention of your readers and all American liberals the letter of Mr. Horace D. Taft on prohibition appearing in the New York Times of November 14? Probably no one is likely to accuse this distinguished teacher of fanaticism, bigotry, intolerance, or a desire to make other people unhappy. Further, he ought to know something, if anyone does, of the effects of prohibition on the morals and manners of American youth, particularly among the wealthy and the well-to-do. His letter is marked, moreover, by an entire absence of rancor, denunciation, or contempt for those who disagree with him. It makes a statement and asks a question that demand the thoughtful attention of every good citizen.

Mr. Taft's argument in brief is this. The prohibition amendment and the Volstead Act were only the legal culmination of a revolution in public sentiment that had been going on in this country for a century. Despite all agitation and despite the acknowledged bribery and corruption attending prohibition, each Congressional election shows a Dry gain, till with the next Congress the Dry-Wet ratio in the House will be three to one and in the Senate five to one. Governor Smith, in a way to do honor to a man of his convictions, espoused the cause of modification and fought an honest battle against national prohibition. Most cool observers agree that his manly stand on that issue was at least one of the leading causes of his overwhelming defeat. All denunciation of the "tyranny" of the Anti-Saloon League and of the "bigotry" of the churches is beside the point when it comes to explaining fundamentally the steady onward march of prohibition as a political policy. The Eighteenth Amendment cannot be repealed, and the Volstead Act cannot be modified, except in the direction of making it stricter. There stand the facts, says Mr. Taft, whether we like them or not, and sensible men and good citizens are bound to act in view of the facts.

Now, if it be true that prohibition is irrevocably imbedded in the law of the land, as Mr. Taft asserts, not by a war fluke, but by a movement of public opinion which still continues its sweep, then what is the present duty of the liberal and the good citizen? Mr. Taft's answer is flat and clear. It is his duty to practice and to preach abstinence because any other course makes him not only a participator in but an instigator of the carnival of bootlegging, bribery, and corruption which the liberal so bitterly and perhaps correctly charges to the prohibition policy. If that policy, as Mr. Taft asserts, cannot be broken down by the present cooperation of liberal and well-to-do drinkers with law-defying bootleggers and speakeasy proprietors, then our jaunty before-dinner cocktails and after-theater champagnes cease to be by any possibility part of a moral crusade; they cannot possibly be a libation to the sacred liberal principle of personal liberty; and they become nothing less than a deliberate instigation of that defiance of law which every good citizen, Wet and Dry alike, deprecates. That conclusion is inevitable. As matters stand, if I drink in the United States today, I deliberately choose to promote bootlegging, bribery, and law defiance. As a good citizen, I may conceivably do this in the promotion of a greater future good to be obtained at this high present cost, if prohibition repeal is possible. If, however, as Mr. Taft believes, the ultimate triumph of prohibition is inevitable, then my action means no more than a lengthening of the period of corruption and demoralization in which we flounder. On this hypothesis, irrespective of personal tastes and preferences, to abstain from intoxicating drinks today logically becomes as much the civic duty of the American citizen as to refrain from subornation of perjury.

I do not care to argue Mr. Taft's case, still less to denounce those who disagree with his conclusions. The prohibition question has been the subject of far too much heat and denunciation on both sides. I do simply want to ask all thoughtful liberals, no small proportion of whom are honestly against prohibition on principle, to consider Mr. Taft's allegation of fact, and if they agree that it is well founded, to ask themselves if they see any escape from his conclusion. In my judgment, if they do so they will mostly conclude that Mr. Taft is right historically. If that be so, his projection of our future course as a nation seems to me almost inevitably to follow, and all the more so for another reason on which he does not touch. In a country of twenty-three million (I haven't looked it up) automobiles, where an unsteady hand is likely at any moment to mean death, we have got to have a universal standard of clear-headedness and steady-handedness such as no nation in history has ever attained. Public safety and alcohol apparently cannot go together in twentieth-century America; for whether we like it or not, the simple mechanical conditions of keeping alive today make it imperatively necessary that every man be all there all the time. If so, is not Mr. Taft doubly right about the future of prohibition? And if he is right, can the thoughtful and patriotic citizen, no matter what his personal wishes and tastes, lend the support of his voice, his pen, or his dollars, by a perfectly inevitable process, to the bootlegger, the speakeasy proprietor, and the corrupt public official, any more than he would do to the yegg or the second-story artist? Without assuming that their answers will be the same as mine, I leave the question to the thoughtful consideration of your readers.

The Socialist Party

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I heartily agree with your editorial of November 21 that "the Democratic Party ought to die and that the sooner it dies the better," as well as your sentiments regarding the need for a large and powerful party in opposition to the party of conservatism.

My disagreement comes when you refer to the Socialist Party. You say: "We cannot forget that for most Americans socialism connotes only bolshevism or anarchy. Hence a new designation and a revised program upon which all liberals may unite are the demand of the hour." Mr. Levinson in a letter has pointed out the reasons for criticizing the first of these sentences. Regarding the need for a revised program, may I ask for a bill of particulars? To my best knowledge the immediate demands in the Socialist Party platform in this campaign coincided pretty closely with the constructive program advocated by The Nation during the last few years (although, unfortunately, not emphasized during the campaign). In what respect would The Nation have that program changed either nationally or internationally? It is not perfect, and here and there changes should undoubtedly be made, but does it not, as far as the immediate demands are concerned, constitute a pretty fair program for the genuine progressive in this country?

Undoubtedly a number of changes must be made in Socialist Party organization in behalf of greater efficiency, but these organizational problems are now being attacked with vigor by the party itself and a more flexible and efficient machinery will soon be developed. In view of these recent developments in the Socialist Party, in view of the changing attitude of the country, and in view of the fact that there is no other coherent progressive group on the horizon at the present time, should not The Nation use its influence to encourage, rather than discourage, genuine progressives to support the Socialist Party during the coming months? Isn't the alternative, in most instances, likely to be futile inaction, as far as the building up of a genuine opposition party in America is concerned?

An Old Chronicle

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: And it came to pass that the people of the Bible Belt heard the sound of the preachers' trumpets and they arose and smote the Catholics hip and thigh, and the hosts of those who voted not as they drank, which were about nineteen millions, went and joined themselves unto the hosts of the honest Drys, which were about one million, and there was a mighty slaughter of the hosts of Raskob; and they pursued after those of them that remained even unto the gates of Boston and unto the swamps of Arkansas.

And there was much rejoicing in Wallstreet, where is the temple of the great God, Mammon, and in all the provinces thereof. When tidings of the great victory came unto King Coolidge he said unto his servants that he was much pleased, howbeit he did not smile; but he straitway made ready a battleship, even the Maryland, that the mighty man of war, Hoover the Quaker, might be placed thereon and that he might go unto the nations of the south and drum up trade for the princes and chief priests of Wallstreet and thus show himself worthy to sit upon the throne of King Coolidge to which he had been chosen.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: May I ask if you will be good enough to print this letter asking any of your readers who have diaries, old letters, and memoranda concerning Andrew Johnson if they would communicate with the undersigned. ## Dead Baron

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: May I call your attention to an error of fact in your review of the memoirs of Baron N. Wrangel, "From Serfdom to Bolshevism"? The opening paragraph of the review states that the author "was the father of the better-known Baron Wrangel who led an army against the Bolsheviks in 1919-1920 and who still heads a band of mercenaries in the Balkans." Baron Peter Wrangel could not in November, 1928, lead anything or anybody for the simple reason that he died in Brussels last April.

To a Girl

By BERT COOKSLEY

Walk swiftly by old towers
Where noise is dead.
Where are no ripe flowers
Nor a breathing head.

There can be no feeling,
There no rooting tree,
There no savage dealing
With life's lunacy.

Pass swiftly in the daylight,
Swift in nightlight go.
Of shroud gray and of bone white
Time is left to know.

This Week Out of Bondage

BEFORE me lies one of the most revolutionary documents ever published. It is, on its face, a collection of letters chosen from among the quarter-million or more received by the American Birth Control League, assembled here as a demonstration of the need of rescinding the laws which now forbid even the medical profession from giving information about the prevention of conception. It is called "Motherhood in Bondage"* and is introduced by an appeal for sense and decency by Margaret Sanger. If you read one or two of the letters and feel the ignorance and panic that lie behind them you will undoubtedly be moved to a warm pity for human beings so desperately ensnared. If you read them all you will be stirred to wrath and shame. Taken separately each letter is a plea for help; together they become a shout of protest. The dynamic effect of hundreds and thousands of emotional outbursts gathered into a single explosion is terrifying and hopeful. Such feeling, so strong and so despairing, rooted in the deep centers of energy and life, pushing up and bursting out under such irresistible pressure—this, it seems certain, must finally shatter the forces that oppose it, backed though they are by gods and hobgoblins and all the more genteel forms of fear.

Those who read André Siegfried's lively and penetrating volume, "America's Coming of Age," can hardly have forgotten his picture of a civilization in which repression and standardization, accepted without undue protest by the vast complacent majority, rob individuals of an opportunity to live and move according to their personal desires. Americans—he said in effect—are people who love to pass laws, especially restrictive laws. Americans are people who wish to make their neighbors do things they would not do themselves. Americans are people who consider "the needs of the community supreme." Hence prohibition, hence restricted immigration, hence—even more particularly—eugenics. "If you visit the United States," said M. Siegfried, "you must not forget your Bible, but you must also take a treatise on eugenics. Armed with these two talismans, you will never get beyond your depth." He discussed the influence of Lothrop Stoddard and the Ku Klux Klan, and very specifically sought to identify the birth-control movement with these advocates of the supremacy of the Protestant Nordic.

But here, I believe, M. Siegfried was betrayed by his eagerness to make everything fit smoothly and evenly into his pattern of repression. Undoubtedly many eugenicists support birth control; for all I know Mr. Lothrop Stoddard may make an annual contribution to the League. But when we consider M. Siegfried's "typical American"—he who elected Herbert Hoover and defeated Al Smith; who instinctively and indiscriminately dislikes Irish Catholics, communism, Jews, Italians, beer, and labor unions; the pious hillsman of the South, the Methodist minister in a Kansas town, the New England farmer—we find him solidly against birth control. This may astonish M. Siegfried, for he is a Frenchman and a logician. Obviously, if the domination of the Nordic is to be perpetuated, he must somehow seduce the "undesirables" and the aliens into reducing their birth-rate. If reason were to prevail the Birth Control League would be able to count on the solid backing of the fundamentalist majority.

But logic is not a vice of the fundamentalist. He is against birth control. He detests the very words. He shrinks from the thought behind the words. Birth control can hardly be considered without considering sex, and sex should be suppressed and ignored as far as possible. If children are born, let us not dwell on the incidences of their origin; let us presume that God sent them to bless our homes, and leave the matter there. Besides, says the fundamentalist under his breath, what will become of morals if people can sin without fear? And so, if pushed to the choice, the conventional and pious Nordic Protestant will refuse even the fundamental logic of self-preservation, which seems to him to imply, not regimentation and coercion as M. Siegfried would maintain, but new and alarming forms of freedom. By his different route, he arrives at the same attitude toward birth control as that maintained by the Catholic church.

And the bigots of both faiths are right; they do well to fear the effect of a widespread knowledge of birth control methods. At present such knowledge is in the hands of the upper classes—through bootleggers—and the effect of it has been to change the habits and morals and economic status of middle-class women, and to modify almost beyond recognition the middle-class home. Some of this knowledge gets through to the poorer classes. But, like bootlegged liquor, it is apt to be poisonous—the more so, the cheaper the bootlegger. So the women of the working class are dying from the effects of drugs and abortions, when they are not dying from the effects of too many children; and a bitter, passionate clamor for fair treatment is beginning to sound through muffling layers of poverty and repression. Not for the sake of the dwindling Nordic, but for their own health and happiness and security and freedom and for their children's future, these women are going to have what they want. If you doubt it, read "Motherhood in Bondage."

The Early Life of Thomas Hardy: 1840-1891. By Florence Emily Hardy. The Macmillan Company. $5.

Winter Words in Various Moods and Metres. By Thomas Hardy. The Macmillan Company. $2.

MRS. HARDY has written an indispensable book about her husband's first half-century. Harold Nicolson, whose taste in biography is all but perfect, has recently reminded us that lives by relations are more than likely to be bad. But there is one commodity which relations are pretty sure to have—facts; and when they are generous with these, as Mrs. Hardy is, they give us what no one else can give. One does not know what Mrs. Hardy left out, but on the basis of what she puts in a number of good guesses about the man become possible; and the very natural question concerning this poet and novelist who dealt for sixty-five years with the theme of disappointment—what early disappointment did he himself experience?—gets more or less answered.

The answer seems to be that he was not disappointed at all. Things came his way rather nicely, if sometimes slowly, both in love and in literature, and nothing happened to him of the sort that happens to the heroes of his novels. The only thing which failed to meet his expectations was the universe, and if that seems a big "only" it must be remembered that many other people suffer the same disillusionment without expressing themselves as Hardy did. The important fact about him is that he was a small, shy, delicate boy who had been born into "an old family of spent social energies" and who grew into a small, shy, sensitive, and contemplative man of the kind that could say to himself in his diary at 47:

If there is any way of getting a melancholy satisfaction out of life it lies in dying, so to speak, before one is out of the flesh; by which I mean putting on the manners of ghosts, wandering in their haunts, and taking their views of surrounding things. . . . Hence even when I enter into a room to pay a simple morning call I have unconsciously the habit of regarding the scene as if I were a specter not solid enough to influence my environment; only fit to behold and say, as another specter said: "Peace be unto you!"

This ghostly Hardy peering upon the tragic scene is the only Hardy a reader was justified, perhaps, in constructing out of the whole cloth of the books. Yet there was the temptation to guess about personal disasters of a melodramatic sort, and Mrs. Hardy lays that particular ghost, I imagine, forever. Given the dusky temperament and the withdrawn passion of the Dorset boy, the man at 39 would be writing this New Year's thought: "A perception of the FAILURE of THINGS to be what they are meant to be lends them, in place of the intended interest, a new and greater interest of an unintended kind"; or at 42 this dismissal of all expectations: "Since I discovered, several years ago, that I was living in a world where nothing bears out in practice what it promises incipiently, I have troubled myself very little about theories. . . . Where development according to perfect reason is limited to the narrow region of pure mathematics, I am content with tentativeness from day to day." Such a boy, I suspect, would have become Thomas Hardy in any world; though Darwin and Huxley, as Mrs. Hardy makes clear, had much to do with the special direction in which the nineteenth-century world took him.

If this guess is wrong, there is ample material for other ones in the diaries, letters, notes, biographical memoranda, and oral remarks which Mrs. Hardy has so wisely used to fill her pages. And in any event we get a narrative that is richer than most novels in detail. We are told some of the old tales which came down to Hardy as a family inheritance, and we see how throughout his long life he filled notebooks with stories of people—often rather ghastly ones—that he got from conversation or reading. We learn how absorbed he was always in books; how in his youth this passion was tempered only by an interest in country music of the sort his father and grandfather fiddled and caroled, and a little later by a professional interest in architecture. We are given to guess how many girls he looked lingeringly at, and how many of these he remembered decades later even though there never had been words between him and them; there was, for instance, Louisa the farmer's daughter, to whom he said "Good evening" once at 15 and whom he has put into his last book of poems at 87. We hear of two village hangings that he saw, one through a telescope three miles away. We see him in school; in an architect's office; in courtship with his first wife; in London talking to John Morley, George Meredith, and Leslie Stephen—a remarkable trio from whom to get one's first literary advice, and in publishers' offices agreeing cheerfully to changes in his manuscript, since fiction was his "trade." We get also a number of profound entries out of the diaries in which he recorded his impressions of life—and of the individuals whom, ghost as he was, he saw so many of.

Of "Winter Words" there is little to say that has not been said of the volumes which preceded it. It is quite as important, however, as any of them, even if it is only one more proof of that amazing variety which Hardy could achieve within the strict unity of his mood. Here as always are songs and stories by a master of the art of being interesting in verse, and here as always is commentary upon a world which as early as Hardy saw it was changed from what it had been before time began.

MARK VAN DOREN

A Rare Flower

Civilization. By Clive Bell. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.50.

THE "civilization" which Clive Bell undertakes to discuss in this urbane little book is neither the inclusive Kultur familiar to students of anthropology nor the social machinery analyzed by the economist, but that particular state of mind which we recognize in a Pericles, a Voltaire, or a Gibbon. It is something made possible by tolerance, skepticism, and intelligence; it has nothing to do with wealth or power or even—necessarily—with genius; and it is as conspicuously absent in certain great men like Homer or Henry Ford as it is present in others. Reasonableness, together with what Mr. Bell calls "a sense of values," is the hallmark by which it is known, and a certain keen though just appreciation of the possible pleasures which living affords is its fruit. No people as a whole was ever civilized in this sense, but certain ages have been more colored by civilized minds than most. The eighteenth century in France was such an age; the twentieth century in England and America is not.

Now, so far as the positive parts of the argument are concerned, there is nothing particularly new in these contentions. However much this particular meaning of the term "civilization" may have been disregarded by those materialists who have attempted to measure it in terms of industrial production or by those rather naive humanitarians who have been content to assume that it was synonymous with the equitable distribution of wealth, there have always been some who have defined it as Mr. Bell does. But the really interesting part of his discussion is that in which he is forced to make certain concessions, since it is these which constitute him a "modern" and which reveal the havoc wrought by nineteenth century thought upon a classical and pseudo-classical faith. Mr. Bell, to put it bluntly, does not and cannot believe in the all-sufficiency of "civilization" as those "civilized" men whom he most admires did believe.

What critic of the Golden Age in France would have admitted as he does that certain "barbarian" artists like Shakespeare and Dostoevski are as great or greater than Racine and Molière? What one would have followed him into the still blacker heresy which forces him to concede the more general proposition that the "civilized" man is most conspicuously superior as an appreciator rather than as a creator because he lacks the fanatical energy of the unenlightened? The very cornerstone of the aesthetic creed of the eighteenth century was the assertion that "art" was a surer guide than "nature" so far as literature or painting is concerned, and romanticism, however much he may have attempted to throw it off, has done that much to Mr. Bell. Nor is that all. He confesses that "civilization" is only one of the various goods which it is the business of mankind to pursue; that "irrational and unpromising belief, blind patriotism and loyalty" have often been good because means to sublime states of mind; and that, in a word, "enlightenment" is neither so nearly all-sufficient nor so indefinitely extendable as Voltaire would have thought it. In a final chapter entitled How to Make a Civilization he not only recognizes that true "civilization" is possible only to a minority of leisured people, but makes what would have been to the eighteenth century a ghastly proposal—namely, that the task of government need not, perhaps ought not, to be intrusted to this civilized minority.

Mr. Bell's book is wittily and often brilliantly phrased. His remark that the Roman philosophers "merely restate familiar fallacies with the complacent and cumbrous air of one who discharges a moral obligation" is a typical obiter dictum, and one might turn for an example of his satiric exuberance to the passage in which he pays his respects to one or another of the "little cults of innocence and animality" whose members, flying from the sterility of civilization, hope to get "back to the inter-tidal scum via arts and crafts." But, this wit notwithstanding, it is possible to draw a more pessimistic conclusion than the author intends, for if one concedes as much as he does it is difficult to escape from the necessity of conceding still more. If "civilization" is not only inevitably restricted to a minority, but if, as he says further, "the perfectly civilized are essentially defenseless; whatever reason may say, their sensibility will make it impossible for them to strike a blow in cold blood or deliberately to inflict a punishment," it is very difficult to believe that "civilization" can ever be other than rare, sporadic, and evanescent. The Golden Ages have perhaps believed differently, but we who have thought more than they ever did about biology, economics, and psychology have come to see that the tolerance, the disinterestedness, and the skepticism which "civilization" implies are luxuries that people cannot indulge very freely or very generally if they are to survive, and that the "civilized" man is, though we may admire him more than any other, essentially parasitic upon the animal man who keeps the race alive and the world moving. "Civilization," like justice, benevolence, and most other human virtues, comes to flower here and there and often in unexpected places. Neither it nor they are ever likely to be very abundant or very common.

Wayne Wheeler, Dry Boss. An Uncensored Biography of Wayne B. Wheeler. By Justin Steuart. Fleming H. Revell Company. $3.

UNTIL the Anti-Saloon League indorsed Mr. Hoover as a Presidential candidate and some twenty million men and women, in spite of that fact, voted for him, it might have been supposed that the only sufficient reason for a biography of Wayne B. Wheeler was the desirability of letting the American public know exactly how much mischief he had done. Mr. Steuart, who was formerly Wheeler's publicity secretary, sums up a part of the record at the outset by noting that Wheeler "controlled six Congresses, dictated to two Presidents of the United States, directed legislation in most of the States of the Union, picked the candidates for the most important elective State and federal offices, held the balance of power in both Republican and Democratic parties, distributed more patronage than any dozen other men, supervised a federal bureau from outside without official authority, and was recognized by friend and foe alike as the most masterful and powerful single individual in the United States." To this may be added that he once wrote for a Wet a "red-hot personal-liberty tirade and tore the welkin into shreds in denunciation of prohibition and its fanaticism" as a device for getting into a Liquor League convention, exerted himself as a lawyer to uphold the Webb-Kenyon act notwithstanding his belief that the act was unconstitutional, and practically framed the Volstead Act. Now that the anti-saloon candidate has been elected, however, and we know what "the will of the people" is like, it is to be expected that the mischief that Wheeler did will be counted to him for righteousness, and that his name will in due course be added to the list of our national heroes. Mr. Steuart sets down an appalling record, but he at least does it in a straightforward style and with as little obvious partisanship as such a book could well have.

Jung's Psychology

Two Essays on Analytical Psychology. By C. G. Jung. Translated by H. G. and C. F. Baynes. Dodd, Mead and Company. $4.

THE significance of this book is by no means indicated by its modest title and size. For it contains a brief account of the results which Dr. Jung has obtained from many years of research in the field of human psychology. In the first essay he discusses what lies behind that layer of the unconscious in which the personal memories and repressed instincts are to be found, and shows how the collective and general problems of humanity possess their counterpart in the deep layers of the unconscious—called by him the "collective unconscious." He describes how in case after case he has observed that the images of the collective unconscious begin to appear at that stage in an analysis where the patient's problem ceases to be any longer a question of repressed infantile wishes or of parent fixations. At this point the truly adult problems of the individual's relation to life as a whole and to such questions as the meaning of good and evil, the significance of death, and the relation of man to woman, force themselves to the fore and demand solution. In discussing this question Dr. Jung gives numerous examples to show how various persons whom he has analyzed have sought for a solution.

In the second essay the author takes us even deeper into the problem, for here he describes the contents of the collective unconscious in a way that is almost like a picture of the structure of the psyche. He has found that layer after layer of the unconscious opens in regular order during an analysis; and that each region of the unconscious is dominated by a figure which appears in dreams and fantasies in personified form. The author discusses, with the help of many examples, the relation of the dreamer to these figures of the unconscious and the effects that the various relations have on the psyche. He shows how an individual can overcome the figures each in turn, and possess himself of the energy or power that they previously held. In this way a new form of individuality is created which Dr. Jung conceives of as the aim of analysis.

The book is written with deep understanding of man's problems and struggles, and through it all the author's very human sympathy and kindness shine out. The translation is an unusually good one, for the translators have been associated with Dr. Jung over a period of years and are thoroughly familiar with his work.

Biography and Fiction Briefs

Life and Times of Pieter Stuyvesant. By Hendrik Willem van Loon. Henry Holt and Company. $4.

Mr. van Loon's habit of seeing things in the large, of painting huge landscapes with broad strokes of Rubenesque color, is not quite fit for this task. The figure of old Pieter Stuyvesant is almost always submerged beneath a mass of Dutch and Colonial historical data—data that are not presented with that journalistic élan which the author's many followers have come to expect. Occasionally Pieter stumps around, brandishes a formidable fist, and bellows vast Dutch oaths with all the verve of Long John Silver himself; but too often he is as peacefully somnolent as Baltus Van Tassel in "The Legend of Sleepy Hollow."

John Smith—and Pocahontas. By John Gould Fletcher. Brentano's. $3.50.

Add one more book to the long list of volumes that have been written about the "Life and Adventures" of Captain John Smith. This latest member is competent, scholarly, and, of course, interesting—with such a subject, how could it fail to be?—but it is questionable if either the style, the compilation of familiar data, or even a reasonably new fact now and then, succeed in making it particularly valuable.

François Villon. By D. B. Wyndham Lewis. Coward, McCann and Edwin Valentine Mitchell. $4.

An excellent biography, rather unoriginal on the critical side, of a figure who appears to be enjoying a sensational run at the moment. Mr. Lewis's style, which has been much praised in certain quarters, is perhaps open to the charge of literary "lustiness" and a forced exuberance; but his book should be widely read, nevertheless. It appears the most carefully documented study of Villon to appear in English; and while it adds nothing new to the French researches, it represents a careful and judicious selection among a thousand dangerous hypotheses. As an interpretation of Villon's mind, it is conventional; Mr. Lewis is too much in sympathy with the usual romantic notion of Villon to be able to see his hero from more than one angle.

That Magic Fire. By Sylvia Bates. Houghton Mifflin Company. $2.

This story opens in one of those Maine villages one would wish to live in, and then takes refuge on one of those garden apartments behind a church on West Eleventh Street that many of us envy. But beyond its tastefully selected backgrounds one doesn't remember much. There is a sensitive young man with an inherited mental instability, and a nice girl who loves him but doesn't give herself to him at the proper moment, and it all comes out right in the end.

Towers Along the Grass. By Ellen Du Pois Taylor. Harper and Brothers. $2.50.

Mannered and extremely artificial in style, this novel frequently tortures language to express the reactions of an acute sensibility, and continually tortures reality in the windings of its plot. Its writer has decided talent and she knows how to write; but because she has not yet learned how to bring her writing to bear upon reality, her book is a series of fantastic arabesques traced upon the smooth ice of experience.

The Jealous Gods. By Gertrude Atherton. Horace Liveright. $2.50.

This is a competent, slow-moving historical novel of the period just following the Periclean Age which Mrs. Atherton previously celebrated in "The Immortal Marriage." The roystering, puckish, headstrong Alcibiades is the hero, and Mrs. Atherton gets some excellent comedy from the notion of con-

Drama

G. B. S. and the Test of Time

IN 1918, when the Theater Guild was still the Washington Square Players, it produced "Mrs. Warren's Profession" and since then it has allowed only one season to pass without a bow in the direction of Adelphi Terrace, but in the course of ten years a gradual transformation has taken place in the mood of the yearly event. "Mrs. Warren" was a defiant gesture, a bold, bad play resolutely put forward as part of an iconoclastic program, and so too were the pieces which immediately followed it. Then something happened, too gradually to be remarked until a transformation was accomplished. At some date which I am unable to fix precisely we ceased to be exactly thrilled when the annual production came around and the occasion began to seem more pious than revolutionary—something more and more like a ceremony and less and less like an outburst.

Mr. Shaw himself has strong ideas on the subject of the natural period of human vitality and he has gone a long way toward vindicating them in his own person, but even this modern Methuselah ceased, at about the age of sixty-five, to be any longer a member of the younger generation. Instead of gasping with astonishment and chortling with unholy glee we began to discuss just how well this or that of "the old boy's" plays was holding up. Blasphemous words like "dated" were heard from time to time, and as the fiery red beard of the author faded into white we began to pat the head which had once seemed so formidable. Certainly, too, his works ceased to be in any sense esoteric, and the great public came in. He had replied to an invitation to open the new Guild Theater by remarking "that he had had more experience in closing theaters than in opening them"; but this was a mere boast, for the returns from his plays made a bright spot in the yearly financial statement of the Guild, and if the white-whiskered old gentleman ceased to be its prophet he became its Santa Claus instead.

Any discussion of "Major Barbara" (Guild Theater) must, therefore, begin with an answer to an anxious question. The play stands up far better than some of the others, and it seems to be more explicit, very much more substantial than did "The Doctor's Dilemma" when performed here last season. The first act still crackles pleasantly, the scene at the Salvation Army shelter is still emotionally moving (a rare thing in Shaw), and if the last act seems to beg the whole question in an almost fatuous fashion I am inclined to think that it was always weak. "Major Barbara" has dated, of course, but with Dudley Digges as Anthony Undershaft, Helen Westley as Lady Brittomart, Winifred Lenihan as Barbara, and Eliot Cabot as the Greek professor who finds the bass drum Dionysian it is still far more entertaining than forty-nine out of fifty contemporary plays.

For myself, however, I must confess that I am less sure now than I was ten years ago just what the argument of the play is. Shaw is saying, of course, that "what is wrong with the poor is poverty," and he is saying besides that the development of industry is a better remedy than charity for this worst of all diseases; but when he deserts these simple propositions for the kind of rapt ecstasy which sometimes seizes him, I find myself lost. Did he choose Anthony Undershaft, maker of armaments for every side of every struggle, as the hero of the piece merely because cannon-making was the least defensible of all industries and hence a crucial test of the thesis, or did he choose him because he seemed a representative of that Nietzscheanism which inspires the more mystical passages of the piece? The question is highly important for the meaning of the play, but it is, like many other important questions which can be raised concerning most of Shaw's dramas, not to be answered on the basis of any internal evidence, and it awakens a suspicion, which grows stronger and stronger as time goes on, that Shaw himself responded eagerly to more different influences than were capable of being reconciled in any one philosophy.

According to his own boast he was "up to his neck in his times," but there are moments when he seems over his head as well. Liberal, Socialist, Nietzschean, humanitarian, Wagnerite, rationalist, and Christian—he is something of each, but the question is simply whether or not it is possible to be all these things at once except in a certain cloudy realm within which he takes refuge when brought face to face with the necessity of making a choice. A magnificent disseminator of ideas, he has hesitated to commit himself to most of those which he has seemed to champion, and the result is that he draws back at the last moment from the ultimate conclusion to which he would seem to be leading. Sometimes the result, as in "The Doctor's Dilemma," is to produce an effect almost of timidity and to lead one to ask, as one does in connection with that play, why he chose such a fundamentally decent sort of person as hero when his apparent intention was to prove that virtue is irrelevant to the value of an artist? At other times this unwillingness to go to the logical extremes makes a play like "Major Barbara" seem positively obscure. In it he hesitates between the sober exposition of a socialistic ideal and the rhapsodical celebration of a Nietzschean faith in force, finally escaping from the problem by concocting an act in which everything is magically adjusted without any of the fundamental questions having been in any sense answered. It is clear from the scene at the Salvation Army shelter that he is too much of a Nietzschean to be a Christian, but the play as a whole makes it clear that he is also too Christian to follow Nietzsche. If his plays ever lose their place as important contributions to drama and thought it will be because he had too positive a temperament to be a skeptic, while at the same time he saw too many sides of everything to be a believer.

Revivals of "The Wild Duck" (with Helen Chandler and Blanche Yurka) at the Forty-ninth Street Theater, of "Peter Pan" at the Civic Repertory, and of "Macbeth" at the Knickerbocker are, among other things, indications of the fact that most of the new plays produced this season have failed of success. Shakespeare's simplest and directest tragedy makes a stirring evening. Lon Harding as Macbeth is excellent; Florence Reed as his queen achieves a certain rough sort of success so far as the more obvious values of the part are concerned, but she hardly seems aware that Lady Macbeth is something more than the heroine of a blood-and-thunder melodrama.

Student Rebels in Latin America

By ANITA BRENNER

STUDENTS, writers, artists, and labor groups of Central America, Mexico, Cuba, Colombia, and Argentina are protesting against the expulsion of Victor Raul Haya de la Torre, Peruvian intellectual and student leader, from Guatemala and Honduras. This expulsion is blamed on the United States. In both Guatemala and Honduras his offense was the same. He wrote and spoke on "united action of the Latin-American people against Yankee imperialism, for the political and economic unity of the Latin-American countries, for nationalization of wealth, for internationalization of the Panama Canal, and for solidarity with other oppressed peoples of the world."

This is the program of the APRA, an inter-Latin-American association of intellectuals and labor leaders which branches from Mexico into Central America. The feeling that this program represents is not new in Latin America, but the active and concrete policies developed from it are new. Haya de la Torre has been largely influential in forming them. The APRA stands Against feudal and oligarchic governments . . . which support extortionist contracts, territorial concessions, sale of the subsoil . . . thus prolonging a condition of slavery in the peasant and labor classes.

The APRA wants union between the Central-American peoples, first, because Central America is a strategic point for the domination of all America by the United States. No example could be more patent and dolorous than Nicaragua. The United States desires to possess this small republic completely in order thus to divide Latin America and obtain the incalculable advantages of a second canal which would control the economic life of all the Latin-American peoples. . . . Yankee imperialism, one must not forget, begins with economic domination and ends with political. After the dollar the bayonet. . . .

Therefore the APRA has two enemies to attack, which in the last analysis are one: native governments which permit or invite intervention, and American economic or political dominators. . . . One must say it and repeat it . . . Central America is a future domain of the United States, and everything in Wall Street tends to provoke disturbances in these small countries, to justify intervention and make definitive the appropriation of our territories, with the criminal aid of our ruling oligarchies.

The APRA carries on its campaign through organization and through propaganda in all Latin-American countries that tend to Latin-American nationalism. Its contention is that an oligarchic government in one country imperils the sovereignty of all the others, and that labor and peasant battles in one country are fundamentally battles of labor and peasant interests in all the others.

In Central America De la Torre pivots the APRA program on Sandino. His expulsion was due to the following concrete suggestions:

We must struggle . . . to keep the peace between Guatemala and Honduras, at present on the verge of conflict which is only a quarrel between two fruit companies, the Cuyamel and the United Fruit. Such conflict is to the interest of the United States because it will divert the active and widespread sympathy which exists in Central America for Nicaragua, and which may mean the victory of Sandino. A conflict between two Central-American countries will smother this new Central Americanism in national ardors . . . and furthermore, will tend to justify intervention. It is at the same time the duty of all Latin-American youth to give active aid and support to Sandino, our representative hero.

Sandino himself supports De la Torre's suggestions, and declares, in regard to the possible conflict between Guatemala and Honduras: "It would not be strange news if my army and myself were suddenly to be found in any country of Latin America where the assassin invader sets his foot to conquer. . . . Sandino is Indo-Spanish and has no frontiers in Latin America."

The program of the APRA dovetails into that of the Union Latino Americana, which spreads from Argentina into the neighboring South-American countries. It has student-group allies in every Latin-American country, with the possible exception of Brazil, and also in Spain and France. It is in policy and personnel allied to the Mexican and Central-American APRA. South America, however, has no such compact scheme as that of the APRA. In Argentina student organizations first demanded a share in the choice of teachers and the fixing of the university curriculum, stating that what was wanted was less humanistic and more social education. In Venezuela students attack the President-for-life, Gomez, and manifest pro-labor and anti-church sentiments, and similarly in Peru and Chile. In Colombia they are frankly socialist, anti-church, and at present, due to the Barco oil-concession dispute, agitate for nationalization of the subsoil. But from Mexico to Argentina these groups have one powerful link: fear, hate, resentment of American capital and American marines.

All these organizations have grown up in the past ten years. They are nowhere very large, nevertheless they have considerable significance. Young Latin Americans, particularly, find it difficult to bracket Lindbergh and Sandino in the same diplomatic sentence. The APRA, the Union Latino Americana, and the groups affiliated with them, are distinctly hostile to the Pan-American ideal of a hundred years ago, and also hostile to the present Pan-American Union, because, they say, it is a diplomatic lie.

The views and policies of Haya de la Torre and of his active allies are an extreme and unusually precise version of opinion general in Latin America today, but most intense and articulate in the cultured classes. APRA and Union Latino Americana membership is drawn almost entirely from literary, scholastic, and artistic circles. The leaders are men respected in their countries for intellectual and artistic achievements. In Argentina the initiator of the Union Latino Americana was José Ingenieros, sociologist and teacher in the University of La Plata. With him were associated Manuel Ugarte, present consul of Argentina in Nice, and José Vasconcelos, then Mexican Minister of Education. In Mexico today one of the active APRA leaders is Diego Rivera, the painter.

This new Latin Americanism is directly caused by American intervention, American continental manners, above all by the struggle in Nicaragua. The working form of it is partly an Argentinian, mostly a Mexican contribution. Haya de la Torre began his active career by forming student-labor nuclei called popular universities in his own country, Peru. He was thrown into prison by his kinsman the Peruvian President-for-life, Leguia, and after a hunger-strike in protest he was released, largely because of clamor in Mexico. In Mexico De la Torre later found a refuge and a place in literary and artistic activities under Vasconcelos. The APRA and the Union Latino Americana date from this period.

The Mexican influence in the new Latin Americanism is, however, due to more than such courtesies. Mexico, besides being the cross-roads and refuge of Latin-American exiles, has also become the focus of Latin-American nationalist culture. Hence the new Latin Americanism, a product of the cultured classes, is modeled on Mexican nationalism, which is expressed in literature and art. From Mexico comes the insistence on organization, and proposals of constitutional inter-Latin-American citizenship. From Mexico comes the idea of art wedded to the nation's troubles and ideals. It is the thing to write, sing, and paint such themes as economic problems and inter-American conflicts. Mexican ideas are carried in the body of Mexican art, and this is wonderfully moving to people driven in upon themselves, made nationally self-conscious, largely because of American aggression.

Except perhaps in Mexico and Argentina, this militant Latin Americanism is no immediate political factor. It may elsewhere never come to mean much more to the United States than guerrilla warfare of the Mexican and Sandino school, a certain amount of sabotage, and a good deal of printed noise. But, carried by cheerful, simple, healthy, and energetic young men such as Haya de la Torre, this spoken, printed, and painted noise strikes home to the young people, who are even more restless, discontented, nationally self-conscious than their intellectual predecessors, and who have as yet no political or commercial ax to grind.

Matter-of-fact Haya de la Torre and stubborn Sandino are members of the same suicide club. They pit themselves against enormous odds with a sincerity and a lack of pose that makes a tremendous appeal to Latin-American youth. They are heroes, but more than that they are symbols and models. This is in the end their real significance, and it is one that at this moment is easily underestimated.

CENTENARY EDITION OF

JOSEF DIETZGEN'S

The Positive Outcome of Philosophy

Josef Dietzgen, born December 9, 1828, approached the problems of philosophy from the view-point of the revolutionary working class. This book, his greatest work, deals with the nature and substance of thinking. It discards mysticism, and shows brain work as a natural process.

In the twenty years since Dietzgen's works first appeared in English, the name and fame of the "workingman philosopher" have become familiar to an ever-widening circle of proletarian students, who find Dietzgen's logic a sharp and invincible theoretical weapon. This new translation will be welcomed for its added clearness and strength. Cloth, 450 pages, $2.00 postpaid.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: NATION, New York. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising, Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 34, Clifton Gardens, W. 9, London, England.

THE NATION is on file in most public and college libraries and is indexed in the Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature.

Why is Mr. Kellogg building dreadnaughts and cruisers? He says: "Thou shalt not kill," but he also says: "Fill your waist-belt with knives and pistols so as to be ready to kill."

THUS SPOKE DAVID LLOYD GEORGE at the opening of a remarkable "peace campaign" initiated by the Liberal Party in England on October 8. Mr. Lloyd George added that the nations of the world were heading straight for war, not because any one wanted it, but because no one had the courage to stop the runaway horses of the chariot of war. Unless, he continued, nations soon definitely and finally committed themselves to peaceful means of settling disputes, "God alone can save the world from a more terrible war than has ever been seen." Unquestionably true, but it is again the so-called statesmen, and not God or the nations, that are drifting into war; the people are powerless. The very day that Lloyd George spoke Mussolini ridiculed the Kellogg peace pact which his country so solemnly signed. "The trouble is," he said, "that the whole world is again arming itself. The number of bayonets and cannon is constantly increasing, yet everybody speaks of peace." He is himself one of the greatest menaces to peace and, of course, preaches the bad Rooseveltian doctrine of speaking softly—when not roughly—and of carrying a big stick.

AS FOR OUR AMERICAN RELATIONS with England, they are getting worse. Field Marshal Sir William Robertson has made a speech pointing out that we are drifting into the same situation as were Germany and England prior to the war and declaring that our actions are "disquieting." Washington replies to this that the Government regards such speeches as "deliberate English propaganda" to hamper our building program and "about the last straw so far as official patience here is concerned." (New York Herald Tribune, December 7.) In France $80,000 has just been voted from the secret funds for special aviation purposes, only Socialists and Communists dissenting. Every day makes it clearer that governments should no longer be trusted with the war-making power, and that war is more threatening. How shocking it is, therefore, that the Federal Council of Churches, which has just elected that admirable social statesman Bishop Francis J. McConnell as its presiding officer, could not vote at its sixth quadrennial session on December 7 that there should be complete "renunciation of war and the refusal of the church of Christ as an institution to be used as an instrument or an agency in support of war." Some delegates suggested the inevitable "defensive-war" red herring, with the result that the whole matter was referred to the new quadrennial session in 1932! By that time hell may be firmly established on earth and the need for any churches ended. It was Lloyd George who on July 28, 1922, correctly declared that if the "churches of Christ throughout England and America allow that [another war] to fructify, they had better close their doors. The next war . . . will be a war on civilization itself." And the Federal Council of Churches must mark time for four years!

MEANWHILE THE PRESIDENT has suddenly thrown his influence openly into the scale on behalf of the fifteen new cruisers and the Kellogg pact. The "official spokesman" has been discarded. Mr. Coolidge himself told the press of Mr. Kellogg's testimony before the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, although such testimony is usually considered confidential. He is also the source of the news that he has received thousands of letters on behalf of the Kellogg pact. It is now being claimed in Washington that the fifteen cruisers are merely replacements of ships more than twenty years old and that if built we shall still have less cruiser tonnage than was to have been allotted to us at Geneva by our partners in that conference for the limitation of fleets. The number of protests against the cruiser plan is not announced by the President, but there is every reason to believe that they are very numerous, especially from men in pulpits. In Washington journalistic circles opinion is divided, but there is a growing feeling that nothing will come out of this dying Congress except the appropriation bills. This would be remarkable because there is no real opposition to the Kellogg pact, outside of a very few men. The general attitude is that a vote for it is like a vote for the Ten Commandments, perfectly proper and in no wise affecting the existing status of the world.

NOT ONLY THE LIBERAL PRESS but conservative papers like the London Express have now turned against the policy of Austen Chamberlain in making Great Britain merely an echo of France's wishes in regard to reparations and disarmament. Says the Express: "If he continues to maintain that reparations and evacuation are indissolubly linked, and that we cannot leave the Rhineland until all the terms of the Treaty of Versailles have been carried out to the letter, then he will not be speaking for Britain, and the outside world should know it." The Manchester Guardian naturally demands to know whether the protocol with its definite promise of evacuation in the event of good faith is to be treated as a "scrap of paper." "Narrow legalistic hair-splitting will not suffice," it declares. "The fact remains that the former Allies are morally bound to withdraw their troops." It is also a fact that the present policy of England and France is a direct negation of the spirit of Locarno and that every day the troops stay in Germany the more difficult they make the task of the German Government in carrying out the reparations program; indeed, their presence endangers a continuance of Dr. Stresemann in office and strengthens the reactionary and nationalistic forces within the Reich. As we go to press it appears as if there might be a promise of partial evacuation in 1929. But that is not adequate. Good faith, honesty, and a respect for the integrity of the Treaty of Versailles, as well as self-interest in the matter of reparations, all dictate immediate and complete withdrawal. The pretense that any further coercion of Germany is needed is as false as it is preposterous.

IN BOLIVIA'S CAPITAL, the name of which—in English—is Peace, they are shouting War. At this writing the popular outburst in La Paz has all the makings of the stupidest kind of nationalistic conflict. There is a patriotic frenzy over "wounded honor," in consequence of which overwrought young men are clamoring for the high privilege of wallowing in the mud, getting lousy, and finally rotting into carrion on a "field of glory." The cause of the madness is a disputed boundary line between Bolivia and Paraguay. The contested boundary, of which there are still a number in Latin America, didn't matter until oil—that most inflammable product—was found in the neighborhood. Then both countries sent troops into the region, and never in history has such action had any but one result—a clash. There is no use in trying to apportion the blame—both sides were as culpable in letting their respective forces come together as if they had unleashed two bulldogs in the same inclosure. But after the set-to Paraguay sensibly offered to arbitrate the dispute under the Gondra Convention; Bolivia, talking of "wounded honor," began to demur. It is sincerely to be hoped that Bolivia may be otherwise persuaded. War at any time is foolish and tragic. But at the Christmas season, during the "good-will trip" of Mr. Hoover, and coincident with the sessions of the Pan-American arbitration conference in Washington a conflict would be not only the depth of stupidity but also the height of irony. We wish success to the committee on conciliation headed by Mr. Hughes.

NINE HUNDRED THOUSAND British miners are on the verge of starvation. And this is not even front-page news in our press. We enlarge our headlines for spectacular and dramatic disasters at sea; but for the time-worn conflict of labor and capital, the dreary round of strike and starve or work and starve only a little less, we have no longer any but the most casual notice. Charity has made only a small dent in the misery in South Wales and Durham; subsistence doles prolong lives that are such only in that breath remains in wasted bodies. The Government's plan to revive depressed industries, of which coal is one, will take a long time to take effect if it ever does. A scheme of cultivating 10,000 vegetable gardens to raise food for relief means little in winter. Conferences mean even less. They are as ever-present as distress among the miners. And in the face of an approaching winter the South Wales colliery owners have offered a wage reduction of $.25 a shift—12½ per cent. In two years the mine owners have lost nearly £5,500,000. If they at least have enough to eat and clothes to cover them, they, too, have their difficulties. The trouble is not with individual owners or a particular strike, but with the coal industry as a whole. Not only the miners but the industry itself is starving to death—as slowly and surely as the bitter Welsh winter approaches. Where is King Coal? Who or what can save him? The miners say higher wages; the owners say lower wages; the "public" says conferences. But the patient continues to weaken.

THE SENATORS who are fighting against the confirmation of Roy O. West as Secretary of the Interior will have the good-will of every believer in clean government. A sinner may become an archbishop in the pages of a story book, but in real life we doubt whether a faithful attorney for Samuel Insull can become a good Secretary of the Interior. Mr. West was for thirty years the henchman of the very magnates who are now fighting for the private ownership and exploitation of the natural resources which a Secretary of the Interior is supposed to protect. He admitted on the witness stand that he owned large blocks of utilities stocks and handled a goodly share of Samuel Insull's political "appropriations." Apparently he believes that his own case before the Senate is hopeless, for he is brazenly defying decent public sentiment. The case of the Insull interests and Cumberland Falls came before the Federal Power Commission on the very day that Mr. West's appointment was sent to the Senate. Cumberland Falls, known as "the Niagara of the South," is located in eastern Kentucky and is one of twenty power sites in that State which Insull's Middle Western Utilities Company is trying to capture. Although Mr. West has admitted ownership of a large block of stock in this Middle Western Utilities Company, he saw nothing indelicate or questionable in sitting with the Federal Power Commission in his capacity as ex-officio member when the Insull case came up. Such loyalty to his former employers, we trust, will result in Mr. West's being returned by the Senate to the bosom of the Republican Party of Chicago.

WE CANNOT LET PASS without comment the recent retirement of E. A. Stewart, associate professor of agricultural engineering at the University of Minnesota, to become president of the Northwestern Public Utilities Company, with main offices in Minneapolis. For our readers may see in the incident a striking example of the law of cause and effect, or a pretty version of the old story of Virtue Rewarded. While a member of the faculty of a great State university Professor Stewart took from utility companies pay for his time and expenses in attending various power conferences. For going to the World Power Conference in Switzerland, for instance, he received $500 a month for two months and $485 toward his expenses. A couple of years ago he visited Ontario and made an unfavorable report on the government-owned power system. The chairman of the Hydro-Electric Power Commission charged that although errors and misstatements were called to Professor Stewart's attention before the report was published, no corrections were made. Last winter when the Ontario report was quoted by the Portland Press Herald the Evening News of the same city wrote to Professor Stewart for confirmation of the figures. Instead of a simple reply Professor Stewart offered to go to Maine to deliver a series of addresses in order to give the people "the proper information along this line." When S. S. Wyer published through the Smithsonian Institution a partisan attack on the Ontario power development our hero wrote to the author: "Hallelujah, thine the glory. Hallelujah, amen!" We congratulate the University of Minnesota and Professor Stewart on his change of job. He has earned it.

CHRISTMAS WILL BRING FREEDOM for Eugene Barnett, one of the eight men sentenced to life imprisonment after the raid of American Legion members on the hall of the Industrial Workers of the World in Centralia, Washington, in 1919. The favorable action of the Washington Parole Board in voting to grant Barnett's request for a parole gives hope that the other victims of the Centralia hysteria will soon be released. One member of the American Legion, Captain E. P. Coll of Hoquiam, Washington, is certainly doing his best to compensate for the Centralia injustice. In an open letter to his fellow-Legionnaires he says:

The I. W. W. in Centralia, Washington, who fired upon the men that were attempting to raid the I. W. W. headquarters were fully justified in their act. . . . As in the famous Dreyfus case in France, so in the State of Washington, a great wrong has been done and the innocent party has suffered. . . . As a Legionnaire I wish to prevent the shrine of the American Legion from becoming the shame of the American Legion.

Meanwhile there are many other men in American prisons because they have taken an aggressive part in the labor struggle, and the Christmas season is an appropriate time to remember them. For those who have no labor friends in jail there are the silk strikers of Paterson, New Jersey, who have been fighting for eight weeks for the forty-four hour week in the silk industry and the recognition of their union. Christmas cheer may be addressed to them at Strike Relief Fund, Associated Silk Workers, 201 Market Street, Paterson, New Jersey.

ALTHOUGH PAXTON HIBBEN died while he was still a young man, his life held more of the life of the world in its compass than most long spans of years. His early experience in the diplomatic service led him into Russia—and later to Mexico, Holland, Chile, and other countries. From 1915 to 1917 he was a war correspondent in Europe. When America entered the war Hibben served in the field artillery and gained the rank of captain. He worked with the Near East Relief from 1920 to 1922, was attached to the military mission in Armenia, and finally took charge of the American Committee for the Relief of Russian Children. His intense sympathy for Russia and his passionate belief that the Soviet Government should be recognized by the United States involved him in difficulties with the military authorities, who attempted to cancel his commission as captain in the Officers' Reserve Corps. Hibben fought the case through the hearings before a court of inquiry, and his commission was subsequently renewed. He also took part in the battle for justice for Sacco and Vanzetti. Recently, in addition to his public work, Paxton Hibben had been chiefly engaged with biographical writing. His outspoken life of Henry Ward Beecher, published in 1927, caused a hot controversy; at the time of his death he was deep in work on a closely documented book on William Jennings Bryan. A man with so many varied interests and self-imposed tasks, with such passion and eager intensity and unrelenting activity must necessarily wear his resources thin. His loss is a heavy one for everyone who knew and loved him and for those movements for human freedom which had come to count so surely upon his valor and fiery enthusiasm.

ELLERY SEDGWICK must have known that his sensational publication in the Atlantic Monthly of letters and memoranda supposedly written by Abraham Lincoln would raise a storm. We have no desire to prejudice the case or do more than attempt to weigh the effect of conflicting testimony; but at this point in the discussion the group of experts who have risen up to call the letters forgeries seems to us impressive, while Mr. Sedgwick's replies have appeared ineffective by comparison. This proves nothing except, perhaps, that the editor of the Atlantic proceeded unwisely when he began publication of the documents without consulting all the available authorities; and also when he failed to mention Worthington Ford's preliminary judgment that the letters were fakes. So good a pilot as Ellery Sedgwick should not have set sail on such precarious seas without taking every precaution.

LIQUOR IS GOING TO COST MORE in 1929, though there is no reason to believe that it will be any scarcer. The House has just voted, for dry-law enforcement, the largest appropriation in the history of the "noble experiment"—$32,000,000 to be spent by the same men who thus far have not really tried to enforce it. This means that the number of prohibition agents will be increased. This means that speakeasy proprietors will have to pay more and probably larger fees to keep the agents satisfied. This means that the customer will have to pay more for his drinks. Perhaps, if we make larger appropriations and appoint more agents every year, the cost of liquor may become so high that the drinking population will be reduced to the prohibition agents who get their drinks free. But by that time, granted our Republican prosperity endures, the majority of citizens will be prohibition agents and we shall have to begin all over again. Meanwhile recent Speakeasiana indicate that the show, which has already run nine years, is getting funnier every season. A speakeasy in New York City has just been closed—for violating the Board of Health rules concerning ventilation. In another establishment at three o'clock each morning the proprietor goes the rounds telling his patrons that it is closing time. When there are protests he says firmly: "The place closes at three o'clock. I gotta obey the curfew law." And he does. Stanley Glowka was arraigned in court last week on a charge of running a restaurant without a license. "It isn't a restaurant, Judge," said he. "It's only a speakeasy. I don't need a license for that." But the health officer who had arrested him said the place looked like a restaurant and Glowka was fined $5. May we now look to see the development of a distinctive speakeasy architecture to guard against raids?

Twenty-five Years of Flight

ON December 17, 1903, on a lonely sand dune along the coast of North Carolina an odd-looking contrivance bearing a man rose from the earth, soared through the air for some seconds, and then came safely to the ground again. After aspiring toward the feat from the infancy of the race man had at last learned to fly. Strange to say, the accomplishment of this dream was heralded with no burst of publicity. Wilbur and Orville Wright had purposely chosen one of the loneliest and most isolated spots in the country for their experiments, and newspaper correspondents were rigidly excluded from this first flying-field in America during the years when the Wright brothers were carrying on their momentous experiments. Only a few stray newspaper paragraphs, based on rumor, recorded the successful culmination of the long effort to fly in a heavier-than-air machine, nor was much heard of subsequent experiments for about five years. The American public remained incredulous and almost indifferent toward the achievement until the Wright brothers went to Paris and unimpeachable testimony came from there of the practical success which they had attained.

Looking back over the phenomenal progress since the flight at Kitty Hawk, North Carolina, it seems incredible that only twenty-five years have intervened. In that brief time, and mostly in fact during the decade since the end of the World War, airplanes have crossed the Atlantic Ocean in both directions, circled over the North Pole, and spied out all the most remote spots of the globe. There is a criss-cross of mail and passenger lines in all directions; United States air-mail pilots flew 5,585,224 miles in the last fiscal year. The National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics has just reported an increase last year by 100 per cent in the number of airplanes produced for private ownership and operation. It would take a bold imagination, as we pause to celebrate the silver anniversary of the beginning of successful flight, to measure the progress that we may hope for in another quarter of a century. The United States, which has lagged behind Europe in the establishment of passenger air lines, is undoubtedly at the edge of a prodigious development in that direction, as also a great spread in the private use of airplanes for sport or utility. With this development will come an even greater need for regulation and control than in the case of the automobile, and it is to be hoped that a firm grip of the problem will not be postponed as long as in the case of the motor car.

One cloud in the sky of the silver anniversary of the airplane is the unhappy controversy between Wilbur Wright and the Smithsonian Institution over the legitimate place in flying history of Samuel Pierpont Langley. With their usual devotion to success American newspapers have been disposed to side strongly with Wilbur Wright, who undoubtedly was justified in resenting the original course of the Smithsonian Institution in its effort to exalt the reputation of its one-time chief. But under its present secretary, Charles G. Abbot, the Smithsonian Institution seems to have made an honest attempt to rectify past errors, and it is to be hoped that Wilbur Wright will eventually see his way to depositing in the National Museum at Washington the original Kitty Hawk airplane which in his resentment he turned over for exhibition purposes to the South Kensington Museum in London.

Langley was the pioneer American in the field of heavier-than-air flying, beginning his experiments as far back as 1887 and persisting in them until his death. All this in spite of public ridicule, which previous to twenty-five years ago was directed upon any one who essayed to fly in the same way that it is now turned upon the man who sets out to achieve perpetual motion. Langley actually flew model airplanes in 1896 and, having obtained a government appropriation of $50,000, undertook the construction of what he called an aerodrome. This was a kind of tandem airplane carrying one man, and two attempts to fly it were made in 1903, shortly before the Kitty Hawk flight of the Wright brothers. Both attempts failed because of faulty launchings, and the aerodrome fell into the Potomac River. Whether the machine would have flown if properly launched will never be known. In 1914 it was sent to the workshops of Glenn H. Curtiss at Hammondsport, New York, where it was reconstructed, admittedly changed somewhat, and then successfully flown, first with the original engine and later with an improved motor. Certain changes in the aerodrome were necessary because of a different method of launching. How material those changes were must, of course, remain a disputed question, but Joseph S. Ames, professor of physics at Johns Hopkins University, and Rear Admiral D. W. Taylor—whom the Smithsonian Institution asked to investigate the subject—stated it as their belief that the Langley machine "was capable of sustained flight had it been successfully launched."

The Smithsonian Institution has recently issued a small pamphlet on the Wright controversy in which it is set forth that too much has been claimed for Langley in various ways in the past and that it was unfortunate that the restoration of his machine was intrusted to Curtiss with whom the Wright interests were in litigation at the time in regard to patents. It is specifically admitted that the label originally placed beside the Langley machine in the National Museum at Washington was a mistake. This label read: "The first man-carrying aeroplane in the history of the world capable of sustained free flight. Invented, built, and tested over the Potomac River by Samuel Pierpont Langley in 1903. Successfully flown at Hammondsport, N. Y., June 2, 1914." In order to take the exhibit out of the range of controversy this label has now been changed to read simply:

LANGLEY AERODROME

THE ORIGINAL SAMUEL PIERPONT LANGLEY FLYING MACHINE
OF 1903, RESTORED

Deposited by
The Smithsonian Institution

Certainly the American public has no wish to belittle in the slightest degree the high and legitimate fame of the Wright brothers. On the other hand, it should protect the memory of Langley, who came close to his goal but failed to enter the Promised Land. It is desirable that the original Kitty Hawk airplane come back some day to the country where it first spread its wings, but it is more important still that history be recorded fairly.

Undemocratic Democracy

IT is good news which comes from Washington that a determined fight will be made this winter for a reapportionment of members of Congress. Of the many anomalies in our democracy, such as the lame-duck session of Congress and the obsolete Electoral College, the most notorious and inexcusable is the failure to reapportion the membership of Congress and of the Electoral College according to the census of 1920. Critics and fair-minded Congressmen have fought for eight years to force our Representatives to carry out the clear mandate of the Constitution that Congress should be reapportioned after each census. But what is the Constitution among Congressmen? The log-rolling, reactionary traders from the stagnant States have boasted that the reapportionment bill can pass only over their dead bodies. Accordingly we are still conducting Congressional and Presidential elections according to the census of 1910.

Many Americans who read of the apportionment scandal are inclined to yawn and ask: "What of it? What is one moron more or less in a Congress so stupid and corrupt that it cannot even revise its own system of seating legally?" This contempt of Congress created by its failure to reconstruct its own representation has at last got under the skins of a considerable number of Congressional leaders who are determined to filibuster, if necessary, until reapportionment is effected. They are supporting the Fenn bill which would reapportion Congress according to the census of 1930, taking effect in 1933, and automatically providing for reapportionment after every future decennial census. The Fenn bill wisely leaves the membership of the House at its present figure of 435—any larger number would make the already unwieldy body more cumbersome and incompetent.

Ideally we ought to give representation to the various States according to the number of voters rather than the number of persons who inhabit the State. This would give encouragement to voting and, incidentally, would punish the Southern States for their disfranchisement of the Negro. Kansas cast about six times as many votes in the election of 1924 as Mississippi, but these States have the same number of electoral votes and the same number of Congressmen. A South Carolina white man has seventeen times the voting power of a California white man, if we use the Presidential vote of 1924 as a measuring-rod. (South Carolina, which cast 50,751 votes, has nine men in Congress and nine electoral votes; California, which cast 1,281,778 votes, has thirteen men in Congress and thirteen electoral votes.) Some of these grotesqueries are due to the disfranchisement of Southern Negroes under a system which allows them to be counted as constituents, but very serious injustices can also be discovered in the distribution of voting power among white voters.

Since the census of 1910 great shifts have taken place in our population which are not accounted for under the present distribution of voting power. Millions who have moved from the country to the city have been virtually disfranchised because the increase in population of many metropolitan areas has not been taken into account. Detroit, for example, is still treated as a small city and so is Los Angeles. If the Fenn bill is passed, Michigan will get four more Congressmen and California six. Missouri will lose three, and Indiana, Iowa, Kentucky, and Mississippi two each. Ohio will gain three, and Texas and New Jersey two.

William Starr Myers of Princeton, writing in the North American Review before election, pointed out that our failure to reapportion constituencies since the 1910 census could elect to the Presidency a candidate who had been a loser in the popular vote. This result, of course, would be possible under our electoral-college system even without any maladjustment in apportionment. A candidate who carried New York by 1,000 votes could afford to lose half a dozen minor States by a margin of many millions and still emerge as the winner in the Electoral College. What most citizens do not appreciate is the extent of the injustice under the present system of apportionment. Twenty-three men are sitting in Congress who have no moral right to be there, and twenty-three men who ought to be there are denied the right to represent constituencies. Stated in mathematical terms nearly 5,000,000 people have their votes underweighted in Congressional and Presidential elections.

Some Congressmen in this session have questioned the legality of a Congress which failed to carry out the specific command in the Constitution to reapportion after each census. Apparently there is little weight in this point because there is no power great enough to compel our lawmakers to obey the Constitution if they care to defy it. But the pressure of public opinion is becoming great enough to embarrass even the hard-boiled provincials who have held up reapportionment bills for many years. The Fenn bill has a chance of success. With it, we hope, will be coupled the Norris Constitutional amendment to abolish the lame-duck session of Congress and a provision for the direct election of Presidents.

The Post-Dispatch

TO the St. Louis Post-Dispatch go our warmest congratulations upon the fiftieth anniversary of its birth, an occasion deserving of notice by all interested in journalism, for the Post-Dispatch stands second to no other newspaper in this country as a liberal news-daily, free and unfettered, able to say what it thinks without fear or favor. That the New York Times prints a greater volume of news is true; in nearly every other respect it is inferior, especially in its editorial page. The Sun and the Evening Sun of Baltimore rank next to the Post-Dispatch in fearlessness, cleanliness, intelligent news-gathering, tolerance, liberalism, and keen editorial comment. All three are at the forefront of the all-too-short list of liberal dailies deeply imbued with the democratic spirit.

In commemoration of this event the Post-Dispatch has issued a remarkable anniversary number of more than 200 pages, with dozens of valuable contributions from leaders in the fields of public opinion, science, literature, international relations, etc. From the pen of Charles G. Ross, one of its able Washington correspondents, comes a history of the newspaper and its achievements. Well does he set forth that record with pride. The Post-Dispatch has repeatedly lived up to the highest duty that rests upon the press—that of exposing rascality in public office. For St. Louis it has done that repeatedly. It was one of the earliest dailies to support Senator La Follette in his first unveiling of the oil scandals. During the war hysteria it kept its head—or more nearly so than the rest of the press—and it was quick to demand the release of the war prisoners. To it go men and women who are waging the new-old fight for liberty in the United States with complete certainty that they will be received with sympathy and understanding. This is not only because it is intrenched in principle. It realizes also that there is no better way to uphold and demonstrate a principle than by taking up cases of individual justice or individual injustice. It has rendered no greater service than in driving from the federal bench Judge George W. English, who so thoroughly abused his powers that rather than face trial he resigned. The entire case against him was worked up by some brilliant members of its staff and printed with characteristic fearlessness.

Three men are responsible for the fine record of the Post-Dispatch: Joseph Pulitzer, the founder; Joseph Pulitzer, the son; and the present managing editor, Oliver K. Bovard. Mr. Pulitzer's great service to journalism, at first apparently a great menace because of his sensationalism and yellowness, we have often dwelt upon. His son has shown extraordinary wisdom in his own attitude toward the paper and especially in the freedom given to its editors. He has kept it true to his father's finest traditions. As for Mr. Bovard, he is not only a born journalist, a rarely able newsgatherer, an inspirer and leader of his fellow-workers, but also a thoroughgoing old-fashioned American liberal. We place him first in the list of newspaper executives in this country. The paper continues under his guidance to print admirably revealing correspondence from Washington. He keeps its news columns as full as they are clean. Best of all he is as ready to espouse an unpopular cause as a popular one. Altogether the Post-Dispatch proves that there is still opportunity in this country for a newspaper which refuses to stoop to the gutter, which puts its faith in the selling power of honest news and of a brave and fearless editorial page, declining to become merely the profitable servant of great capital.

We wish that it were possible to speak with similar enthusiasm and hopefulness of the other Pulitzer daily, the New York World. It is the only liberal newspaper, save the New York Telegram, left in the metropolis. It still champions liberal causes; it still sympathizes with the underdog; and it continues to have the only distinguished editorial page in Manhattan. It rejoices in some interesting features, but it is so far inferior to the Post-Dispatch and its chief rivals as a gatherer of news as to cause great alarm to its friends. Its circulation stands still, or recedes; it had on October 1, last, 14,000 readers fewer than on October 1, 1923, while the evening edition lost 22,099 readers in twelve months. During 1927 the morning World lost 2,209,955 agate lines of advertising as contrasted with 1926, and it has lost advertising in 1928. These are symptoms to cause profound anxiety to its supporters and admirers, and to give concern to those in charge of the policy of making the World what is called a "selective newspaper." The more recent successes of journalism have been built on the principle of printing as much news as could be crowded in. The World by no means prints all the news. We set down these facts, reluctantly, only because any mishap to the World would be a grave blow to American liberalism.

The Lesson of the Vestris

History holds no incidents, to my knowledge, to compare with the incompetence and sheer stupidity of this exhibition, and disagreeable as it is for me to hold this up to public view, I feel that my duty would not be complete if I were to attempt in any way to gloss over or in any other way minimize such incompetence at sea.

THUS Captain E. P. Jessop, nautical expert for the United States Government, in his report on the sinking of the Vestris. This is not the opinion of a tyro, or of a publicity seeker. It is the considered conclusion of an experienced seafaring man.

Beginning with an improperly closed hatch, Captain Jessop calmly and quietly reports the steps that completed the tragedy of the Vestris. The seas that poured into the ship all day Sunday and caused her first to list alarmingly came through that hatch; later on when she was listing badly, other leaks occurred. The S O S should have been sent out not later than 4 a. m. Monday. (Captain Carey sent it at 9:58) Calls for ships to stand by should have been issued not later than midnight Sunday. With the ship leaking badly, only one pump was manned to expel the water. No attempt was made to cover coaling hatches on the upper deck until 3 p. m. Sunday, and then covering of canvas only was used. No general order was given to don life preservers. No boat drill had been held. No lifelines were run across the deck. No order was maintained in taking to the boats, and apparently the Captain stood by unprotesting while the women and children were loaded into the port boats on the high side of the ship, where they hung until the vessel foundered. Before a record like this Captain Jessop, and with him every follower of the sea and even every layman who possesses the ability to read and understand the English language, must throw up his hands in despair.

Captain Jessop's associate, Captain Henry McConkey, the British nautical expert, was more cautious in his findings. He preferred to suspend judgment on Captain Carey and his officers and to consider the cause of the disaster a mystery. In a sense he is quite right. For what happens to men when they lose command of themselves in an emergency is indeed a mystery.

One can only hope that out of this mysterious calamity will come something to prevent similar disasters. Captain Jessop recommends a more rigorous inspection of lifeboats, compulsory wireless for all ships, more careful examination and training for ship's officers, and, among other things, that owners be held responsible for competence of officers and crews. This brings us to Representative La Guardia, who would have the American shipping act of 1851 amended so that owners could be held fully accountable for lives or property lost on a sinking ship. The present act provides that owners are liable only to the extent of the value of the vessel saved. The Vestris was a total loss. Objections have been raised that suits for damages might totally bankrupt the ship-owners, particularly small shipping companies. Compulsory insurance for passengers has been suggested; certainly provisions should be made for the dependents of seamen, who are not at present protected under the Workman's Compensation Act. At the Conference on Safety of Life at Sea, to be held in London next spring, such problems must be faced.

It Seems to Heywood Broun

ST. JOHN ERVINE, dramatic critic of the New York World, states a most dangerous fallacy in a recent newspaper essay. However, in all fairness to Mr. Ervine it must be admitted that on many other occasions he has done much to disprove the axiom which he offers. "I happen," writes our English guest, "to be a European and, therefore, a civilized person."

Mr. Ervine may or may not be a civilized person. That issue is not entirely relevant, but it is nonsense to maintain that culture floats freely in any atmosphere to be had at the mere expense of breathing. Wisdom is granted only to such as take thought. It may descend, like the ravens of the Lord, even in the most unlikely places. The chief faults of America as I see them consist of an exaggerated arrogance coupled with a complement of forlorn humility. Many of us swagger confoundedly until challenged and then proceed to cringe most shamefully. If we could abate the strutting we might hold our heads higher in the face of frontal attack.

In elevating St. John Ervine to the seats of the mighty where judgments are passed upon the theatrical offerings of the season the World seems to have been seduced to some extent by the mere fact that here was an Englishman. To be sure, he had written two plays of considerable consequence and some novels not without merit. His reputation as a daily journalist was less securely founded and the World was seditious in so eagerly assuming that ignorance in this field was a matter of no moment. Mr. Ervine has been sharp in his criticism of those who approach the theater without the armor of proper craftsmanship. Yet he has failed signally in self-examination as to his own qualifications as a daily commentator upon the American drama. Surely there was nothing of humility in his approach to a job meriting the best in any man. It was his whim to compare the newspaper profession to the business of delivering ice, and in his own contribution to journalism Mr. Ervine has made that simile hold good, since it has been his practice to handle all things American with frigidity and tongs.

Moreover, it is my impression that this distinguished European has given a good deal less than honest weight. It was no fault of St. John Ervine's that he happened upon us in the middle of a season which bulks up below the average recently established. Still the land from which he came has not of late been blessed with any vast quantity of milk and honey within the portals of its playhouses. If the distinguished critic from London had scourged us with whips we might all have been irritated to our own advantage. Of course we could not have liked him in the least had he spit consistently upon our gabardine, but even so we might have admired his marksmanship. The crime of St. John Ervine is greater than this. He has tried to sting like a wasp and has merely succeeded in droning like a bee. Old-fashioned Southern hospitality should never be denied to any guest who speaks his mind in sincere asperity, but when a man manages to bound and bore with one and the same movement it does not seem amiss that a tired community should exclaim, "Go on Sinjun, get home, get home."

There is no point in my pretending that I am without prejudice in the matter although I must maintain that I am not aware of any personal commotion. My toes have not been touched in any personal controversy. But I am jealous of the honor of the newspaper business, and it was a profession of dignity and honor until so many visiting Englishmen rushed in. Always I am delighted when specialists from somewhat alien fields of literary endeavor condescend to stoop to daily hire and stumble even as they stoop. This has happened so regularly that one more failure would not be a sufficient occasion for bonfires and the tolling of chapel bells. Every working newspaperman knows what to expect when the editor hires some recluse to report the World's Series, or the Dayton Flood, or the heavy-weight championship. With singularly few exceptions the outsider has fallen down and been shoved aside in favor of the regular correspondent.

Admittedly, then, I am all for the reporter and against the amateur whether he comes from Bombay or Britain. But St. John Ervine has violated a code precious to the craft and sound enough in principle to enlist the support even of those who are not steeped in the tradition. We hold that no reporter should ever employ the columns of a newspaper to vent a spite which is purely personal in its causation.

When Mr. Ervine was first appointed a guest critic of the World that paper conducted a symposium among theatrical people as to the wisdom of this move. Naturally the replies were almost unanimously laudatory. This was a step which would lend strength and dignity to an art fallen into decay. St. John Ervine was hailed as the real McCoy and so on. One lone, large figure stood out against the tumult and the shouting. Mr. Philip Goodman, a producer of musical plays, said "No." He asserted that it seemed to him a ridiculous appointment and that the distinguished Englishman would prove in no way fitted for his task.

Whether this was second sight on the part of Mr. Goodman or the echo of some earlier row I do not know. At any rate the World printed his unfavorable opinion in its columns without comment and without change. Some weeks went by before it became Mr. Ervine's duty to sit in judgment upon any play sponsored by Mr. Goodman. Finally a musical show called "Rainbow" was brought in for inspection and St. John Ervine did not absent himself. He avoided the obvious and unspeakable revenge of taking out his irritation upon the show itself. He was able to moderate his enthusiasm which may have been no more than just, but he did make use of the occasion to deliver a flank attack upon Philip Goodman. The producer is a man of huge proportions and this served to inspire the critic to a number of digressions about Mr. Goodman's fearful appetite. No attempt was made to relate these observations to "Rainbow." It is hard to see just what Mr. Goodman's taste in food has to do with his preferences in book and lyrics. When the first edition of the World appeared Philip Goodman made a complaint about this extraneous material and it was deleted from subsequent editions.

Such American newspaper men as are lacking in European training may be barbarians, but we do possess strange native customs which even a civilized visitor should respect. That is our whim.

HEYWOOD BROWN

What's Wrong with The Nation?

By HOWARD MUMFORD JONES

[Mr. Mencken's article, What's Wrong With The Nation, which appeared in the issue of November 21, has inspired several interesting answers, of which Mr. Jones's is the first. Others will appear in subsequent issues.]

MR. MENCKEN does not in the least know what's wrong with The Nation. As a matter of fact there is not a thing wrong with it. Its editorials are firmly written, its reviews cut deep, and its criticism is well done. The only difficulty about The Nation is just that. Like a good sermon, it must by definition reach only the people who do not need it.

Consider, for example, its circulation. It never advances beyond a certain number which I will leave to the editors to supply. The country increases in size, issues flare up and die away, controversies engage the public mind, and the liberal magazines of opinion go into a new year with what the two black crows call a certain sum, and they come out of the year with the same amount. It may be a few thousand more or a few thousand less, but in the long run the subscribers remain about constant.*

In the meantime the reading public over the country increases. They take on book-of-the-month clubs without number (incidentally they read very good books); they support a vast variety of newspapers, often of considerable independence in editorial policy; and in these newspapers they read articles not a whit more difficult to understand than the articles in The Nation. The tide rises, the tide falls, and its circulation remains about the same. Indeed, whatever its absolute rise in circulation over the last ten years may be, I'll bet that in proportion to the total available public intelligent enough to follow its lucubrations its circulation is really decreasing.

What is the difficulty? What The Nation is not, is a national magazine. What it is is a New York magazine.

Consider, on the other hand, that admirable business enterprise, the Saturday Evening Post. It has a policy as definite as The Nation's policy, and it is a policy to which no liberal can give his support. It offers a vast variety of fictional entertainment for five cents; and this of course The Nation cannot do. Interspersed among the stories are shrewdly built special articles calculated to put over the economic views which its proprietors stand for, these in turn backed up by admirable editorials—not as good as they used to be, but still very good. Its fictional appeal aside, the Saturday Evening Post is trying to do what The Nation is trying to do: convert a vast number of people to an economic doctrine. Unlike The Nation, it is succeeding.

The obvious retort that the Saturday Evening Post appeals because of its fiction is beside the point. There are plenty of fiction magazines without economic propaganda, but the public continues to buy the Post. Why? The Saturday Evening Post is a national magazine.

Its editors never forget that the fact of the Post's being edited from Philadelphia is a geographical accident. The truth is that the editorial offices of the Post are not anywhere in particular. You can read its propaganda without knowing whether it emanates from Philadelphia or San Francisco. Its special articles, read in Los Angeles, seem to have been written in Los Angeles; read in Tampa, they fit without sense of difference into Tampa; they are the same in Chicago as they are in Laramie.

Consider now The Nation. It is not a national magazine. It emanates from New York, not only physically but mentally. Issue after issue shrieks at you that it has come out of New York. Its editors survey the country from New York. Its book reviewers either live in New York, or, when they do not, they write as if they did. It reviews New York plays. It carries New York advertisements. Its whole lingo is strange and foreign anywhere outside of New York.

Now the great popular mind is suspicious of New York. It has had its maiden aunt from Sioux City, Iowa, held up to ridicule just once too often. It has had the glories of New York architecture, the dreadfulness of Wall Street, the sophistication of Harlem, Greenwich Village, and the Algonquin Hotel told just too many times. New York is a foreign country which you visit for amusement, and a place which you visit for amusement is not the place whose leadership you are going seriously to accept.

Moreover, this attitude of mind is not characteristic of the mentally unwashed alone. It extends to the provincial leaders, educational, political, religious, commercial, which The Nation wants to reach and is not reaching. If the New-Yorkism of The Nation gives it detachment, it also gives it aloofness, and when you are struggling to advance the cause of educational progress in the Bible belt, or when you are endeavoring to secure a better tax system in Gopher Prairie, you may go to New York to secure the munitions of war from some of the educational foundations to whom yours is merely another case on their crowded docket, or you may carry your tale of woe to the editor of a liberal magazine to whom it is merely another instance of human folly, but in neither event are you going to take home with you the conviction that the New York expert or editor is the sort of fellow whom you could put on the local newspaper to write editorials for you. The editors of The Nation sit, like the gods in Lucretius, aloof and impartial, but you don't invite the gods to breakfast. The fact that the editorial offices of The Nation are in New York is not a geographical accident, it is a state of mind.

Contemplate, on the other hand, Mr. William Allen White. Mr. White battles for many of the things The Nation battles for, and if they disagree violently on other matters, yet their general outlook is not dissimilar. The country takes Mr. White (relatively speaking) to its bosom. Mr. White, I believe, is permanently at home in Emporia, Kansas, but he would be just as much at home in Minneapolis or Denver or Montpelier, Vermont, or (after a period of incubation) Charleston, South Carolina. The only place that Mr. White might not feel at home, I suspect, is in New York, considered as a state of mind. And this is not because Mr. White writes down to the folks or because he is temperamentally a more sympathetic or a less highbrow man than the editors of The Nation; the fundamental fact is that, like the editors of the Saturday Evening Post, Mr. White instinctively takes a position nowhere in particular. He is in a national state of mind.

It do not believe it is necessary to transplant The Nation physically from New York to, let us say, Sioux City, Iowa. I think, however, The Nation would get farther if it transplanted its mind to Sioux City, Iowa, and then in rapid succession to Billings, Montana, Fort Scott, Kansas, the University of Texas, a plantation in Virginia, the Open Forum in Sante Fe, a Cleveland steel mill, and a Nebraska church, and then, thoroughly dizzy from its revolution, come to rest in no particular spot at all.

You cannot edit a national liberal weekly by living in New York and making occasional raids into the rest of the country. The rest of the country lives where it lives and makes occasional raids on New York.

Hope for Progressives

By GEORGE W. NORRIS

NOW since the country has somewhat settled down from the excitement of the recent campaign, it is well to consider conditions that confront us all as a result of the election. It is our duty, of course, to accept the results even though we may be in some respects very much dissatisfied with them. No true progressive can yield the fundamental principles in which he believes merely because of temporary victory or defeat. However, it must be recognized that we can never make these principles effective if we conceal from ourselves the conditions under which we must work and the obstacles we must overcome.

I feel that in so far as genuine fundamental principles were given any consideration in that part of the campaign relating to the Presidential contest, the country has taken a backward step. Progressive principles, so far as the election of a President is concerned, have met with a temporary defeat. And yet I believe that a great majority of our people are truly progressive and at heart believe in the principles for which the progressive group has fought.

It is the source of a great deal of satisfaction that there was more independent voting in the recent election than in any national election that has ever taken place, and to the believer in honest, popular government this is a great comfort. It is to the independent voter and the independent thinker that civilization owes most of the advancement which it has made. There was more scratching of tickets in this election than ever took place before.

The result of this has been that the progressives in the legislative part of the election contest have really won a great victory. While voters by the million permitted themselves, in the Presidential part of the contest, to follow their religious prejudice and to settle the election, so far as the President was concerned, on this issue, they made no such mistake when it came to voting for Senators. Some of the States which elected Democratic progressive Senators went overwhelmingly for the Republican candidate for President. Some of these progressive Senators were Democrats, some were Republicans, some were Wet, some were Dry, some were Protestants, and some were Catholics, but their constituencies, while permitting their Presidential vote to be settled by religion or prohibition, paid no attention to these imaginary issues when it came to voting for Senator.

The people, however, have added to the difficulties of this progressive group. In their various contests in the Senate they have always been compelled to meet the opposition of the Administration forces. For eight years the occupant of the White House has used the power of his great office to block the pathway that they have attempted to travel and it looks now as though the country has decided that at least for four years more this same impediment shall stand in the way of legislative progress.

These progressive members are going to be handicapped by the claim, already being made, that the things for which they have stood have been adversely decided by the people in the settlement of the Presidential election. The great power trust has taken on new life. It is claiming now that its unpatriotic conduct in its attempt to control, by false propaganda, all avenues of human activity, so well disclosed by the investigation of the Federal Trade Commission, has been approved by the vote of a majority of the people themselves in their election of Mr. Hoover. The trust is claiming now that the fight made to save Muscle Shoals and Boulder Dam has been condemned, as shown by the enormous majority by which Mr. Hoover was elected President. Those who believe in our un-Christian and ungodly warfare upon Nicaragua and other weak, Central-American nations are now claiming that the use of our army and navy for these purposes has been beyond question approved by the American people. The standpat group of self-appointed alleged leaders who succeeded in defeating the "Lame Duck" amendment to the Constitution are laughing in glee at what they claim to be the death-blow administered to that amendment at the polls. Those who have favored the seating of Mr. Vare and Insull's man from Illinois in the Senate of the United States are pointing to the result of the recent election as a vindication of their conduct. The special interests which have fought ever since the war against giving agriculture any relief from the dire distress in which it has been floundering are pointing to the result of the election throughout the great agricultural West as a condemnation of those Senators who have been valiantly battling for farm relief.

The machine politician, the political boss, the representatives of monopoly, always asking for special legislation, are—one and all—vociferously claiming a great victory.

On the face of the returns and so far as the Presidential part of the contest is concerned, I think it must be admitted that there is some reason for this rejoicing and some foundation for the claims which these machines and bosses make. However, a close analysis of the entire election returns by the critical mind will, to a great extent at least, refute these unwarranted claims. The victory of progressive Senators is the answer.

In Wisconsin we find the progressive La Follette re-elected by 400,000 majority, while Mr. Hoover swept the State by almost 100,000. La Follette repudiated the platform on which Mr. Hoover carried the State. If you say that Hoover won Wisconsin on the prohibition issue, then how can you explain that the State went for La Follette, an anti-prohibitionist, by more than four times the majority received by Mr. Hoover? It must be realized also that Senator La Follette was bitterly fought by the Wisconsin managers of the Hoover campaign. The standpat Republican Hoover machine even went so far as to bolt the result of the Republican primary and put an independent candidate in the field. It denounced La Follette from every stump and the standpat press turned heaven and earth to secure votes against him.

In Montana, although the head of the Republican ticket carried the State by a crushing majority, the same citizens who gave this majority also gave a similar one to the progressive Senator Wheeler, running on the Democratic ticket, who repeatedly denounced the policies advocated by Mr. Hoover. It must be remembered that there, also, the machine, the so-called leaders, and an almost unanimous press were backing Mr. Hoover and fighting Senator Wheeler.

In Washington the same condition existed and while in that ordinarily Republican State they gave a majority to Mr. Hoover, on the same ballot they voted for Senator Dill, a Democrat, who stood on a platform not only of opposition but of condemnation of the Hoover policies.

In Arizona the religious prejudice was sufficient to give the State to Hoover by a large majority, and yet the people thought so much of progressive principles that, notwithstanding this religious prejudice, they reelected Senator Ashurst in spite of the fact that he is a Catholic.

In the rock-ribbed Republican State of Minnesota we have another illustration that the voters desired to give their approval to the fight that has been made by the little progressive group in the Senate. They gave the State to Hoover by a sweeping majority and at the same time reelected Senator Shipstead, who was running independent of both great parties, by a majority of over 300,000.

And so we might go on, but we will always find that the rank and file of the American citizenship were extremely anxious to give their approval to the principles for which the group of progressive Senators, regardless of politics, have been working and fighting. They believed so firmly in these principles that they did not permit the question of prohibition or the question of religion to influence their conclusions. It is true, as I have said, that this group have had their burdens increased in the fight which they must continue, but, through it all, they can clearly see that their work has been approved by the American people.

It may be and, in my judgment, it is inconsistent and perhaps illogical to reelect these progressive Senators to carry on their fight in favor of the governmental principles for which they have stood and at the same time elect a President who, in his official capacity, will perhaps be able to nullify every governmental step these Senators will take. But that is one of the inconsistent and irreconcilable difficulties of our complex electoral system.

In contests for seats in the House of Representatives candidates of the progressive type, whether Democratic or Republican, were either reelected or ran so far ahead of their tickets as to show the progressive sentiment of their districts with unmistakable certainty. The Republican landslide carried some of them to defeat, but in every such case it will be found upon looking over the record that the progressive candidate, even if defeated, ran so far ahead of his ticket as to constitute almost a condemnation of his successful opponent.

To sum up, it can fairly be stated that the progressive cause has been given a complete indorsement. This group in the Senate have been maintained and encouraged by a fresh indorsement from their constituents. The members of this group did not owe their victory to any single political party or organization. They won their seats on records of opposition to the standpat policies of the Harding-Coolidge Administration, on independent, constructive action in Congress, and on specific pledges to adhere to the policies upon which the indorsement was won. This group thus remains a nucleus for the millions of progressives throughout the country who are not content to intrust their government to machine-ridden parties and monopoly-controlled bosses.

Progressives have no personal ill-will against the President-elect, and this group in the Senate will ardently support the Administration in every instance where they believe it is right. They will criticize constructively if they think criticism is due, and they will do this without fear or favor in every case in which they believe such policies to be wrong. In this respect they will give to the new Administration the same respect, the same accord that they would have given to Governor Smith had he been elected.

Neither have progressives a single feeling of unkindliness against any man or woman who supported Mr. Hoover, believing that prohibition was the all-important issue. Such voters have a perfect right to their opinions and their judgment. They have a right to it without being criticized for having it. I, of course, do not agree with them. Personally, I believe the greatest single element entering into the overwhelming victory of Mr. Hoover was religion. Religious prejudice is at once the bitterest and the most unreasonable prejudice that ever took possession of the human heart. It never should have been given any consideration in the election. It never should have entered into the contest. The special interests, the power trust, the machine politicians, while they concealed their identity, nevertheless kept this issue to the front. They knew it was a false issue. They knew it was a wicked and unfair issue. But with remarkable perseverance, always concealing their activities, they aroused the religious hatred and animosities which sometimes control men's reason and judgment. They have sown the seeds of hatred in millions of human hearts and they will bear fruit long after the present generation shall have passed away. While the people were quarreling over a false issue they were industriously licking the platter clean and they are already claiming that the result is a complete vindication of their advocacy of turning over the natural resources of the country to monopoly and greed. For the good of our common country and for the advancement of Christian civilization, I believe that the man or woman whose vote was controlled by the religious issue was taking a course that will be detrimental to the future happiness and advancement of our people; and yet I frankly admit that a voter has a right, if he so desires, to make his decision entirely upon religious grounds in the casting of his ballot. I would not take away this right if I could. Every voter should decide for himself, according to the dictates of his own individual conscience, how he should vote, and he must be protected to the limit in carrying out this decision. Only in this way can we in the aggregate reach the highest ideals of a representative democracy, and when it is all over, whatever may be the verdict, every lover of liberty and justice, every believer in our form of government must accept the result as final.

Japan Fights for Manchuria

By THOMAS F. MILLARD

[The last of three articles by Mr. Millard. The other two appeared in the issues of December 5 and 12 respectively. Mr. Shigeyoshi Obata, correspondent of the Osaka Mainichi, will present the Japanese attitude toward Manchuria in an article appearing in the issue of January 2, 1929.]

Shanghai, October 8

THE Chinese are much less concerned about making a new commercial treaty with Japan than about whether Japan intends to "grab" Shantung and Manchuria. Japan's position in those regions now is tantamount to armed occupation. In Shantung and South Manchuria Japan's will is the sovereign power. China's authority is only a shadow. If conditions stay as they are a large piece of China's territory will pass under Japan's rule.

Manchuria is composed of three provinces—Shengking, Kirin, and Heilungkiang. Their combined area is 354,000 square miles; almost exactly the same as the States of Illinois, Iowa, Minnesota, Nebraska, and Kansas together. Manchuria lies in the same latitude as those States and has much the same climate, soil, and topography. It is a rich, healthful, and beautiful country as yet only partly developed.

Manchuria is peopled by about 22,000,000 Chinese, fewer than 100,000 Japanese (including Koreans), close to 100,000 Russians, and a few hundred other foreigners. The Japanese, Russians, and other foreigners are mostly concentrated in the larger towns. The wealth of Manchuria at present and in prospect depends fundamentally on the Chinese, who are rapidly settling on the land and opening new areas of production. Nearly a million Chinese emigrated to Manchuria in 1927.

A railway map of Manchuria presents the skeleton over which international diplomacy and intrigue spread their plans. Russia began it back in 1895 when Count Witte realized that his country's future lay eastward and launched what in those times was a colossal undertaking, the Siberia Railway, to open a path to the Pacific Ocean. Witte made a deal with Li Hung Chang, who felt the advantages to China of closer communication with Russia and Europe, whereby the railway could pass across Manchuria to Vladivostok, shortening the line several hundred miles.

That part of the railway in China's territory had a special status. It was a joint Chinese and Russian concern and was named the Chinese Eastern Railway. Later, when with the help of France and Germany, Russia artfully evicted Japan from the Liao-tung (which Japan took from China during the China-Japan war), Witte got a lease of Port Arthur, and the Chinese Eastern Railway was built from Harbin to that ice-free port in the Gulf of Chihli.

When by the peace terms of 1905 Japan took over the southern end of the Chinese Eastern Railway (now the South Manchuria Railway) the situation took a new turn. The Chinese made that first agreement for the construction of the Chinese Eastern Railway willingly. They were hesitant about the southward extension and the Port Arthur lease, but Li Hung Chang wanted Russia as a stand-off to Japan. From a time prior to the Russo-Japan war and for years thereafter China was a pawn in the game.

In its advance into Manchuria from Korea by way of Antung the Japanese army built a light railway as it moved along. After the war Japan reconstructed that light railway into a standard-gauge line that is now part of the Japanese railway system linking Japan, Korea, and Manchuria. The Chinese objected but, as in many other matters, had to give way. Japan acquired from Russia the "stub" from the main line to Newchwang.

By that time Peking was alarmed at the trend of Japanese and Russian policy in Manchuria and sought a counterweight. That led to an agreement, obtained by the late Willard Straight, for American capitalists to build, for China, a railway from Chinchow in southwestern Shengking Province to Aigun on the Amur River, a distance of about 900 miles. Such a line connecting directly with the railway system of China would have broken up Russo-Japan control of the Eastern provinces. About that time Philander C. Knox, then American Secretary of State, moved to break the Russo-Japan grip in Manchuria and to restore the "open door" there by proposing that all railways in that region should be neutralized and consolidated under international administration until China could pay for them.

The Knox neutralization proposal was made late in 1909 and it created a sensation. Japan and Russia, lately at war against each other, at once combined to keep American interests out of Manchuria, and those governments, by means of a ring of secret agreements among the Powers, got Great Britain and France to join them to intimidate Peking. That opposition killed the Chinchow-Aigun railway project and it was not until some time afterward that the State Department learned how the trick was turned. At Peking in 1910 I obtained texts of the notes of the British, French, Russian, and Japanese governments to the Wai Chiao-pu (Peking Foreign Office) and published them. Mr. Knox told me afterward that that was the first positive knowledge he had of what was done to kill his plan to end the international struggle for advantage in Manchuria.

If Mr. Knox were alive today he probably would smile to see how the Chinese, twenty years later, have outwitted and outfinessed the Japanese and Russian opposition and have built the Chinchow-Aigun Railway to a point where it touches the east-west line of the Chinese Eastern Railway. This new line is not, of course, named the Chinchow-Aigun Railway. It is composed of several short lines built at different times and having different names.

For many years after the Russo-Japan war Japan opposed and defeated every effort of the Chinese to build railways in Manchuria. The Twenty-One Demands provided that China should not build any railways in Manchuria and Inner Mongolia without previously consulting Japan and that China must use Japanese capital. But when, at the Washington Conference, the Twenty-One Demands and the treaties based on them fell under international disapproval, "spheres of influence" were renounced and secret agreements denounced, and Manchuria was formally recognized as an integral part of China's territory, Japan modified her attitude. The Chinese thereafter were permitted to build a number of short lines, all connecting, however, with the South Manchuria Railway. Japan helped to finance some of those lines, for they "feed" the Japanese trunk line. Japanese tried to get an agreement that traffic on those Chinese lines should be routed to Dairen, which meant that the South Manchuria Railway would get the major part of the land haul and Japanese ships would get the major part of the water haul. To that Chang Tso-lin would not agree, although strong pressure was put to make him consent.

The Chinese, on their own, began to connect the "spur" lines with each other and those connections will make it possible to go by train from China to Europe, or to Vladivostok, without touching a Japanese line anywhere. In that oblique way the thought back of the old Chinchow-Aigun project is being realized.

Japan does not like that at all, but the way conditions have been since the Washington Conference, it has been difficult for her to prevent those developments. Chang Tso-lin and other high Chinese officials in Manchuria had become unruly in those matters. The railway situation probably more than any other matter caused Tokyo to return to a "firm" policy vis-a-vis China and to an aggressive policy in Manchuria.

Japan's policy is to "preserve peace" in China, and whenever anything that is likely to disturb the peace here is discerned by Tokyo's watchful eye then something has to be done about it. Tokyo foresaw that peace would be endangered in Shantung and sent troops to occupy that province. Tokyo foresaw that peace would be endangered in the Tientsin-Peking region and sent troops there. Tokyo foresaw that peace might be endangered in Manchuria and sent troops there. Tokyo foresaw danger to peace away off on the Mongolia-Manchuria border, and, as Premier Tanaka is quoted by Japanese newspapers, "fears that complications will arise between China and Russia from the Hulunbor incident, and in such a contingency Japan must take proper and effectual steps for the maintenance of peace in the three Eastern provinces in view of Japan's declaration some time ago in regard to the preservation of peace in Manchuria."

In short, Japan's purpose evidently is to set up in Manchuria a puppet Chinese government behind which Japan will rule that country until a time comes when it can be annexed without opposition from other Powers. That is not an imaginary or trumped-up accusation. The project is spread plainly in the Japanese press and Japan's propaganda organs in China day after day. It often gets confirmation from utterances of responsible Japanese officials. General Fukishi, who accompanied Baron Hayashi to Mukden when the latter gave the second warning to the Manchuria Government not to join the Chinese National Government, said on returning to Japan: "Manchuria is Japan's daughter and our first line of defense."

Defense against what or whom? China and Russia evidently. Manchuria would not be much of a defense, let us say, against Great Britain or America. Such utterances, taken with conditions that exist in Manchuria, forecast events rather plainly. Military observers believe that Japan was more than willing for Chang Tso-lin to squander money in building the huge Mukden arsenal because Japan expects to find use for it. Those observers regard the South Manchuria Railway system of hotels as a camouflaged chain of military hospitals, with the immense new hospital at Dairen as a base. Military experts regard the railways in Manchuria that connect with the Japanese lines in Korea as providing a way to bring large numbers of Japanese troops quickly into Manchuria and to supply them on the Siberia border. If war comes with Russia, Japan, so the military experts think, plans to have the first battle line on that frontier. The Russians are not oblivious to what this situation and Japan's "firm" policy toward China connote. They regard it as the Japanese military oligarchy's last magnificent gesture to stave off a revolution in Japan.

In Manchuria one can perceive another great war in the making. I venture the opinion that when, and if, it comes, the other principal Pacific Ocean Powers will be drawn into that war before it ends.

It Costs Money to Die

By PAUL BLANSHARD

AMONG certain ancient tribes it was the custom to throw upon the funeral pyre the clothing, jewelry, and money belonging to the deceased. Occasionally a widow or a slave was thrown in for good measure. We in the United States do nothing so foolish. We merely throw into the grave annually several hundred million dollars. We throw it in in the form of bronze caskets, flowers, stone cases, silk paddings, gold handles, and mausoleums.

The corpse does not know the difference. Most of the American people if asked individually whether or not they wanted an ostentatious funeral would reply that they cared nothing whatever about what happened to their bodies after death. Yet the extravagant funeral is always with us. In fact, the United States has the most extravagant funeral practices in all history and they seem to be getting more costly every year. The prodigious waste and suffering wrought by our funeral customs are set forth in a study recently published by Putnams* and written by John C.

Gebhart after a thorough investigation which was financed by the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company. Consumers of caskets ought to study this book—and, in this particular, every citizen is an ultimate consumer. Mr. Gebhart follows up and completes the research begun by earlier writers including Quincy L. Dowd and Frederick Hoffman.

A funeral could be had in the United States before the Civil War for $25. Gebhart prints the bill of a Boston funeral in 1829 for $8. A funeral today for a Boston citizen of the same class would probably cost $400. Between the $8 bill and the $400 bill there is the difference of a century, face veils, limousines, professional pall-bearers, metal caskets, cast-stone vaults, chapel palms, newspaper notices, and morticians. But the greatest of these is the mortician. One cannot study the development of American funeral customs without being forced to the conclusion that the mortician is the bird of prey in the whole funeral system. He is a very suave bird whose claws are concealed by the reverential padding and plumage that surround the grim economics of death.

Not that the mortician is a fiend. He is an American business man operating in a field where the normal safeguards of competitive commerce break down. His customers are numb with grief or confused by inexperience. By tradition they cannot resort to the coquetry of the bargain counter; they cannot shop for cheaper caskets. They deliver themselves to the undertaker as to a friend, or the friend of a friend or a man who has a nice voice, or is a member of the Elks, or a deacon in the same church. One of the reasons why the casket customer gives himself so unquestioningly into the hands of the mortician is that there is no accepted and well-advertised bargain counter to which he can go. The funeral industry is like the retail trade of this country before the rise of the great department store and the chain nickelorium. Every city is cursed with too many corner undertakers who are expensive and inefficient, and there are too few competitive consolidations of morticians who practice mass production.

Supersalesmanship applies its pressure at the point of family pride when sales resistance is subnormal. I treasure as one of my choicest Americana the speech of Clifford Askin, an Indianapolis undertaker, before the morticians of Tennessee, as reported in the July Southern Funeral Director.

I wonder [said Mr. Askin] when your friend's son or daughter gets married if you are the first to drop by and offer to furnish chairs for the party or wedding, or do you wait until he calls you up over the phone or comes to see you? We are losing an opportunity if we happen to meet him on the street and do not offer him our chairs or call him on the phone. That is service.

When you send a funeral out of your town or city and they are coming back on the train this afternoon or 8 o'clock in the morning, are you at the train to meet them when they come back and carry them to their homes? No, you say, their friends will meet them, that is sufficient. That is sufficient as far as transportation is concerned, but are you losing an opportunity to manifest personal interest and perhaps a personal service? . . .

Are you mailing out to the friend or the family a card after the funeral giving the section or number and the grave number and the lot number, stating if there are other members of the family who would like the small card, you would be glad to furnish on request? Well, you are not—and if you are not you are losing an opportunity for service and an opportunity for contact with that family.

Much could be accomplished toward cheapening funerals by the leaders of the industry itself if they would pass from this personal and individual stage of merchandising to large-scale standardization and selling. Mr. Gebhart hopes that the funeral industry will thus reform itself from within and he points to the newly organized Funeral Service Bureau of America which has taken up the problem of cooperating to reduce costs among a few powerful firms. This optimism seems scarcely justified. Far better would be a development in America of the municipal funeral system of Europe which Mr. Gebhart describes.

Frankfort, for example, has only one private undertaker, and he is of no importance. Virtually every citizen who dies is buried by the Municipal Burial Office and practically the same kind of funeral is provided for everyone. But the family of the poor man pays less than the family of the rich man because the charge is levied in proportion to income. For a complete funeral including casket, transportation, burial robe, and grave the charge is not more than 3 per cent of the annual income for an adult and three-quarters of 1 per cent for a child under one year. But the maximum charge is $57.12. So Frankfort achieves democracy in death. Many other continental cities have similar socialization of funerals, but most of them do not insist upon the same grade of funeral for all citizens. The Municipal Burial Office of Vienna has eight classes of funerals ranging up to $300. Cologne's cheapest funeral is $19.04.

Compare with these figures the cost of the average American funeral! Rich families in America commonly spend several thousand dollars on a funeral. They make the occasion an exhibition of conspicuous economic success—and the poor imitate them. Italian widows in New York who are so poor that they receive pensions from the New York Board of Child Welfare still manage to spend an average of $421 to bury the husband and father. That is more than half of their total net assets and usually it comes out of insurance which they have skimmed to pay. The average net funeral bill of probated estates in New York County is $772.

The most inexcusable item in these average bills is the item on which the undertaker subsists, the charge for the casket. I have found by investigation that a reasonably dignified and beautiful casket can be made for $15. The average mortician unites with the casket manufacturer in pawning off on the bereaved customer a casket which is worth perhaps two or three times that amount for $500 to $5,000.

Some people wonder why the problem of funeral costs cannot be solved by cremation. Cremation is probably a good thing in itself but it does not at the present time afford an escape from expense. A casket is required by custom before cremation just as it is required before burial, and the cost of cremation is still high. Gebhart says concerning crematory costs: "Some urns sell for as much as $1,500, while the average rental of columbarium space is probably no cheaper than the ordinary grave and family plots." Undertakers commonly sell expensive caskets to customers for use before cremation and then strip the caskets of the costliest trappings before incineration.

Why cremation should cost as much as it does is not altogether clear. The growing popularity of the custom may ultimately reduce charges. Meanwhile cremation is saving for the use of the living a considerable amount of valuable land near our great cities which would otherwise be dedicated to the dead. If all our dead were cremated we would save at least 22,000 acres of such land every year.

The development of municipal funeral bureaus in America would be the sanest and most obvious answer to the problem of funeral costs, but there are few cities in America progressive enough to fight private-ownership propaganda successfully. The gestures toward cheaper funerals by funeral directors' associations will probably be nothing more than gestures unless the present price level of the industry is challenged from the outside. Perhaps the wisest step in the direction of relief would be the formation of a limited dividend corporation headed by philanthropic citizens which attempted to market funerals and funeral paraphernalia at civilized prices. Considering the toll of suffering and exploitation among the poor because of the present system of profiteering it is strange that no such experiment has been tried on a large scale.

In the Driftway

EXCHANGE professorships are all right in their way, but why stop there? Why not exchange editorships? An editor is as exchangeable as a professor provided he is presented in undamaged condition with the original price slip in the package. Of course it may be argued that editors never are in undamaged condition, while professors—are sometimes. But since the revelations before the Federal Trade Commission in regard to power propaganda in the colleges, professors have little to brag about.

* * * * *

THE Carnegie Foundation for Something or Other (the Drifter has forgotten exactly what) recently brought a large party of English journalists to this continent on a junket. It was intended to promote international understanding and all that sort of thing, you know. Maybe it did promote international understanding, but it certainly did not promote individual understanding. Nobody in the party had a chance to see anything of America other than what he could observe through the bottom of a tumbler or across a plate of gumbo soup. The Britishers were breakfasted, and lunched, and tea'd, and dined until they could no longer look at a joint of roast chicken or a biscuit tortoni without a shudder. In some places they were made to drink twice as much as they were in the habit of consuming at home (British journalists are no slouches in that direction, take it from the Drifter), and in all cases they had to talk and be talked to ten times as much as was good for them. The members of this party were so busy having the country shown to them that they could have had no time to see any of it for themselves, and working journalists over here had no time to see them. It is hard to conceive that any one carried away an impression of the continent other than a row of cutlery to his right and left, a meal prepared by a European chef in front of him, and a waiter behind him who kept filling his glass with ice.

* * * * *

HOW much better it would be to send the members of such a party over one at a time, or each to a different place, and let them at least go through the motions of working for a living while on their visit. In order to demonstrate the soundness of his theory the Drifter offers himself for the experiment. He will go anywhere and work anywhere (after his fashion). It would be a lot of fun, he thinks, to go to England and spend a summer working for the Morning Post or the Daily Mirror. Either would do equally well. So would one of the fine English weeklies. But there is much to see and to do in England outside of Fleet Street, so maybe work on a daily or weekly would be too confining. Better probably would be a job on a quarterly—which had just gone to press when the Drifter arrived for his two months' stay. In Paris life is even more engrossing, so that the Drifter would reluctantly pass by a chance to join the staff of the Temps or the Matin and seek a place with a good annual, like "Tout Paris" or the Almanach Hachette. And if the Drifter should be sent to the East, to Calcutta or Singapore, he would refuse to consider even an annual publication. He would want to be an editor of an encyclopedia the preparation of which was destined to take a lifetime and whose staff assembled only once every five or six years.

"Those Terrible Britons"

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: My heart fell this morning when, opening my copy of The Nation, I found myself branded in an editorial as a danger to the world's peace. "In the interests of international peace and friendly understanding," I read, "some things ought to be prevented by law. Among those which come in mind immediately are (1) books about the United States by visiting Englishmen—especially visiting English lecturers; (2) Mr. St. John Ervine's drama column in the New York World; and (3) criticisms of American books in any British review." For a few moments I imagined that I had bought the wrong paper and was reading the humorous column in one of those funny papers which are the awe and wonder of the world, but, alas, there was no escape for me in such an imagining as that. Solemnly and apparently in conclave, The Nation announces that I am likely to cause a conflagration between the United States and Great Britain unless I am prevented by law from writing about the American drama. I see the agitated Mr. Oswald Garrison Villard, who had so much difficulty in deciding whether he would support Mr. Smith or Mr. Thomas in the Presidential election, crying in agony to his colleagues: "My God, if this fellow Ervine isn't stopped, the navy experts will get the additional cruisers and then there'll be war!" One more word from me on the merits or demerits of a musical comedy, and apparently Washington will issue an ultimatum, if not to the world, at least to Great Britain. God forbid that I should be the cause of strife or that I should even exacerbate international feeling, and so, sir, I appeal to you to condescend to a few details. An editorial in a weekly review of the caliber of The Nation is a vastly different affair from a signed article or an individual and jocular commentary such as the Driftway. Had the Drifter made the statement which I have quoted, or had Mr. Krutch included it in his dramatic criticism, I should not have felt any dismay, for personal opinion or playful exaggeration can be discounted; but a solemn editorial rebuke is another matter.

And perhaps, sir, while you are informing me in what way my contributions to the World have endangered "international peace and friendly understanding," you will also tell me and your readers who are the terrible Britons who write books about the United States, after they have lectured here, with the same malignant effect. Do you wish to have a law passed to prevent any visiting Englishman—I happen not to be English at all, but to be an Ulsterman without one drop of English blood in my veins—from writing about the United States or merely to prevent the publication of books in which any adverse criticism on this country is passed? And will you also tell me and your readers why, if you wish to suppress by law all "criticisms of American books in any British review," American authors so sedulously send their books to British reviews? Whatever an "English reviewer" does, whether he praises or condemns an American book, he meets with your disapproval. The poor simp, seemingly, can do no right. You quote passages from a review which appeared in the London Times Literary Supplement, in which references were made to an American book, and you add: "One would hardly think the book worth more than a trifling mention in a literary review." Well, sir, after reading your editorial—editorial, sir!—entitled Those Terrible Britons, I am prepared to find anything in any review anywhere. I shall not be at all astonished if the main editorial in the next issue of The Nation is written by the Rev. Billy Sunday or Mr. Groucho Marx.

In the interests of journalistic pride—after all, we belong to the same craft and no journalist likes to see another journalist letting it down—I suggest that you should try to remember that there is a difference between an editorial in The Nation and a bright and breezy article in a college magazine, edited by a freshman. Those Terrible Britons obviously was written by a sophomore.

New York, November 23

ST. JOHN ERVINE

[The Nation does not believe that its editorial pages should be debarred from any rights of "playful exaggeration" that are allowed to the Drifter or its dramatic critic. We do not take the menace of Mr. Ervine as seriously as he seems to imagine. And we still have our sense of humor.—EDITOR THE NATION.]

Smith for the Cabinet

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: One of the outstanding attributes in Mr. Hoover's career is his indifference to party as compared with principle. He who whole-heartedly and usefully served Woodrow Wilson might as whole-heartedly and usefully be served by Alfred Smith. Mr. Hoover has notably refrained from belittling in any way Mr. Smith's superb record as a public servant. Mr. Hoover is not only with Woodrow Wilson in recognizing Smith's statesmanlike qualities but with Charles Evans Hughes and other Republicans. Why should not our new President create a vigorous, human, honest, and influential precedent in our politics by appointing Governor Smith to a Cabinet post?

Flagler's Philanthropy

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I should like to add this much to what was printed of my article on the orchestral merger in The Nation of October 17. Mr. Flagler received editorial praise for a support of the New York Symphony that had furnished perhaps the only justification for his wealth, and had not so much as deprived his breakfast eggs of their bacon. Instead he deserved only a rebuke for withdrawing this support. Even as high-minded a man as Mr. Flagler illustrates the consequences of leaving such matters to wealthy individuals who are apt to support an orchestra out of misplaced faith in some conductor, and, when he retires, to treat it as a losing business venture is treated.

And I should like to ask the question that was omitted from my article on the Salzburg Festival. What is there in the music of Bloch that would be recognized as Jewish without knowledge of the titles, or as the work of a Jew without knowledge of the fact?

It Undoubtedly Would

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I would like to run a weekly column in your magazine in which I will agree to answer correctly all economic questions. I will also agree to pay to the people submitting the questions, or to charity, three times the amount of salary you will pay, should I fail to answer these questions correctly. You will note that this suggestion is based upon fifteen years of research work in economics and a point of view which has enabled me to express economics mathematically. My method explains every economic phenomena [sic] that has taken place from the dawn of man to the present day, simply and definitely. I believe such a column would be interesting to all students of economics.

Angel Guri

By BORGHILD LEE

Guri wears a bonnet
And a dress of black
That fits her like
A potato sack.

The wind fills her skirt
Till she has no feet,
She looks like a black bird
Coming down the street.

She pushes a fish-cart
And sings and cries
(She has sold her body
To be taken when she dies):

"Fish in the court!
Fresh, young, and fine—
Turn them in the sun
And see them shine!"

All day long
Up and down the street
Walks a black bird
Without any feet.

No one will bury her,
No bells will ring,
She has sold her body
For ten crowns to the king!

This Week Franz Boas

SINCE very few people enjoy the spectacle of intelligence applied to life I do not suppose that "Anthropology and Modern Life"* will achieve a large circulation. But it should be read by anyone who is ever tempted to voice an opinion about race superiority or inferiority, sex characteristics and aptitudes, national differences, standards of conduct, habits and instincts, manners, the superiority of the intellectuals or of the "upper" classes, religion, or sex. For in the compass of this short volume Franz Boas accomplishes the annihilation of the bases of almost all the prejudices and passions on which modern society rests, and arrives by the least spectacular kind of reasoning at revolutionary and yet strangely hopeful conclusions.

One by one he questions the accepted attitudes by which we live. We speak confidently of "races" and "racial types," even within the confines of a single continent where every nationality comprises the mingled blood of nearly every strain. We speak of the presence of "higher" and "lower" racial types, without even knowing—since no certain tests have been devised—what the relation is between structure and function. We decide, by establishing certain arbitrary standards—usually of likeness to ourselves—that one culture is superior to another and we conclude that people of a primitive culture are mentally inferior, ignoring the accidents of climate and food supply and migration that help to retard or speed the development of civilizations.

Professor Boas does not limit himself to general considerations such as these. He discusses the laws and customs of modern America as he would the ways of the Aleutian Islanders. He considers the immigration policy of the Coolidge Administration in the light of the fact that no racial lines can be successfully drawn across the face of Europe and that no national or ethnological groups can possibly claim a monopoly of intelligence and integrity. He looks upon international war with eyes that have watched the primitive horde turn savagely upon the alien horde to preserve its own food supply from invasion, and yet have witnessed a steadily widening circle of common interest and mutual dependence among peoples. Acknowledging the ferocious domination of race prejudice, Professor Boas is able to ignore popular attitudes with a serenity that is almost alarming. He discusses the relations of Negroes and Whites in America and the evil effects of social division based on race differences and concludes with these words:

The causes that operate against the unions of colored men and white women are almost as potent as in the days of slavery. Looking forward toward a lessening of the intensity of race feeling an increase of unions of white men and colored women would be desirable. The present policy of many of the Southern States tends to accentuate the lack of homogeneity of our nation.

Such a truncated quotation does not do justice to the integrity of Professor Boas's argument, but it is included as an indication of his temper.

He is willing to wait for the changes that he sees coming; man is still young on the earth and from the beginning "the increase of knowledge, the freeing of the individual from traditional fetters, the extension of political units have proceeded regularly." People act "under the stress of the tradition in which they have grown up"—not because they are biologically committed to one course. And changes occur through "forces active in the individuals that make up the social group." The closer the contact between individuals and groups and nations the stronger is the pressure toward change, the less the resistance.

And so Mr. Boas arrives at the hopeful conclusion that the nations of the world are on the road to peace and world federation. Presumably, too, race lines will be broken down, race differences will disappear, and class conflicts will be solved. In the long vision of the anthropologist these changes may appear likely; in the rest of us they arouse questions. Will our wide interchange of knowledge and our swift communications eliminate primitive fears and misconceptions or will they only produce new terrors on a grand scale and more magnificent means of annihilation? Are we keeping up with our culture, or becoming more confused and inadequate in the face of the civilization our unimproved brains have produced? I wish Professor Boas would discuss these problems and others that his book suggests in a new volume which he could call "Anthropology and the Future."

The Man Who Cheats

Ananias, or The False Artist. By Walter Pach. Harper and Brothers. $4.

"FOR twenty years," says Walter Pach, "I have been trying to strangle this book. Now let somebody else take the job." Twenty years of looking at the rows of notorious and unblushing misdemeanors in the American wing of the Metropolitan Museum would no doubt make one want to strangle something. Still, when Walter Pach spoke to me of the Ananias project, I wondered sympathetically why he should want to write about those particular things and the others like them. He estimates the number of bad and indifferent artists in Paris alone at 39,900. Devote your time and thought to them, when there are a hundred good ones? "And if there be but ten just men in Sodom, she is saved. . . ."

Furthermore, for whose benefit the exposé? The idols that would be shattered are already more than crumbling. Few of the people who would read a book about painting and sculpture would think of even questioning Pach's rightness and righteousness. They would enjoy, as they do, the wholly comic, excellently chosen display of abominations. The rest at the most might be shamed into putting their prints in the closet.

But "Ananias" turns out to be a subtle philosophical and sociological excursion. It is not the 39,900 failures who are to be strangled. It is the "large number of men who should be ranked with the failures" and "are considered by the general public as successes, the great men of the modern period, indeed." And who are they? They are all the same man, the ubiquitous Ananias, the man who cheats.

Now Ananias is not so easily defined, though he is easily enough recognized, as easily as one knows a good odor from a bad one, Walter Pach suggests. Roger Fry has pointed him out frequently. Pach finds him in many countries and periods: among the Phoenicians, three hundred years before Christ; in Europe, in America. He has, however, at this moment in the United States, unusual prestige and power and a very fat bank account. He is the man who "sells" himself on other merits than those of his work. Like Sargent, he makes flattering portraits of people who want to be flattered; he imitates his betters and poses in their garments, like Zuloaga in Goya's; he trusts to sensationalism such as can be achieved by outmoderning the moderns and being more primitive than the primitives, and, like Mestrovic, pleases the snobs of sophistication; he rides on patriotism, religion, romantic love; above all he struts in the sacrosanct armor of the Greeks and of the Renaissance. These things he does because he has little soul of his own, or because he hates to work and likes automobiles. He is a snob, a pharisee, literally a bunk artist, and frequently a most unhappy man.

Therein lies the danger. Consciously or unconsciously a cheat, he is envious and afraid of the people he suspects may have, after all, the better portion. He hates them much as many lonely prudes hate lovers. He therefore turns upon them viciously. Being of facile virtue, he becomes an arbiter, an authority, a person of temporary power. He has often the last word upon what goes into the museums, what is taught in the schools, and the result is shocking poverty of spirit in many young artists who might have done better by themselves, and vulgar decorations in theaters and on the walls of fine buildings, and continued ignorance, the same that keeps Ananias sitting where he sits and the notorious misdemeanors hanging where they hang.

It is, after all, not a question of art but of morals. Ananias is more easily identified in the plastic arts, perhaps because there he cannot help but make his own image. What about the playwright who depends on lights and scenic effects to carry a cheap and incoherent play? What about the musician who steals the melody of a good man or turns fulsomely the irreproachable mask of the "classics"? What about the writer who veils pornography in pink? And the scientist who lops or pads his data to prove a current bias or superstition? In the newspapers, the movies, in politics, everywhere there is the same Ananias. Beyond question Walter Pach is right. But he needs help.

Portraits of France

Louis XIV. By Louis Bertrand. Translated by Cleveland Chase. Longmans, Green and Company. $5.

Twelve Portraits of the French Revolution. By Henri Béraud. Translated by Madeleine Boyd. Little, Brown and Company. $3.50.

The Enchantress. By Helen W. Henderson. Houghton Mifflin Company. $4.50.

IF the last was the stammering century, our own is the topsy-turvy one. Values have been reversed. In the past a disposition on the part of the individual to give some of his time and energy to the remedying of public abuses was held admirable; today "world-saving" has become a term of opprobrium, and those infected with its virus are pityingly classed as pathological. In the past virginity was admired in women, and quaint terms like "deflowering" were used when this precious status was given up. Today, among the true cognoscenti, a young woman is held suspect unless she wears with some degree of publicity at least one privileged lover. Yet as we investigate the numerous upheavals of ideals, we find that there is a curious lack of method in the change: in one case a democratic ideal replaces an aristocratic one; in the next the reverse is true; and we begin to suspect that heterodoxy is worshiped for itself rather than for its fruits.

This being so, the publishers have chosen exactly the right time to launch Bertrand's ardent defense of Louis XIV. Was Louis accused of sowing the whirlwind? Then point out that it was he who introduced an almost classical restraint and dignity into French life. Was he accused of dissipating the great kingdom he inherited, by ceaseless wars and harrying taxes? Then show that when he became King France was torn by civil war, its power was reduced, its boundaries were uncertain, and that little by little he restored its wealth, built up its army, and as a result of one successful campaign after another incorporated in its boundaries disputed territory that has since belonged to France. Was he accused of idling luxuriously at Court while the neglected army struggled against odds? This was a carefully considered plan to conceal the magnitude of his plans from the enemy. Was he accused of failing to wring sufficient profit from his victories, and of concluding premature peace when he might have crushed the enemy, in order to rush back to Mme de Maintenon and Versailles? This again was superb diplomacy. The world was united against him, and if he had exacted too greedy terms of peace from a vanquished enemy, Austria, Germany, Spain, and England would have forced him to disgorge. Moreover, it was an old complaint against France that she could conquer new territory, but could not hold it. Louis consolidated his gains before seeking more. Was he accused of grinding the faces of the poor and of saying "L'état, c'est moi"? Flatly, he never said it, and his "entire life belied that silly stilted phrase." Was he accused of being frivolous and of placing too much respect in the pretensions of rank? It was he who encouraged, patronized, and—contrary to the current custom in France—duly respected great artists and writers. "He was the King of France during the Grand Siècle, and created the most civilized society in Occidental history since the days of Greece and Rome." "With the debatable exception of Napoleon, he was the greatest ruler France has ever had! He fashioned France in his own image, and she remains today essentially as he left her."

This is a blast indeed, and the heterodoxy of M. Bertrand's opinions can be counted on to compensate for his too declamatory style. The most interesting question the book raises is not touched upon by the author. In spite of Louis's ability and devotion as a king, the seeds of revolution were certainly sown during his long reign; and one wonders if perhaps a highly civilized society is not too great a luxury for any country to support for a protracted period of time. Certainly it was too severe a strain for France in the days before mechanical inventions magnified man's labor power. The book can be read with profit only if the author's monarchistic and religious prejudices are discounted; but this is true of a writer as much greater than Bertrand as Sainte-Beuve. Bertrand's portrait of Mme de Maintenon, as of all the King's mistresses, is absurdly unfair. He leans too much on asseveration and too little on the wealth of material available to the historian of this period. Nevertheless the lay student of the period will be well repaid by reading the book.

The twelve portraits of the revolution are Mirabeau, Danton, Robespierre, Saint Just, Marat, Desmoulins, Vergniaud, the King, the Queen, Theroigne de Méricourt, Mme Roland, and Charlotte Corday. They are rapid, well-written recitals of the main facts of the lives of each sitter, and, with the exception of that of Marie Antoinette, are done with impartiality and appreciation of different types of people. They are too brief, however, to go into disputed points, and the writer has no unusual gifts of character evocation.

The story of Dianne de Poytiers is, in its writing, as excellent an example of the better type of modern biography as Louis XIV is a poor one. Miss Henderson writes extremely well, and she has used great skill in weaving into her own vivacious narrative the very extensive first-hand materials she has accumulated. Instead of making loud asseverations as to Dianne's true character, she quotes inimitable contemporary stories drawn both from her admirers and her detractors. Instead of hotly asserting Henri's devotion, she quotes some of his letters, but always to the point, and never for the sake of rubbing in her erudition. Diarists of the period, letter writers, poets, gossips, satirists, confessors, abbés, rakes, great lords, and ladies, all trail in lively procession through her book, which is enriched with twenty-two illustrations—contemporary portraits, statues, bas-reliefs, enamels, and chateaux. If I have a criticism to make of this lively narrative, which contrives at the same time to be a rich repository of learning and wit, it is that the importance of François I, particularly in bringing great artists to his court, is not adequately shown, and that only those among the artists who were directly concerned with Dianne figure in her pages. But in making this criticism I am perhaps only saying that I wish Miss Henderson had written two books instead of one.

ALICE BEAL PARSONS

Spying as Science and Sport

Spy and Counter-Spy: The Development of Modern Espionage.

By Richard Wilmer Rowan. The Viking Press. $3.50.

Spies. By Joseph Gollomb. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

THE general reader is acquainted with the considerable output of books supposed to be composed of strictly "true" stories of crime, from highway robbery and murder to piracy and treason. The manufacture of this literature has led to the systematic ransacking of libraries for historical documents and court records of the past until one wonders at the industry involved. A great deal of this delving is of scholarly inspiration and the collections have at least a documentary value. But if they are not to be deplored neither are they to be valued very highly. All they usually do is to satisfy curiosity or supply vicarious thrills.

Joseph Gollomb's "Spies" is, on the whole, a book of this character. Its origin may be set down to the progressive exhaustion of true stories of murderers and pirates, by this author in particular and by his fellow-practitioners in general. The neglect of the spy till now is not surprising when it is considered that his work has always been kept so secret that the hardest spade labor is necessary to bring it to light. The research of Mr. Gollomb has been highly successful, but the book he offers is simply a compilation of spy stories. They are told in chronological order from the days of Moses, who sent spies to survey the land of Canaan, to Wilhelm Stieber, who first put spying upon an organized basis, right down to the latest spy episodes of the Great War. The tales of the individual spies are well told. A reader who is seeking palpitations of the heart will get them. But that is almost the whole value of the book.

On the other hand, Richard Wilmer Rowan's "Spy and Counter-Spy" is a vastly more sophisticated book. Appearing at almost the same time and based upon practically the same material (the respective authors score very few "beats") it is converted by the attitude of its author and by his method into a contribution to political science of real importance. Mr. Rowan has taken the stories of individual spies and made them into a well-ordered treatise on the work of the spy. We are presented with a lucid exposition of the various sides of the spy's activities rather than mere history. This double aspect of the book gives it at once meaning and quality. In Mr. Rowan we are dealing, it is apparent, with a student of espionage considered as an art and a science; and an aspiring spy will find here a manual that has a Machiavellian flavor all its own. The author is perfectly detached and passes no judgments, moral or patriotic, and the acerbity of his style is well suited to his purpose. Moreover, a strong political-mindedness has made him perceive that an account of spies and spying should aim at far more than diversion. His treatment of the subject as one of the phases of statecraft makes admirably clear its relation to the problems of war and imperialism. He forces the reader to reflect upon such matters as the connections between spying and disarmament and between spying and the destruction of civil rights in war time. Liberals should find instructive his statement that 45,000 spies, about equally divided, were in action on both sides during the Great War. In fact, the whole book is one that deserves to be read and pondered by anyone who is at all interested in war and peace and international relations.

A New Symbolist

Now the Sky and Other Poems. By Mark Van Doren. Albert and Charles Boni. $2.

THIS is Mr. Van Doren's third volume of poetry, and it is one of the half-dozen really distinguished books of poetry that have appeared in America in the last ten years. His performance has exhibited, from the outset, a continuity of impulse, a certainty of direction, and consequently a homogeneous development of style. There are other contemporary poetic minds as interesting as Mr. Van Doren's, but none knows itself so well. He is that rare American poet who has been able to sustain, over a number of years, a single purpose, and to extend and deepen this purpose without doing violence to his style as it was originally conceived. Marianne Moore and Wallace Stevens, of Van Doren's generation, alone have equaled him in the certainty of their craft; but their impulse contrasted with his (which is complex and dynamic) is simple and static, and easier to control.

Mr. Van Doren is, in fact, if not the most brilliant stylist of our time, one of the most accomplished craftsmen. It would be difficult to find in all his work an ill-written poem. There are, however, several unsatisfactory poems. There has always been in his verse, as I have previously pointed out, an occasional obscurity which appears when the poem seems, at first glance, to be simplest and clearest. Take this stanza, from one of the Philosopher's Love Songs:

I learn at last
To wait alone.
She is my own
And tethered fast—
But to no mast
And to no moan.

It is an image that puts the seal of logical meaning upon the poem but which leaves the emotion diffuse. This kind of obscurity, in a poet of Van Doren's stature, is due to a gift for writing which persists at those times when the impulse is diffuse or repetitive. But this analysis, in the light of his most recent poems, requires extension: the symbols that first occupied his mind were not equal to the full reach of his vision, and while these early symbols could not comprehend all that he had to say and left his emotion diffuse, his skill as a rhetorician saved him from the appearance of failure.

Certain minute changes in natural scenes are the source of Van Doren's early symbolism, and in the best poems the correspondence between the feeling and the image is so exact that it has tempted him to attribute philosophical value to the "objective reference" of his feeling—that is, to nature itself. There has therefore been latent in his impulse the tendency to document his sense of nature to the fullest. But he has always had more than the sense of nature, or at any rate a sense quite different from that. Only those poems in which the feeling is intimately related to the natural symbol are completely successful. Nature, in short, has been the sustaining framework of Van Doren's best work up to the present time. But it has not exhausted his vision; there has been a certain number of poems, written in the effort to document the sense of nature, which contain traces of an impulse alien to that intention. What to do with this alien impulse and what its significance is in relation to the original one are questions that landed Mr. Van Doren in a serious dilemma.

But, as a conscious artist, he has, in the present volume, analyzed his predicament, and he sets about correcting the divided emphasis of his past work. Nature, he says, in a long history of his mind entitled We Come Too Late, no longer sustains him: the last poem in the book predicts a more varied background for his future work. There is, indeed, at present interesting evidence of this.

There are few poets whom the sense of nature has supported throughout a long career, and there is nothing peculiarly modern in Mr. Van Doren's rejection of an early belief. That he has, however, been able to extricate himself from a predicament that would destroy most poets and to use the predicament itself as a fresh starting-point attests to the vigilance of one of the most acute intelligences in contemporary poetry.

Yet, if there is nothing specifically modern in a rejection of nature, the positive direction with which Van Doren follows his rejection puts upon it a definitely modern interpretation. It is not that his feeling for nature has weakened; it is rather that he can no longer believe in it as a realm of fixed symbols adequate to what he has to say. It no longer has the intrinsic value that he once thought it had. As a modern mind he has been affected by the scientific version of nature (or by its moral equivalent in the social atmosphere), which has killed its human values. Turning away, he finds that the only values accessible to him as a modern lie within himself. And so, breaking off from the early tendency toward a minute documentation of the sense of nature—possible only so long as nature has intrinsic human values—he grows more and more interested in the creation of intricate and elusive emotions, which a simple inspection of the face of nature would not support. Poems like Tiresias, The Disguise, Civil War, in which the imagery is composed of irrational symbols irreducible to the logic of prose, connect Van Doren with his contemporaries Wallace Stevens, Phelps

Putnam, Hart Crane. There is, in these recent poems, a quality not unlike that of the symbolist poets. And there is, besides, quality of macabre ferocity in some of his images unlike anything he has done before and unlike anything by anybody else. Here is a specimen from Civil War:

In the forbidden country where the sod
Grows down and down, with restless blue roots, gray roots,
In the dark windy land no one can leave,
Separate necks yearn homeward;
Separate hungry shoulders pull and pull.
Wind, oh wind, I did not come to stay;
I must be there tomorrow, not to miss. . . .
But the dark wind is earless, and the day
Is endless, and the grasses hiss and hiss.

Fiction from History

Ashes. By Stephan Zeromski. Translated from the Polish by Helen Stankiewics Zand. Alfred A. Knopf. Two volumes boxed. $6.

Defeat. By Ricarda Huch. Translated from the German by Catherine Alison Phillips. Alfred A. Knopf. $3.

Trenck: The Love Story of a Favourite. By Bruno Frank. Translated from the German by Eden and Cedar Paul. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

IS it really possible for these three examples of historical fiction to have been written by contemporaries, or near-contemporaries (Zeromski died in 1925 and Ricarda Huch had completed her best work by the outbreak of the war)? They seem separated by generations, almost epochs. So sharp-cut are the abysses that lie between them that the reader can trace with fair exactitude the progressive steps taken in recent years by the mind of the historical novelist.

"Ashes" is a two-volume explosion detonating against the ferociously colored background of the Napoleonic invasion and the Polish struggle for freedom. It is difficult to understand Conrad's words of praise for a writer whose mind seems stuffed full of servant-girl romances. To Zeromski history is merely a series of violences in chronological order, a sort of uninterrupted red flare against which the characters send up their oratorical rockets. His heroes are passionate and aristocratic: The Duchess would not have been ashamed to sponsor them. His heroines, to avoid being raped by non-Polish soldiery, cast themselves over Byronic cliffs, a proceeding permissible in life but hardly in literature.

A critical moment in a nation's history is not viewed as a modern eye would view it, that is, as the culmination of a set of complex forces resolvable by the exercise of the critical and imaginative faculties working in harmonious conjunction, but as chaotic melodrama, in which all the actors out-Herod Herod and megaphone their feelings quite in the manner of the tent'-thirt'. If Santayana could bring himself to peruse such undisciplined and tropical prose, he would find in "Ashes" a perfect example of the literature of barbarism. We have not had such a roaring perversion of history since "Quo Vadis."

While Ricarda Huch is, as a literary craftswoman, infinitely superior to the purpureal Zeromski, her outlook on the past is at bottom no more moving than his. "Defeat" is concerned with Garibaldi's defense of Rome and his ignominious withdrawal before the forces of France in 1849. If "Ashes" is chaotic melodrama, "Defeat" is a heroic pageant, conceived in Carlylean terms. Confronted with Italy, Ricarda Huch seems to have undergone the same process of mental softening that is observable in her countrymen, Goethe and Winckelmann. When a German crosses the Alps his capacity for detached reflection seems abruptly to desert him and his emotions immediately register high pressure. If there is any political movement that cries out for the judgment of an ironic mind. It is the Risorgimento; and if there are any two national heroes who combine the qualities of courage and idealism with those of absurd grandiloquence and sentimental quixotism, they are Garibaldi and Mazzini. But Ricarda Huch remains true to an expiring tradition: Garibaldi and Mazzini are stuck to their pedestals with a heavy Teutonic glue and introduced to us as if they were Achilles and Odysseus. The result of this posturing is comic opera rendered all the more ludicrous by the author's unswerving admiration of her heroes even in their most undignified moments. Ricarda Huch's great historical knowledge and her grave and marmoreal prose cannot atone for her lack of humor and insight.

As a historical novel, "Trenck" is a slight work and does not remain long in the memory, but it is at least free of the defects of "Ashes" and "Defeat." Except for his occasional but unimportant concessions to German national feeling, Frank's view of Frederick the Great and his ill-starred favorite, Baron Trenck, is intelligent and realistic. He is lacking in the psychological sympathy of Brod and Neumann and Feuchtwanger, but at least he does not enlarge his characters beyond life-size nor does he depend on a set of emotional formulas to secure the reader's sympathy. Though his best chapters are the purely narrative ones, one can see that he views his historical material in critical perspective, a perspective that does not exclude irony and humor. He works like a modern man with whatever tools the modern historian can furnish him.

Books in Brief

The Formation of the Chinese People: An Anthropological Inquiry. By Chi Li. Harvard University Press.

What is a Chinese? They differ from one another in height, color, habits, and skull form; and for thousands of years the race has been changing. Chi Li's is a pioneer scientific study. He summarizes such physical data as are available upon the physical traits of modern Chinese in various parts of China (a decade hence there will be more abundant and conclusive data), the records of city-wall building, the spread of various Chinese surnames, and the distribution of the "We-group," those whom the Chinese have regarded as civilizers, of their own kind, and of the "You-group," the aliens, the barbarians. He traces the incorporation into the "We-group," originally confined to the silk-wearing, rice-eating, city-building descendants of the Yellow Emperor, of the horse-riding, flesh-eating Hsiung-nus, the yak-driving Ch'iangs, the pig-rearing Tungus, and the cattle-stealing Mongols, since the beginning of the Christian era, and the distribution in the various provinces of these new stocks; and the slower absorption of the tattooing Shans and the cremating Tibeto-Burmans in the South. And he concludes modestly: "The aim of this monograph is simply to show the complexity of the problem and the possible ways of solving it."

Indice de Documentos de Nueva España. Secretaria de Relaciones exteriores, Mexico.

The wonders of New Spain, the exploits of the conquerors—these pages of American history and romance have still hardly been cut. Even this catalogue of the letters and reports made for the King of Spain by explorers, soldiers, and missionaries from Arizona to Peru is here for the first time available. It was compiled by the Mexican historian Francisco del Paso y Troncoso for his own use and has been posthumously published. Possibly it is not a complete list, but certainly it is an adequate one. It covers the entire colonial period, and even the bare outline of the titles unfolds a vision, from the first searches for golden lands to the last quarrels over booty. For historians, archaeologists, anthropologists, and ama-

Who . . . ... started the War?

"THE guilt clause of the Treaty of Versailles is now pulverized" by "The Origins of the World War," a new book of world-wide importance which represents "the greatest and most dramatic historical revolution ever achieved." Charles A. Beard, eminent historian, says: "Whoever else is read, Mr. Fay must be read. And it would contribute powerfully to the understanding and peace of the world if all editors, politicians, preachers and teachers were required to read him before opening their mouths on the present state of Europe's tangled affairs."

A Book About Paris. By George and Pearl Adam. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $5.

Of course nobody ever writes a book about the capital of France which does not purport to reveal the "real Paris." The only difference is that some authors are more sincere, or more successful, or both, than others. Fortunately, too, there are so many real Parises that there is room for numerous books without exhausting the reality. This volume is certainly sincere and reasonably successful in presenting the "real Paris" of the writers. It deals with sober and satisfying aspects, and gives an added pleasure through the inclusion of illustrations in color by H. Franks Waring.

Drama American Comedy

THE conventional opinion has it that George M. Cohan is the head of the American comic tradition. Both here and abroad it is generally assumed, not only that we are at present incapable of the more civilized sorts of comedy, but also that any possible future for us lies in his direction. There is, of course, a certain element of truth in this contention. He did succeed in crossing the new and shallow sophistication of Broadway with that bucolic innocence of spirit which of necessity lingers in a metropolitan civilization hardly a generation old, and he did thus achieve very lively representations of the people with whom he dealt from their own point of view. But his plays had the crudeness as well as the vivacity of his characters. He not only represented the workings of the immature American mind but he exemplified it as well, and to say that the genre which he made popular is the one which we must continue to cultivate is simply to assert that, resting content with vulgar representations of vulgarity, we must never hope to reach any artistic maturity at all.

Plays like "Broadway," "The Royal Family," and "The Barker" belong, for all the differences which may exist between them, to the Cohan tradition both in their tendency to sanction an ultimate dependence upon melodrama or farce and in the essentially uncritical character of even their satire. These are hailed by the general public and by that section of the commentators which still pins its faith upon the popular as distinguished from the literary drama, but they do not, for all that, seem to be leading anywhere. No conceivable increase in speed or superficial verisimilitude can raise noisy entertainments of the type of "Broadway" above their own level, and the hope of an American comedy lies less with their authors than with people like Maxwell Anderson, H. N. Behrman, and Philip Barry who have been more quietly experimenting with native comedies of a different sort. This week two new ones, "Holiday" (Plymouth Theater) and "A Most Immoral Lady" (Cort Theater), have appeared.

For the earlier and much be-praised "whimsical" plays of Mr. Barry, author of the first, I have no great enthusiasm, but in "Paris Bound" he showed himself capable of writing pure comedy with dexterity and taste and in "Holiday" he at least equals his former success. The plot is extremely slight and the whole thing tenuous to the very last degree, but it is both delightfully witty and thoroughly humane as well. Mr. Barry does not cultivate either the wisecrack or even its more literary twin brother the epigram; his dialogue is not of the sort which can be quoted in fragments and it is almost too unsubstantial to be subject to analysis; but it ripples in one gay and continuous stream throughout the piece like the conversation which one hopes to hear (but never has actually heard) at some supernally well-selected dinner-party. He tells no story that is particularly important and introduces us to no character very remarkable in himself, but he generates that atmosphere in which comedy lives, breathes, and has its being. His people have gaiety and ease and grace. They make us believe in the real existence of that world of delicate suavity, of the free but decorous play of the intellect toward which sophisticated societies are always striving, and which, though it is never reached by any people of flesh and blood, it is the business of comedy to imagine in its perfection in order, first, that we may have an image of the ideal of civilized human intercourse and, second, that we may find in this idealized world of manners some compensation for the inevitable crudities of that real one in which we live. Mr. Barry is as "American" as he needs to be—he deals, that is to say, with American characters in an American scene. But his play is also, as every good American piece should be, something more. It is international or classic besides, not because it is great or powerful, but because its author is endeavoring to write comedy in the great tradition.

Townsend Martin's "A Most Immoral Lady" is hardly less accomplished in its dialogue, in its atmosphere, and in its success in creating interestingly agreeable people, but the author has attempted to handle a more dramatic situation without knowing exactly what to do with it, so that the play, continuously interesting during the first two acts, arrives at a highly conventional and rather pointless conclusion. It has, however, the very important advantage of Miss Alice Brady in the leading role. She is, without exception I think, the most accomplished American interpreter of the spirit of polite comedy and she illuminates the whole with her charm, making the play seem better than it is. Never within my memory has she had a role quite worthy of her, but she exists as a constant challenge to our playwrights. She is here, finished and waiting for that comedy which several of them seem capable at any moment of writing.

The rapturous applause which greeted "A Play Without a Name" (Booth Theater) was probably intended for Peggy Wood who plays the leading role. The play itself is a rather commonplace sentimental drama interrupted at three points by a very elaborate scene supposed to represent the interior of the hero's skull. The only thing to be said of them is that of all the odd devices recently tried out on the stage this one achieves the minimum of communication with the maximum of machinery.

"The Sacred Flame" (Henry Miller), a pretty good example of the rather mechanical sort of play which Maugham has got into the habit of giving us, affords Clare Eames the opportunity to do the best piece of acting she has done in several seasons past.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Robert Rossiter, a widower of forty, decides, for the good of his three children, to give up a sweetheart of seven years' standing and marry a respectable bit of vapidty who doesn't care for him and for whom he doesn't care. What the children and the women do about it is the subject of "The Lady Lies" (Little Theater). What Rossiter does—after the others have determined his action—is suggested also at the play's end. Modern-minded moralists will insist that Rossiter was a dunce and his problem poppycock, but there are more Rossiters and more poppycock in the world than modern-minded moralists, and John Meehan has used the fact to write an amusing, intelligent, and generally convincing comedy. William Boyd and Shirley Warde carry the leading roles well. Nan Sunderland as Hilda Pearson was good, too, but the chuckles of a pleased third-night audience were chiefly for Anna Thomas as Rossiter's youngest daughter.

A. W.

Probably due to the hand of Laurence Stallings, "Rainbow" (Gallo Theater) is far more robust and entertaining than the usual musical play. It is well-staged and well-sung. Charles Ruggles's comedy is a treat, especially in his rendition of "The Bride Was Dressed in White."

Austro-German Union

By FRIEDRICH HERTZ

AUSTRIA is today the object of a great deal of criticism in the French press. She is accused of open or at least ill-concealed Pan-Germanism because on the occasion of a song festival there has been, among other things, some talk of union with Germany. Indeed the French press definitely reports Dr. Benes as having declared in Berlin that such a union meant war, and Pertinax adds in a note of explanation in the Echo de Paris that this refers not only to a formal and complete consolidation of the two countries without the sanction of the League of Nations (something no German or Austrian dreams of) but also to any gradual conformity of form of government, administration, law, education, and public economy. The latter is actually already taking place, but the treaties of peace give the other states not the slightest right to oppose it. In spite of this, Pertinax maintains that the "threatened" states have the right to go to war in order to prevent such a union, and cites, without regard to the Kellogg pact, Section 7, Article 15 of the constitution of the League of Nations. Other French newspapers hold a similar view of the situation.

Now it is obvious to all that the entire hubbub about the Austrian situation is directed more against Germany than Austria. The intention behind the propaganda is clear: It is to set the public mind in France against Germany's demand that the Rhineland be vacated by raising the alarming cry of Pan-Germanism.

My consistent standpoint as writer, especially during the World War, gives me the right to consider myself as one of the sharpest critics and opponents of German Nationalism. Nor have I been inclined personally to view an unconditional union with Germany with much enthusiasm, although I do not consider myself less a German than an Austrian and a citizen of the world.

Nevertheless I consider it the duty of every pacifist and liberal to take an unmistakable stand against the sophistical negation of the principle of self-determination and against the duplication of the fable of the lion and the lamb involved in the present question. It is not necessary to consider for the present whether consolidation is politically or culturally advisable for Austria, for that question concerns only Austria. It is the far more important international problem which concerns me here. It is, first of all, a rank falsehood that the movement for union with Germany in Austria has been fostered by the German Government or by the German Nationalists. Everyone who has studied the Austrian political situation without prejudice knows very well that the movement has been spontaneous. As a matter of fact, it is opposed heart and soul by the reactionary Nationalist elements in Germany, although they do not any longer dare to voice their objections as loudly as previously. They know only too well that they will never be able to count on assistance from the Austrian Germans in a war for revenge, and that the Austrian votes will be cast overwhelmingly in favor of peace and democracy. In the Reichstag, the Austrian Germans would belong principally to the Center and to the Social Democracy, for among them Nationalism is only poorly represented. While in Germany I had more than one occasion to admire the great tact of reactionaries who thought nothing of openly expressing their contempt for "listless" Austria in the presence of an Austrian.

Austria has neither a military junkerdom nor an upper middle-class of great industrial power such as is to be found in Germany. The nobility, which moreover has been abolished, was for the most part of foreign origin, and the rest of the population has also a considerable proportion of non-Germans, mostly in the military and official service, the groups which are at present the mainstay of German Nationalism. The Catholic church was always more internationally minded than German Lutherism. Austrian public opinion today represents mainly the psychology of the poorer peasant, the lower middle-class, and the petty official, and to this must be added the newer and powerful influence of Social Democracy.

Let us, however, assume for the moment that which is empirically impossible. Let us analyze the situation from the point of view of the French Nationalists who pretend to fear that, once united with Germany, the unarmed Austrian people will proceed to threaten the rather well-prepared Czecho-Slovakian nation. Now if a common war plan existed anywhere else than in the heated imagination of a number of French publicists, it would be a matter of no importance whether Germany and Austria were formally united or not. The "secret general staffs" in Vienna and Berlin could, obviously, work together without the political union of the two states. Nor would this cooperation necessarily involve armed participation on Austria's part. For Germany engaged in a war of revenge it would be apparently even an advantage, from the military point of view, to be able to count on an independent and, above all, neutral Austria. For Austria is surrounded by potential enemies, and is difficult to defend. Vienna is situated so close to the Austrian border that hostile fliers would be bombing the city in twenty-five minutes. A neutral Austria would, besides, be commercially an open door for Germany, while it would remain closed to Germany's enemies.

Much more important than these considerations is the maintenance of the right of self-determination which was established as the binding principle of post-war Europe. This is no longer a matter of Austria's or Germany's interests; this concerns Europe and the world as well. Without the right of self-determination the creation of an international rule of justice is an impossibility. With what dishonesty the principle of self-determination is being perverted is shown by the claim that the union of Austria with Germany would have to be accompanied by the union of Belgium or French Switzerland with France. Does Belgium then or French Switzerland desire such a union? In case of Austria, on the contrary, such a desire exists. It is nothing else than a bare lie to call the union of Austria and Germany annexation.

True it is, of course, that self-determination cannot comprise the entire substance of European political theory. It is indeed unfortunate that this claim was not recognized when the new boundaries were determined. Wherever self-determination was unfavorable to the conquered Powers, the other equally important principle was cast to the winds. Wherever, on the contrary, self-determination was in favor of Austria and Germany, arguments and reasons for exceptions to be made were always found to outweigh the former principle. There must be an end, once for all, to this hypocrisy and high-handedness. All the possible exceptions to self-determination must be clearly defined and themselves made as exception-proof as possible.

In the case of Austria the treaty of peace left open the possibility of union with Germany, subject to the approval of the League of Nations. Austria falls in none of the exceptions to the right of self-determination. The main argument of the opponents of consolidation is that thereby Germany's power would be greatly increased, and that this would threaten the existence of France's allies (meaning Czecho-Slovakia). This is in short nothing else than the old European principle of the balance of power and of strategic frontiers. That this is actually unlikely has already been shown. Above this, there is also the thorough illegality of such a consideration. No honest adherent of international justice can afford to admit that military considerations of the balance of power and of strategic boundaries may lead to even the slightest violation of self-determination. He who makes the least concession in this respect will soon find himself on a steep decline which can only end in the absolute negation of the principle.

There are no national boundaries which are not at some point or other strategically unfavorable to the neighboring state. There will always be mountains, rivers, coal and metal mines, harbors, etc., which will appear valuable to the militarist. He, therefore, who recognizes the military argument must perforce deny the nationalistic and democratic. Moreover, "strategic borders" in this era of chemical and air warfare are simply nonsense. It would indeed have to be a Himalaya or an Amazon River which would offer difficulties to the military technique of a modern, industrially developed state. Against the newer methods of warfare and the ingenuity of industrialism our rivers and mountains no longer afford any protection. Against a small, weak state, moreover, no protection is necessary, and the military argument therefore adds hypocrisy to brutal injustice.

The real reasons for the alarm which the French newspapers have raised lie elsewhere. The fear of German military power and revenge is merely an excuse. From the pacifist point of view, France would have every reason to support the union. The whole affair is merely a well-timed effort to wrest concessions from Germany regarding the evacuation of the Rhine provided by the treaty of peace; and to this must be added another motive—Czecho-Slovakia's effort to keep Austria economically dependent. Admittedly, Dr. Benes would be greatly pleased if Austria were incorporated in the Little Entente under Czecho-Slovakian hegemony. Economically indeed a closer alliance between these nations would be profitable to all parties concerned, but unfortunately Czecho-Slovakia has from its very inception pursued a policy toward Austria which is inimical to any such proposal.

It is not a union with Germany but the right of self-determination that I am championing in this article. The practical recognition of this principle appears to me to be so important that in order to establish it I would be willing to advocate consolidation even when I believed it to be against Austria's interests. Whether consolidation is expedient for Austria seems to me to depend upon more narrow considerations. For the sake of peace in Europe it is at any rate highly desirable, for it would put the German Nationalist reactionaries in the hopeless minority.

CENTENARY EDITION OF

JOSEF DIETZGEN'S

The Positive Outcome of Philosophy

Josef Dietzgen, born December 9, 1828, approached the problems of philosophy from the view-point of the revolutionary working class. This book, his greatest work, deals with the nature and substance of thinking. It discards mysticism, and shows brain work as a natural process.

In the twenty years since Dietzgen's works first appeared in English, the name and fame of the "workingman philosopher" have become familiar to an ever-widening circle of proletarian students, who find Dietzgen's logic a sharp and invincible theoretical weapon. This new translation will be welcomed for its added clearness and strength. Cloth, 480 pages, $2.00 postpaid.

TO OUR READERS a Happy New Year! May it be given to them to be eyewitnesses of true political and social progress in 1929, and may we be the fortunate chroniclers of it! We cannot let this issue, the last to bear the date of the old year, speed on its way without a warm word of gratitude to all those friends who made the tenth year of the present editorship the most successful in our history. To have seen the circulation figures touch, and go above, 40,000 has been to all the editors a profound reason for gratitude and inspiration, though it has not decreased their own sense of inadequacy to their task or blurred their vision of the kind of outspoken weekly they would create were unlimited means theirs. To them the rise in ten years of stress, misunderstanding, misrepresentation, and often bitter opposition, from 7,200 readers to 40,000 spells a growth of tolerance (especially for journalistic shortcomings); an increasing demand for more political thinking; and a realization that America cannot live and grow spiritually by material success alone. To those who made the tenth-anniversary subscription campaign a possibility and a success go our special thanks. We record with particular pleasure the formation of clubs of Nation readers in a number of communities, not merely because they seek to serve The Nation but because they certify to the rising desire of liberals to know one another and to come together again for progressive political action. The editors realize that The Nation's road to definite establishment and prosperity is still long and arduous; that they are leagues from the point at which they will be able to build the larger and better weekly they seek to create. But they would be less than human if they let this opportunity pass without recording their profound gratitude for the innumerable evidences from all over the world of good-will, good cheer, generous support, and warm approval which have for them made 1928 unforgettable.

WHILE WE ARE DISTRIBUTING New Year wishes we desire to congratulate the owners of station WMCA of New York on their recent victory before the Federal Radio Commission in winning an equal division of time on the air with station WNYC. Not many large radio stations in America would give to an editor the unconditional right to say what he pleased without preliminary review or censorship, but such is the privilege which has been extended to the editors of The Nation by station WMCA for a number of months. Radio listeners who have tuned in on The Nation hour once a week can bear testimony to the fact that the most controversial matters have been discussed with the utmost frankness. Station WNYC, which asked the Federal Radio Commission for WMCA's time, and was refused, came before the commission with much public support because it is owned and operated by the city of New York. But municipal operation of a radio station does not mean freedom of speech; in the case of station WNYC it has meant quite the opposite. While New York is seething with governmental scandals which cry out for public exposure, the programs of the municipal radio station are limited to colorless, non-controversial "education." If publicly owned radio stations are to have any distinct value for the community they should be multi-partisan rather than non-partisan, allotting their time proportionately to majority and minority groups. Such an opinion is growing in England where government control has proved irksome and repressive. Meanwhile the editors of The Nation will continue to say what they think every Wednesday night over WMCA.

BOLIVIA'S ANNOUNCEMENT that it has ordered a halt to hostilities in the region in dispute between it and the republic of Paraguay increases the hope of a peaceful settlement of the difficulty through the mediation of outside nations, though the Bolivian population is in a hysterical state of mind and is using all the stupid old shibboleths about patriotism and national honor to justify the murder of its own young men and those of its neighbor in a war over something which isn't of the slightest concern to either of the countries, or even to purely selfish commercial interests within them. Fortunately Paraguay is more pacific and, whatever the degree of its fault in the original clash, it has since showed a praiseworthy desire to avoid war. Its acceptance of the offer of mediation on the part of the Pan-American arbitration conference puts it right with public opinion and will win for it world sympathy if Bolivia fails to take a similar course. Incidentally it is not a little ironic that Bolivia is able to spit fire with such gusto largely because it was a recent recipient of a large loan from United States bankers. The purpose of this loan, which was internal development, will of course totally miscarry if the country wastes its substance in war or even in preparations for it.

NATURALLY THE BOLIVIAN-PARAGUAYAN outburst has taken the edge off Mr. Hoover's "good-will visit" to South America, but although it is bad for his publicity it may be good for his education. And Mr. Hoover (and the United States) need education much more than publicity. Persons familiar with South American conditions watched with special care the account of Mr. Hoover's reception in the Argentine, partly because Argentina is the most Europeanized and among the most powerful of the Latin-American republics, but also because it is the chief center of antagonism to the United States. Argentina's withdrawal from the Pan-American Conference in Havana last winter because of resentment against our domination is still fresh in memory. Naturally economic causes are the chief source of ill-feeling. Our tariff on agricultural products, though of small benefit to our farmers, is regarded in the Argentine as unfriendly and reprisals have been proposed. The official reception to Mr. Hoover in Buenos Aires was, of course, as gracious as could be devised, but the newspaper dispatches report a distinct lack of popular enthusiasm. Mr. Hoover was happy in seizing his visit in Buenos Aires to declare through the columns of La Nacion that he is opposed to intervention by the United States in Latin-American affairs. We hope his Administration may prove the declaration more than wind blowing across the pampas.

THE OUTCOME of the meeting of the Council of the League of Nations is in doubt at this writing. There are various rumors as to what has finally been decided upon in regard to the evacuation of German territory. One of these stories is that the Germans are to pay $400,000,000 for complete evacuation, which sum France will receive on account of reparations, will use to pay what she owes the United States for the army supplies purchased by her after the armistice, and will then consent to the floating of a German loan in America, Berlin to transfer to Washington an unnamed amount of gold. This may be mere gossip, but the fact is that the Germans seem to have returned to Berlin much encouraged in spirit, especially by Stresemann's vigorous opposition to the Polish Prime Minister, Zaleski. The latter said that the action of the German Volksbund of Upper Silesia was "treasonable and a danger to the peace of Europe." To this Stresemann replied with high passion that the Germans in Polish Silesia were right in appealing to the League for redress, declaring that "one of the strongest pillars of the League would be destroyed" if for one moment it forgot its duties to racial and national minorities. In this he was upheld by Briand, who declared that "nothing whatsoever can happen which would cause the League to abandon its solemn duty to all minorities."

THE BEST THAT CAN BE SAID about the Boulder Dam bill as it passed the Senate is that it is better than nothing. The men who fought for this bill against the power lobby for eight years deserve the thanks of every good citizen, but it is a rather sorry disappointment to the advocates of public ownership. It provides for flood control and irrigation through the erection of the highest dam in the world, but the vital questions of public or private development of the power plants to be erected at the dam are left to the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior. Senator Borah's amendment to make the government construction of the power house mandatory, as the House had already provided, was withdrawn because the advocates of the measure feared a Coolidge veto if this provision was included. The man who inherits the mantle of Albert B. Fall, Hubert Work, and Roy West is permitted to turn over the erection of a power house to private companies or to lease power from a government plant to private companies on terms which will permit them to revise their bids every ten years. The one guaranty—and a very important one—that the electric power will be used for the public interest is the provision that States are given preference over private corporations in the purchase of current. Meanwhile, the Boulder Dam bill has gone to conference for final revision by the Senate and House committees, and after that hazard it still must face both Houses for final vote and then be ratified by the quarreling States of the Colorado basin. The power lobby has at least half a dozen more chances—in the White House, Congress, and the State legislatures—to smother the frail infant.

THE TRIAL OF PERRY HOWARD, the Republican Negro committeeman from Mississippi, and four co-defendants, all charged with the sale of offices, has resulted in their acquittal. Howard, the dispatches report, made an admirable witness in his own behalf, being frank, straightforward, and good humored throughout his cross-examination. The jury simply would not believe the chief government witness, A. P. Russell, a former United States marshal, who swore that he paid the Negroes $2,000 for his office, $1,500 of which was given to Perry Howard in the latter's office in Washington, where he has been assistant to the Attorney General of the United States. An amusing touch was that some of the jurors declared they thought the Negroes had been "exceptionally good" to Russell and his brother and "they did not have much respect for informers anyway." This verdict is accepted as ending the efforts of the white Republican faction in Mississippi to get rid of Howard as the Republican national committeeman. Incidentally, it again puts up to Herbert Hoover the question of the reorganization of the Republican Party in the South. Leading Negroes have been distinctly on the side of Howard, not that they believed that he was above and beyond the time-honored methods of securing delegates and hawking officers to the highest bidder, but because they felt that he had been picked upon as a scapegoat largely because of his color. Meanwhile the Brookhart committee is sitting in Washington and bringing out more and more facts about the free sale of offices in the South. In one case, it appears, one man "gave up" $500 for a postmastership. When he failed to get the job it took the leveling of a revolver to get his money back.

EMployees OF THE AUSTRIAN postal, telegraph, and telephone service, who number about 50,000, have invented a new technique for labor struggles. They demanded an extra month's pay as a Christmas bonus, asserting that though living costs have increased 200 per cent since the war, wages have remained practically at the pre-war level. Parliament replied that the bad financial situation applied to the whole country and not alone to state employees; it offered a bonus of 30 per cent of a month's wages. The workers refused the offer and began a campaign of "passive resistance." Instead of refusing to work, they appeared as usual—but proceeded in a leisurely and cheerful fashion to obey to the letter the somewhat obsolete regulations covering their departments. Since the telegraph office permits only a certain number of syllables in a word, the operators are meticulously counting syllables; telephone operators, in an unprecedented desire to avoid mistakes, politely ask customers to repeat numbers several times. As a result the post office in Vienna shows all the animation of a slow moving picture. Four days after the "strike" began, a million letters were piled up, telegrams were arriving one day late, and telephone service had so slackened that customers were making personal calls to save time. Efforts to end the situation have resulted in a deadlock. Parliament refuses to enter into further parleys until "passive resistance" ceases; the employees threaten to do their work with even greater precision. Meanwhile, the postal employees of Vienna are probably the only ones in the world who are taking the holiday "rush" calmly.

THE DEATH of Admiral von Scheer, commander of the German High Seas Fleet at the battle of Jutland, will doubtless precipitate anew the discussion as to the winner of that battle, a debate which is certain to continue as long as history is written. It is interesting to note that the London Times now admits that Von Scheer's fleet "returned home after inflicting far greater losses than it had suffered," that he was the best man that could have been picked in the German navy for the chief command, and that he "had made himself an absolute master of a system of leadership that consists in smoke-screens, mass torpedo attacks, outbursts of fire, and Kehrtwendungen" (reverse turns). There is no doubt that his fame as a commander will grow with the years; that he showed very great qualities in the battle of Jutland and in his withdrawal from the action. If he did not win a victory, neither did the British. His English rival certainly showed no greater skill or daring or determination. What might have been complete disaster, he well averted. It is unfortunate to have to record the fact that he was constantly egging the Kaiser on to unrestricted submarine warfare. It is pleasanter to add that, as the Times puts it, the tone and purpose "of what he wrote, or what he uttered, after the war was public-spirited, honorable, and modest." He devoted his last years to demanding proper care for Germany's maimed and disabled victims of the World War.

ONE MAN by manipulating the keys of an electric typewriter in New York or Washington can set up in type the articles in a hundred newspapers scattered over the continent. This amazing advance in the art of publishing has been made possible by the new teletypesetter which was invented by Walter W. Morey and exhibited in Rochester on December 6 by Frank E. Gannett of the Gannett newspapers. The new invention adapts to the linotype machine the principles of the ticker-tape and the player-piano. An electric typewriter perforates a roll of paper, with symbols for each letter and number desired, and these perforations are transmitted by wire to another city where they are duplicated on a roll of paper and fed into a linotype machine which transmutes the perforations into type. The teletypesetter can be used for mail as well as telegraphic service, since the rolls of perforated paper can be fed into the linotype machine at the convenience of the local editor and the automatic typesetting is said to be swifter and more accurate than the human variety. Moreover these perforated rolls of paper can be used by publishers for the multiple editions of books in place of the cumbersome and expensive process of storing type. These tremendous gains in the mechanical features of publication may be offset, however, by certain social losses. The new invention increases the advantage of the chain newspapers and makes more difficult the survival of the small independent publisher.

ELINOR WYLIE'S SUDDEN DEATH deprives American literature of a uniquely gifted writer. Mrs. Wylie, whose "Nets to Catch the Wind," "Black Armor," and "Trivial Breath" contained some of the most exquisite of contributions to modern poetry, was perhaps more widely known as a novelist. But her novels were the work of a fastidious and fanciful poet, as her prose style had all the manner of her brittle-tempered verse. She was famous for her manner both in prose and verse, and there were those who found it excessive; but the scrupulousness with which she followed her literary desires gave us in "Jennifer Lorn," "The Venetian Glass Nephew," "The Orphan Angel," and "Mr. Hodge and Mr. Hazard," four highly original stories that had much to do over the last few years with undermining the ponderous realistic tradition in contemporary fiction—a tradition which the successes of Thornton Wilder, Ernest Hemingway, and others have latterly shown to be losing favor. Mrs. Wylie was possessed of an appetite for knowledge which some readers of her novels may not have appreciated, since the labor of her researches was ably concealed beneath surfaces of fine precision. She had, in addition, pride and wit; and the current scene is poorer for her passing.

WHAT IS THIS WE READ? Why, that W. L. Mellon's magnificent new yacht, the Vagabondia, has arrived in New York, successfully concluding her maiden voyage. Where from? From Germany where she was built. By whom? Why, no less objectionable a company than Krupp's which, a bit over ten years ago, was turning out shot and shell to be used in killing American soldiers. Could the Vagabondia not have been built in the United States? Why, yes, indeed, just as well; but she would have cost her owner a few thousand dollars more. Is her owner poor? He is not; like his brother the Secretary of the Treasury, he is one of the richest men in America, probably the richest in Pennsylvania. But does he not believe in protection for home industry? Oh, yes, indeed, like his brother, the Secretary, he believes that protection is the foundation stone of American prosperity. He has a good many millions of dollars in protected industries. Why then did he go abroad for his yacht just when our ship-yards were in dire distress for lack of orders? Because when his protectionist theories and his pocket-book came into collision his patriotism and protectionism both faded away. The American ship-yards could go hang. Then he is not 100 per cent patriot? Indeed, Mr. Mellon is. He is precisely the kind of patriot we find in large numbers, men who stand by the flag—until it gets in the way of their profits or their purses. They usually rank high in nationalistic circles and may be counted on to denounce anybody who comes out against the American protective system, or the happy American custom of government by and for the rich.

A New Liberal Party?

IS there hope now for a new party? This question has come to us in many letters, for the political interest and excitement engendered by the campaign are persisting in an unusual degree. Emphatically we believe that there is hope for a new party. Despite the huge popular vote rolled up by the Democrats their party is moribund. We are well aware that Franklin D. Roosevelt and Governor Smith have referred to the fourteen or more million votes as proof of the vitality of their organization. But a party may register many votes, yet still be near dissolution and still deserve dissolution. The Democratic high tide of votes in 1928 was not due to party principles, for these it deliberately threw away. Nor was it in response to any thrilling new—or old—social or international program, for no such program was presented. It is largely to be explained by resentment at the way in which Governor Smith was persecuted for his origin, his religion, his political associations, and his views on prohibition. It was a response also to the courage and charm of the man himself, to his picturesqueness, his ability, and such liberalism as he voiced. That cannot, however, conceal the fact that his party is bankrupt as to ideas, has no single principle left to differentiate it from the Republican Party which it strove to emulate in every way possible.

But that leaves millions unsatisfied. Opposed to the Republican Party, they cannot embrace the Democratic now that it insists that it, too, stands for Big Business, for high tariffs, for the gospel of all-controlling prosperity, for the curtailment of immigration, for a big navy, and has forgotten all about the Wilsonian doctrines of 1912. So deep is this feeling that we are convinced that one able, brave, and earnest leader, with a liberal program, could rouse the country. There is no such leader in sight—nor likely to be. Again, if there were a single compelling moral issue, a new party would arise as quickly as did the Republican Party upon that of slavery. Instead we have a multiplicity of evils and no generally accepted solution.

If one adds to the lack of a leader, and of an all-compelling issue, the blindly reactionary policies of the American Federation of Labor, and its refusal to enter politics as a labor force, and the notably individualist character of the American dissenter, it would seem on its face as if the situation were hopeless for those who desire a warless world and a new order in which there shall be adequate social control of private profit. We cannot wholly blame those who see no use in moving until some new leader appears, or the prosperity spell has lost its hold. But for us the possibility of an immediate beginning is present. We cannot forget that nearly five million votes were cast for Mr. La Follette and his progressive platform only four years ago. We are deeply impressed by the growth of liberal forums and clubs, by the spontaneous action of readers of The Nation in voluntarily banding themselves together in a number of cities—without any suggestion from us—in order to discuss and further among themselves the issues for which The Nation stands. We meet, moreover, many men and women who see at last that economic conditions and needs compel a progressive political organization. We venture to prophesy that there is not a hamlet in this country without a few persons in revolt against the existing economic and political order.

Finally, there was the election itself to encourage us. Never before was there such a breaking of party ties, such splitting of ballots—of which the election of a Democratic Governor of New York is one instance, and the amazing defeat of the Crowe gang in Chicago another. Multitudes were ready to distinguish; ready to vote for an issue, but also to weigh the merits of individual candidates, and to vote with no regard for party labels. How else could Senator Shipstead have been reelected without any party?

The omens, therefore, seem favorable. But what can be done now without a leader or a party name, without funds or a single compelling appeal to the public? The answer is that the way to begin is to begin; the way to organize is to organize; the way to fight is to fight; locally now wherever the opportunity offers. There are progressives enough powerfully to affect Congress and to influence the election of 1932 if they could only come together. They do not know one another—often not in their own towns—partly because of the reign of reaction since the war, partly because there has been no common ground of association. An organization to serve as a liaison office; to list the innumerable existing civic and national organizations vitally interested in political and economic reforms; to register the names of individuals in every State who are ready for a change; to encourage political and economic study and action and to inspire it wherever possible; to inquire into the best methods of diffusing progressive thought; to draft slowly and with care a simple platform—that is the great need of the hour. This, we believe, will be the best way to begin the founding of a new liberal party with which we trust the Socialists, with their broad, humanitarian, and international point of view, and their tenacious organization, will be able to affiliate.

We are aware that it is a new technique for this country which we are suggesting. New parties have usually arisen out of a temporary economic stress, or because of a vibrant personality like that of Mr. Roosevelt. To build from underneath is, however, the democratic way. The Republicans did so, and did not know their Lincoln until their machinery was ready to his hand. Today it may seem like essaying the incredible. Not to us. If the work is honestly and ably done it will count. Even if it leads to no party organization, it will be worth while if it merely enables liberals to know one another and stimulates political thinking in the country which today does less sound political thinking than any other important one. We believe that thousands upon thousands of key men and women will rally to the organization as soon as the news reaches them, and that money can be found. Not, however, if there is to be a policy of drift and compromise, or of marking time to see if the Democratic Party can be liberalized, when, as we have so often shown, it is without coherence, or unity, or principle, composed of utterly dissimilar elements. Not if the controlling idea is a certain success in 1932. But if there should be courage, outspokenness, daring, and radicalism—in the English sense of the word—there will, we are certain, be an immediate and unequivocal response.

Stop the Cruiser Bill!

NO sane person wants war between the United States and Great Britain, but we are moving in that direction at a dizzy pace. At Washington the militarists are using our national miseducation on preparedness to jam through Congress the fifteen-cruiser bill. They are telling our befuddled Congressmen that the failure of the Disarmament Conference leaves only one answer to the British menace, the answer of the biggest navy in the world. Some of them are not content even with this answer; they join with the editor of Liberty in demanding a navy large enough to whip both Great Britain and Japan combined. Such chauvinism always finds its echo in the opposing nation. When the British quote Liberty the Americans quote Dean Inge, who let slip an unguarded remark about the possibility of Europe uniting to pull the American Shylock's teeth. If the process goes on, the United States and Great Britain will present the spectacle of two angry boys, each with a large stone in his hand, shouting cheap threats at each other and growling: "Put down that rock or I'll hit you in the eye."

In the midst of this puerile snarling of militarist bullies and professional patriots where does our Government stand? President Coolidge in his Armistice Day address deliberately fed the flames of national prejudice and fear. His words brought such a storm of protest from all parts of the country that in his message to Congress he stressed the fact that we were building new cruisers chiefly for replacement and renewal. "This country," he said, "is neither militaristic nor imperialistic." Then, to prove that he was not precipitous in his demand for more military power, he included in his message a recommendation for eliminating the time clause in the cruiser bill. The bill originally called for the construction of five cruisers in 1929, five in 1930, and five in 1931. But the President suggested that these time clauses be omitted and that the cruisers be built when the Executive deemed it necessary.

This policy can have only one meaning. Mr. Coolidge does not want new cruisers, but he wants new threats to use in the diplomatic game of frightening Great Britain into a naval agreement that will be more favorable to the United States. What a jumble of fevered patriotism and political feebleness this policy is! Either we need new cruisers or we do not. The President by waiving the time clauses in the cruiser bill virtually admits that there is no immediate need of the cruisers. As everyone knows, their ultimate purpose is not so much to defend America as to prey upon Britain's trade routes in case of war.

All history teaches us that such threats breed anger and counter-threats, that, indeed, they are primary causes of war. We cannot frighten Britain into disarmament by a military bluff any more than Britain can stop American expansion by a bluff. If we have no immediate need of these fifteen cruisers we should say so, and frankly tell Great Britain that we do not propose to enter into a naval race. The effect of such a declaration upon British public opinion would be electric.

The little group of progressives in Congress who are fighting the cruiser bill deserve the hearty support of every citizen. The Nation urges its readers to send appropriate telegrams and letters to their representatives at once.

Bothersome Colonies

THERE was a paragraph in President Coolidge's Armistice Day speech which passed almost unnoticed in the United States but has raised a tumult of discussion in our overseas empire. "Our outlying possessions, with the exception of the Panama Canal Zone, are not a help to us but a hindrance," said Mr. Coolidge. "We hold them not as a profit but as a duty."

Naturally these words have caused much talk and some resentment in the regions alluded to, especially as some of them have been chastised by nature recently as well as by the President. A typhoon has lately caused large loss of life in the Philippines, while the Virgin Islands and Porto Rico were pitilessly battered by the hurricane of last autumn. Rothschild Francis's Emancipator of St. Thomas admits sadly that the President's profit-and-loss statement is true in regard to the Virgin Islands, but adds that "if Denmark had known the value of money she certainly could have got at the time of sale $175,000,000 or even $250,000,000 for this particular outlying possession. [We paid $25,000,000.] It is too late now as this is peace time and talk is cheap."

In this country there may be a slight shiver at hearing our colonies discussed from quite such a bookkeeping standpoint as that of Mr. Coolidge, but his words throw a cold light on the whole subject of empire which may be quoted usefully against the policies of his own Administration. If our outlying possessions are "not a help to us but a hindrance," we wonder how Mr. Coolidge explains the passion of the State Department for the practical annexation of Haiti and Nicaragua. In any event, if we have a duty toward our outlying possessions, now is certainly the time to recognize it. The Virgin Islands have been consistently neglected since we acquired them a decade ago, and are still under the "temporary" (and highly unsatisfactory) government then set up. But Porto Rico needs our even more immediate attention, as it was the spot hardest hit in the recent West Indian hurricane. A recent survey shows that the island sustained damage to the extent of $85,000,000 besides the heavy toll of human life. The Red Cross has assisted in supplying food and in rebuilding 50,000 houses, but has no funds for the rehabilitation of agriculture. The coffee industry is in the worst plight, and it is to be hoped that Congress will accede to the plea to make a loan for its revival. This industry is the only considerable one in the island still controlled largely by small individual owners, and although the living conditions of the workers are pitiable, it would be too bad if this remnant of independent agriculture were allowed to perish. As it will take five years to bring new coffee trees into bearing, and as most of the growers are without capital, it is obvious that they will have to have more or less assistance until they can sell their first crop.

Harwood Hull's Porto Rico Progress takes the wise stand that this is the moment to take a broad survey of the island's problems as a whole, and act accordingly, instead of merely dealing out temporary doles here and there. It recalls another part of the Armistice Day speech in which Mr. Coolidge said: "We intend to preserve our high standards of living" and declared that "we should like to see all other countries on the same level."

The newspaper then asks:

If the United States holds Porto Rico as a duty, as the President says, what is the duty of the United States to her fellow-American citizens here? How badly does the President want to preserve the high standards of living in the United States and how badly does he want those standards attained and maintained in Porto Rico?

Millions of money may be appropriated for Porto Rico with scarcely more effort than that required to make the President's speech. If appropriated every cent will be wasted, and worse than wasted, unless basic facts and conditions are studied and understood and a broad general plan developed for the physical, social, and economic rehabilitation of the largest group of American citizens anywhere outside of continental United States; rehabilitation required not because of a chance hurricane, but because of generations of malnutrition, disease, ignorance, and neglect.

Though he did not know it when he made his speech, this is the "duty" of the United States to Porto Rico to which the President referred.

The position is well taken. The situation in Porto Rico is critical. But it is only a little more critical because of the hurricane than it has been during all the thirty years of our occupation. Porto Rico suffers chronically from too many mouths to feed and too little to put into them. The density of population is ten times that of the average for our continental United States, and yet agriculture is—and seems destined long to remain—the one great source of subsistence. The food of the workers is miserably inadequate, and anemia is widespread, due to hookworm and malnutrition. The Porto Rico Chamber of Commerce estimates that at the present time unemployment extends to 60 per cent of the workers, but this is not greatly beyond the normal, which is always appalling. Porto Rico Progress is right. If we pretend a duty to the island, then there is an immediate call for a searching survey and an honest, intelligent effort at a remedy.

The Spectator

THE London Spectator has just passed its hundredth birthday, an event appropriately celebrated by a commemorative issue of the magazine and by the publication in book form of a history of its career.* A good quarter of a century older than its conservative rival, the Saturday Review, the Spectator has been for several generations the best organ of moderate, or rather conservatively tinged, English liberalism, and all signs point to a future no less bright than its past. On this anniversary we extend to the Spectator our heartiest congratulations, with best wishes to the editor, John Evelyn Wrench.

Probably no other magazine of equal age has maintained so completely continuous a tradition or, in general, undergone so few vicissitudes. Times change and opinions change with them, but the Spectator's position in relation to the problems of any particular period has remained almost the same during a century, and it has survived not merely as a name but as a personality also. Doubtless this continuity has been more easily maintained as a result of the fact that from 1828 until 1925 it underwent only two significant changes of ownership. Founded by a rather shadowy Scottish journalist named Rintoul, who remained its editor and proprietor until 1858 and established its tendency, it passed (after a brief interregnum) into the hands of Meredith Townsend and R. H. Hutton, who then carried it on until 1897, when St. Loe Strachey assumed control. In all three cases proprietor and editor were one, and as each editor relinquished it he handed it on, not as a mere property to be sold in the open market but to a successor who would regard it as a permanent institution.

It so happened, moreover, that under each regime the magazine found itself called upon to take an active part in molding public opinion concerning a particular group of related issues. Rintoul passionately championed the cause of the Reform Bill and fought for the repeal of the Corn Laws. Townsend and Hutton espoused the cause of the North in the American Civil War and played a considerable part in the efforts to effect the change of attitude brought about in England. Mr. Strachey was faced with the responsibility of determining the policy of the magazine in respect to the World War. Perhaps Mr. Strachey's regime was the most conservative which the paper had known, and The Nation, of course, is not inclined to regard his militant patriotism and his imperialistic militarism as a logical part of the liberal tradition. But Mr. Strachey himself defined the position of the Spectator as being that of the "left center," and the description is accurate when applied to the whole of its historic policy, even though the earlier editors may have been further to the left than he. In general the Spectator has supported the most important reform measures as they have appeared, but it has always very carefully guarded itself against any possible charge of what would have been called "jacobinism" in its early days and is called "dangerous radicalism" now.

Increasing age inevitably gives to any institution an increasing air of respectability, and irreverent members of more than one younger generation have sometimes been inclined to consider the Spectator, in spite of its liberal principles, as primarily an organ of solid bourgeois opinion. Stevenson's reference to it as his "grandmother" supplied a nickname which stuck, but on the whole the charge of "grandmotherliness" could be more easily sustained by judicious quotation from the literary columns published during its past than by any citations from the history of its political opinion. Indeed, as the author of a summary in the centenary issue admits, "for a hundred years the Spectator was surprisingly the same in its literary outlook; very quick to recognize solid achievement, a little slower to praise talent that came with a disruptive and unusual vigor." In its earliest days it divided its intensest admiration between two established figures, Scott and Byron, and a little later it published articles by Carlyle and Swinburne, but it was somewhat querulous in its reception of Tennyson, Browning, and Meredith, while it was uncompromising in its criticism of various other men who have since been everywhere accepted. Of "Wuthering Heights" it said that "the persons and incidents are too coarse to be attractive," and upon the dogmatic Matthew Arnold it expressed the strange judgment that he was, as a critic, "too tentative, and too insecure." Campbell has "of all the bards of the present century . . . the surest chance of becoming the poet of posterity," but Blake's "Songs of Innocence" "appears to have been written under the influence of eau sucrée and Whitman "delights to dance naked and to chant indecent platitudes in prose run mad." Obviously the Spectator was not good at literary prophecy; but in all fairness it must be admitted that few magazines ever have been.

The Season of Good-Will in South America

Hoover and the "Big Lift"

By AMOS PINCHOT

EARLY last fall hints were dropped from Olympus that a Republican victory would be followed by a largess to business of unusual, indeed unparalleled proportions. Since November 6 belief in this largess has grown. Yet, among newspaper seers, political prophets, and others who should be in the know, the exact nature of the largess is still a moot question, the general opinion, however, being that the Big Lift, as it has been called, would have to do with hydro-electric development.

This opinion, I think, is incorrect. For, though generosity to the hydro-electric group is obviously on the cards, my belief is that the Hoover Administration will hitch its wagon to a higher star; and that the Big Lift will turn out to be a grand offensive against the Sherman Anti-Trust Law. Five years ago Mr. Hoover wrote a book about his political and economic philosophy. "American Individualism," by Herbert Hoover (Doubleday, Page and Company, 1923), deals with the relations that should exist between government and private business. And it is to this subject that Mr. Hoover applies the test of individualism, the philosophy to which he moors both his political and economic thinking. Now, a man's philosophy is perhaps the most important thing about him. Once we understand it, we are in a fair way not only to comprehension of his past, but to a more or less accurate forecast of his future. For this reason "American Individualism" is of more than passing interest. For, though with characteristic reticence Mr. Hoover does not mention the Sherman law by name, he nevertheless inserts it as a major theme in his book.

Now, the theory of individualism, as applied to government and business is a simple and, to most of our minds, a sound one. It is that the government should keep its hands off business, leaving it to its own devices, except when restraint is clearly necessary, in order to safeguard equal opportunity and competition, i.e., to preserve the essentials of individualism itself. In the earlier pages of his book Mr. Hoover sets this down fairly enough, adding that his faith in individualism is rooted in personal experience as well as in theory. He has seen America; he has seen Europe; he has experienced "the backwash and misery of war." "And from it all," he concludes, "I emerge an individualist—an unashamed individualist." So far Mr. Hoover is not saying anything startling. He is merely restating the faith that Jefferson, the loving disciple of John Locke, published in his epic struggle with Hamilton, the argument that Senators Sherman, Hoar, and Edmunds brought to a favorable, indeed unanimous, vote in the great debates on the Sherman law in 1889 and 1890. From this point, however—from the point at which, having stated his theory, the writer begins to apply it to actual conditions—the book takes a sudden and rather disconcerting turn. Mr. Hoover becomes a politician instead of a philosopher, and a politician revamping his theory to fit a purpose which, though obscure at the outset, grows clearer as the book proceeds.

In short, though Mr. Hoover does not cease to praise individualism and "its corollaries," equality of opportunity and "the free-rolling mills of competition," he, at the same time, gives a clean bill of health to American industrialism —quite irrespective of the fact that its attack on individualism has never been so severe or so effective as it is today: first, by denying that concentration of wealth and power is any longer a thing to be feared (though there was a time, he admits, when "domination by [business] groups" threatened us "with a form of autocracy"); second, by rebuking the government for too much regulation of big business; and third, by incorporating in his book four seemingly commonplace sentences which, nevertheless, carry implications that no monopolist, or would-be monopolist, can consider without a thrill of joy.

These sentences are:

Excluding the temporary measures of the war, the period of regulation has now been long enough with us to begin to take stock of its effect upon our social system. It has been highly beneficial, but it has also developed weaknesses in the throttling of proper initiative that require some revision. We have already granted relief to labor organizations and to agriculture from some forms of regulation. There is, however, a large field of cooperative possibilities far outside agriculture that are needlessly hampered.

Now, just what do these sentences mean? To the person unfamiliar with the provisions of the so-called Clayton and Capper-Volstead Acts, they mean little or nothing. But, if one happens to recall that, on October 15, 1914, Congress "relieved" labor and agricultural organizations by placing them beyond the reach of the Sherman Anti-Trust Law, and, again, on February 18, 1922, "relieved" dairy farming, ranching, fruit growing, and other cooperatives, by a similar grant of immunity, the gist of the sentences at once becomes important.

To be specific, Mr. Hoover's meaningful, though veiled, sentences are notice, to those who know how to read them, that, though Mr. Hoover is philosophically an individualist, he is, nevertheless, practically a safe man. Safe because he believes the government should cut loose from its traditional opposition to monopoly. Safe since he suggests that, just as it has guaranteed labor unions and farm cooperatives (which, by the way, Congress never intended to bring under the Sherman law) against prosecution, it shall now guarantee big business, and give monopoly and price-fixing a free hand. It should be noted in this connection that Mr. Hoover uses the term "cooperative possibilities" in the sentence in which he asserts that the government is hampering industry: "There is, however, a large field of cooperative possibilities far outside agriculture that are needlessly hampered." In the language of big business, "cooperation" is almost invariably used as a polite but deceptive synonym for monopoly. When Judge Gary defended the steel and iron monopoly before the Stanley Committee, he called it "cooperation." Last year, when heavy production broke the oil trust's power to control the price of crude, there went up a cry that the Sherman law was thwarting "cooperation."

Many years ago this country came to the conclusion that to allow individuals, or groups of them, to crush competition, control production, and fix the price of the essentials of life, was not merely an expensive policy, but one distinctly dangerous to the integrity of government. Wherefore, the Sherman Anti-Trust Law of 1890 and subsequent supporting legislation. It is not my purpose to uphold the Sherman law as a complete or adequate solution of the monopoly question. Yet, although it has failed in conspicuous cases to protect the public from monopoly and extortion, it has, nevertheless, in a multitude of less-known cases, been useful in preventing the formation of monopolies and in keeping prices down, the latter being the law's main purpose. Moreover, its failures have been due less to faults in its theory and original provisions than to the refusal of the courts to construe it liberally and the neglect of Congress to amend it in accordance with changing business conditions. For instance, if Congress had early taken the position that the functions of production and distribution should be rigidly divorced so that no industrial producer or distributor should own or in any way control a railroad and vice versa (a reform urged by more than one Congressional committee), America's industro-financial history, as well as her political history, might today be read on a cleaner page.

However, with all its faults, the Sherman law, besides being a threat and at times a bar to monopoly, has been immensely valuable as a searchlight on the methods of big business. The prosecutions carried on under its authority, the scathing opinions handed down by justices of the Supreme Court, and the disclosures of committees and commissions investigating alleged illegal mergers and suppressions of competition have centered public attention on industrial questions, at the same time penalizing monopolists by forcing them to expend vast sums for legal expenses, propaganda, etc. Undoubtedly, the Sherman law has served to keep the more lawless elements of big business on the defensive, so much so indeed that, in emergencies, the latter have not stuck at packing courts, congresses, and cabinets.

For example, about the time that Mr. Morgan the elder, at a meeting of his lawyers, expressed the fear that his merger of some two hundred plants into the United States Steel Corporation would, if attacked by the Department of Justice, result in conviction under the Sherman law, there found their way into President Roosevelt's Cabinet two former members of the legal staff of the Steel Corporation, one president of a subsidiary of the Steel Corporation, and a director of the Steel Corporation, who was also a partner in the Morgan firm. At the present moment, the Sherman law is holding up the merger of two competing coal-carrying railroads, and threatening the Mellon aluminum, the Havemeyer sugar, and other trusts with indictments that no doubt will be side-tracked, but not without a good deal of embarrassment and some scandal.

Despite the propaganda to the contrary the Sherman law is rarely, if ever, invoked against legitimate business consolidations or large units of production. Nor does it interfere with initiative, enterprise, or invention. It attacks only monopoly, price-fixing, and unfair competition, for which reason it is more hated by monopolists, more misrepresented, and more schemed against than any law ever signed by a President.

Mr. Hoover, in "American Individualism," paints a glowing picture of our economic system. He declares it to be free from Europe's socialistic degeneration; and, in this, he is quite right. But when he adds that the United States is "steadily developing the ideals that constitute progressive individualism," he is not right and not on firm ground. Indeed, no man should know better than the ex-Secretary of Commerce that, so far from being individualistic, our basic industries are dominated by monopoly groups, which have so successfully warred on individualism, equal opportunity, and competition that, unless the tide of battle turns, they will before long disappear, and, like prehistoric beasts, be known henceforth only by their bones.

For example, Senate Document 1263, 67th Congress, 4th Session, is the clear and readable report of the Committee on Manufactures which investigated the oil industry in 1922 and 1923. After taking the testimony of the outstanding leaders of the oil and gasoline world and examining their records for months, the committee finds that neither individualism, equal opportunity, nor competition has survived in this sector of enterprise, which employs over eleven billions of capital and produces commodities of an annual value of about two and a half billions. The committee reports:

The dominating fact in the oil industry today is its complete control by the Standard companies. Any discussion of the subject which does not frankly recognize this control can only be misleading. Standard Oil today fixes the price which the producer of crude oil receives at the well, the price which the refiner receives for his gasoline and kerosene, as well as the retail price paid by the consumer.

And this state of things the committee finds to be the chronic one, except for brief periods, in which development of new fields speeds up production and temporarily breaks monopoly's power.

The chief cause of this situation the committee traces to the control exercised by the Standard Oil interests over the oil-carrying railroads, and especially the pipe-lines, in both of which differentials favorable to the trust are established and used as clubs with which to bring the independents to heel:

Through the Standard control of pipe-lines connecting the producing centers of the West with the consuming centers of the East and Middle West not only is the price fixed according to the will of the Standard group which any other interest must pay for the transportation of petroleum, but members of the group really determine whether any concern outside their group shall have petroleum transported at any price.

On the score of price-fixing the committee goes on to say that Mr. James E. O'Neil, lately president of the Prairie Oil and Gas Company, a Standard subsidiary, and at present a fugitive in Europe owing to his complicity in the Continental oil deal, part of the proceeds of which were used to pay the deficit of the Republican National Committee, is the individual who guides the price movements of crude oil for the whole trade.

In the anthracite coal industry a similar, but, if anything, worse condition is disclosed by numerous government reports, of which Mr. Hoover can hardly be ignorant. Here, monopoly and control of prices have become so effective that people living in towns built directly above the Pennsylvania mines pay as much for their hard coal as people in New York or Maine. And this has been going on for nearly half a century, to be exact, since 1886, when Mr. Morgan the elder summoned the leaders of the oil and coal interests to his library and perfected his plan for ending competition by tying up the avenues of transportation.

The story of the steel industry, as brought out by the last Congressional investigation, of 1911-1912, is not essentially different. The entire business has been turned into a feudal system, in which the Steel Corporation, through its control of ore and coal-hauling railroads, has expelled competition, and fixed prices arbitrarily.

In his testimony in the United States versus the Steel Corporation, Judge Gary admitted a differential of several dollars a ton. And Mr. Morgan's chief engineer, Mr. Julian Kennedy, testified before the Stanley Committee that, through its railroad and raw-material differentials, the Steel Corporation could, if it chose, destroy the so-called "independents," a fact that, whatever Mr. Hoover may say, is hardly consistent with individualism.

The beef-packing industry, the aluminum industry, the shoe-machinery industry, and many others have followed in similar unindividualistic paths. And, though in a few large industries such as automobile-making and chain grocery and department stores, competitive conditions survive and create higher efficiency and better service to the public than are known where monopoly prevails, these have escaped monopolization only because no individual or group within any of them has, so far, been able to corner and control any really essential industrial element.

The disadvantage of having a man of Mr. Hoover's training in the White House is likely, I fear, to exceed the advantages by a wide margin. Mr. Hoover has so thoroughly absorbed the point of view of his former employers and associates that it is impossible for him to pass a penetrating judgment on their way of doing things, or to study impartially the political and economic problems in which they are concerned. Consequently, though in his book and later in his campaign for the Presidency, Mr. Hoover presents individualism as his ideal, the fact that the industro-financial hierarchy, of which he has himself been a part, is laying violent hands on his ideal, tearing it down under the pretense of "cooperation," and setting up monopoly and privilege in its place, does not register in his mind. The only danger he sees to individualism is socialism—socialism, which has never been at a lower ebb in this country than now.

On the whole, forecasting Mr. Hoover's attitude by the philosophy of his book, which is more a plea for privilege than for individualism, it seems probable that a concerted drive against the Sherman law—the Big Lift that big business, and particularly the oil group, demands—will take place within the year; that monopoly, beneath the warming rays of Presidential approval, will bring forth new and abundant fruit; that the public-utilities interests will consolidate their power, defeating government operation of Muscle Shoals and Boulder Dam, and, no doubt, escaping effective regulation, since effective regulation of privately owned utilities does not, and, for sufficient reasons, probably never will exist; and finally that at the end of four years Mr. Hoover, having by righteous and legal means done more for plutocracy than ever Mr. Harding did by winking at villainies, will again be the choice of a nation gone serenely Babbitt.

Calles: Mexico's Leading Citizen

By ERNEST GRUENING

WITH the inauguration of Emilio Portes Gil as provisional President of Mexico a significant period in Mexico's evolution may have begun. Or rather it would be more accurate to say, with the termination of the Presidency of Plutarco Elias Calles, for despite his withdrawal from public office he has been, is, and for the rest of his life will continue to be the dominant figure in the Mexican scene. If important transformation in Mexico may be expected within the next decade, it is due in a land where the individual still counts extraordinarily to Calles, last of the Sonorans.

In discussing Mexico's future it is necessary to guard both against the undue optimism that a few favorable symptoms in her public life seem to justify, and, likewise, against the pessimism that a longer acquaintance with contemporary Mexican events is apt to engender. Many—including chiefly Mexicans—who have lived through the seventeen years of the revolution and seen its repeated betrayals and relapses, its high hopes and crushing disappointments, are apt to dismiss any current manifestations with a cynical reference to the French proverb—"Plus ça change, plus c'est la même chose."

Nevertheless the deep ferment of revolution has brought results. To achieve them was needed a leader who could combine understanding of the nation's needs, that is, sympathy with the revolutionary aspirations, inflexibility of purpose in materializing them, the political sagacity to maintain himself in office, and, above all, the character that would inspire respect at home and abroad. That leader has been and is Plutarco Elias Calles.

The present tense in his case is quite as important as the past. For, by refusing further tenure of the Presidency, which could have been his again—perhaps indefinitely—for the asking, Calles acquires a prestige and assumes a role in the life of the nation which permits him to serve it fully as much in the future as in the past. What have these services been?

Three underlying revolutionary aspirations have been crystallized in the regime of Calles and lifted to a plane of tangible achievement.

The agrarian reform is a fact. Begun under Carranza, it was a complete failure at the end of his term. It was carried further under Obregon, but was still so harassed by difficulties and the errors of its execution that four years ago it could not well be spoken of as much more than a hope deferred. While far more remains to be done than has been accomplished—indeed, it is the task of a generation—the feudal land tenure is dead, and a new system of small landholdings from which several millions of former peons are benefiting has been erected on ruins.

Labor has been given a chance to organize freely. Whatever may be the ultimate evolution of Mexican labor, it has been set free of the political shackles which bound it. Its process of self-education has begun.

Mexico's autonomy in the family of nations has been established. It has been a bitter struggle. Successively the Taft, Wilson, Harding, and Coolidge administrations varyingly have impinged on Mexican sovereignty. Conversely credit must be given to each of Mexico's executives from Madero on for stubbornly resisting any attempted or actual infringements by the United States. The proof of Mexico's assurance of her position as a sovereign nation, entitled to all the attributes and prerogatives thereof, comes—oh paradox of paradoxes—in the unique and unprecedented praise of the United States Ambassador in the inaugural address of President Portes Gil. Recalling the succession of United States ambassadors and chargés whose every move seemed to be the flaunting of a red cape before the snorting and sensitive toro of Mexican nationalism, it makes one rub one's eyes. We seem to have a man in the arena who has walked up and stroked the bull's nose. It may be taken for granted that the allusion to Mr. Morrow and his friendship was included in the Presidential message not merely with the consent but at the instance of Calles. Incidentally it should be recognized as a deserved tribute to the outstanding diplomatic achievement in United States history. Thus, in three fields of national activity—land, labor, and foreign relations—there has been definite accomplishment.

There has also been a fine, though limited, development in public-health work, road-building, irrigation, and school construction in city and country, and a definitely increased administrative efficiency. The maintenance of peace despite the various attempts at rebellion has been an important if negative achievement. So much for the record of Calles the President.

Viewed in the light of the immensity of his task, of the semi-chaos which he inherited in the wake of the De la Huerta rebellion, the obstacles that he faced in the militant hostility of the church, of the oil men, and of the State Department while its representative was Mr. James R. Sheffield, it is a great achievement. Contrasted against it, the errors in the matter of political favoritism, and the condonation of military violence, fade into insignificance. Excepting only the epochal Reform of the late eighteen-fifties, Calles's term has been the most important four-year period in Mexico's national life.

In one respect only was there complete failure. "Effective suffrage and no reelection," was the revolutionary device which overthrew Diaz. It has remained the campaign slogan ever since. But it has been wholly denatured by political performance. Elections in Mexico, except such as were foregone conclusions, have been a farce. The state elections with rare exceptions have been burlesques of fraud and violence, in which loss of life has been almost the rule. Only within the last month the state elections in Aguascalientes and Puebla have run bloodily true to form.

In the face of such a record Calles's refusal to run again and his declarations of the need of a new deal in politics are of vast importance. (It should be remarked that through an amendment to the Constitution of 1917, adopted by the Mexican Congress in 1927, to remove all doubt as to the legality of Obregon's candidacy, reelection of a President, after an interval, was legalized. Obregon had always contended that the prohibition of reelection in Article 83 of the Constitution of 1917 applied only to successive terms; an election after an interval in private life, he insisted, was another election, not reelection.)

Indeed, the whole record since the apparently cataclysmic assassination of Obregon has in many respects been without precedent. The nation recovered its poise to an unexpected degree and almost instantly. The trial of the murderer proceeded with a judicial calm and leisure which would have done credit to the most firmly established "government of laws" on earth. The elimination of ambitious generals as Presidential contenders and the complete tranquillity which surrounded the choice of Portes Gil for the interim Presidency was a new and unheard-of chapter in Mexican politics. This orderly sequence of events was in no small degree due to the unseen strategy of Calles.

In the momentary burst of grief and rage which followed the shooting of Obregon, Calles immediately moved the dead chieftain's closest associates into positions of brief authority. They were given charge of the preliminary investigation of the murder. The resignation of Morones was accepted. In the excitement of the hour he was blamed by the unfriendly agrarian leaders, though quite unjustly, for the "intellectual authorship" of the crime. Though personally friendly to the CROM leader, Calles took this opportunity to allow this laborite whose popularity had greatly diminished in office, to retire. For a brief interval, Obregonismo, even with its leader dead, appeared in the ascendent. None knew better than Calles that it was but a passing phase, and that shortly the group welded around Obregon would disintegrate. Almost with the removal of Obregon's body to Sonora, and even before the election in Congress of an interim successor, Obregonismo had dissolved. All eyes were now turned on Calles. He was begged not to leave office. He was offered whatever amendments to the constitution were needed to permit him to hold over "in the crisis." Public sentiment crystallized into the hope and belief that the method would be to have Congress elect (upon the nomination of Calles) an interim President and that in the special elections to be held fourteen months later (February 5, 1930), Calles would be chosen for the six-year term.

Congress assembled on September 1, to be opened, according to annual custom, with the President's account of his previous year's administration. To this ceremony President Calles invited not only every state governor, but every Jefe de Operaciones, the heads of the thirty-two military districts. All the political power of the nation was concentrated in the Chamber of Deputies upon that solemn occasion. The proverbial bombshell would have caused far less surprise than Calles's emphatic declaration that not only would he not be a candidate either for the interim or for the regular term, but that he would never again be a candidate for the Presidency. The rule of the caudillo, the chieftain, "the man on horseback," was over, he declared. Henceforth the ruler of Mexico would be "the law." This ideal that he held up for Mexico is, of course, none other than the oft-repeated Anglo-Saxon apothegm of "a government of laws, not of men."

Before the flabbergasted political cohorts could recover their breath, Calles entertained the generals at a conference in which they were carried away to fervent declarations of support of whomsoever the nation should elect. The various cliques within the army had had no time or opportunity to formulate plans of their own. Having them all corralled in one room, Calles ventured the question whether they had united or were prepared to unite on one of their number. Of course they had not. With the all-powerful Calles exhibiting such abnegation none ventured to propose himself as the nation's savior. The candidacy of General Manuel Perez Treviño went by the board. The military's indorsement of a civilian—of a figure who would symbolize not the chieftaincy of the past, but the projected reign of law—was the only course open to the assembled generals. The choice of Portes Gil, called only a short while before from the governorship of Tamaulipas to assume the portfolio of Gobernación, the head of the Cabinet, was assured.

Viewed in its historic perspective, the proposal to substitute democracy by executive fiat is quite impossible of early realization. It will be recalled that Mexico, emerging from three centuries of colonial absolutism, sought to enter its national existence under a constitution modeled on that of the United States. But the "three branches" remained an abstraction. Government in Mexico, politically speaking, has from first to last been an autocracy secured by the strongest. The most repeatedly declared aim of the revolution has been to substitute democratic government. But the heritage has been too overpowering.

In announcing his program, President Calles spoke of the need of a true government of parties, urged that a party be formed to embody and carry forward the ideals of the revolution, and suggested that even those opposed to the revolution should now be given their chance to be heard. Within subsequent weeks there have been hasty efforts on the part of not a few men prominent in government circles to acquire first-hand knowledge of the working of political parties in the United States. At least half a dozen independent requests have gone forth for literature bearing on our party organizations. It is the well-known "history repeats itself." A little over a century ago, the Constitution of the United States was hailed by the Mexican constitution framers as their political panacea and the magic formula for the hoped-for democracy.

What the Mexicans in the eighteen-twenties as well as in the nineteen-twenties apparently failed fully to understand is that apart from the vast dissimilarity in the political heritages of Mexicans and North Americans—continued autocracy on the one hand versus a steadily widening diffusion of power—is the basic difference in local self-government. The growth of political institutions in the United States is an evolution from the self-governing settlement and the town-meeting. In Mexico the appointive official, or local chieftain, in colonial days a fusion of the Aztec cacique and the royal corregidor, continued after independence as the jefe político though officially abolished by the revolution, still persists in fact without the title. Diaz appointed the state governors, though with the pretense of electoral forms. But under the revolution which was to abolish all that, governors have continued to strong-arm themselves into office. The cacique still rules lesser subdivisions by right of might and chicanery. The office as a spoil has remained the concept in municipality and state—though there have been gratifying exceptions. Of course, spoils are a factor in our politics, but no more serious mistake could be made in an effort at understanding the differences between Mexico and the United States than to find other than the remotest parallelism therein. Our municipal corruption in such cities as Chicago and Philadelphia represents the worst we have to offer. An Albert B. Fall is distinctly the exception in our Cabinets today. On the other hand, Calles's arrest and holding for trial of General Jose Alvarez, the chief of the Presidential staff, for grafting, praiseworthy as it was, is still also distinctly exceptional. There have been, along with outstanding and strictly honest men in the Calles Cabinet, others who continue to view public office as a means to feathering their own nests. Certain reappointments in the Portes Gil Cabinet, and such appointments as that of Marte Gomez to the Ministry of Agriculture and of Sanchez Mejorada to the Ministry of Communications are of the highest order. Marte Gomez was largely responsible for the efficient and enlightened application of the agrarian reform in Tamaulipas under Governor Portes Gil; he then became head of the National Farm Credit Bank. No one in Mexico is better qualified for his new and responsible post than he. Sanchez Mejorada, comparatively unknown, likewise is a non-political figure, an engineer whose appointment spells public service.

Of course, in our country purely political appointments to the Cabinet are not unknown. But with the continuity that exists in the departments, regardless of Cabinet changes, the secretaryships are, as a rule, relatively innocuous. They do not as in Mexico spell the difference between administrative success and failure. What Mexican executives need to realize is that at this juncture of Mexico's development, and in the attempted transition to democratic forms, the example given at the top is of supreme importance. Granted that political reform cannot yet spring from the bottom, and admitting the great difficulty of bestowing it from above, nevertheless the effect of a complete and unmistakable house-cleaning in all the offices within the reach of the national executive would be incalculably far-reaching. It is not true that Mexico lacks capable timber for high office, though it is naturally not as plentiful as in countries where politics has been more closely identified with public service. There are, for instance, in Mexico men highly qualified for the important office of Minister of Industry, Commerce, and Labor, who have had practical experience in conducting great business enterprises and are yet not disqualified by the (in Mexico) fearsome label of "reactionary." The head of the largest, most successful, and model tobacco factory—one which has kept well ahead even of the Mexican Federation of Labor's requirements, in which all its workers are organized, is such a man. He happens curiously enough to have been a revolutionist since the Madero days, and at present is senator from the state of Mexico. One wonders likewise why so devoted and capable a public servant as Moises Saenz, sub-Secretary of Education for the past three years, was passed over in the selection for the secretaryship.

The prospects for democracy from beneath are, curiously enough, by no means lacking, though not through the political channel which parallelism with the United States would lead one to expect. They will come far more directly through the agrarian cooperatives and urban labor unions, which are serving as training schools in citizenship of great value. The new political party, to be inaugurated under the sonorous title of Great National Revolutionary Party, does not by the mere gesture of coming into being offer any hope of political emancipation from the past rule of force, unless the spirit which actuated Calles in making his fine pronouncements on the need of "a government of law" is materialized unflinchingly in appointments to office. The appointees must spell "public service only" to the public eye. Apart from its relation to the large and long-distance establishment of democracy, this question bears immediately and overwhelmingly on economic reconstruction.

If Calles, who now bids fair to be something which Mexico has never known—a political boss who is not the President—can make marked progress toward this end, he will add cubits to his already considerable stature, and make his life-term as a civilian citizen of even greater moment and service than his Presidency.

Paxton Hibben

By SUZANNE LA FOLLETTE

THE first time I ever saw Paxton Hibben, strangely enough, was at a public debate. I say strangely, because I avoid public meetings as a cat avoids water. I do not remember what took me to that debate on Russia; but I rather like to think my guardian angel may have been a bit more watchful than usual, for it became the occasion of a delightful friendship. Mr. Hibben's opponent was a Russian of the old regime; and the argument had not proceeded very far when it became evident that the sponsor of the Soviets had the best of it. Indeed his easy command of the situation nettled the Russian and drove him to abusive personalities which spoiled the effect of such arguments as he had to offer. One might have condoned a similar lapse into blackguarding on Mr. Hibben's part, but it was not necessary; for he returned to the attack with perfect urbanity, and lifted the argument once more to the level of impersonal fact and theory.

It was amusing to see the protagonist of a despised working-class government set this sponsor of the aristocracy such an example of objectivity and good breeding. Indeed, I enjoyed it so much that when I had occasion a few days later to write Mr. Hibben for the Freeman, I gave myself the pleasure of telling him so. His answer was an agreeable surprise: I was invited to dine at his home. Thus I was introduced into a household where, mirabile dictu, the ruling spirit was that gaiety which is as rare in America today as when Mrs. Trollope commented on its absence a century ago. Another exotic plant which flourished there was genuine conversation. What discussions there were over Sheila Hibben's dinners, where the excellence of the food was equaled only by that of the company! What arguments on every conceivable subject, from the nature and function of language to the adultery of Henry Ward Beecher!—arguments characterized by great good humor and a wealth of amusing comments from the two Hibbens. I had reason, indeed, to thank whatever gods had drawn me to that debate on Russia.

It was a rare privilege to enjoy this intimate contact with Paxton Hibben. There was about him something electric; wherever one touched his mind one drew a spark. Nothing escaped him; no aspect of life was too unimportant to interest him, and none failed to elicit from him a response strongly individual and therefore always interesting and often provocative. Another thing in him which delighted me was the intensity of his absorption in the thing he was doing. While he was writing his biography of Henry Ward Beecher, the Great Preacher really became an intimate of the Hibben circle; we all felt that we knew him well. The same thing was true later of William Jennings Bryan. I suppose I have heard Paxton hold forth a hundred times on the character and behavior of these two men; and his analysis always fascinated me as much as his subject fascinated him.

There were many other reasons why it was a privilege to know this man, among them his capacity for an altogether admirable loyalty to his friends, a loyalty often prolonged far beyond the time when they had ceased to deserve it. In this clinging to people who had been dear to him there was something of that sentimentality which he recognized and fought in himself, and never admitted to another soul, probably, save Sheila Hibben. His friendship for Albert J. Beveridge, for example, not only withstood the test of Beveridge's prima-donna airs; it also withstood the test of his clumsy efforts to conceal their connection when he became a little ashamed of it after Paxton had "gone radical." Paxton Hibben had long since outgrown all that he had in common with Beveridge, but he remained loyal to a friendship which had become anomalous and inconvenient, for the sake of what it had once meant to him. There were no reservations in his loyalty to the people he cared for; nor was he the kind to await an opportune moment to take up the cudgels for a friend. His book in defense of King Constantine came out at a time when it was so disagreeable to our Government that it was quietly suppressed; and the circumstance did not add to official regard for its author. No doubt it was one of the unpublished counts against him in that ridiculous proceeding which did not dare be quite so ridiculous as to deprive Captain Hibben of his commission in the reserve corps of the army.

The qualities which endeared Paxton Hibben to his friends determined the direction of his public life. Being one of those "dissentients afflicted with the malady of thought," and having the mental courage to follow thought along unfamiliar ways, he came, by the strange path of Rooseveltian progressivism, from an inauspicious beginning among the artificialities of diplomatic life to an uncompromising social and economic radicalism. If at the same time he clung with apparent inconsistency to certain things which most radicals reject, this loyalty, again, becomes clear in the light of the sentimentality which he hated. It never involved compromise. He joined the army in 1917—a gesture of loyalty to a conception of patriotism which he was rapidly outgrowing—but his position did not deter him from bringing himself into disfavor with his superior officers by lecturing to his battery on a subject which was no soldier's business: the causes of the war. Nor did he allow the terrors of an official inquiry to swerve him by a hair's breadth from his stand on Russia. His love for old forms and new ideas caused him at one time to be a good deal misunderstood. Neither conservatives nor radicals knew quite how to take him, probably because both expect their sympathizers to be of the herd; they fear and distrust the individual. But Paxton Hibben was, more than anything else, an individual who thought and acted for himself—and as such he really represented the best American tradition. What he found good, to that he gave loyal and courageous support; what he found bad he fought uncompromisingly and with no thought of timeliness or expediency—and he was a formidable antagonist. Perhaps the most significant thing about his public career lies in the fact that he had the strength to break the social mold which cramps the spirit of most Americans of his class, and to emerge into a triumphant individualism which many of his compatriots, no doubt, never understood, but which they were nevertheless forced to respect.

He had entered, when he died, upon what must have been to him the most satisfactory phase of his career, the writing of biography. Here, too, his mental honesty and his courage brought him into trouble. His "Henry Ward Beecher" aroused a storm of abuse such as few writers have encountered. It is a tribute to his scholarship that no attack was brought against his facts or his interpretation of them that he was not able successfully to refute. The book is called "An American Portrait"; it might with equal justice have been called a portrait of America, for that is what it is—of the America of economic opportunism and moral sham which were dramatically epitomized in Beecher. No doubt the life of Bryan, which is left unfinished, will prove as graphic a picture of a later phase of American life. The parts I have seen show the same vivid understanding of the man and his period, touched with that mordant irony which made the "Beecher" at the same time so delightful and so devastating.

One hesitates to say that another has died too young, remembering the tragic words of Sophocles that there is no such pain as length of life. Paxton Hibben was no friend to the idea of growing old. Yet one feels that he would have liked to finish his work, and fight a few more good fights. His death, untimely for himself, was calamitous for his friends. And not for these alone. The passing of such a man is an irreparable loss to American culture, for he represented all that is best and bravest in American life.

Caste Under Attack in India

By W. NORMAN BROWN

THE class had got on the subject of caste. "It is eternal," said a Brahman boy. "God divided people into these groups of high and low to punish or reward them for the actions of previous existences."

"But," I interposed, "does not biology teach us that all men are essentially similar, especially those within the same race?"

"Oh, sir," burst out another student passionately, "how can you say that? There is as much difference between a Brahman and a bhangi (sweeper) as between a man and a donkey."

The entire class nodded approval, with the exception of the half dozen Mohammedans, who looked disdainfully skeptical but by their silence seemed to acknowledge the futility of argument.

From the orthodox Hindu point of view these boys were entirely right; even the despised bhangi would agree. For caste is, briefly, the last word in group consciousness. Sanctioned by religion, it separates the Hindu community on many social matters into innumerable mutually exclusive groups, high and low, the privileged and the oppressed. The most important prohibitions are against intermarriage; lesser disabilities concern such things as eating and drinking. At the bottom of the scale are the Untouchables, "less than men," some sixty million strong, who are so low that they may not be touched by members of the higher castes without risk of ceremonial pollution. In many cases they may not approach within certain prescribed distances of the highest, nor use the same wells or even the same highways. Economically the bleakest poverty is their lot. They compose about one-fifth of the total population of India and about one-fourth of the Hindu community.

Centuries ago this social discrimination was justified intellectually by associating it with the doctrine of Karma (retribution for the act in rebirth). Men reap in one existence what they have sowed in others. The Untouchable of today is only the wicked of yesterday; and, if he lives righteously today, he will be the Brahman of tomorrow. It is not for us, whether we be high or low, to try to overthrow the decrees of an impersonal, irresistible cosmic law; our duty is to accept the present and strive only for a better future.

It is commonly stated that to think of abolishing caste would be as futile as to think of abolishing Hinduism itself. Indeed, the one would be the inevitable concomitant of the other. Efforts that have from time to time been made to overthrow caste have met with no permanent success; rather has caste itself carried the day. The most striking of its victories lie in concessions it has received from rival religions. Among Mohammedans there are converted groups that still retain caste regulations in social matters; and even the Brahmo Samaj, the liberal theistic society of Bengal, that in theory does not tolerate caste, in practice has not rid itself entirely of caste prejudices.

In an India run strictly according to Hindu theory the system of caste would be unshakable—eternal, as my student put it. But India is not so run and never has been. Throughout her long history thoughtful men have frequently expressed skepticism of the validity of caste, and the recurring impact of foreign invasion has often forced modification. The native reaction against caste is very old, almost as old as the institution. Five hundred years before Christ, we are told, the Buddha said that only he is truly a Brahman who lives the Brahman life—birth does not signify—and the sentiment has often been repeated by succeeding moralizers. To this day certain Hindu ascetic orders of the highest standing, whose members concentrate their efforts upon release from the beginningless round of rebirth, admit men of any caste, and once they are admitted caste is forgotten. There is plenty of respected authority to give moral support to attacks upon the system and to provide an antecedent body of opinion in favor of reform.

Of the diverse agencies that are at war with the institution some of the most effective operate against it only by indirection. The mightiest is the new learning from the West. When it was first introduced about a hundred years back, it was thought by missionaries, native reformers, and government officials alike that it would eliminate the undesirable features of the country's social institutions and the expectation has already had a modest fulfilment, with the prospect of a greater. And this, too, in spite of the fact that Hindu apologists, who would rationalize their native institutions by an appeal to modern science, seek support for caste in the teachings of biology concerning heredity. Yet even the most ardent Western eugenicist would scarcely aver that the human species can be separated into a thousand or more definitely graduated groups, Nordimaniacs to the contrary.

Still less premeditated has been the leveling influence of the railroad. Except in a few backward native states, when Hindus go traveling no provision is made to sort the Brahman from the leather worker. Outraged though he may be, the former must sit on the same seat with the latter, eat in his presence, submit to a hundred petty infringements of caste law. This situation caused considerable heartburning in the early days of the railways—there were those who preferred to travel by road—but that day has about passed. Now the infringements are tacitly condoned.

But it is the agencies which are operating intentionally against caste that are most conspicuous. Some of these are from without the pale of Hinduism; others from within. The chief of the former are the proselyting religions Christianity and Islam. These, being casteless, make caste a point of attack against the enemy, Hinduism. Appealing to the principle of "by their fruits ye shall know them," they represent that the evils accompanying caste and the whole institution are the result of belief in erroneous metaphysical doctrine. Obviously this argument is effective only with the lower castes; and so to them, all subtleties aside, the aggressor religions quite frankly offer social amelioration as the reward of conversion. These castes in turn are not difficult to persuade, readily submitting to the symbolical rites of baptism or circumcision as the new faith may chance to demand. In this way there comes to exist the phenomenon known as "mass conversion." Whole castes or whole villages whose inhabitants are all members of the same caste adopt a new creed, not knowing much about it doctrinally but finding it a great help amid the physical woes of life.

These wholesale conversions have inspired Hindu counter-religious activity and social reform which is conditioned by two general attitudes of mind. The one, orthodox, counsels alleviation of the miserable condition of the Untouchables but by no means advocates the abolishment of caste. The reformers find the conservative opposition very strong, yet from time to time effect the adoption by the Hindu Maha Sabha, the orthodox Hindu General Association, of measures diminishing specific evils. For example, in 1924, after a serious and successful struggle of the lower castes at a place called Vaikom, in southern India, for the right to use the roads past certain temples, the Maha Sabha adopted a resolution removing the ban in regard to schools, public wells, meeting-places, and temples.

Of the unorthodox Hindu attacks the most vigorous comes from the Arya Samaj, an organization about sixty years old, motivated by a spirit of religious nationalism, which regards the received faith as a left-handed corruption of the teachings of the great seers, repudiates it, and seeks to purify the community by restoring the religion of the Veda. The Arya Samaj has notions of the Vedic religion that are in many respects fantastic, but it is sound in finding no evidence in Vedic literature of the institution of caste as it is now known. As part of its program it would modify caste almost to extinction; thus, in competition with Islam and Christianity, it offers the lower castes about an equal degree of improvement in social status, and at the same time permits them to remain Hindus. In the colleges of northern India Arya Samaj propaganda is remarkably successful. If my class had been composed of fourth-year students, instead of first-year, there would have been some Hindus as well as Mohammedans to harbor doubts about the inviolable sanctity of caste, and, unlike the Mohammedans, they would not have sat silent.

It would be unfair to give the impression that the Hindu efforts in behalf of the Untouchables are not due to the workings of humanitarianism as well as of religious expediency. Quite the contrary! The humanitarian trait is known from historical records to have operated in India from at least the time of the Emperor Asoka, in the third century B. C., and it has never since been inactive. As the social teachings of the new world gradually penetrate India's consciousness, that spirit of humanitarianism slowly becomes aware of new fields for its operation and sets about eradicating evils, some of which have roots fixed in the traditions and prejudices of five millennia. A hundred years ago that spirit had moved Raja Ram Mohun Roy to establish a society of religious reform and to call for Western education. Within the memory of ourselves it led the late Mr. Gokhale to found the Servants of India Society that has worked untiringly for the uplift of the depressed classes. Today it drives Gandhi from one end of India to the other, in large cities and small villages alike, preaching against the crime of untouchability. Cries he: "If this is Hinduism, oh Lord, my fervent prayer is that the soonest it is destroyed the best!" For years he has associated in the fullest sense with the most lowly and despised, the sweeper, the scavenger, and performed their loathsome tasks, while he has supported his crusade with arguments of political, economic, religious, and purely humanitarian import. And he is far from being alone in his conviction of the need for social reform. Many fellow-Hindus are with him and with that other great Hindu, Rabindranath Tagore, who finds in the abolition of this social injustice a necessary precursor to any solid nationalism. If the success of Gandhi and those like-minded at first glance seems small, it is tremendous in consideration of the obstacles, and therein lies its chief significance. In the most backward sections of India, in regions where the upper castes ride in passenger coaches on the railroad trains but the lower have "reserved" quarters in open freight cars, he has induced Brahmans to sit side by side with Untouchables in public meeting. The effect of his work is cumulative, destined to continue with increase after he must stop. How could it be otherwise when it is so apposite to ideas that are surely, if slowly, establishing themselves in India?

The efforts to ease the unendurable strictures of caste could never be successful if they were only from above; with them must go conscious activity by the depressed classes themselves. There exists just that activity. Some of it is crude, as when the scavengers go on strike and throw a city with its primitive methods of sewage disposal into a panic, or when the Untouchables at Vaikom protested by public action against some of their disabilities. This is an unreasoning method of desperation, usually availing at the time but seldom producing a permanent gain. Planned for greater effect is the adoption of political means.

With the advent of political reform and the small beginnings of democratic, representative government, the lower orders, growing politically conscious, are becoming restive. Their opportunity lies in the fact that the right of franchise is determined by qualifications of education, property, or rank in civil or military service. Every time a man of the lower castes raises himself in any one of these respects, he improves slightly the social chances of himself and his fellows. The issue is especially well drawn in southern India, where the distinctions between the castes are most marked. There the community is divided into two camps, the Brahmans and the non-Brahmans, the latter including the Untouchables, and in the legislative councils the two groups are represented separately. The feeling is intense and has produced such results as the recent formation of a "Non-Brahman Confederation for South India," some of whose stated objects are "to promote good-will and unity among non-Brahman classes and communities of South India, by means of communal representation, social ameliorization, and ultimate fusion of all castes." Specific representation in the legislative bodies gives the proponents of such sentiments the chance to express them in action.

The results to date of the attacks on caste, although not large, are definite, compact, and prophetic. In some of the most enlightened quarters the system is clearly on the defensive; more positively a number of minor but concrete modifications have been effected. Members of different castes now associate much more freely than in the past and enforce fewer restrictions on inter-dining. Inter-marriage occurs occasionally. When a high-caste man goes to the hospital, he accepts intimate personal attention from low-caste orderlies that fifty years ago would not have been tolerated. In railway eating-rooms men of all castes eat together. In the North-West Frontier Provinces, so the 1921 Census reveals, Hindus observe no restrictions of inter-dining, and there is a strong tendency to widen the groups that may intermarry and narrow down those that may not. In Bengal, the most advanced province of India, certain social customs that used to be regarded as caste laws have suffered a sharp decline, as the veiling of women, and others are threatened, as enforced widowhood. In several parts of India child-marriage conditions, also under caste supervision, have been improved by the legal adoption of an age-of-consent bill. In the new legislative bodies the representatives of the lowest castes may sit with the highest, thus violating the traditional Hindu notion that governing should be left to a "ruling caste."

What has so far been accomplished against caste has been only the correction of abuses incident to it. Compromise, change, is preceding annihilation, if the latter is ever to come. Evil though caste may be in some respects, it can be safely discarded only piecemeal. "It fixes social precedence, the rules of marriage, of eating, of drinking, of worship, of a hundred other things, and last but not of least importance, it is the primary unit of government in India. The caste panchayat (council) is the most fundamental form of representative government in India." Thus Gilchrist in his "Indian Nationality." Each panchayat lays down the laws for its own caste, pronounces judgment upon offenders, and administers punishment. Relatively few of such cases are ever appealed to the courts, and cases have actually been removed from the courts to the panchayats for adjudication. To overthrow the caste system out of hand would be to turn Hindu society into complete chaos.

As the past of the caste system is obscure, particularly in regard to its origin, so also must be its future. Yet we may well expect a time in a reconstructed India when caste will be so altered that the present order will be regarded with as much curiosity as we in America now look upon the institution of chattel slavery that only a little over sixty years ago was a part of our social structure.

In the Driftway

OF the reading of books there is no end. Unfortunately. In common with most of his friends the Drifter is increasingly overwhelmed by the number of books which he should read but doesn't, which he wants to read but (for lack of time) can't, which he says he has read but hasn't. We ought to pass a law about it. Somebody once said that every time a new book came out he read an old one. But that is no longer possible; there aren't enough old books. And if there were, there isn't enough time. And anyhow some of the new books are better than some of the old ones. Que faire? as the French say—whatever that may mean.

* * * * *

THERE is no use in telling oneself that some day one will have more time and can read everything he wants to select; anybody but a sophomore knows that day will never come. The most the Drifter dares to dream is that in some tranquil future he will have a chance to read some of the books that in past years he has reviewed. There seemed to be good stuff in some of them, and the Drifter laid those volumes down with the promise that one day he would find out what it was. But he doubts if he will. If a moment to do so ever arrives, it is more likely to be spent in reviewing some new books. Nor can the Drifter cope with the flood of new publications, as some of his friends do, by ruling out certain great categories altogether. Some say: "I don't read fiction," or "I don't read poetry," or "I don't read science." But the Drifter is too catholic-minded for that. He bars practically nothing except books on Esperanto, success, and turnip growing. He has sometimes thought of finding someone with whom to pair, as they do in Congress when an important vote is coming up. Thus when asked by the lady beside him at a dinner party if he had read "Scarlet Love," he would be able to answer: "No, but you needn't look at me so scornfully, because the Rev. Dr. Whiteheart of All Angels' Church hasn't read it either. I wanted to read it, while he didn't; so we paired and both passed it up." Thus far, however, the scheme has miscarried because all the Drifter's clerical friends want to read "Scarlet Love." Perhaps a better idea would be to form a club and divide up all books that one "must read" among its members. Thus when cornered at a party by a learned-looking female who demands "What do you think of Professor Boredom's epoch-making book on 'The Delicatessen-Store Proprietor Looks at His Bologna'?" one will be able to draw a leaflet from his pocket and, handing it over, reply without panic: "The Readers' Mutual Insurance Society, to which I belong, assigned that volume to Dr. Stronghead of the department of astro-physics of Johns Hopkins University. Here is his report on it."

* * * * *

BUT while waiting for schemes like the above to take hold in the community, the Drifter has decided upon a simple yet drastic method of reducing the burden of his reading. He will pick out a single letter of the alphabet and read only authors whose names begin with it. When assailed as an ignoramus for not having read Theobald Scribbler's "Murky Morals" he can reply without shame: "The author's name begins with an 'S.' I read only men whose names begin with 'T.'" In practice probably it would most reduce one's reading to choose the letter "Q" or "X," but for purely personal reasons the Drifter has decided on "D." For if he tires of Dante, Disraeli, and the Devil, he can always call for the collected works of the Drifter. That will impose almost no burden on him at all, since these works have never been collected.

Max Eastman Replies

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I regret that a lecture tour delayed my answer to Albert Rhys Williams's criticisms of me in a review of Trotsky's book (The Nation, November 14). Williams, who is and has been for a long time a paid correspondent of the Stalin press, accuses me of "partisanship" because I defend the Opposition! He accuses me of conceiving the Stalin-Trotsky controversy as a "Zoroastrian conflict between forces of good and evil" because I describe it as a conflict of leaders expressing the pressure of class forces. He does not know that my description is purely Marxian. He accuses me of hero-worshipping Trotsky. Does he imagine that Rakovsky, Radek, Preobrazhensky, life-long leaders in Marxian science, have gone into exile for the principle of hero-worship? They are loyal to Trotsky, because Trotsky, like Lenin, is a revolutionary engineer and not an adventurer in political power or socialistic emotion.

"Fundamental to any understanding" of Lenin's party, Williams says, is the fact that its policies are and always have been determined not by the leaders but by the masses, that "the course of the revolution is controlled by the rank and file." The fact is that Lenin began his career by annihilating with the hammer blows of his political realism exactly this romantic talk about leaders and masses that Williams now advances with so much unction. A whole section of his great book "What to Do?" is devoted to it. "I assert," he said, "that no revolutionary movement can be durable without a solid organization of leaders capable of maintaining their succession." That is not "fundamental," however. The fundamental thing is this: "A party of revolutionary Marxists rejects radically" the idea that "any form of party organization is right absolutely and for all periods." Lenin "militarized" the party—to use his own word—during the armed struggle, but the moment the war ended he announced: "The needs of the current moment demand a new organizational form—Workers' Democracy."

It was for insisting upon the enactment of this new, post-revolutionary policy that Trotsky was originally attacked and denounced as a Menshevik. The struggle is still raging about this central theme. Trotsky's present book is essentially devoted to it. Albert Williams emerges from his village sojourn after Trotsky has been fighting this battle five years, and has been arrested and exiled for the principle of "control by the rank and file," and in a pretended review of a book in which Trotsky is still carrying on the fight underground, solemnly informs him that he "ignores" the fact that the revolution is controlled by the rank and file!

Williams denies the publisher's assertion that all the documents in Trotsky's book have been "suppressed and outlawed by the Stalin regime." Trotsky's speech, he says, "was published in Pravda, November 2, 1927." What was published in Pravda, November 2, was the stenographer's attempt to hear the first half of Trotsky's speech over the uproar of the Central Committee, who refused to let it go into the record. An entire page of the speech is represented in the report by three broken phrases. The fact that the speech was published in this mangled form is, moreover, expressly stated by me in my Explanatory Note.

"The substance of some of" the platform, he says, appeared in Pravda, November 14, and was sent abroad in Inprecor. What appeared in Pravda, November 14, was less than two newspaper pages of "Theses on the Work in the Villages," partly composed of paragraphs from the platform, partly not. The first six paragraphs are a description of how even these theses were suppressed until after they could not affect the elections. They were sent out in Inprecor, moreover, only after Trotsky was expelled from the party. In Inprecor, Vol. VII, No. 64, Stalin himself asserts that the party refused to print the Opposition platform. In Pravda, October 4, 1927, the arrest and imprisonment of Fischelev for printing the outlawed platform is candidly described. Nobody but Albert Williams pretends that the platform is not suppressed.

Finally, Williams states that "the Joffé letter appeared in the magazine Bolshevik." The Joffé letter is not a part of Trotsky's book. It was inserted by the editor in an appendix along with translations from the French which could not possibly have been suppressed in Russia. The publisher's announcement about documents in Trotsky's book naturally refers to Trotsky's documents. That is the whole basis upon which Albert Williams accuses Trotsky and me and Harcourt, Brace and Company of making a false statement. I repeat that all the documents in Trotsky's book are suppressed and outlawed in Soviet Russia.

Williams describes how "Trotsky's friend Feodorov" chose his own place of exile, joked about it with his friends, and took a merry trip down to "Zinoviev and Kamenev in exile about sixty miles from Moscow." Zinoviev and Kamenev deserted the Opposition under the threat of exile, "changed their opinions," and are merely awaiting readmittance to the party. Trotsky has denounced them in such terms that no member of the Opposition would go near them. Their "exile," and that of their friends, is indeed a joke. It has nothing to do with the forcible suppression of the Marxian Opposition, which is not a joke to anyone interested in the fate of the Russian Revolution.

Williams exclaims: "The party that wrought the greatest revolution in history become a crowd of dupes and cowards! Is it possible that anybody believes this is the real situation in Russia?" The proportion in the present party of old underground workers—who actually "wrought" the revolution in so far as it was wrought by a party—is 1.4 per cent (Pravda, October 9, 1927).

There could be no better proof of the intellectual degeneration of the Communist world-leadership than the reprinting of Albert Williams's non-Marxian, ignorant, and fact-ignoring article by the Daily Worker as a defense of Stalin's claim to be the inheritor of Lenin's science.

Reforming Police Practice

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Apropos of the recent discussion in your columns of police brutality and third-degree methods, some substitute for the third degree will have to be found before public opinion can be successfully raised to a pitch where a general demand for its abolition can be created. It is quite true that the recovery of stolen property and the conviction of many criminals may not be as important as the protection of general human rights, but the fact remains that many guilty are discovered and much property is restored to its owners by this method.

The rule that a man should not be compelled to testify against himself is not based on sound reasoning if no physical force is brought to bear upon the person so required to testify. The romantic notion that it is the duty of the police to discover and follow up clues à la Sherlock Holmes is absurd under modern urban conditions, with large populations, automobile facilities for escape, and organized criminal bands.

It is therefore evident that those who advocate abolition of the third degree will never make a strong case with the public until and unless they can show that the many criminals who have been captured in this way will not escape. There ought to be some civilized substitute for the medieval brutality that has grown up in our police system with regard to the solution of crime. It could possibly be worked out along the following lines: Some judicial officer should be allowed to examine the prisoner under oath and as soon as he is brought in. The prisoner should be compelled to answer questions on pain of imprisonment for contempt in the event he refuses to do so, the length of sentence for this contempt to be proportionate to the gravity of the offense of which he is suspected. It might be advisable to limit this right of interrogation to questions concerning which the veracity of the answer could be checked. This suggested penalty for perjury may not be in line with modern trends in criminological circles, but at least it would be a step forward from the present third-degree method.

Fear-Ridden California

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Announcement of a national committee to work for Mooney and Billings is interesting, as noble gestures always are, but I fear that your hope of results is doomed to disappointment. If there are any Californians on the committee they may as well let their colleagues understand at the start that the "unconditional pardon" of these men is "too much to ask," for the simple reason that there is not and never will be a public man in California with the courage to commit political suicide. The presentation of the facts in authoritative and orderly fashion by a responsible committee will not be without value. But let us have no illusions that Mr. Hoover or Governor Young or anybody else will ever do anything officially about the matter except ignore it.

Numbered Knowledge

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Your article on Science Says recalled the statement of one of our greatest modern physicists which should be etched into the minds of both scientist and layman. Lord Kelvin said.

When you can measure what you are speaking about and express it in numbers, you know something about it, and when you cannot measure it, when you cannot express it in numbers, your knowledge is of a meager and unsatisfactory kind. It may be the beginning of knowledge, but you have scarcely in your thought advanced to the stage of a science.

Why do some scientists talk so glibly of things theological when they would not speak so unreservedly of things scientific?

Christmas Eve: New York

By HAL SAUNDERS WHITE

Blue stars of evening whistle about our towers;
strike with thin christening
the chasms of our darkness.
Flakes of lighted windows flutter still into the windy alleys of our city:
we have raised our trees of Christmas, street to starry pinnacle
holy with candles.
Blow up, clear winter;
whirl your white snows.
Christ is born among the lilies;
he flows beneath the arc-lights—
milky garments blowing underneath the elevated.

This Week Through the Nose

THE book I have before me is not to be found on drug-store counters, nor does it lie among the heaps of Christmas gift volumes in our leading bookstores. Glancing at its cover, turning over its pages, it seems appropriate that this pearl should indeed be without price. Its fragile charms could not decently be thrown out into the market-place for the eyes and hands and purse of just anyone. No, this work is not for you and me—I shall not attempt to explain how a copy happened to stray into my hands—it is for the Few, the Elect and Discriminating, the Elegantly Sophisticated. And it is not for sale even to them, although in the long run it will quite certainly be paid for—and through the nose, if I may apply that phrase both in its metaphorical and in its most literal sense.

The name of the book is "The Romance of Perfume." It was written by Richard Le Gallienne, illustrated by George Barbier, and "done" on special antique rag paper at the printing-house of William Edwin Rudge. It is a beautiful piece of book-making: the drawings are charmingly reproduced in color; the type is delicate and decorative. As for the text, Mr. Le Gallienne has expressed in refined and subtly aromatic prose and verse the history, chemistry, sentiment, and poetry of perfume through the ages. He treats the subject with the high seriousness that any subject deserves if it is to be discussed on rag paper in type by Rudge and he attributes to the creation and proper use of perfumes most of the finer developments of civilization. He explains, for instance, that "time has been traveling with these sweet smells from the beginning; and though its history may be written in blood and tears, it is written, too, and perhaps more completely, in perfume." The author is not only lyrical, he is sometimes sheerly physiological—though in a nice way:

All that is sacred, pure, and innocent in man, all that suggests his starry origin and destiny, seems in some way to be most poignantly hinted at in perfume. Not merely fancifully and symbolically, but actually. The deeds of a good man are said to "smell sweet and blossom in the dust," and the innocence of children, the pure thoughts of youth, the holiness of saintly men and women, are known to give a sensible fragrance to their very bodies.

He describes the tastes in perfume of exquisites and frail, lovely ladies of all times; he quotes the poets; he cites the philosophers. He describes in tender rhapsody the Role of Woman. He becomes even more ecstatic in his discussion of the role of the perfumer—that noble and intricate compound of scientist, artist, philosopher, aesthete, psychologist, poet, scholar. Perfumers, indeed, "partake in all the divine and noble associations of perfume."

Whether they realized it or not, the men who first made perfumes were seeking to distil something like the essence of human romance, something that in an aromatic dew-drop would convey the drama of living, the intimations of the soul, and the spiritual thrill of love.

In fact, according to Mr. Le Gallienne, the perfumer is the only known example of an artist who loses nothing through his contact with trade. The fragrant essential oils of his being drown out the corrupting taint of business. Whereas "even poets," says Mr. Le Gallienne simply and frankly, "who sell their wares, however profitably, lose dignity by the transaction. We come to think of them rather as tradesmen than poets. The processes of business overpower the romantic quality of the thing they sell." Ah, Richard, how aptly you put it.

It was with a faint shiver of something more subtle than surprise that the reviewer slipped a dainty brochure from an envelope in the back of this frail volume and discovered that, at a smart new shop at 20 rue de la Paix (and if that is out of your way you can stop at any local drugstore) the various perfumes and other products of Mr. Richard Hudnut might be purchased. But only, I hope, by the very nicest people, those whose names are on selected lists and whose nostrils have learned to breathe the double-distilled atmosphere of delicate intoxication which pervades this ultimate consummation of the art of the American advertiser.

FREDA KIRCHWEY

The Virgin Queen

Elizabeth and Essex. By Lytton Strachey. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $3.75.

ALMOST every biography written in the English language since 1918 owes something to the example of Lytton Strachey. There is hardly a writer, good, bad, or indifferent, who has turned out a "life" since then without hoping to imitate at least one of the virtues which made "Eminent Victorians" famous, and yet it might fairly be said that Strachey himself belongs more truly to another and greater tradition than he does to that which goes by his name. He was, to be sure, clever and ironical and disrespectful of the dead, but these were no more than the accidents of his method. They might be, and they were, facilely imitated by dozens whose ease was mere superficiality and whose would-be irony was no more than impudence. But behind his work lay a richness of knowledge, an economy of statement, and a scrupulosity in the handling of facts not equaled by any who attempted to follow in his footsteps. Most of the others were, in a word, something less than "Stracheyesque," while he alone was more.

"Elizabeth and Essex" almost seems to have been intended to emphasize this fact. Turning from those Victorians whom he had helped to make seem inevitably ridiculous he has, in abandoning them, abandoned also any large dependence upon that fastidiously expressed disdain which may have seemed inseparable from his genius. Elizabeth has wrung respect from even his skeptical mind, and he has made no effort to utilize unsuitable occasions for the exercise of his ironic gifts. Telling a complicated and absorbing story with matchless ease, he has rightly assumed that it needed no adventitious ornament, and he has exercised the whole of his extraordinary skill in reconstructing from the voluminous documents a narrative which pauses only to sketch an unforgettable portrait or to speculate with calm detachment upon tangled motives which patience alone cannot even partly unravel. It is more brilliant in its own way than "Queen Victoria" was in another for the very reason that the brilliance inheres less often in a single phrase and reveals itself more conspicuously in the light which shines through the whole than in the flash of an epigram. Many of the most admired phrases of "Eminent Victorians" might have been thrown off by a wit; "Elizabeth and Essex" could have been written only by a man whose imagination was large enough and powerful enough to hold in one sustained embrace all the elements of a complicated situation.

This is not to say that the book does not contain scores of individual sentences pointed enough to invite quotation or that there are not occasional scenes which reveal Strachey's irony at its best—notably, for example, that which describes the death of the pious King Philip racked by hideous disease:

One thought alone troubled him: had he been remiss in the burning of heretics? He had burnt many, no doubt; but he might have burnt more. Was it because of this, perhaps, that he had not been quite as successful as he might have wished? . . . When he awoke, it was night and there was singing at the altar below him; a sacred candle was lighted and put into his hand, the flame, as he clutched it closer and closer, casting lurid shadows upon his face; and so, in ecstasy and in torment, in absurdity and in greatness, happy, miserable, horrible, and holy, King Philip went off, to meet the Trinity.

Yet it is less in scenes like this—and the whole of it is much finer than the fragmentary quotation of its conclusion can indicate—than in passages of less obviously picturesque effectiveness that the greatness of the book lies, and the tradition to which Strachey really belongs is merely that tradition of historical and biographical writing to which all the greatest works of either of those kinds belong—the tradition, that is to say, which can claim both Tacitus and Gibbon because the qualities which are requisite are simply vigor and incisiveness in a superlative degree.

The Sea's Last Frontier

John Cameron's Odyssey. Transcribed by Andrew Farrell. The Macmillan Company. $4.50.

"Cap'n George Fred." By George Fred Tilton. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $4.

Way for a Sailor. By Albert Richard Wetjen. The Century Company. $2.50.

The Cruise of the Northern Light. By Mrs. John Borden. The Macmillan Company. $4.50.

THE Pacific Ocean was the last frontier of the sea. I say "was" with intention, because as a frontier the Pacific has disappeared; the water is still there—lots of it—but the frontier is gone. It went during about the same period when our last land frontier—the West—was also passing away. By the end of the last century the Pacific had become safe and sane. At least it had become safe (except for such occasional hazards as typhoons and coral reefs), and if one was cast away on an island, or sailed into a harbor more conventionally on business or pleasure, he could hope for a happier fate than ending his career in the soup tureen of some South Sea chieftain.

Along with the capitulation of the once independent rulers of the Pacific islands to the white man, eliminating the danger—and so, of course, much of the romance—went another evolution. Simultaneously with the passing of the last frontier of the sea sails gave way to steam.

The four books listed above all touch the Pacific and, taken together, bridge the passing of the old South Seas, as also the shift from sail to steam. Captain Cameron left a Scotch home in 1867 to go to sea as a boy of seventeen. He followed the sea for thirty years, during which, he says: "I saw the end of the Age of Sail. I witnessed the passing of something fuller of pathos—the little brown kingdoms of the Pacific." But he spends no time sentimentalizing over either in his yarn, which tells of "blackbirding," shipwreck, privation, and dissipation when the Pacific was still untamed. Some seven years ago Mr. Farrell came into contact with Captain Cameron, and the upshot was that the skipper undertook to write his story, to be licked into shape by Mr. Farrell. It is a grand yarn and Mr. Farrell seems to have preserved its original flavor to a high degree.

Cap'n George Fred has written a similar yarn of hard-hitting, tough-living personal adventure. He was born on the island of Martha's Vineyard and, having a venturesome nature, was in the circumstances inexorably destined to roam the oceans. He tried to run away to sea twice as a small boy, but was caught and brought home both times. A third effort was more successful, and at the advanced age of fourteen he stowed away on a whaling ship in 1875. He chased whales thereafter in the Atlantic, Pacific, and Arctic oceans until 1908, when he made his last trip out of Frisco as skipper and part owner of the steam whaler Bowhead. He is now in charge of the Charles W. Morgan, the old New Bedford whaler which Colonel E. H. R. Green has preserved as a memorial of a once great New England industry. Cap'n George Fred's yarn is a racy and piquant one, and loses nothing by reason of the fact that the grammar is frequently that of the sea rather than that of the little red schoolhouse. There are appealing illustrations by Harry Neyland. A note acknowledges indebtedness to Joseph Chase Allen, who wrote a story of Cap'n George Fred's adventures for the Vineyard Gazette, "a portion of which appears as a part of this book." In its issue of November 16, last, the Vineyard Gazette says: "The 'portion' of the narrative by Mr. Allen thus referred to is virtually 100 per cent of it; and the 'part of the book' substantially identical with Mr. Allen's account consists of no fewer than 285 pages out of the 295."

In contrast to the books by Skipper Cameron and Cap'n George Fred, which deal primarily with the days of sail, is "Way for a Sailor," a story of the age of steam, an era as splendid in a new way—and even more spectacular—than that of wind-power. "Why for a Sailor" is fiction, decidedly better than one would expect whose acquaintance with the author has been gained from his stories in the Saturday Evening Post.

In contrast to all three of the other books is Mrs. Borden's narrative, but it is linked with Cap'n George Fred because it was on his recommendation that an executive officer, an old whaling captain, was obtained for the Northern Light, a motor yacht built to the order of Mrs. Borden's husband expressly to make a trip through the Bering Sea to the Arctic for big game. There is no hard life of the sailor in Mrs. Borden's narrative. It is the sea in silk pajamas. Because of that it annoys a little one who learned to know the sea on salt horse and weevily ship's biscuit; also because (1) I dislike lady big-game hunters and (2) I dislike big-game hunters of either sex. Indeed I hold in poor repute any kind of so-called sportsman with a gun. The only justification for shooting animals, big or little, is that of the honest-to-God pot-hunter who kills because he needs the food or the money. But one should not let his personal prejudices enter into his judgment of a book, should he?

Liberty at Any Price

Losing Liberty Judicially: Prohibitory and Kindred Laws Examined. By Thomas James Norton. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

A SCHOLARLY discussion of the proper scope of liberty today in relation to law would be very useful. Such a book might take up in turn the various clauses of our constitutional bills of rights and show the extent to which they are made effective in practice. Mr. Norton, however, gives us nothing of the sort. Very many important phases of liberty are either omitted entirely or mentioned casually, such as freedom of speech and assembly, immunity from searches and seizures, and the right not to testify against oneself. The book is, in fact, a controversial pamphlet against prohibition and social legislation.

The author's main contentions may be briefly stated thus: Individual liberty is desirable and traditionally American; therefore all governmental restraints on individual action, with a few limited exceptions, are bad. The second proposition may appear to flow naturally from the first, but such logical simplicity fails to consider the complicating factors in the problem of liberty which have been created by modern industry and the congestion of population. These factors play only a small part in the author's discussion, but they may be summarized as follows: If the individual of today is left free by the state to act or bargain completely as he pleases, his ignorance may lead him into action which will inflict permanent injury upon himself or upon others, and his economic necessities may force him into employment which is similarly disadvantageous. Consequently, it is not an adequate argument against a law restricting such action or employment to point out that it limits the person's liberty. For example, a law prohibiting a woman from working at night or for more than eight hours a day does undoubtedly encroach upon her liberty at the time of employment, but it may save her and her subsequent offspring from physical incapacities which would in the end limit her liberty and theirs still more. Consequently, such a law cannot properly be discussed as if it presented a sharp issue between liberty and restraint. The true alternatives are between liberty at the moment and continuous freedom. Each proposed piece of social legislation raises the question whether the continuous freedom of an individual is sufficiently endangered by the forbidden practice to warrant the limitation on his immediate freedom. The answer to this question will depend upon the particular circumstances of the case, and cannot be discovered by vague definitions of liberty.

Mr. Norton's book minimizes these difficulties. Furthermore it entirely ignores the duty of courts to refrain from declaring statutes unconstitutional merely because the judges think them undesirable. It is the task of the legislature to weigh the immediate liberty of the individual against the social advantages gained by restraint. The court might appraise the value of the opposing forces differently, but this is not enough reason for invalidating the statute. So long as it is reasonably possible that the legislature's judgment may be right, the court should scrupulously refuse to substitute its opinion for that of the elected representatives of the people. Mr. Norton says that the court should not deal with "a possibility." On the contrary, that is exactly the function of the court in a constitutional case. The author appears to assume that if he can only demonstrate that a minimum-wage law or a law requiring a railroad to eliminate grade crossings is objectionable the statute is therefore unconstitutional.

The decision upholding the Oklahoma guaranteed-bank-deposit law gave Mr. Justice Holmes an opportunity to express the wise method of judicial approach to novel legislation:

We must be cautious about pressing the broad words of the Fourteenth Amendment to a dryly logical extreme.

Many laws which it would be vain to ask the court to overthrow could be shown, easily enough, to transgress a scholastic interpretation of one or another of the great guaranties in the Bill of Rights. They more or less limit the liberty of the individual or they diminish property to a certain extent. We have few scientifically certain criteria of legislation, and as it often is difficult to mark the line where what is called the police power of the States is limited by the Constitution of the United States, judges should be slow to read into the latter a nolumus mutare as against the law-making power.

In this decision the Supreme Court exhibited a liberalism which has not been maintained in subsequent years. That the author singles it out for a long and vigorous attack, sufficiently illustrates his attitude.

It is a serious objection to Mr. Norton's adverse criticism of important decisions that he fails to recognize that they raise difficult issues which have been painstakingly reviewed by other writers. He does not cite their writings or indicate that he has read them. For example, his condemnation of the Michaelson case upholding the power of Congress to require a jury trial in criminal contempt cases pays no attention to the significant material on this question assembled by Professors Frankfurter and Landis (Harvard Law Review, June, 1924). His denunciation of McGrain vs. Daugherty, allowing the Senate to compel testimony in an investigation, ignores the contrary conclusions of Professor Landis (Harvard Law Review, December, 1926).

As a tract against prohibition the book is not apt to be effective, because it singles out a few decisions for attack without supplying their relation to the great body of Supreme Court decisions. For example, the author objects to the federal legislation aiding Dry States before the Eighteenth Amendment on the ground that the power to regulate interstate commerce does not include the power to prohibit it. Such a narrow interpretation is inconsistent with a decision sustaining the prohibition of interstate shipments of lottery tickets. His contention that "commerce" requires trade and transportation would make it impossible for the federal government to control the interstate broadcasting of radio concerts. His attempt to limit the clause by the circumstances when the Constitution was adopted would restrict "commerce" to sailing vessels and horse-drawn vehicles.

The Eighteenth Amendment he regards as unconstitutional because of the method of its adoption, but does not inform the reader that the Supreme Court reached a different conclusion in Rhode Island vs. Palmer. He attacks the amendment as superfluous because so many States had already adopted prohibition laws; and then denounces these same State laws as unconstitutional and condemns the federal legislation which protected Dry States from the liquor sold in their Wet neighbors. Mr. Norton cannot have it both ways. If the prior legislation was really invalid, the Eighteenth Amendment was necessary for prohibition.

The author would have bar examiners ask:

Where did Congress get power to enact the Cotton Futures Law, the Warehouse Law, the Cooperative Marketing Law? . . . What constitutional authority had it for setting up a Department of Labor and giving the head of it a seat in the Cabinet?

This seems an easy way to dispose of political activities which he dislikes; but he might be disturbed if they asked, as well:

What clause authorizes the Department of Agriculture, the deportation of radical aliens, the Smithsonian Institution, the Weather Bureau, paper currency, the national and Federal Reserve banks, and the use of marines to supervise Nicaraguan elections?

The tone of the book may be gathered from this sentence:

In June, 1928, for one example out of many, a party of over thirty instructors in our colleges and universities went to Russia to philosophize over conditions there instead of taking summer tutelage at home in the constitutional government of their country and, it might well be, in the history and uses of the Monroe Doctrine.

The reviewer would much prefer to praise, if he could, the work of a lawyer whose sixty-five years have created in him a sincere devotion to the Constitution. It is, however, necessary to challenge vigorously conclusions which, coming from a member of the bar and backed by the deservedly high reputation of the publishers, may give this book an unfortunate influence against legislation which is required to curb undesirable private enterprise and aid individuals who are unable to safeguard themselves. It is already much too easy to arouse popular and judicial hostility to such laws in the present period of reaction.

Books in Brief

The Story of Gilbert and Sullivan. By Isaac Goldberg. Simon and Schuster. $6.

Dr. Goldberg has spread a generous table at which gourmand Savoyards may feast to repletion. Here they will find the life-stories of Gilbert and of Sullivan culminating in the long Savoy partnership and separating again to their tragic endings, the history of each opera, excerpts from the scores, and a reprinting of many lost Bab Ballads—a lavish and appetizing banquet. In the biographical sections there are traces of an attempt at modern psychoanalytical interpretation. Dr. Goldberg's occasional deprecating comment seems a bit strained and far less convincing than his evident pride and delight in his subjects. With his wealth of fact, anecdote, and authenticated illustration he achieves a very pattern of a modern major general of the army of books that have recently been written on Gilbert and Sullivan.

J. S. Bach. A Biography. By Charles Sanford Terry. Oxford University. $7.50.

A painstaking but dull life of the great German master, written with scrupulous attention to detail, and with an obvious lack of imaginative insight. Throughout the volume there is too much chronicle of outward event and too little evaluation of character and inward life. The most interesting chapter, perhaps, contains a series of letters annotated by John Elias Bach, a cousin of Sebastian's; these letters contain rather interesting material, especially in reference to one of Bach's sons, by all accounts a wayward youth. The volume closes with a series of illustrations depicting bits of medieval Germany that were intimately associated with Bach's career.

Persian Pictures. By Gertrude Bell. With a Preface by Sir E. Denison Ross. Boni and Liveright. $3.

Readers of "The Letters of Gertrude Bell of Arabia" will remember that she went to Persia in her twenties and, besides translating Hafiz, wrote sketches of the country and of her experience there. These are here reprinted in a volume which will serve further to establish her as one of the most brilliant and imaginative of English women.

A London Reverie. Fifty-six Drawings by Joseph Pennell. Introductory Essay and Notes by J. C. Squire. The Macmillan Company. $8.

A book of romantic and impressionistic drawings of London twenty years ago selected by J. C. Squire, who contributes, by way of introduction, a pleasantly discursive essay on London, old and new, on his own acquaintance with the town and her more noted inhabitants, and, finally, on Pennell as a portrayer of London's charms as well as of some of her sorrier aspects. Although Squire fails to give Pennell high rank as an imaginative artist, he admires him as "a very skilful and dashing draftsman; and a restless experimenter. . . ."

Moving Pictures The Language of Images

AT this stage of the season's progress Eisenstein's "Ten Days That Shook the World" must be adjudged, among the movie offerings, as indisputably the most significant.

It is unnecessary to dwell on the fact that it is not a great picture. The critics who found it confusing and sometimes even boring were perfectly right. It does confuse people who are not familiar with the events of the October Revolution, who know nothing about the struggle between the different revolutionary factions, and to whom the topography of St. Petersburg is a sealed secret. Nor is it possible to deny that the picture often loses tempo by marking time over sequences which contain no action or are excessively repetitious. This much goes by general agreement into the debit side of the picture's account. Eisenstein himself admits the confusion and the lack of sustained dramatic development, pleading, in justification, pressure of time and aims and effects other than dramatic.

His plea shall be readily granted. One absolves him of blame for failing to produce drama, for with the magnificent material in his hands—material pictorially and dramatically as striking as that in his "Potemkin"—he could have easily achieved success if he had only chosen to repeat himself, or to follow the more conventional methods. Deliberately, however, he steered his course to a different goal—the goal not of a gradually prepared dramatic climax and its resolution but of a recital of events with the recitalist's personal "angle" conspicuously in evidence.

In the final analysis there are two schools of thought in the movie art of today. One school regards the motion picture as a procession of visual images related to one another through their meaning. The other school maintains that the only significant relationship is that based on the movement of the images, or their dynamic interplay. Hollywood, with the exception of Murnau and to some extent of King Vidor and Fejos, has always adhered to the first theory. To the same school belongs the whole modern group of Russian movie directors—Kuleshoff, Vertoff, Pudovkin, and Eisenstein. Only the Russians are developing their theory much farther than it ever occurred to the Americans to do. Not content with ignoring the Hollywood formula for dramatic construction, they are attempting to build the language of cinematic images. They believe that visual images, like words, can be joined into sentences, with the difference that the cementing medium is provided by the associations arising out of the meaning of the images—the logic of facts, so to speak—and not by the etymological forms, as in word sentences.

In "Ten Days That Shook the World" Eisenstein makes great play of this linguistic concept. The problem which engaged his special attention was that of the cinematic equivalent of metaphors and other figures of speech and qualifying clauses which in the verbal language serve to express the speaker's personal attitude to the subject of his narration. In the present case Eisenstein confined his personal reaction to satirical comment on the enemies of the revolution: he points a mocking finger at self-opinionated Kerensky by introducing the statue of a woman holding a wreath as if about to crown the hero, or by placing him side by side with the statue of Napoleon; he pokes fun at Kerensky's ministers by showing their dreamy musings to the accompaniment of heavenly melodies played on harps by ethereal ladies; he stresses the moral of a telephone conversation between Kerensky and a Cossack stableman by showing the buttocks of munching horses as a sign of the latter's "neutrality."

It is impossible to deny considerable interest to Eisenstein's experiment. It is suggestive. It may add to the resources of the cinema. It may bring about a new, essentially descriptive genre of the screen art. But it is fundamentally anti-dynamic and anti-dramatic, and as such lies off the main road of artistic progress in this medium. Far more important than these exercises in linguistic ideography are some of Eisenstein's startling visual effects produced by purely dynamic means. Such is the effect of machine-gun fire with its rapid staccato beat which is conveyed almost with the reality of sound. Eisenstein achieves this by alternating very rapidly two or three different sequences of guns and gunners, one sequence being light and the other dark, while differing also in the position of objects which results in the effect of intermittent spurts.

It remains to be added that in spite of its rococo discursiveness and its lack of organized dramatic development, "Ten Days That Shook the World" is replete with magnificent scenes of mass movement, with amazingly observed characters (a gallery of types that can never be forgotten), and with extremely striking and beautiful camera shots.

Of the other pictures lately shown on Broadway the most satisfying was "Shadows of Fear" (Therese Raquin)—a straightforward realistic drama directed by Jacques Feyder with a subtlety reminiscent of Chaplin's "Woman of Paris." Murnau's "Four Devils," though less firmly knit than his "Sunrise," and though sharing with the latter a certain lack of warmth in the make-up of its characters, shows the hand of a master in its flowing style, which shapes and modulates its equally fluid emotional content. "Lonesome," directed by Paul Fejos, has the same dynamic quality as "Four Devils" and shows many extremely interesting and suggestive effects such as the combination of a number of independent images within the same frame. It is marred by an unnecessary talking sequence. Eric von Stroheim's "Wedding March," redolent with the old-fashioned sentimentality of the days of "The Blue Danube," is interesting only for its insistence on realistic detail—an insistence so shrieking and sometimes so incongruous that it loses even the little virtue that one might be willing to concede it. "White Shadows," depicting the life of the South Sea islanders, is a very effective picture, in fact, too effective, with that characteristic Hollywood sleekness and prettifying. King Vidor's "Show People" is a fairly amusing comedy, though most of its laughs, one is sorry to say, come from the titles.

ALEXANDER BAKSHY

Drama Tour de Force

THE directors of the Theater Guild were shrewd in their determination to furnish no advance information concerning their latest production, for it is vastly more entertaining than any description would indicate. To say that it deals with the consternation produced when a young physicist discovers how to release the energy of the atom and to add further that the entire action takes place at a meeting of the British Cabinet is inevitably to suggest that the auditor is in for an evening of verbiage; but all gloomy forebodings notwithstanding, "Wings over Europe" (Martin Beck Theater) is an original and gripping play. Its authors, Robert Nichols and Maurice Brown, have handled their subject with a fine sense of its latent dramatic possibilities and, steering a difficult course between melodrama and disquisition, they have accomplished a tour de force more striking than any other recent attempt to put a world problem on the stage.

Doubtless they do not intend their dramatic simplification of the theme to be taken without a grain of salt. The young recluse who suddenly appears with proof that he has discovered a means whereby illimitable power may be placed in the hands of man and who asks the assembled rulers of England what they propose to do with it, is obviously a creature of fancy; for

The RUSSIAN LAND

by ALBERT RHYS WILLIAMS

"I have read The Russian Land with much pleasure and equally great enlightenment. Mr. Williams has a keen and penetrating eye. He reports what he sees with vividness and humor. I have found his descriptions of life among the peasants more instructive than anything else which I have read."—JOHN DEWEY.

At bookstores, or send a ONE DOLLAR BILL to New Republic, Inc., 421 West 21st Street, New York, for a copy postpaid. It is the 20th title in The New Republic DOLLAR SERIES.

when (or if) the atom is unlocked the discoverer of the secret will not be, like the hero of "Wings over Europe," instantaneously in a position either to turn all the wheels of the world without steam or to blow the terrestrial globe to bits. But this fantastic simplification serves admirably to convey an evident though almost ungraspable truth. For a century and a half man's power has been increasing at an accelerated rate, and there is every reason to suppose that it will continue to do so. Far from reaping all the advantages which would seem to result, he has, up to the present, been barely able to preserve himself from the destruction which his own machines threatened. What does he propose to do when the might of his electricity and his explosives, even now all but uncontrollable, is multiplied by infinity?

Some day he will be compelled to assume the responsibility of something like omnipotence so far as the physical world is concerned. Is there anything in his present behavior to suggest that he will know what to do with his power, or is it more likely that he will be, like the imaginary Cabinet in the present play, impotently all-powerful? Faced with its timidity, its selfishness, and its lack of any constructive imagination, our hero allows himself to be convinced that his discovery is not, as he had supposed, a road to the Golden Age, but he refuses to accept the suggestion that he sink it deeper than Prospero's books. Mankind is obviously a failure. If its sufferings have been due, not to lack of power, but to lack of good-will, there is no further hope for it and no good in postponing the disaster which must inevitably come. Perhaps Nature is conducting a more successful experiment upon some other globe now revolving about some remoter sun. As for this one, he will blow it to bits.

Obviously the chief difficulty inherent in such a theme is the result of its ill-defined magnitude, for too much subject is as dangerous to a playwright as too little. Drama must take place at some point localized in time and space, and the success of "Wings over Europe" depends largely upon the fact that its authors, realizing this, have not permitted their speculations to carry them too far afield. Allowing its implications to remain merely implications, they have centered their attention upon the effect of the physicist's revelation upon a diversified group of individual human beings and made the drama itself to consist, to a very considerable extent, in the interplay between these concrete personages. If dramatic action be thought of as inevitably involving physical commotion, then "Wings over Europe" is almost devoid of it, but if it be considered to consist in the sudden shifting back and forth of the spiritual balance of power between characters, then the play has a great deal, for it is never either repetitious or static. There is a continuous movement from the moment when the Cabinet first hears with impatient incredulity the tremendous announcement until it is gradually reduced to its realization that the end is at hand, and there is a continuous suspense for the audience which can never anticipate the next development.

"Wings over Europe" belongs perhaps to the class of "stunt" plays, but it has a freshness particularly grateful in a stale season and there is only one fault to find with an excellent production in which Ernest Crawford, Alexander Kirkland, and Frank Conroy take the leads; it should be housed in a more intimate theater instead of being, as it is, somewhat lost in the Byzantine immensities of the Martin Beck.

"Whoopee" (New Amsterdam Theater) is produced with Mr. Ziegfeld's usual magnificence. The presence of Eddie Cantor gives it a place very near the top of contemporary musical comedies.

The New Playwrights' group (temporarily housed at the Provincetown Theater) is offering an extremely ragged but occasionally powerful production of Upton Sinclair's "Singing Jailbirds." The play, long known in print, is almost as uncertain as the production. Forceful writing alternates with passages of impossibly stilted dialogue, and dramatic scenes with tepid discourses upon the future of the proletariat.

Internal Conflict in China

By WILLIAM PROHME

THE new "National Government, Republic of China," now that it has defined its form under the five Yuan system, subsidiary to a State Council headed by a military leader, begins its career with every sign of lively realism in approaching the problem of China's foreign relations.

It already has succeeded in winning de jure recognition from the United States, implied in the fiscal treaty of July acknowledging China's autonomy in tariff regulations commencing January 1, 1929. That acknowledgment, of course, may not mean much unless other Powers likewise approve it, for the "most-favored-nation" clause still holds. Nevertheless it is a step ahead.

It has liquidated the Nanking affair of March, 1927, with nearly all the nations involved. It is negotiating new commercial treaties with several European Powers, and one country, Germany, is preparing to set up its legation (which may become an embassy) at Nanking, recognizing by that act that Nanking is definitely the new capital. Only with Japan do negotiations lag, due to the obstinacy of General Tanaka's Government about the Tsinan affair of last May and about the status of Manchuria.

In foreign relations one may say that the present National Government has its major problems well in hand and on the road toward proper settlement. But what of its approach to domestic problems? There the story seems to be different. In fact, in this field the new regime is showing the most complete blindness. It proceeds as if domestic problems would settle themselves by themselves, if only foreign problems can be solved and a sound working administration be set up.

The major domestic problems in China have to do with the land, the status of the peasant and the improvement of his condition, trade-union organization and development. In a country where from 85 to 90 per cent of the people are peasants and workers, it is idle to say that problems dealing with their welfare can be secondary and may be left until after problems of foreign relations and internal administration are settled. To say that is to argue that one can set up government in a vacuum, without regard to the very bases of the society to be governed.

Yet the attitude of the present regime at Nanking has been one of active enmity against labor and the peasantry, on the ground that these elements, by their "impatience" to have their problems looked into, are making disturbances that interfere with the "settled conditions" necessary for working out foreign and administrative problems. In short, the present regime is placing the cart before the horse.

In provinces like Hunan, Kiangsi, and Hupeh, and also in Kwangtung, where echoes of 1927's peasant uprisings still are heard in armed bands of peasants raiding grain warehouses of the rich gentry (the usurers of the country, who keep so large a part of China's peasantry in perpetual chains of debt) the armies of Nanking's Government undertake punitive expeditions against what are dubbed "bandits" or "communists." These uprisings are characterized by such a man as Sir Cecil Clementi, Governor of Hongkong, as "echoes of Borodin's influence." But Admiral Mark Bristol, who commands America's fleet in China's waters, told the British-American Association at Peking a short time ago that they were "the inevitable revolt of oppressed people against their oppressors."

In the field of labor there has been the most ruthless suppression. Labor unions were prohibited in Peking and Tientsin, by order of General Yen Hsi-shan, that "model governor" of Shansi. In Shanghai, ever since Chiang Kai-shek and the rich merchants have called the tune there, only government-controlled Fascist unions have been allowed. The All-China Federation of Labor and the Shanghai Federation of Labor are interdicted organizations, but they exist underground. In Canton, where suppression has been more bloody than anywhere else in China, labor-union members and peasant leaders are this very day being executed.

The new Government's official attitude toward labor is clearly exposed in a manifesto of October 17, issued "with a view," according to the official Kuo Min News Agency, "to clarifying the position of the Kuomintang, and outlining its position as regards the country's working classes." This manifesto tells the workers to wait until the revolution is completed, until unity is achieved, until China's foreign relations are settled, until the Government's working administration is running smoothly. It says in part:

... Our comrades in the field of industry must realize that the success of the revolution is yet far off. They must know that while militarism within has been exterminated, dangers from abroad are still to be overcome. . . . Our workers in striving for a better economic and social position must not start from their individual position as such, for then it will merely mean class struggle within the country which will surely drag them down. They must strive in unison as citizens of China against dangers from abroad; for we must first raise the position of our country before the status of our workers can be improved. They must think in terms of, and strive for, national progress and advancement instead of individual gain.

Our workers must realize that the secret of our national preservation and progress is our country's historical and cultural continuity. Our present society is the result of hundreds of years of activity on the part of our forefathers, and it is our duty to continue their activity in order that we may bequeath this inheritance from our forebears to our descendants.

(This passage suggests that the writer of the manifesto probably remembers Dr. Nicholas Murray Butler's famous admonition of 1920, that the highest duty of American citizens is to hand down to coming generations the institutions of the revolutionary fathers, unmarred, unchanged, immaculate and pure.)

In order to do so, however, we must not think of the immediate advantages ahead and try only to secure those enjoyments for ourselves in the short span of years of our own lives. We must consider the welfare of our descendants and our responsibilities to them.

... It is the desire of the Kuomintang that the workers refrain from making unreasonable demands upon society and the Government, and cooperate with the authorities in maintaining general stability so that the Government can proceed with various reconstruction schemes which are designed for the ultimate benefit of the entire country. If our workers persist in showing what the Communists term "class consciousness," thus breaking the harmony of society to their own detriment, it will be impossible even for the entire Chinese people to survive, not to say the workers alone.

The pious vagueness of all this convinces trade-union leaders that they will get no help from the present regime. Intellectual leaders in the labor movement, who happen also to have an ear for British slang, call it "eye-wash," and proceed with their underground expansion of the All-China Federation of Labor, the outlaw body which has had no open recognition since the spring of 1927.

The so-called "radical" movement goes on everywhere, led largely by peasant and labor leaders. The students, from Peking down to Canton, bereft of the opportunity for "action" and frowned upon by the government which no longer needs them and whose spokesmen tell them to "pay attention to their books and let politics alone," are everywhere in more or less open revolt.

The "reign of terror" against all proletarian activity is resulting, according to an Associated Press mail story sent out from Shanghai in October, in "opposition to this rightist government" that is "growing noticeably in these recent months."

In the seeming peace and unity of China, therefore, which wins so many kindly editorial comments in so many unexpected quarters of the world's press, there is underground war and conflict. The acknowledged leader of the non-Communist Left in the Kuomintang, Mrs. Sun Yat-sen, stands aloof in Europe, disdaining to cooperate with this regime, which, she has said, befouls and denies the program of her late husband, leader of the revolution and founder of the Kuomintang.

All of which leads to the conclusion that the present "National Government, Republic of China" will have this historic role to play: to clear up China's relations with the world. Beyond that it has neither the will nor the desire, the temperament nor the understanding, to do anything. The solution of China's domestic problems must be left for a later regime, which will have to be dominated by the present outlaws and outcasts of the Left. A persistence by the present regime in its present policies toward labor and the peasants will hasten the return of these Leftists to power.
